DEDICATION.

“tongues,” is too considerate to discourage even what may tend but in a small degree to illustrate the literature of England.

With the highest sentiments of gratitude for the permission to inscribe the work to Your Royal Highness, and with all dutiful respect, I have the honour to be,

May it please Your Royal Highness,

Your most faithful and devoted Servant,

THE Dictionary of Dr. Johnson has been rightly pronounced a wonderful achievement of genius and labour. Yet Dr. Johnson admitted, that, in forming it, he had not satisfied his own expectations; and, after a revision of it, he replied to a * friend, who had sent him additions too late to be inserted, that if many readers had been as judicious, as diligent, and as communicative, the Dictionary would have been better. He probably, therefore, would not have scorned an augmentation or correction, though offered by one of less attainments than his friend, if offered with due respect.

This consideration supports, in some degree, the mind of the present editor. For, though he feels all the diffidence which most men would feel in occasionally questioning the authority of Dr. Johnson, he is induced to hope, that the warmest admirers of that incomparable man will not disparage the industry which he himself might perhaps have countenanced.

The fruits, such as they are, of the present editor's employment, will be found in an abundant supply of words which have hitherto been omitted; in a rectification of many which etymology, in particular, requires; and in exemplifying several which are without illustration. These words are often the property of authors, the "† very dust of whose writings is gold;" of Pearson, and of Barrow, whose names might very frequently have graced the pages of a national Dictionary; of Bacon and Raleigh, of Jeremy Taylor, of Milton, and Hammond, and Hall, and many others, whose words indeed have largely, but of which the stock is not exhausted, conveyed, in the example, "† some elegance of language, or some precept of prudence or piety." These words commend to notice many writers also, who have been unjustly neglected or slightly examined; men who have taught with energy the lessons of human life, and who have explored with accuracy

Additions and corrections, which had been made by this gentleman, have been entrusted to the present editor; of which, as well as of other communications made to him with great liberality and without solicitation, he will, in the Introduction to this work, give an explicit account.

pleasure to incorporate his labours. He had doubtless some talents for research ; but he has lowered them by perpetually insulting the memory of Johnson, whom he brands with " muddiness of intellect." Not such have been the exertions of the Reverend Mr Boucher ; of which a specimen has been given to the publick in the first letter of the alphabet, and which abundantly, as well as most learnedly shows how much remains to be done, in order to have a perfect view of the English Language.

The proprietors of this work have, with unsolicited kindness, procured, for the present editor's inspection, the papers of the late Mr. Horne Tooker, and his copy of Johnson's Dictionary, with some marginal remarks ; the late Mr. Henshall's interleaved but slightly noted copy of the same ; and the late Mr. Eyre's copy, with additional references in the margin. But these have yielded no great harvest of intelligence. What has been gained, will be more fully detailed, with other obligations to his friends, from whom he must not here omit to mention that he has received some remarks of the late Mr. Malone, in the general Introduction to this work.

After all, what the present editor has done, he considers but as dust in the balance, when weighed against the work of Dr. Johnson. He is content, if his countrymen shall admit that he has contributed somewhat towards that which many hands will not exhaust ; that his efforts, though imperfect, are not useless. And if any should severely insist, that he ought to have preserved so much caution through the work, as rarely to sink into negligence ; and to have obtained so much knowledge of all its parts, as seldom to fail by ignorance ; he has only to hope that their frequent disappointment may be consoled by the following words : " † He that endureth no faults in other men's writings must only read his own, wherein for the most part all appeareth white. Quotation, mistakes, inadvertency, expedition, and human lapses, may make not only moles, but warts, in learned authors ; who notwithstanding, being judged by the capital matter, admit not of disparagement."

“Perfection is unattainable, but nearer and nearer approaches may be made; and finding my Dictionary about to be reprinted, I have endeavoured, by a revisal, to make it less reprehensible. I will not deny, that I found many parts requiring emendation, and many more capable of improvement. Many faults I have corrected, some superfluities I have taken away, and some deficiencies I have supplied: I have methodised some parts that were disordered, and illuminated some that were obscure. Yet the changes or additions bear a very small proportion to the whole. The critick will now have less to object, but the student who has bought any of the former copies needs not repent; he will not, without nice collation, perceive how they differ; and usefulness seldom depends upon little things.

“For negligence, or deficiency, I have perhaps not need of more apology than the nature of the work will furnish: I have left that inaccurate which never was made exact, and that imperfect which never was completed.”—

Of the present augmented edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary the proprietors, as I am informed, intend to publish as soon as possible, in the octavo size, an abridgement; in which I have respectfully, and for unanswerable reasons, declined any concern whatever. And I now relinquish altogether the labours of lexicography, with the hope, that my omissions and imperfections may stimulate the accurate and the judicious so to form a dictionary of our language, as not to subject it to any of the animadversions which will be made on my attempt.

INTRODUCTION.

THE nature and design of the additions and alterations, which are made in the present publication of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, are explained in the preceding Advertisement. It remains to specify my obligations to others, in the preparation of the work ; and to introduce to the reader's notice such other circumstances, connected with the progress of it, as it becomes me to state.

The first, and in my own opinion the most important, obligation which I have to acknowledge, is to James Boswell, Esq. of the Middle Temple, the son of the biographer of Johnson, the friend of the late Edmond Malone, and a zealous promoter of the cause of literature. Among the valuable books of Mr. Malone, consigned to the care of Mr. Boswell, there was a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary interleaved, and bound in three volumes ; in which Mr. Malone had "inserted a great number of additional words and examples omitted by Johnson." With the frankness, which distinguishes the real lover of learning, Mr. Boswell sent these volumes to me, of the existence of which I had not before known ; allowing me, at the same time, to extract any of the observations, which Mr. Malone had made, for the purpose of the present work. The accuracy and diligence of Mr. Malone could not but render the business of examining his volumes very pleasing ; nor fail to afford abundant service towards the labour in which I was employed. His statement, at the beginning of the first of the volumes, is this : " 1052 manuscript remarks in the three volumes of this most valuable Dictionary : for the greater part I am answerable : those, to which D is subscribed, were written by Samuel Dyer." — Of these additional words and examples a large number is taken from the works of Bishop Hall in particular, and from those of other writers in the reigns of Elizabeth and her successor ; most of which, in the course of my studies, had been long since selected also by myself ; the fitness of which for my design, I was therefore proud to find corroborated by the judgement of Mr. Malone. That I have omitted many of his additions, I will not conceal ; that I have, in particular cases, expressly summoned him to my aid, will be obvious ; and that he would not have disdained the manner in which I have adopted any of his improvements, I am persuaded.

To the President and Fellows of Sion College, I am next to say that, in like manner, I am indebted for an unsolicited offer of the use of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, belonging to their library; in the margins of which, references to authors for examples where several words have none, and also some new words with examples, are pointed out by the late Rev. Mr. Bagshaw, of Bromley, one of the friends of Dr. Johnson. But they are principally mere references, in number about 600, and chiefly to our theological writers; of which some agree with examples cited by Mr. Malone or myself, and some with others which have appeared in Mr. Mason's Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. Etymological remarks are rarely found among these proofs of Mr. Bagshaw's diligence. By the perusal of the whole, however, I have been much gratified, as well as often confirmed in matters which had before excited hesitation.

For the sight of an interleaved copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, which belonged to the late Rev. Mr. Henshall, I have been obliged to Messrs. Longman and Co. booksellers. The copy is formed into four volumes: that, which ends with the letter C, contains the most of his fanciful, however learned, annotations: the rest are thinly sown with remarks. I am not aware of having derived advantage from this favour.

From the same gentlemen I received another copy of the Dictionary, filled with marginal remarks by the late Rev. Mr. Eyre. Though these remarks, like Mr. Bagshaw's, are mostly references; and though they are references principally to recent publications, as reviews and magazines, of which, at the beginning of the book, Mr. Eyre gives a list; as plays and novels also of our own days; one cannot but admire the indefatigable industry of the scholiast, in crowding the margins with words or sentences, intended (I should suppose in very many instances) rather for future consideration, than for decided addition. Had the same attention been paid to our old authors, the labour of Mr. Eyre would have been invaluable. Probably, not having access to many writers of this description, Mr. Eyre availed himself of the less useful information within his reach; and bestowed acute as well as diligent investigation upon objects not always deserving it. Sometimes, though rarely, he has given a citation from a book of elder times; a citation generally admissible. The writer of a future dictionary may perhaps often betake himself to this storehouse of information. What I have scrupled to adopt, may, at no distant period, demand, on encreasing authority, admission into an English dictionary; and eccentric terms, which have been employed by questionable writers to express common conceptions, may perhaps lose their novelty, or their quaintness, in sage and solemn usage.

There remains to be expressed another obligation to these gentlemen for the use of several books and papers, which were the property of the late Mr. Horne Tooke. Of these in due order. The first has been a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in two folio volumes, with marginal notes; in which there are not fifty that can be of service to any lexicographer, (as I perhaps mistakingly conceive,) who is in possession of the Diversions of Purley. This copy had been purchased at the sale of Mr. Tooke's library, and is said to have been intended by the purchaser to be the basis of a new English dictionary. By the purchaser, however, it was consigned to Messrs. Longman and Co.; and the publick will with me lament, that any intention should have been impeded, of which the furtherance might at once have crushed my humble attempt. At the beginning of this copy, there are the names of some authors entered; on the preface there are some remarks, not of the most liberal character; and to the history of the language, and to the grammar, there is no addition of importance. The Heracles of Mr. Harris, another of Mr. Tooke's books, abounding with his notes of haughtiest mood, has been of no use whatever to my purpose. His folio copy of Beaumont and Fletcher, with words marked in the margins, (an employment in which he was assisted by a distinguished living character,) has been of great service to me; being the same edition as that from which my own remarks had been formed, and thus by easy reference confirming my choice with respect to dubious expressions, as well as pointing out others which I had overpassed. The Gothick and Saxon dictionary of Lye, edited by Mr. Manning, was also among the printed volumes of Mr. Tooke entrusted to me; upon which the manuscript remarks afforded no intelligence of consequence. I come next to the observations upon our language, which Mr. Tooke left in manuscript books; at least such as I have examined. These were fifteen quarto books, containing the words of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in regular order, with some additions, more particularly adverbs and substantives derived from adjectives; but without example, or other notice than the mere entry of the word. This employment occasionally suggested to me the introduction of such words into the dictionary, especially when I could support them by example. And therefore to this employment of Mr. Tooke I gladly acknowledge myself indebted. Six quarto books, containing words arranged according to terminations, as in and, ard, ed, est, &c. have been without use to me, however they might have been intended for some valuable purpose by Mr. Tooke. Of a quarto, entitled roots, which are Latin verbs, with English words stated to be derived from them, I found no occasion to avail myself. In another, entitled Gothic roots, consisting of not many written pages, there was little to be observed, which was not already in Lye. Out of three quartos, entitled Index Expurgatorius, or a list of such words as Mr. Tooke would have discharged from Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, I have made no selection; some, which he rejects, being supported by no mean authority; and some, being local, deserving to be retained. I think that in the letter A the arbitrary abolitions amount to about 800. Besides these books, there was a great variety of cards, upon which were written terminations entered in the quarto volumes, and other intended verbal arrangements. There was also one set, denouncing certain words as false English, and arranged according to terminations, which I have printed at the close of this Dictionary; both as it is a specimen of the employment which I have been describing, and as a criticism, rarely to be questioned. Such is the account of the papers, left by Mr. Tooke, which I have seen; which indicate, I think, that he had once intended to compile an English Dictionary. If more had been left to show, that he had other illustrations to offer, not dissimilar to those which his Diversions of Purley had communicated, his friends would surely not have suffered them to slumber in inglorious silence. For that work, in which he has so acutely illustrated an ancient system, he has the thanks of every sound philologist; though it has been well remarked, that he has not laid in it, as he imagined, the foundation for future philosophers.

I am now to offer my thanks to the Rev. Archdeacon Churton, and the Rev. J. B. Blakeway; by whose remarks, communicated without solicitation, and without conditions, I have been, in several instances, materially assisted: to John Nichols, Esq. for the perusal of papers, illustrating our language, which were written by the late Dr. Pegge, and which offered, though mostly interwoven into his own publications, a glancing or two to be gathered: to Roger Wilbraham, Esq. for the use of some uncommon books in his possession, and for some pertinent observations: and to Martin Whish, Esq. of whose attention, though directing me not seldom to what my own researches had also marked, I cannot express too grateful a sense, when I consider the largeness of the communications, and the liberality with which they were made. Some notices have been sent by others, whose good intentions I respect, in number and importance too inconsiderable to require further acknowledgement. Nor have I been without obligation, in the progress of my employment, to criticisms which wanted as well as to those which possessed the writer's name; in which, on the one hand, much wit has been employed upon what are justly termed my feeble exertions; and, on the other, indignation has hurled its thunderbolts at my presumption; in which, pretended illustrations and detections of mistake, (penned in the bewitching hours of self-delusion,) have been also proposed; which upon examination have only discovered how liable we all are to be deceived, and how much it behoves the maker or augments of a dictionary not always to rely implicitly upon proffered kindness, nor wholly to disregard the oppositions of sportive or malicious ingenuity.

That there may soon be new makers of an English dictionary, it is warrantable to conjecture, knowing, as I do, that other gentlemen have bestowed attention upon the subject; the incorporation of whose services, not altogether free from conditions, it was beyond my power, if it had been my wish, after my plan was formed, to make. The treasures which now remain in their own management, undispersed, may therefore, if the owners choose, be laid before the publick, without intermixture, and without omission.

The History of the English Language I have augmented with some new materials. To the Grammar I have added Notes, which are principally illustrative of orthography, and of the etymological system so powerfully recalled to modern notice by Mr. Tooke; to which are subjoined the grammatical remarks of Mr. Tyrwhitt upon our ancient language. For the convenience of the volumes the Grammar has its place in the last. After it follows a List of Authors; of whom many perhaps might be considered too obscure to have been formally cited in the dictionary, if it could be denied, in the words of Johnson, that “§ the riches of the English tongue are much greater than they are commonly supposed; that many useful and valuable books lie buried in shops and libraries unknown and unexamined, unless some lucky compiler opens them by chance, and finds an easy spoil of wit and learning.” Of old authors, as of old words, let no one make too hasty a rejection. Sarcasm may expose its impotence, as well as ignorance, in arraiging either; unaccustomed to observe that from the one, (the partially “unknown and unexamined,”) our best writers have occasionally not disdained to draw wisdom; and that with the other they have warranted the use of terms, which the jeer of modern hypercriticism would discard. It may be easy, though it is not “† pleasant without scurrility,” if I may use Sir Nathaniel’s phrase, to present both words and sentences, with the juxtaposition of a quaint title, in a manner so detached, as to excite no favourable opinion of the book, or rather to destroy all belief that it possesses any power of conveying knowledge. I might have omitted some citations from modern writers. But the canons yet remain to be promulged, by which the extremes of opposite tastes are to be settled. The precise period, at which antiquity is to be regarded as a rule, is not yet determined: the standard “‡ one inclines to remove to the distance of a century and a half; another may, with as good reason, fix it three centuries backwards; and another, six.” May we then expect decision upon these points from a society for refining the language, and fixing its standard? Alas, Johnson himself has told us, that “§ the edicts of an English Academy would probably be read by many, only that they might be sure to disobey them!”

For the paucity of curious or satisfactory information, which my additions and alterations exhibit; and for the abundance of inaccuracies and faults which have escaped my care; I may not, I hope, solicit the pardon of the candid reader in vain. I should indeed have been thrown into irrecoverable confusion and dismay, in reconsidering what I have done, if for an humble attendant also there were not consolation in the words of the master, which first accompanied the fourth edition of his Dictionary.

“Many are the works of human industry, which to begin and finish are hardly granted to the same man. He that undertakes to compile a Dictionary, undertakes that, which, if it comprehends the full extent of his design, he knows himself unable to perform. Yet his labours, though deficient, may be ‖ useful, and, with the hope of this inferior praise, he must incite his activity, and solace his weariness.”

‖ “Dans la dernière séance de l’Académie, il [Voltaire] parla fort long-temps et avec la plus grande chaleur sur l’utilité d’un nouveau Dictionnaire conçu à peu près sur la même plan que celui de l’Encyclopédie, ou celui de Johnson.” Grimm, Mem. tom. ii.

DR. JOHNSON'S PREFACE.

IT is the fate of those, who toil at the lower employments of life, to be rather driven by the fear of evil, than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure, without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries; whom mankind have considered, not as the pupil but the slave of science, the pioneer of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths, through which Learning and Genius press forward to conquest and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other author may aspire to praise; the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach, and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a Dictionary of the English Language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected; suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance; resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion; and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetick without rules; wherever I turned my view, there was perplexity to be disentangled, and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and, noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated in time the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me: experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing; and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the ORTHOGRAPHY, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies, which, though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things; and which require only to be registered, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded: but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

As language was at its beginning merely oral, all words of necessary or common use were spoken before they were written; and, while they were unfixed by any visible signs, must have been spoken with great diversity, as we now observe those, who cannot read, catch sounds imperfectly, and utter them negligently. When this wild and barbarous jargon was first reduced to an alphabet, every penman endeavoured to express, as he could, the sounds which he was accustomed to pronounce or to receive, and vitiated in writing such words as were already vitiated in speech. The powers of the letters, when they were applied to a new language, must have been vague and unsettled, and therefore different hands would exhibit the same sound by different combinations.

From this uncertain pronunciation arise in a great part the various dialects of the same country, which will always be observed to grow fewer, and less different, as books are multiplied; and, from this arbitrary representation of sounds by letters, proceeds that diversity of spelling observable in the Saxon remains, and I suppose in the first books of every nation, which perplexes or destroys analogy, and produces anomalous formations, that, being once incorporated, can never be afterwards dismissed or reformed.

Of this kind are the derivatives length from long, strength from strong, darling from dear, breadth from broad; from dry, drought, and from high, height, which Milton, in zeal for analogy, writes highth: "Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?" to change all would be too much, and to change one is nothing.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified, by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Such defects are not errors in orthography, but spots of barbarity impressed so deep in the English language, that criticism can never wash them away: these therefore must be permitted to remain untouched: but many words have likewise been altered by accident, or depraved by ignorance, as the pronunciation of the vulgar has been weakly followed; and some still continue to be variously written, as authors differ in their care or skill: of these it was proper to inquire the true orthography, which I have always considered as depending on their derivation, and have therefore referred them to their original languages: thus I write enchant, enchantment, enchanter, after the French, and incantation after the Latin; thus entire is chosen rather than intire, because it passed to us not from the Latin integer, but from the French entier.

Of many words it is difficult to say whether they were immediately received from the Latin or the French, since, at the time when we had dominions in France, we had Latin service in our churches. It is, however, my opinion, that the French gene-fully supplied us; for we have few Latin words among the terms of domestic use, which are not French: but many French, which are very remote from Latin.

Even in words of which the derivation is apparent, I have been often obliged to sacrifice uniformity to custom; thus I write, in compliance with a numberless majority, convey and inveigh, deceit and receipt, fancy and phantom; sometimes the derivative varies from the primitive, as explain and explanation, repeat and repetition.

Some combinations of letters, having the same power, are used indifferently without any discoverable reason or choice, as in choak, choke; soap, sope; serrel, fuel, and many others; which I have sometimes inserted twice, that those, who search for them under either form, may not search in vain.

In examining the orthography of any doubtful word, the mode of spelling by which it is inserted in the series of the Dictionary, is to be considered as that to which I give, perhaps not often rashly, the preference. I have left, in the examples, to every author his own practice unmolested, that the reader may balance suffrages, and judge between us: but this question is not always to be determined by reputed or by real learning: some men, intent upon greater things, have thought little on sounds and derivations; some, knowing in the ancient tongues, have neglected those in which our words are commonly to be sought. Thus Hammond writes feasibleness for feasibleness, because I suppose he imagined it derived immediately from the Latin; and some words, such as dependant, dependent, dependance, dependence, vary their final syllable, as one or another language is present to the writer.

In this part of the work, where caprice has long wanted without control, and vanity sought praise by petty reformation, I have endeavoured to proceed with a scholar's reverence for antiquity, and a grammarian's regard to the genius of our tongue. I have attempted a few alterations; and, among those few, perhaps the greater part is from the modern to the ancient practice; and I hope I may be allowed to recommend to those, whose thoughts have been perhaps employed too anxiously on verbal singularities, not to disturb, upon narrow views, of for minute propriety, the orthography of their fathers. It has been asserted, that for the law to be known, is of more importance than to be right. Change, says Hooker, is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better. There is in constancy and stability a general and lasting advantage, which will always overbalance the slow improvements of gradual correction. Much less ought our written language to comply with the corruptions of oral utterance, or copy that which every variation of time or place makes different from itself, and imitate those changes which will again be changed, while imitation is employed in observing them.

This recommendation of steadiness and uniformity does not proceed from an opinion, that particular combinations of letters have much influence on human happiness; or that truth may not be successfully taught by modes of spelling fanciful and erroneous: I am not yet so lost in lexicography, as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven. Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas: I wish, however, that the instrument might be less apt to decay, and that signs might be permanent, like the things which they denote.

In settling the orthography, I have not wholly neglected the pronunciation, which I have directed, by printing an accent upon the acute or elevated syllable. It will sometimes be found, that the accent is placed by the author quoted, on a different syllable from that marked in the alphabetical series: it is then to be understood that custom has varied, or that the author has, in my opinion, pronounced wrong. Short directions are sometimes given where the sound of letters is irregular; and, if they are sometimes omitted, defect in such minute observations will be more easily excused, than superfluity.

In the investigation both of the orthography and signification of words, their ETYMOLOGY was necessarily to be considered, and they were therefore to be divided into primitives and derivatives. A primitive word is that which can be traced no further to any English root; thus circumspect, circumvent, circumstance, delude, concave, and complicate, though compounds in the Latin, are to us primitives. Derivatives are all those that can be referred to any word in English of greater simplicity.

The derivatives I have referred to their primitives with an accuracy sometimes needless; for who does not see that remoteness comes from remote, lovely from love, concavity from concave, and demonstrative from demonstrate? but this grammatical exuberance the scheme of my work did not allow me to repress. It is of great importance, in examining the general fabrick of a language, to trace one word from another, by noting the usual modes of derivation and inflection; and uniformity must be preserved in systematical works, though sometimes at the expense of particular propriety.

Among other derivatives I have been careful to insert and elucidate the anomalous plurals of nouns and preterits of verbs, which in the Teutonical dialects are very frequent, and, though familiar to those who have always used them, interrupt and embarrass the learners of our language.

The two languages from which our primitives have been derived are the Roman and Teutonical: under the Roman I comprehend the French and provincial tongues; and under the Teutonical range the Saxon, German, and all their kindred dialects. Most of our polysyllables are Roman, and our words of one syllable are very often Teutonical.

In assigning the Roman original, it has perhaps sometimes happened that I have mentioned only the Latin, when the word was borrowed from the French; and, considering myself as employed only in the illustration of my own language, I have not been very careful to observe whether the Latin word be pure or barbarous, or the French elegant or obsolete.

For the Teutonical etymologies I am commonly indebted to Junius and Skinner, the only names which I have forbore to quote when I copied their books; not that I might appropriate their labours or usurp their honours, but that I might spare a perpetual repetition by one general acknowledgment. Of these, whom I ought not to mention but with reverence due to instructors and benefactors, Junius appears to have excelled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of understanding. Junius was accurately skilled in all the northern languages; Skinner probably examined the ancient and remoter dialects only by occasional inspection into dictionaries; but the learning of Junius is often of no other use than to show him a track by which he might deviate from his purpose, to which Skinner always presses forward by the shortest way. Skinner is often ignorant, but never ridiculous: Junius is always full of knowledge; but his variety distracts his judgment, and his learning is very frequently disgraced by his absurdities.

The votaries of the northern Muses will not perhaps easily restrain their indignation, when they find the name of Junius thus degraded by a disadvantageous comparison; but whatever reference is due to his diligence, or his attainments, it can be no criminal degree of censoriousness to charge that etymologist with want of judgment, who can seriously derive dream from drama, because life is a drama, and a drama is a dream; and who declares with a tone of defiance, that no man can fail to derive moan from μόνος, Gr. (monos,) single or solitary, who considers that grief naturally loves to be alone.

Our knowledge of the northern literature is so scanty, that of words undoubtedly Teutonick the original is not always to be found in any ancient language; and I have therefore inserted Dutch or German substitutes, which I consider not as radical but parallel, not as the parents but sisters of the English.

The words, which are represented as thus related by descent or cognation, do not always agree in sense; for it is incident to words, as to their authprs, to degenerate from their ancestors, and to change their manners when they change their country. It is sufficient, in etymological inquiries, if the senses of kindred words be found such as may easily pass into each other, or such as may both be referred to one general idea.

The etymology, so far as it is yet known, was easily found in the volumes where it is particularly and professedly delivered; and, by proper attention to the rules of derivation, the orthography was soon adjusted. But to COLLECT the Words of our language was a task of greater difficulty: the deficiency of dictionaries was immediately apparent; and, when they were exhausted, what was yet wanting must be sought by fortuitous and unguided excursions into books, and gleaned as industry should find, or chance should offer it, in the boundless chaos of a living speech. My search, however, has been either skilful or lucky; for I have much augmented the vocabulary.

As my design was a dictionary, common or appellative, I have omitted all words which have relation to proper names; such as Arian, Socinian, Cabalist, Benedictine, Mahometan; but have retained those of a more general nature, as Heathen, Pagan.

Of the terms of art I have received such as could be found either in books of science or technical dictionaries; and have often inserted, from philosophical writers, words which are supported perhaps only by a single authority; and which, being not admitted into general use, stand yet as candidates or probationers, and must depend for their adoption on the suffrage of futurity.

The words which our authors have introduced by their knowledge of foreign languages, or ignorance of their own, by vanity or wantonness, by compliance with fashion or lust of innovation, I have registered as they occurred, though commonly only to censure them and warn others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives.

I have not rejected any by design, merely because they were unnecessary or exuberant; but have received those which by different writers have been differently formed, as viscid and viscidily, viscous and viscosity.

Compounded or double words I have seldom noted, except when they obtain a signification different from that which the components have in their simple state. Thus highwayman, woodman, and horsecourser, require an explanation; but of thieflike or coachdriver no notice was needed, because the primitives contain the meaning of the compounds.

Words arbitrarily formed by a constant and settled analogy, like diminutive adjectives in ish, as greenish, bluish; adverbs in ly, as dully, openly; substantives in ness, as vileness, faultiness; were less diligently sought, and sometimes have been omitted, when I had no authority that invited me to insert them; not that they are not genuine and regular offsprings of English roots, but, because their relation to the primitive being always the same, their significations cannot be mistaken.

The verbal nouns in ing, such as the keeping of the castle, leading of the army, are always neglected, or placed only to illustrate the sense of the verb, except when they signify things as well as actions, and have therefore a plural number, as dwelling, living; or have an absolute and abstract signification, as colouring, painting, learning.

The participles are likewise omitted, unless, by signifying rather habit or quality than action, they take the nature of adjectives: as a thinking man, a man of prudence; pace horse, a horse that can pace: these I have ventured to call participial adjectives. But neither are these always inserted, because they are commonly to be understood, without any danger of mistake, by consulting the verb.

• Obsolete words are admitted, when they are found in authors not obsolete, or when they have any force or beauty that may deserve revival. / .

• As composition is one of the chief characteristics of a language, I have endeavoured to make some reparation for the universal negligence of my predecessors, by inserting great numbers of compounded words as may be found under after, fore, new, night, fair, and many more. These, numerous as they are, might be multiplied, but that use and curiosity are here satisfied, and the frame of our language and modes of our combination amply discovered.

Of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to note repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited, that they are hourly affixed to new words as occasion requires or is imagined to require them.

There is another kind of composition more frequent in our language than perhaps in any other, from which arises to foreigners the greatest difficulty. We modify the signification of many words by a particle subjoined; as to come off, to escape by a fetch; to fall on, to attack; to fall off, to apostatize; to break off, to stop abruptly; to bear off, to justify; to fall in, to comply; to give over, to cease; to set off, to embellish; to set in, to begin a continual tenour; to set out, to begin a course or journey; to take off, to copy; with innumerable expressions of the same kind, of which some appear wildly irregular, being so far distant from the sense of the simple words, that no sagacity will be able to trace the steps by which they arrived at the present use. These I have noted with great care; and, though I cannot flatter myself that the collection is complete, I believe I have so far assisted the students of our language, that this kind of phraseology will be no longer insuperable; and the combinations of verbs and particles, by chance omitted, will be easily explained by comparison with those that may be found.

Many words yet stand supported only by the name of Bailey, Ainsworth, Phillips, or the contracted Dict. for Dictionaries subjoined; of these I am not always certain that they are read in any book but the works of lexicographers. Of such I have omitted many, because I had never read them; and many I have inserted, because they may perhaps exist, though they have escaped my notice: they are, however, to be yet considered as resting only upon the credit of former dictionaries. Others, which I considered as useful, or known to be proper, though I could not at present support them by authorities, I have suffered to stand upon my own attestation, claiming the same privilege with my predecessors, of being sometimes credited without proof.

The words, thus selected and disposed, are grammatically considered; they are referred to the different parts of speech; traced, when they are irregularly inflected, through their various terminations; and illustrated by observations, not indeed of great or striking importance, separately considered, but necessary to the elucidation of our language, and hitherto neglected or forgotten by English grammarians.

That part of my work on which I expect malignity most frequently to fasten is, the Explanation; in which I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are perhaps not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonymes, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described. When the nature of things is unknown, or the notion unsettled and indefinite, and various in various minds, the words by which such notions are conveyed, or such things denoted, will be ambiguous and perplexed. And such is the fate of hapless lexicography, that not only darkness, but light, impedes and distresses it; things may be not only too little, but too much known, to be happily illustrated. To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found; for as nothing can be proved but by supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit a definition.

Other words there are, of which the sense is too subtle and evanescent to be fixed in a paraphrase; such are all those which are by the grammarians termed expletives, and, in dead languages, are suffered to pass for empty sounds, of no other use than to fill a verse, or to modulate a period, but which are easily perceived in living tongues to have power and emphasis, though it be sometimes such as no other form of expression can convey.

My labour has likewise been much increased by a class of verbs too frequent in the English language, of which the signification is so loose and general, the use so vague and indeterminate, and the senses detorted so widely from the first idea, that it is hard to trace them through the maze of variation, to catch them on the brink of utter inanity, to circumscribe them by any limitations, or interpret them by any words of distinct and settled meaning: such are bear, break, come, cast, fall, get, give, do, put, set, go, run, make, take, turn, throw. If of these the whole power is not accurately delivered, it must be remembered, that while our language is yet living, and variable by the caprice of every one that speaks it, these words are hourly shifting their relations, and can no more be ascertained in a dictionary, than a grove, in the agitation of a storm, can be accurately delineated from its picture in the water.

The particles are among all nations applied with so great latitude, that they are not easily reducible under any regular scheme of explication; this difficulty is not less, nor perhaps greater, in English, than in other languages. I have laboured them with diligence, I hope with success; such at least as can be expected in a task, which no man, however learned or sagacious, has yet been able to perform.

Some words there are which I cannot explain, because I do not understand them; these might have been omitted very often with little inconvenience, but I would not so far indulge my vanity as to decline this confession: for when Tully owns himself ignorant whether lassus, in the twelve tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment; and Aristotle doubts whether οἶνος, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or mulcteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information.

The rigour of interpretative lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate; names, therefore, have often many ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word; for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution; nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples.

In every word of extensive use, it was requisite to mark the progress of its meaning, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense it has passed from its primitive to its remote and accidental signification; so that every foregoing explanation should tend to that which follows, and the series be regularly concatenated from the first notion to the last.

This is specious but not always practicable; kindred senses may be so interwoven, that the perplexity cannot be disentangled, nor any reason be assigned why one should be ranged before the other. When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? The shades of meaning sometimes pass imperceptibly into each other; so that though on one side they apparently differ, yet it is impossible to mark the point of contact. Ideas of the same race, though not exactly alike, are sometimes so little different, that no words can express the dissimilitude though the mind easily perceives it, when they are exhibited together: and sometimes there is such a confusion of acceptations, that discernment is wearied, and distinction puzzled, and perseverance herself hurries to an end, by crowding together what she cannot separate.

These complaints of difficulty will, by those that have never considered words beyond their popular use, be thought only the jargon of a man willing to magnify his labours, and procure veneration to his studies by involution and obscurity. But every art is obscure to those that have not learned it: this uncertainty of terms, and commixture of ideas, is well known to those who have joined philosophy with grammar; and if I have not expressed them very clearly, it must be remembered that I am speaking of that which words are insufficient to explain.

The original sense of words is often driven out of use by their metaphorical acceptations, yet must be inserted for the sake of a regular origination. Thus I know not whether ardour is used for material heat, or whether flagrant, in English, ever signifies the same with burning; yet such are the primitive ideas of these words, which are therefore set first, though without examples, that the figurative senses may be commodiously deduced.

Such is the exuberance of signification which many words have obtained, that it was scarcely possible to collect all their senses; sometimes the meaning of derivatives must be sought in the mother term, and sometimes deficient explanations of the primitive may be supplied in the train of derivation. In any case of doubt or difficulty, it will be always proper to examine all the words of the same race; for some words are slightly passed over to avoid repetition; some admitted easier and clearer explanation than others; and all will be better understood, as they are considered in greater variety of structures and relations.

All the interpretations of words are not written with the same skill, or the same happiness: things, equally easy in themselves, are not all equally easy to any single mind. Every writer of a long work commits errors, where there appears neither ambiguity to mislead, nor obscurity to confound him: and, in a search like this, many felicities of expression will be casually overlooked, many convenient parallels will be forgotten, and many particulars will admit improvement from a mind utterly unequal to the whole performance.

But many seeming faults are to be imputed rather to the nature of the undertaking, than the negligence of the performer. Thus some explanations are unavoidably reciprocal or circular, as hind, the female of the stag; stag, the male of the hind: sometimes easier words are changed into harder, as burial into sepulture or interment, drier into desiccative, dryness into siccity or aridity, fit into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy. But easiness and difficulty are merely relative; and, if the present prevalence of our language should invite foreigners to this Dictionary, many will be assisted by those words which now seem only to increase or produce obscurity. For this reason I have endeavoured frequently to join a Teutonic or Roman interpretation, as to CHEER, to gladden, or exhilarate, that every learner of English may be assisted by his own tongue.

The solution of all difficulties, and the supply of all defects, must be sought in the examples, subjoined to the various senses of each word, and ranged according to the time of their authors.

When first I collected these authorities, I was desirous that every quotation should be useful to some other end than the illustration of a word; I therefore extracted from philosophers principles of science; from historians remarkable facts; from chymists complete processes; from divines striking exhortations; and from poets beautiful descriptions. Such is design, while it is yet at a distance from execution. When the time called upon me to range this accumulation of elegance and wisdom into an alphabetical series, I soon discovered that the bulk of my volumes would fright away the student, and was forced to depart from my scheme of including all that was pleasing or useful in English literature, and reduce my transcripts very often to clusters of words, in which scarcely any meaning is retained: thus, to the weariness of copying, I was condemned to add the vexation of expunging. Some passages I have yet spared, which may relieve the labour of verbal searches, and intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty deserts of barren philology.

The examples, thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments of doctrine of their authors; the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty detruncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets; or the philosopher his system.

Some of the examples have been taken from writers who were never mentioned as masters of elegance or models of style; but words must be sought where they are used; and in what pages, eminent for purity, can terms of manufacture or agriculture be found? Many quotations serve no other purpose, than that of proving the bare existence of words, and are therefore selected with less scrupulousness than those which are to teach their structures and relations.

My purpose was to admit no testimony of living authors, that I might not be misled by partiality, and that none of my contemporaries might have reason to complain; nor have I departed from this resolution, but when some performance of uncommon excellence excited my veneration, when my memory supplied me from late books with an example that was wanting, or when my heart in the tenderness of friendship solicited admission for a favourite name.

So far have I been from any care to grace my pages with modern decorations, that I have studiously endeavoured to collect examples and authorities from the writers before the Restoration, whose works I regard as the wells of English undefiled, as the pure sources of genuine diction. Our language, for almost a century, has, by the concurrence of many causes, been gradually departing from its original Teutonic character, and deviating toward a Gallick structure and phrasology, from which it ought to be our endeavour to recall it, by making our ancient volumes the groundwork of style, admitting among the additions of later times only such as may supply real deficiencies, such as are readily adopted by the genius of our tongue, and incorporate easily with our native idioms.

But as every language has a time of rudeness antecedent to perfection, as well as of false refinement and declension, I have been cautious lest my zeal for antiquity might drive me into times too remote, and crowd my book with words now no longer understood. I have fixed Sidney's work for the boundary, beyond which I make few excursions. From the authors, which rose in the time of Elizabeth, a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use and elegance. If the language of theology were extracted from Hooker and the Translation of the Bible; the terms of natural knowledge from Bacon; the phrases of policy, war, and navigation, from Raleigh; the dialect of poetry and fiction from Spenser and Sidney; and the diction of common life from Shakspeare, few ideas would be lost to mankind for want of English words in which they might be expressed.

It is not sufficient that a word is found, unless it be so combined as that its meaning is apparently determined by the tract and tenour of the sentence; such passages I have therefore chosen; and when it happened that any author gave a definition of a term, or such an explanation as is equivalent to a definition, I have placed his authority as a supplement to my own, without regard to the chronological order that is otherwise observed.

Some words, indeed, stand unsupported by any authority, but they are commonly derivative nouns or adverbs, formed from their primitives by regular and constant analogy, or names of things seldom occurring in books, or words of which I have reason to doubt the existence.

There is more danger of censure from the multiplicity than paucity of examples; authorities will sometimes seem to have been accumulated without necessity or use, and perhaps some will be found, which might, without loss, have been omitted. But a work of this kind is not hastily to be charged with superfluities: those quotations, which to careless or unskillful perusers appear only to repeat the same sense, will often exhibit, to a more accurate examiner, diversities of significations, or, at least, afford different shades of the same meaning: one will show the word applied to persons, another to things; one will express an ill, another a good, and a third a neutral sense; one will prove the expression genuine from an ancient author; another will show it elegant from a modern: a doubtful authority is corroborated by another of more credit; an ambiguous sentence is ascertained by a passage clear and determinate; the word, how often soever repeated, appears with new associates and in different combinations; and every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.

When words are used equivocally, I receive them in either sense; when they are metaphorical, I adopt them in their primitive acceptation.

I have sometimes, though rarely, yielded to the temptation of exhibiting a genealogy of sentiments, by showing how one author copied the thoughts and diction of another: such quotations are indeed little more than repetitions, which might justly be censured, did they not gratify the mind, by affording a kind of intellectual history.

The various syntactical structures occurring in the examples have been carefully noted; the licence or negligence, with which many words have been hitherto used, has made our style capricious and indeterminate: when the different combinations of the same word are exhibited together, the preference is readily given to propriety, and I have often endeavoured to direct the choice.

Thus I have laboured, by settling the orthography, displaying the analogy, regulating the structures, and ascertaining the signification of English words, to perform all the parts of a faithful lexicographer: but I have not always executed my own scheme, or satisfied my own expectations. The work, whatever proofs of diligence and attention it may exhibit, is yet capable of many improvements: the orthography which I recommend is still controvertible; the etymology which I adopt is uncertain, and perhaps frequently erroneous; the explanations are sometimes too much contracted, and sometimes too much diffused; the significations are distinguished rather with subtilty than skill, and the attention is harassed with unnecessary minuteness.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated, and perhaps sometimes, I hope very rarely, alleged in a mistaken sense; for in making this collection I trusted more to memory, than, in a state of disquiet and embarrassment, memory can contain; and purposed to supply at the review what was left incomplete in the first transcription.

Many terms appropriated to particular occupations though necessary and significant, are undoubtedly omitted; and of the words most studiously considered and exemplified, many senses have escaped observation.

Yet these failures, however frequent, may admit extenuation and apology. To have attempted much is always laudable, even when the enterprise is above the strength that undertakes it: To rest below his own aim is incident to every one whose fancy is active, and whose views are comprehensive; nor is any man satisfied with himself because he has done much, but because he can conceive little. When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, with the obscure recesses of northern learning which I should enter and ransack, the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus inquired into the original of words, I resolved to show likewise, my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to inquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet, doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution; and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to inquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained: I saw that one inquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and thus to pursue perfection, was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the sun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them.

I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance; by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed.

Despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to negligence; some faults will at last appear to be the effects of anxious diligence and persevering activity. The nice and subtle ramifications of meaning were not easily avoided by a mind intent upon accuracy, and convinced of the necessity of disentangling combinations, and separating similitudes. Many of the distinctions which to common readers appear useless and idle, will be found real and important by men versed in the school philosophy, without which no dictionary can ever be accurately compiled, or skillfully examined.

Some senses however there are, which, though not the same, are yet so nearly allied, that they are often confounded. Most men think indistinctly, and therefore cannot speak with exactness; and consequently some examples might be indifferently put to either signification: this uncertainty is not to be imputed to me, who do not form but register the language; who do not teach men how they should think, but relate how they have hitherto expressed their thoughts.

The imperfect sense of some examples I lamented, but could not remedy, and hope they will be compensated by innumerable passages selected with propriety, and preserved with exactness; some shining with sparks of imagination, and some replete with treasures of wisdom.

The orthography and etymology, though imperfect, are not imperfect for want of care, but because care will not always be successful, and recollection or information come too late for use.

That many terms of art and manufacture are omitted, must be frankly acknowledged; but for this defect I may boldly allege that it was unavoidable: I could not visit caverns to learn the miner's language, nor take a voyage to perfect my skill in the dialect of navigation, nor visit the warehouses of merchants, and shops of artificers, to gain the names of wares, tools, and operations, of which no mention is found in books; what favourable accident, or easy inquiry, brought within my reach, has not been neglected: but it had been a hopeless labour to glean up words, by courting living information, and contesting with the sullenness of one, and the roughness of another.

To furnish the academicians della Crusca with words of this kind, a series of comedies called la Fiera, or the Fair, was professedly written by Buonarrotti; but I had no such assistant, and therefore was content to want what they must have wanted likewise, had they not luckily been so supplied.

Nor are all words, which are not found in the vocabulary, to be lamented as omissions. Of the laborious and mercantile part of the people, the diction is in a great measure casual and mutable; many of their terms are formed for some temporary or local convenience, and, though current at certain times and places, are in others utterly unknown. This fugitive cant, which is always in a state of increase or decay, cannot be regarded as any part of the durable materials of a language, and therefore must be suffered to perish with other things unworthy of preservation.

Care will sometimes betray to the appearance of negligence. He, that is catching opportunities which seldom occur, will suffer those to pass by unregarded which he expects hourly to return; he, that is searching for rare and remote things, will neglect those that are obvious and familiar: thus many of the most common and cursory words have been inserted with little illustration, because, in gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought likely to occur whenever they were wanted. It is remarkable that, in reviewing my collection, I found the word SEA unexemplified.

Thus it happens, that in things difficult there is danger from ignorance, and in things easy from confidence: the mind, afraid of greatness and disdainful of littleness, hastily withdraws herself from painful searches, and passes with scornful rapidity over tasks not adequate to her powers; sometimes too secure for caution, and again too anxious for vigorous effort; sometimes idle in a plain path, and sometimes distracted in labyrinths, and dissipated by different intentions.

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labour, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected, that the stones which form the dome of a temple, should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having laboured it, with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those, who have been persuaded to think well of my design, will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time, and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while; but now begin to fear, that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who, being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can enshrine his language, and secure it from corruption and decay; that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy; the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé; and no Italian will maintain, that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare; but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance, as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port; but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniences of life; either without books, or like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those, who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas; and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero; and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatick delays. Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will, at one time or other, by publick intimation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language, allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamiliar by disuse, and displeasing by unfamiliarity?

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated: A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both; and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste and negligence, refinement and affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotick expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabrick of the tongue continue the same; but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependance multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavour with all their influence, to stop the licence of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest, to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add any thing by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time: much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders, and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert; who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since, while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine; that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory, at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great ; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academick bowers, but amid inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow. It may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive ; if the aggregated knowledge, and co-operating diligence of the Italian academicians, did not secure them from the censure of Beni ; if the embodied criticks of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy, and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me ? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave, and success and miscarriage are empty sounds ; I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE,
BY DR. JOHNSON:
WITH ADDITIONS BY THE REV. MR. TODD.

I have distinguished the Additions, both text and notes, in this History of the Language, by enclosing them in brackets. H. J. TODD.

[SECTION I. Fabrick and Scheme of the English Language, Gothick or Teutonical.]

I. THOUGH the Britains or Welsh were the first possessors of this island, whose names are recorded, and are therefore in civil history always considered as the predecessors of the present inhabitants; yet the deduction of the English language, from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge to its present state, requires no mention of them: for we have (a) so few words, which can, with any probability, be referred to British roots, that we justly regard the Saxons and Welsh, as nations totally distinct. It has been conjectured, that when the Saxons seized this country, they suffered the Britains to live among them in a state of vassalage, employed in the culture of the ground, and other laborious and ignoble services. But it is scarcely possible, that a nation, however depressed, should have been mixed with another in considerable numbers without some communication of their tongue, and therefore it may, with great reason, be imagined, that those, who were not sheltered in the mountains, perished by the sword.

(a) [So few words, &c. Mr. Horne Tooke says, that “our language has absolutely nothing from the Welsh.” Div. of Purley, vol. 2. p. 311. On the other hand, Mr. Ellis asserts, that “there are good reasons for believing, that near one third of our language is of Welsh origin.” Metr. Romances, 2d edit. vol. 1. p. 112. Of these opposite assertions the following remark may seem a judicious modification. “The British, to speak plainly, has little or no resemblance to the English. Many of their terms may have gained admission among us; as from the vicinity and long intercourse we have had with that people may necessarily be imagined; but their idioms and genius are as radically and essentially different as any two languages can possibly be.” Rev. Mr. Drake on the Orig. of the Eng. Lang. Archæol. vol. 5. p. 317.]

The whole fabrick and scheme of the English language is Gothick or Teutonic : it is a dialect of that tongue, which prevails (b) over all the northern countries of Europe except those where the Slavonian is spoken. Of these languages Dr. Hickes has thus exhibited the genealogy.

Of the Gothick, the only monument remaining is a copy of the Gospels somewhat mutilated, which, from the silver with which the characters are adorned, is called the (d) Silver Book. It is now preserved at Upsal, and having been twice published before,

(b) [Over all the northern countries, &c. This is curiously illustrated by a grammarian of elder times. "Another property of an excellent language is the generalitie or large extent thereof; wherein no tongue within Christendome may compare with ours. For the Germans, of whom our fathers (the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles,) are a part, have spread themselves, and their Teutonic tongue, (though in divers dialects, which time hath caused,) thorow all High and Low Germanie, their primarie habitation; but also in divers other countries, where their victorious hand, enlarging still their territories, hath sented them; as in Denmarke, Suedland, Lapland, Finland, Gotland, Norway, England, and the East Part of Scotland, even from Barweeke to the Orkades, now the Isles of Orkney: which the very language, differing but little, in dialect, from the Northern or older English, doeth shew. And therefore the Highland or Western Scots, (which indeede are the right Scots, speaking the Scottish or Irish tongue,) doe call the Easterlings or Low-land-men (as the Welch doe us) Saxons or Saxons. Likewise in the other Northern Isles; as Groenland, Freesland, Iceland, &c. even to the hyperborean or frozen sea. Neither onely these Northerne parts, but the South countries also, wheresoever they set their foote, have yielded to their puissance: as France, subdued by their Franks and Normans; Africk, over-run by their Vandals; and Italie, by their Lombards, Gothes, and Vangals: though in these parts their language be mixt and much corrupted with the speeche of the conquered people, whom they suffered to remaine among them. So that, not without cause, hath this manly nation obtained the name of German or Alman; which are both one; ger, or gar, signifying, in the Teutonic, as much as all." The English Grammar, &c. by Charles Butler, 1633. Pref.]

(c) [Ex bibliis Icelandicis, non minus ferè quam ex Saxonice monumentis, vernaculæ nostræ origines prehendunt. Hickes. The aspirations of the consonants, so frequent in the English, are the leading marks of a northern derivation; so that an Icelander, hearing this in the mouth of an Englishman, will go no farther than to his own language, and is sure to find either the word, or the root of it, with very few alterations. Serenius.]

(d) [The Silver Book. The leaves are of vellum of a violet colour. All the letters are of silver, except the initials, which are of gold. See Notes on the Transl. of Mallet's North. Antiq. ch. 13. The high antiquity of thus distinguishing valuable, and particularly sacred writings, is found in Josephus, Antiq. Jud. lib. xii. cap. 2. See also Baringii, Clavis Diplomatica, p. 171. The publication of the Silver Book by Lye, to which Dr. Johnson alludes, was in 1750. Since that time, another portion of this ancient version has been discovered in the library at Wolfenbottel, in Germany; which is part of the epistle to the Romans, and was published in 1761 by the Rev. F. A. Knittel, Archdeacon of Wolfenbottel; afterwards by Hre. It has since occupied a place in the Appendix to the valuable edition of Lye's Goth. & Sax. Dict. by the Rev. O. Manning. Of eight of St. Paul's Epistles, at least in part, a recent discovery also (1817) is said to have been made, in the Ambrosian library at Milan, by the Abbé Angelo Mai, one of the librarians; of which the publication is earnestly expected.]

has been lately reprinted at Oxford, under the inspection of Mr. Lye, the editor of Judius. Whether the diction of this venerable manuscript be purely Gothick, has been doubted; it seems, however, to exhibit the most ancient dialect now to be found of the Teutonic race; and the Saxon, which is the original of the present English, was either derived from it, or both have descended from some common parent.

[SECTION II. Specimen of the Gothick Language.]

II. [From the venerable monument, of which so much has been said in the notes to the preceding section, I select the Lord's Prayer; and place, in the opposite column, the ancient Anglo-Saxon version of the same; both in English characters, that the benefit of comparison with our present language may be within the reach of every reader.

The doubt, which Dr. Johnson notices, in regard to the diction of the Silver Book, alludes especially to the opinions of Hickes and Bishop Nicholson, who consider "some Teuton or German as the author of it." Michaelis and others have contended that it is rather a fragment of some very ancient Francick Bible. To these objections, Dean Serenius has adverted, asserting that it is "no German or Francick dialect, as learned men have contended and disputed on both sides of the question; but the same aboriginal language, then living, and spoken, by the Goths seated upon Marotis, when Ulphilas was their bishop, and translated the four Gospels." Swed. and Eng. Dict. 2d edit. 1757. pref. p. 5. The Gothick claim has indeed found numerous and able supporters; and has been strengthened by a curious relic of the same language discovered in Italy. The following statement combines the arguments of those who have vindicated the claim: of Knittel, Hre, and others.

1. "Scilicet, id certum est è veterum testimoniis fuisse interpretationem ejusmodi Geticam: de Francicâ quidam nihil apud veteres habetur.

2. "Deinde vera historia docet, Ulphilan Getas literis donasse, iisdemque suam librorum sacrorum interpretationem conscripsisse. Itaque cum veterem interpretationem Teutonicam, quæ quidem literis, non modò à Latinis sed dimidiam minimùm partem à Græcis mutuò sumptis, consignata sit in manibus habeamus; hæc profectò sermone Getarum, ad Istrum olim habitantium, scripta esse dici debet. Moesi autem, quorum in regionem penetraverunt, Latine locuti sunt; Getisque finitimi Græci fuerunt.

3. "Tum etiam Codex, qui vocatur Argenteus, magnam vocabulorum vim complectitur, quorum in Francicâ ne vestigium quidè deprehendimus.

4. "Nec parum huc momenti affert, quod Wachterus (Gloss. Germ. p. 43.) vocabula quædam, Codici Argentei propria, in Tartariâ Minori, Getarum quondam sede, invenerit; ejusmodi est swiltan, mori, à swalt, mors.

5. "Quo et illud pertinet, quòd Ulphilana interpretatio non pauca Græcorum vocabula civitate suâ donaverit, non illa, linguis Teutonicis cum Græcâ ab ultimâ inde antiquitate communia; quibus eandem populorum originem, vel priscum aliquod commercium, efficere solentur; sed ea vocabula, quibus omnes omnino Teutonicæ septentrionalesque dialecti carcant: atque in his nonnulla, quæ, nisi perfectâ jam lingue utriusque facie, illuc profecta non facer. Exemplum sit atta, âra, pater.

6. "Huc accedunt vocabula et Illyrica, quæ neque in dialectis Teutonicis reperiuntur, neque gentem produunt à Getis longè remotam;

7. "Et Latina; non ea eruditionem, artes resque sacras (qualia et apud Francos permulta sunt) spectantia: sed alia, neque Rhenum inter ac Viadrum unquam audita.

8. "Ne verò amplius dubites, faciunt vocabula quædam, quæ Getica dixere veteres. At hæc quidè, ceteris in dialectis Teutonicis non obvia, in Codice Argenteo et Carolino invenias.

9. [SECTION III. Saxon. Caedmon's metrical hymn. Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius.]

III. What was the form of the Saxon language, when about the year 450, they first entered Britain, cannot now be known. They seem to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet; their speech therefore, having been always cursory and extemporaneous, must have been artless and unconnected, without any modes of transition or involution of clauses: which abruptness and inconnection may be observed even in their later writings. This barbarity may be supposed to have continued during their wars with the Britains, which for a time left them no leisure for softer studies; nor is there any reason for supposing it abated, till the year 590, when Augustine came from Rome to convert them to Christianity.

[Of the language the earliest monument which remains, is the song or hymn of Caedmon, monk of Whitby; which is now given in the section appropriated to the consideration of the Saxon poetry.]

The Christian religion always implies or produces a certain degree of civility and learning: the Saxons then became by degrees acquainted with the Roman language, and so gained, from time to time, some knowledge and elegance, till in three centuries they had formed a language capable of expressing all the sentiments of a civilized people, as appears by king Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius and his short preface.

This may perhaps be considered as a specimen of the Saxon (g) in its highest state of purity, for here are scarcely any words borrowed from the Roman dialects.

[SECTION IV. Version of the Gospels probably between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman Conquest.]

IV. Of the (h) following version of the Gospels the age is not certainly known ; but it was probably written between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman conquest, and therefore may properly be inserted here.

(g) [Its highest state of purity. The Anglo-Saxon laws before the reign of Athelstan, and the works of Alfred, may be referred to as containing the Anglo-Saxon language in its genuine and uncorrupted state. See Turner's Hist. of the Anglo-Sax. B. 8. ch. 3.]

(h) [From the edition of it, published by Dr. Marshall, in conjunction with the Mæso-Gothick Gospels by Junius, in 1665.]

Translations seldom afford just specimens of a language, and least of all those in which a scrupulous and verbal interpretation is endeavoured, because they retain the phraseology and structure of the original tongue; yet they have often this convenience, that the same book, being translated in different ages, affords opportunity of marking the gradations of change, and bringing one age into comparison with another. For this purpose I have placed the Saxon version and that of Wicliffe, written about the year 1380, in opposite columns; because the convenience of easy collation seems greater than that of regular chronology.

IN the dayes of Eroude kyng of Judec ther was a prest Zacarye by name : of the sort of Abia, and his wyf was of the doughtris of Aaron : and hir name was Elizabeth.

“ And bothe weren juste biforn God : goyng in alle the maundementis and justifyingis of the Lord withouten playnt.

[SECTION V. Saxon Poetry.]

V. [" Of the Saxon poetry," Dr. Johnson says, " some specimen is necessary; though our ignorance of the laws of their metre and the quantities of their syllables, which it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to recover, excludes us from that pleasure which the old bards undoubtedly gave to their contemporaries.

" The first poetry of the Saxons was without rhyme; and consequently must have depended upon the quantity of their syllables: but they began in time to imitate their neighbours, and close their verses with correspondent sounds."—

Alliteration is another distinction of the Saxon poetry; which, as we shall presently see, distinguished also the old English. But rhythm or cadence is its principal feature. " (i) When their words would not fall easily into the desired rhythm, the Saxons were satisfied with an approach to it; and with this mixture of regular and irregular cadence, all their poetry seems to have been composed. By this rhythm, by their inversions of phrase, by their transitions, by their omissions of particles, and above all by their metaphors and perpetual periphrasis, their poetry seems to have been principally distinguished."

• Of this poetry the oldest remaining monument is the song or hymn of Cædmon, monk of Whitby, who died in 680; which Alfred inserted in his version of (k) Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The rhythmical division of it, which is now given, is that which the learned historian of the Anglo-Saxons has adopted.

Languages. But the translation, now given is that of Mr. Turner, Hist. Angl. Sax. B. 4. ch. 4.]

THE HISTORY OF THE

Frea ælmihtig.

As this fragment is also the oldest monument of the language, a translation of it cannot but be acceptable to the English reader.

“ Now should we praise
The Guardian of the heavenly kingdom ;
The mighty Creator,
And the conceptions of his mind,
Glorious Father of his works !
As he of every glory,
Eternal Lord !
Established the beginning ;
So he first made
The earth for the children of men,
And the heavens for its canopy.
Holy Creator !
The middle region,
The guardian of mankind,
The Eternal Lord
Afterwards made,
The earth for men,
Almighty Ruler !”

To this Cædmon has been attributed a beautiful poetical paraphrase of the book of Genesis, and of some other parts of Scripture ; which Junius published in 1655. But the appropriation has been questioned ; and the (1) composition assigned to a later age.

From the fragment of the true Cædmon, we pass to the notice of another ancient poem, written more than a hundred years before the Norman conquest ; a specimen of unadulterated Saxon. It is an Ode on a Victory of king Athelstan's, of the (m) date of 937 or 938. The following is the conclusion of it.

 Over the broad brine (sea)
 Britain they sought.

The (n) most interesting remains of the Anglo-Saxon poetry, are said to be a kind of epick poem, in which is described the attempt of Beowulf to wreck the fiethle or deadly feud on Hrothgar for a homicide, which he had committed. It is supposed to be the oldest poem of an epick form in the vernacular language of Europe which now exists.]

The two following passages, contain apparently the rudiments of our present lyrick measures ; and the writers may be justly considered as the genuine ancestors of the English poets.

[SECTION VI. Dawn of the present English. Saxon Chronicle. Ancient Poetry.]

VI. About the year 1150, the Saxon began to take a form in which the beginning of the present English may be plainly discovered: this change seems not to have been the effect of the Norman conquest, for very few French words are found to have been introduced in the first hundred years after it; the language must therefore have been altered by causes like those which, notwithstanding the care of writers and societies instituted to obviate them, are even now daily making innovations in every living language. I have exhibited a specimen of the language of this age from the year 1135 to 1140 of the Saxon Chronicle, of which the latter part was apparently written near the time to which it relates.

Ðis wære for þe king Stephne ofer ræ to Norþmānbi. 7 þer wer under-fanzen. forðr þæt hi wendæn þæt he sceolde ben alre alre þe com wer. 7 for he hadde zet his trefor. ac he to deað it 7 fæstred soðlice. Nearly about this time, the following pieces of poetry seem to have been written, of which I have inserted only short fragments; the first is a rude attempt at the present measure of eight syllables, and the second is a natural introduction to Robert of Gloucester, being composed in the same measure, which, however rude and barbarous it may seem, taught the way to the Alexandrines of the French poetry.

If these fragments, the adulteration of the Saxon tongue, by a mixture of the Norman, becomes apparent; yet it is not so much changed by the admixture of new words, which might be imputed to commerce with the continent, as by changes of its own forms and terminations; for which no reason can be given.

[It has been suggested, that these changes in the Saxon, as they consist solely in the extinction of its ancient grammatical inflections, and are similar to the alterations by which the Latin was gradually transformed into the several Romance dialects, may be explained on the same principles. To this it has been acutely objected (3), that, when we consider the thousand turns originating in fancy, in some accidental combination, or the absolute ignorance of all rule, on which, in the progress of the darkest times, the modern languages of the greater part of Europe were fortuitously thrown together, rather than deliberately formed, we shall hardly look for steady principles. “(t) Besides, what is singularly remarkable in the early Anglo-Saxon, is, that it ceased to be Saxon by an admixture, as it should seem, with the Norman, without taking from the latter more than a few words, and with no change in its syntax or grammatical construction. It was not so in the Romance dialects, derived from the Latin.” Earlier by a few years, than the two preceding poems cited by Dr. Johnson, must be placed the poetical translation made by Layamon, a priest at Ernleye upon Severn, from the Brut d’Angleterre, an ancient French poem by M. Wace. Of this translation the orthography is sometimes perplexing; but it is a most curious monument of the progress of the language in its approach to English. It is (u) supposed to have been made toward the close of the twelfth century; and though substantially an Anglo-Saxon poem, it exhibits the simple style of the Anglo-Norman poetry. The following specimen is what precedes Arthur’s narration of his dream, which I have minutely copied from the (x) manuscript; observing only the rhythmical division, instead of the prosaick form, in which old Saxon poetry is written.

þa hit wes ðai a margen,
 And ðugeðe gon sturien.

That is, according to Mr. Turner's translation : —

Then it was day in the morning,
 And the nobles began to stir.
 Arthur, then rose up,
 And stretched his arms.
 He arose up, and sat down ;
 Indeed he was very sick.
 Then asked him a true knight,
 Lord, how hast thou been to-night ?
 Arthur then answered,
 And his mind was uneasy to him.
 To-night in my sleep,
 Where I lay on my bed,
 I dreamt a dream,
 Whereof I am full sorry."

But though the Anglo-Saxon language derived great advantages, in regard to diction, from the writings of the Normans, of which simplicity and plainness is the character ; and thus converted wildness and irregularity into order ; the Norman tongue was not familiar to the great body of the English people. Before the conquest, indeed, some had begun "(y) in many things to imitate French manners, the great peers to speak French in their houses, in French to write their bills and letters." And after it, towards the close of the eleventh century, some younger (z) monks were directed to learn the Saxon hand, as the letter or character, on account of the Normans, was then neglected, and not known but to a few elders. Yet the (a) common people retained their native speech ; and that nearly the ancient idiom was preserved, the style of the Saxon chronicle has shown.

The most ancient English song now extant is preserved in a manuscript in the (b) British Museum, and is (c) believed to have been written at least as early as the year 1250. By (d) Sir John Hawkins and Dr. Burney, in their respective histories of musick, it has been most inaccurately referred to the fifteenth century. And their erroneous judgement has been hastily adopted by the historian of English poetry. The song, as (e) Ritson has well observed, will speak for itself. It is in praise of the cuckoo.

“ Sumer is icumen in ;
 Lhude sing cucu :
 Groweþ sed, & bloweþ med,
 And springþ þe wde nu.
 Sing cucu.
 Awe bleteþ after lomb ;
 Lhouþ after calue cu ;
 Bulluc sterteþ,
 Bucke verteþ ;
 Murie sing cucu.
 Cucu, cucu,
 Wel singes þu cucu ;
 Ne swik þu nauer nu.”

In modern English this : “ Summer is come in ; loud sings the cuckoo : now the seed grows, and the mead blows, (i. e. is in flower,) and the wood springs. The cuckoo sings. The ewe bleats after the lamb ; the calf lows after the cow ; the bullock starts, the buck verts, (i. e. goes to harbour in the fern ;) merrily sings the cuckoo. Cuckoo, cuckoo, well singest thou cuckoo ; mayest thou never cease.”]

[SECTION VII. Robert of Gloucester.]

VII. [“ Hitherto the language used in this island,” Dr. Johnson says, “ however different in successive time, may be called Saxon ; nor can it be expected, from the nature of things gradually changing, that any time can be assigned, when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence. Robert of Gloucester however, who is placed by the critics in the thirteenth century, seems to have used a kind of intermediate diction, neither Saxon nor English ; in his work therefore we see the transition exhibited, and, as he is the first of our writers in rhyme, of whom any large work remains, a more extensive quotation is extracted. He writes apparently in the same measure with the foregoing author of St. Margaret ; which, polished into greater exactness, appeared to our ancestors so suitable to the genius of the English language, that it was continued in use almost to the middle of the seventeenth century.”]

This intermediate diction, however, occurs in the production of Layamon, already cited. And thus the time when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence, is (f) placed about the year 1180, when the Saxons and Normans, laying aside their antipathies, began to live together in amity, and to participate in a common literature and language ; and in 1216 the change is considered as complete. Thus have the Saxon, Danish, and Norman, been mingled together in our present speech ; and though nine-tenths of our words were judged, not more than a century since, to be of Saxon origin, perhaps in modern English one-fifth (g) of the Saxon language has ceased to be used.

Of Robert of Gloucester, to whose poetry Dr. Johnson barely adds his name, some information seems requisite. He is supposed by our antiquaries to have been a monk in the abbey of Gloucester. His chronicle was not written till after the year 1278. He might be the "Robert of Gloucester" who was "secretary" to Thomas Cantilupe, bishop of Hereford, at the time of the bishop's decease in 1282; and who is described as "afterwards chancellor of Hereford." See the Life and Gest of S. Thomas Cantilupe bishop of Hereford, &c. 12mo. Gant, 1674. p. 196. There follows a long description of a curious dream which this "Robert of Gloucester" had, shadowing the death of the bishop. Hearne, however, doubts, that this person was the poet.

[Very near the time of Robert of Gloucester's poem, we have the following specimen of improved language, in an amatory (c) poem, the metre of which is remarkable, though the lines are printed by Warton like those of Robert of Gloucester.

"Bytvene mersh and aueril,
 When spray biginneþ to sp[r]inge, þe lutel foul hap hire wyl
 On hȝre (d) lud to synge,
 Ich libbe in loue longinge
 For semlokest of alle þynge.
 (c) He may me blisse bringe,
 Icham in hire bandoun.
 An hendȝ hap ichabbe ȝhent :
 Ichot from heuene it is me sent.
 From alle wȝmmen mi loue is lent,
 Andlyht on Alisoun."

That is: "Between March and April, when the spray or branches begin to spring, [and] the little birds have inclination sing their songs, I live in the longing of love for the seemliest of all things. She may bring me bliss; I am at her command. I have obtained a lucky lot. I wot (believe) it is sent me from heaven. My love has left all other women, and is alighted upon Alysoun."

[SECTION VIII. • Robert of Brunne. Metrical Romances.].

[The early part of the fourteenth century introduces Robert de Brunne, who is allowed by Warton to have contributed to form a style, to teach expression, and to polish his native tongue, but of whom Dr. Johnson has taken no notice. The poet is said to have been a canon of Brunne, or Bourne, near Depyng in Lincolnshire; whence the name by which he is (f) usually called, his real one being Robert Man-

(d) [Lud, lay, song; leudus, low Lat. liod, Icel.]

(f) [His Chronicle is thus described, as "putte into Englishe ryme by Robert de Brunne incta Depinge." Lambeth MSS. No. 131. This manuscript is imperfect in part, but contains what Hearne omitted to print, and yet remains to be published entire, the translation from the Brut.]

THE HISTORY OF THE

nyng. His principal work is a translation from the Brut of M. Wace, which exercised, as we have seen, the pen of Layamon; and from the French rhyming chronicle of Peter de Langtoft. This was finished in 1388. But there is also a metrical translation by him of a "Manuel des Pechees," or "a Handlyng of Sirne," the beginning of which states it to have been commenced in 1303.

"(g) Dane Felyp was mayster that tyme,
That y began thys Englysh ryne.
The yere of grace fyl than to be
A thousynd thre hundred and thre."

From this work I copy his praise of good women:

(h) Nothyng is to man so dere
As womanys love yn gode manere.
A gode woman ys maunys blyss,
Wher her love ryght and stedfast ys.
Ther ys no solace undyr hevene,
Of al that a man may nevene, [name,]
That shuld a man so moche glew, [delight,]
As a gode woman that loveth trew :
Ne derer is none yn Goddys hyrde [family]
Than a chaste woman with lovely wurde."

Of his metrical chronicle the following custom, with the subsequent description of the lady who conformed to it, may be a sufficient specimen.

"(i) This es ther custom and ther gest,
Whan thei are atte the ale or fest ;
Ilk man that lovis quare him think,
Salle say, wassaille, and to him drink :
He that bidis salle say, wassaille ;
The tother salle say again, drinckhaille.
————— That maidin ying
Wassailed, and kist the king :
Of bodi sche was right avenant,
Of fair colour, with swete semblaunt :
Hir hatire fulle wele it semed."

The English compositions, which are called metrical romances, and are chiefly productions of the beginning of the fourteenth century, were now in high estimation; to some of which Robert de Brunne refers. Chaucer, in his Rhyme of Sir Topas, has specified many, and in distinctive terms.

" Men speken of romaunces of pris
Of Hornchild, and of Ipotis,
Of Bevis, and Sir Guy ;
Of Sir Libeux, and Pleindamour."

These rhyming narratives often present illustrations of manners with great exactness, while they serve in some degree to trace the progress of language. They are said to have been often written or translated at the request, or for the amusement, of the great. From one of those enumerated by Chaucer a brief specimen is cited; which will show, what in other instances in this history may be proved, that our ancient writings are often incorrectly copied. From Sir Iibeaus Disconus, (or, as in the twelfth stanza of the romance the name is explained "ly beau desconus, the fayre unknown,") I select a stanza, describing the maiden Ellep, as it stands in an ancient manuscript; and, in the opposite column, place the same as printed in an admired collection of Metrical Romances.

(k) From the MS.

" The (m) may hight Ellene,
Gentyll, bryght, and shene,
A lovely messengere:
Ther nas countes nor quene,
So semely on to sene,
That might be hir pere.
• She was clothed in Tarse,
Rownd, and nothing scarce, &c."

(l) Printed Copy.

" That mayde was cleped Elene,
Gentyll, bryght, and schene,
A lady messenger:
Ther nas countesse ne quene,
So semelych on to sene,
That myght be her pere.
Sche was elodeth with Tars,
Rowme, and noding skars, &c."

Variations of this kind might be exhibited to a great extent. It is clear, from what is offered, that the manuscript is the most perspicuous.

Scripture history, and the biography of saints, were also the subjects of the metrical romances. From one, unknown to our antiquaries and the lovers of our ancient poetry, I will make a citation. It was probably written in the fourteenth century, and is called the "Storie of the lady Asueth, daughter of Patifar, one of the princes of Pharaoh, chief counseillour. &c." and is "translated out of the latyn into Englysh." It is in fact a sort of history of Joseph, who at length marries Asueth. The metre of the poem is that which Robert of Gloucester has used. This metrical history forms part of a manuscript which belonged to the conventual college of Bonhommes at Ashridge in Buckinghamshire, and is now in the library of the marquis of Stafford. The description of the heroine, and the desire of Pharaoh's son to marry her, are the passages which I have selected.

" This prince hadde a dowter dere, Asueth was her name,
A virgine ful specious, and semely of stature;
Of eyhtene yeer age sche was, withoute ony blame, fflorishyng in here beaute the most comely creature
Of Egypt, and alle virgines sche passed in feture;
Not lyke the dowhtres of Egypt in here resemblance,
But assemblyng the Hebrees in color and countenance.—
But when pat Pharoes eldist child his sone and his heir
Herde telle of this ladi, to his fadir he wente right,
And said graunte me to my wyf Asueth the feyr;
But Pharao denyed hym, and answered to the knyght,
Thu schalt have to þin astate a ladi of more myght,
The kyngis dowter of Moab, of noble alliaunce,
A comeli quene, fair and free, even to þe plesance."

(h) [Lambeth MSS. No. 306. fol. 73. This is a most valuable copy of the romance, which repeatedly presents a preferable reading to the printed copy.]

(m) [That is, maid; a pure Saxon word. In an old ballad of the fourteenth century, the author's mistress is called the "fairest may in town." And so Sir T. More and Spenser use it.]

To the lives of the saints in verse I may also add an hitherto unexplored translation, as it is called, of the Golden Legend; of a later date than the romance which I have cited, but not of interesting character as to its poetry or language. It ends with the life of St. Eustas. The running title of Becket, viz. "St. Thomas of Canterbury," is, through the greatest part of his tedious legend, crossed with the pen; as in other manuscripts the same kind of literary degradation has been fixed upon the saintship of this prelate. A circumstance, attending the murder of Becket, may be cited as a specimen of this rhyming compilation; for a compilation it is from other sources as well as the Legenda Aurea.

"Another knyȝt smote saȝnt Thomas in þat selue wounde,
And made him bowe his face adoun and lōke toward þe grounde :
The þridde in þat selue stid þereafter hȝm smote anon,
And made him loute al adoun þe face to þe stone ;
In þat stid þe ferþe smote þat þat other hade ere ydo,
And þe poȝnt of his swerde brake bi þe merhle stone atwo ;
ȝett þe poȝnt at Canterbury þe monkes leten wete for honor of þe holy mon þat þerwith was ysmȝte."

This manuscript is in the archiepiscopal library of Lambeth Palace, No. 228.; and the author is described by Henry Wharton as Robert de Wottoun, of whom, however, no notice occurs in our poetical or biographical histories.]

[SECTION IX. Richard Rolle. Laurence Minot. Vision of Pierce Ploughman.]

[Towards the middle of the fourteenth century we find a valuable writer both of poetry, and prose, in Richard Rolle, of the order of St. Augustine, often called the hermit of Hampole, and simply Richard Hampole. His compositions are numerous. From his translation of the Psalms, in which, he says, "I seke no straunge Ynglys, bot lightest and communest," as also from his "Twelve Profits of Tribulation," the specimens of his prose are taken; and from his long poem, entitled "The Prikke of Conscience," expressly written for those who could understand only English, that of his poetry.

(m) From Psalm xxiii.

"Our Lord gouerneth me, and nothyng to me shal wante: stede of pasture thar he me sette. In the water of the lētyng forth he me brouȝte: my soule he turnyde.

"He ladde me on the stretis of rygȝtwisnesse for his name.

"For wiȝ gif I hadde goo in myddil of the shadewe of deeth, I shal not dreede yveles; for thou art with me.

"Thi geerde and thi stef, thei haue counfortid me."

(n) From The Twelve Profits of Tribulation.

"The sevynth profet of tribulacion is, that it spredith abred or opynyth thyne hert to receyve the grace of God. For God, with many strokys of the hammyr, spredith abrode a pece of golde or of silver, to make a vessell for to put in wyne or precyouse liquore.—And considre, as the more precyouse metalle is more ductible and obeynge to the strokes of the goldsmyth; so the more precious and meke herte is more patiente in tribulacion. And allethogh the sharp stroke of tribulacion turmenteth the, yet comforte the; for the goldsmyth, Allemnighthy God, holdeth the hammer of tribulacion in his hond, and knoweth ful welle what thou maist suffir, and mesurith hys smytynge after thi frele nature."

(o) From the Prikke of Conscience.

The following versification and description of the poet's heaven are certainly pleasing.

" Ther is lyf withoute ony deth,
And ther is youthe without ony elde;
And ther is alle manner welthe to welde:
And ther is reste without ony travaille:—
And ther is pees withoute ony strife,
And ther is alle mannere likynge of lyf:—
And ther is bright somer ever to se,
And ther is nevere wynter in that countree:—
And ther is more worshipe and honour,
Then evere hadde kynge oþer emperour.
And ther is grete melodee of aungeles' songe,
And ther is preysing hem amonge.
And ther is alle maner frendshipe that may be,
And ther is evere perfect love and charite;
And ther is wisdom without folyc,
And ther is honeste without vilenye.
All these a man may joyes of hevene call:
Ac yutte the most sovereyn joye of alle,
Is the sight of Goddes bright face,
In wham resteth alle manere grace."

About the middle also of the fourteenth century, Laurence Minot wrote, for the most part in lyrick measure, some short poems on events in the reign of our third Edward. They were published by Mr. Ritson, in 1795. From the first of them a stanza may be selected.

" Trew king, that sittes in trone,
Unto the I tel my tale,
And unto the I bid a bone,
For thou art bone of al my bale:
Als thou made midel erd, and the mone,
And bestes and fowles grete and smale:
Unto me send thi socoure sone,
And dresce my dedes in this dale."

Not only smoothness of versification may be here observed, but also, what is found in the ancient Saxon poetry, studied alliteration. But in no composition can this latter practice be better illustrated than in the Vision of Pierce Ploughman, a poem without

(o) [MS. cited by Turner, ut supr. p. 462. There are three copies of this curious poem among the Lambeth MSS. Two of them are very valuable, and afford variations of consequence, viz. No. 491. fol. 296. and No. 492. The third is the fourth article in No. 260.]

rhyme, written also not long after the middle of the fourteenth century, and ascribed to (p) Robert Langland, a secular priest, and fellow of Oriel College in Oxford. It is to the learned printer of the work that we owe this information, at the distance of about a century afterwards. He tells us, that the author "wrote altogether in miter, [metre,] but not after the maner of our rimers that write nowe a dayes; for his verses ende not alike; but the nature of hys miter is, to have thre wordes at the letusto in every verse whiche beginne with some one letter: as for ensample, the firste two verses of the boke renne upon s; as thus:

*In a somer season, whan sette was the sunne,
I shope me into shrobbes, as I a shepe were, &c.*

The thinge noted, the miter shal be very pleasaunt to read." The Printer to the Reader. In this composition there is often very animated description amid severe satire. I have selected a serious passage in which the birth and death of our Lord are the objects of the writer's notice; in which there is strength of colouring, and ample exhibition of the alliterative metre “(q) There blased a starre,

That al the wise men of this world in one accorden,
That such a barne was borne in Bethlems city,
That mans soule shoulde save, and synne destroy.
And al the elementes, saith the boke, hereof bereth witnes,
That he was God that al wrought: the welken first shewed
Tho, ther were in heaven tooken, stella comata,
And tindeden hir as a torche, to reverence his byrth:
The light folowed the Lorde into the lowe earth:
The water witnessed that he was God: for he went on it. —
And lo how the sunne gan lacke her light in her selfe,
Whan she see Him suffer that sunne and sea made:
The earth, for hevines that He woulde suffer,
Quaked as a quyeke thing, and al to quassed the roch.”

[SECTION X. Sir John Mandeville. Wickliffe. Trevisa. Publick documents.]

Sir John Mandeville wrote, as he himself informs us, in the fourteenth century, and his work, which, comprising a relation of many different particulars, consequently required the use of many words and phrases, may be properly specified in this place. Of the following quotations, I have chosen the first, because it shows, in some measure the state of European science as well as of the English tongue; and the second, because it is valuable for the force of thought and beauty of expression.

I. “In that lond, ne in many othere (r) bezonde that, no man may see the sterre transmontane, that is clept the sterre of the see, that is unmevable,

(p) [By Robert Crowley, who published the work in 1550, and prefixed an introduction to it. Crowley was fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford; was afterwards an ecclesiastick, and was well beneficed.]

(q) [Pass. xviii. fol. c. b. edit. 1550. The sun, in this extract, is of the feminine gender, as in the Saxon and German. See the Dict. in V. SUN.]

(r) [Bezonde. The z, in this word and many others in the extract, is the corruption of the ancient press. The letter intended, and required, is the Saxon z, which was sometimes represented by ȝ, having the power of our y, our g, and our gh; and the latter form has been mistakenly represented, in several old books, by the Roman z.

and that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the lode sterre. But men seen another sterre, the contrarie to him, that is toward the Southe, that is clept Antartyk. And right as the schip men taken here avys here, and governe hem be the lode sterre, right so don schip men bezonde the parties, be the sterre of the Southe the which sterre apperethe not to us. And this sterre, that is toward the Northe, that wee clepen the lode sterre, ne apperethe not to hem. For whiche cause, men may wel perceyve that the lond and the see ben of rownde schapp and forme. For the partie of the firmament schewethe in o contree, that schewethe not in another contree. And men may well preuen be experience and sotyle compassement of wytt, that zif a man fond passages be schippes, that wolde go to serchen the world, men myghte go be schippe alle aboute the world, and aboven and benethen. The whiche thing I prove thus, afre that I have seyn. For I have been toward the parties of Braban, and beholden the Astrolabre, that the sterre that is clept the transmoutayne, is 58 degrees hight. And more forthere in Almayne and Bewme, it hathe 58 degrees. And more forthe toward the parties septentrionales, it is 62 degrees of heghte, and certyn mynutes. For I my self have mesured it by the Astrolabre. Now schulle ze knowe, that azen the Transmoutayne, is the tother sterre, that is clept Antartyke; as I have seyd before. And tho 2 sterres ne meeven nevere. And be hem turnethe alle the firmament, righte as dothe a wheel, that turnethe be his axille tree: so that tho sterres beren the firmament in 2 egalle parties; so that it hath als mochel aboven, as it hathe benethen. Afre this, I have gon toward the parties meridionales, that is toward the Southe: and I have founden, that in Lybye, men seen first the sterre Antartyk. And so fer I have gon more in tho contrees, that I have founde that sterre more highe; so that towarde the highe Lybye, it is 18 degrees of heghte, and certeyn minutes (of the whiche, 60 minutes maken a degree) afre goynge be see and be londe, toward this contree, of that I have spoke, and to other yles and londes bezonde that contree, I have founden the sterre Antartyk of 33 degrees of heghte, and mo mynutes. And zif I hadde had companye and schippyng, for to go more bezonde, I trowe wel in certyn, that wee scholde have seen alle the roundnesse of the firmament alle aboute. For as I have seyd zou be for, the half of the firmament is betwene tho 2 sterres: the whiche halfondelle I have seyn. And of the tother halfondelle, I have seyn toward the Northe, undre the Transmontane 62 degrees and 10 mynutes; and toward the partie meridionale, I have seen undre the Antartyk 33 degrees and 16 mynutes: and thanne the halfondelle of the firmament in alle, ne holdethe not but 180 degrees. And of tho 180, I have seen 62 on that o part, and 33 on that other part, that ben 95 degrees, and nyghe the halfondelle of a degree; and so there ne faylethe but that I have seen alle the firmament, saf 84 degrees and the halfondelle of a degree; and that is not the fourthe part of the firmament. For the 4 partie of the roundnesse of the firmament holt 90 degrees: so there faylethe but 5 degrees and an half, of the fourthe partie. And also I have seen the 3 parties of alle the roundnesse of the firmament, and more zit 5 degrees and an half. Be the whiche I seye zou certeynly, that men may envirowne alle the erthe of alle the world, as wel under as aboven, and turnen azen to his contree, that hadde companye and schippyng and conduyt: and alle weyes he scholde fynde men, londes, and yles, als wel as in this contree. For zee wyten welle, that thei that ben toward the Antartyk, thei ben streghte, feet azen feet of hem, that dwellen undre the transmoutane; als wel as wee and thei that dwellyn undre us, ben feet azenst feet. For alle the parties of see and of lond han here appositees, habitables or trepassables, and thei of this half and bezond half. And wytethe wel, that afre that, that I may perceyve and comprehende, the londes of Prestre John, emperor of Ynde ben undre us. For in goynge from Scotland or from England toward Jerusalem, men gon upward alweys. For oure

 lond is in the lowe partie of the erthe, toward the West: and the lond of Prestre
 John is the lowe partie of the erthe, toward the Est: and thei han there the day, whan wee have the nyghte, and also highe to the contrarie, thei han the nyghte, whan wee han the day. For the erthe and the see ben of round forme and schapp, as I have seyde befor. And than that men gon upward to o cost, men gon downward to another cost. Also zee have herd me seye, that Jerusalem is in the myddes of the world; and that may men preven and schewen there, be a spere, that is pighte in to the erthe, upon the hour of mydday, whan it is equenoxium, that schewethe no schadwe on no syde. And that it scholde ben in the myddes of the world, David wytnessethe it in the Psautre, where he seythe, Deus operatus est salutē in medio terre. Thanne thei that parten fro the parties of the West, for to go toward Jerusa-lom, als many iorneyes as thei gon upward for to go thidre, in als many iorneyes may thei gon fro Jerusalem, unto other confynyes of the superficialtie of the erthe bezonde.
 And whan men gon bezonde tho iorneyes, towarde Ynde and to the foreyn yles, alle is envyrnyng the roundnesse of the erthe and of the see, undre oure contrees on this half. And therefore hathe it befallen many tymes of o thing, that I have herd cownted, whan I was zong; how a worthi man departed sometyme from oure contrees, for to go serche the world. And so he passed Ynde, and the yles bezonde Ynde, where ben mo than 5000 yles: and so longe he wente be see and lond, and so envi-round the world be many seysons, that he foud an yle, where he herde speke his owne langage, callynge on oxen in the plowghe, siche wordes as men speken to bestes in his owne contree: whereof he hadde gret mervayle: for he knewe not how it mighte be. But I seye, that he had gon so longe, be londe and be see, that he had envy-round alle the erthe, that he was comen azen envyrnyng, that is to seye, goynge aboute, unto his owne marches, zif he wolde have passed forthe, til he had founden his contree and his owne knoueleche. But he turned azen from thens, from whens he was come fro; and so he loste moche peynefulle labour, as him self seyde, a gret while afre, that he was comen hom. For it befelle afre, that he wente in to Norweye; and there tempest of the see toke him; and he arryved in an yle; and whan he was in that yle, he knew wel, that it was the yle, where he had herd speke his owne langage before, and the callynge of the oxen at the plowghe: and that was possible thinges. But how it semethe to symple men unlearned, that men ne mowe not go undre the erthe, and also that men scholde falle toward the hevne, from undre! But that may not be, upon lesse, than wee mowe falle toward hevne, fro the erthe, where wee ben. For fro what partie of the erthe, that men duelle, outhen aboven or be-nethen, it semethe alweyes to hem that duellen, that thei gon more righte than any other folk. And righte as it semethe to us, that thei ben undre us, righte so it semethe hem, that wee ben undre hem. For zif a man mighte falle fro the erthe unto the firmament; he gretter reson, the erthe and the see, that ben so grete and so hevy, scholde fallen to the firmament: but that may not be: and therefore seithe oure Lord God, Non timeas me, qui suspendi terrā ex nichilo? And alle be it, that it be possible thing, that men may so envyrnone alle the world, natheles of a 1000 per-sones, en ne myghte not happen to returnen in to his contree. For, for the gretnesse of the erthe and of the see, men may go be a 1000 and a 1000 other weyes, that no man cowde redye him perfytely toward the parties that he cam fro, but zif it were be aventure and happ, or be the grace of God. For the erthe is fulle large and fulle gret, and holt in roundnesse and aboute envyrroun, be aboven and benethen 20425 myles, afre the opynyoun of the olde wise astronomeres. And here seyenges I repreve noughite. But afre my lytylle wyt, it semethe me, savyng here reverence, that it is more. And for to have better understandinge, I seye thus, be ther ymagyned a figure, that hath a gret compass; and aboute the poynt of the gret compass, that is clept the centre, be made another litille compass: than afre, be the gret compass devised be lines in manye parties; and that alle the lynes meeten at the centre; so that in as many parties, as the grete compass schal be departed, in als manye, schalle be departed the litille, that is aboute the centre, alle be it, that the spaces ben lesse. Now thanne, be the gret compass represented for the firmament, and the litille compass represented for the erthe. Now thanne the firmament is devysed, be astronomeres, in 12 signes; and every signe is devysed in 30 degrees, that is 360 degrees, that the firmamente hath aboven. Also, be the erthe devysed in als many parties, as the firmament; and lat every partye answer to a degree of the firmament: and wytethe it wel, that afre the auctoures of astronomye, 700 furlonges of erthe answeren to a degree of the firmament; and tho ben 87 miles and 3 furlonges. Now be that here multiplyed be 360 sithes; and than thei ben 31500 myles, every of 8 furlonges, afre myles of oure contree. So moche hath the erthe in roundnesse, and of heghte environ, afre myn opynyoun and myn undirstondynge. And zee schalle undirstonde, that afre the opynyoun of olde wise philosophres and astronomeres, oure contree ne Ireland ne Wales ne Scotland ne Norweye ne the other yles costynge to hem, ne ben not in the superlicyalte cownted aboven the erthe; as it schewethe be alle the bokes of astronomye. For the superficialtee of the erthe is departed in 7 parties, for the 7 planetes: and tho parties ben clept clymates. And oure parties be not of the 7 clymates: for thei ben descendynge toward the West. And also these yles of Ynde, which beth evene azenst us, beth noght reckned in the climates: for thei ben azenst us, that ben in the lowe contree. And the 7 clymates stretchen hem envyreunynge the world.

II. " And I John Maundeville knyghte aboveseyd, (alle thoughe I be unworthi) that departed from oure contrees and passed the see, the zeer of grace 1322. that have passed manye londes and manye yles and contrees, and cerched manye fulle straunge places, and have ben in many a fulle gode honourable companye, and at many a faire dede of arnes, (alle be it that I dide none myself, for myn unable insuffisance) now I am comen hom (mawgree my self) to reste: for gowtes, artetykes, that me distreynen, tho diffynen the ende of my labour, azenst my wille (God knowethe.) And thus takynge solace in my wrecched reste, recordynge the tyme passed, I have fulfilled theise thinges and putte hem wryten in this boke, as it wolde come in to my mynde, the zeer of grace 1356 in the 34 zeere that I departede from oure contrees. Wherefore I preye to alle the rederes and heeres of this boke, zif it plesse hem, that thei wolde preyen to God for me: and I schalle preye for hem. And alle tho that seyn for me a Pater noster, with an Ave Maria, that God forzeve me my synnes, I make hem partneres and graunte hem part of alle the gode pilgrimages and of alle the gode dedes, that I have don, zif ony be to his plesance: and noghte only of tho, but of alle that evere I schalle do unto my lyfes ende. And I beseche Almyghty God, fro whom alle godenesse and grace comethe fro, that he vouchesaf, of his excellent mercy and habundant grace, to fulle fylle hire soules with inspiracioun of the Holy Gost, in makynge defence of alle hire gostly enemyes here in erthe, to hire salvacioun, bothe of body and soule; to worschipe and thankynge of him, that is three and on, withouten begynnynge and without endynge; that is withouten qualitee, good, and withouten quantytee, gret; that in alle places is present, and alle thinges contenyng; the whiche that no goodnesse may amende, ne non evelle empeyre; that in perfeyte trynytee lyveth and regneth God, be alle worldes and be alle tymes. Amen, Amen, Amen."

[Of Wicliffe's style an abundant specimen has been given in his translation of the first chapter of St. Luke opposed to the ancient Anglo-Saxon. Of his original composition a brief specimen may be taken from his Objections against Friars.

"Freres praisen more their rotten habite then the worshipfull body of our Lord Jesu Christ; for they techen lords and naveliche ladies, that if they dien in Francis's habite, they shulden never come to hell for virtue thereof.

"Also Freres beggen without nede for their own rich sect.

"Freres also keepen not correption of the Gospel against their brethren that trespassen, but cruelly don them to painful prison."

Wicliffe died in 1384.

*Contemporary with him was John de Trevisa, Vicar of Berkeley in Gloucestershire; who translated the Polychronicon of Higden, and Bartholomæus de Proprietatibus Rerum; and has had the reputation of having produced an English version of the Bible, which however has in vain been sought for. From the version of Higden, partly made in 1385, the following extracts are highly interesting; both as they respect the language and custom of the time.

"(s) As it is know how many maner peple beth in this Ilonde, ther beth also of so meny peple langages and tonges. Notheles Walschemen and Scottes, that beth nouzt ymeddled with othir nationns, holdeth wel neig her first langage and speche. But yett the Scottes, that were somtyme confederate and woned with the Pictes, drawe somewhat after her speche. But the Flemmynges, that woneth in the west side of Wales, haveth ylefte her straunge speche, and speketh Saxonlich enoug. Also Englischemen, thoug they had from the begiunynge thre maner speche, southren, northren, and myddell speche in the myddell of the lond, as thei come of the thre maner peple of Germania; notheles by commixtion, and medlyng, first with Danes, and afterward with Normans, in many the contray langage is appaired. For some usith strang wlaffyng, chitering, harryng and gurryng, grisbyting. This apairyng of the birthe tonge is bicause of twey thinges: oon is, for children in scole agens the usage and maner of alle other nationns beth compellid for to leve her owne langage, and for to constrewe her lessons and her thinges a Frensche, and haveth siththe that the Normans came first in to Englonde. Also gentil mens children beth ytaught for to speke Frensche from the time that thei beth rokked in her cradel, and kunneth speke and play with a childes brooch. And uplondische men woll likne hem selfe to gentilmenn, and fondith with grete bysnesse for to speke Frensche for to be the more ytold of."

So far is a translation from Higden: Trevisa then adds his own observation.

"This maner was miche yused tofore the first moreyn, and is siththe somdel ychaungide. For Johan Cornwail, a maister of gramer, chaungide the lore of gramer scole and construction of Frensche in to Englisch; and Richard Pencriche lerned that maner techyng of hym; and othir men of Pencrich; so that now in the yere of our Lord M. CCC. LXXXV. of the secund king Richard after the Conquest nyne, in alle the gramer scoles of Englonde, children leveth Frensche, and construeth and lerneth an Englisch, and haveth thereby avantage in oon side, and desavantage in another. Her avauntage is that thei lerneth her gramer in lasse time than children were wont to do; desavauntage is, that now children of gramer scole kunneth no more Frensche, then can her lifte heele. And it is harm for hem and thei schul passe the see, and travaile in straunge londes and in many other places also. Also gentel men haveth now myche ylefte for to teche her children Frensche."

(s) [MS. Harl. 1900. Brit. Mus. Part of the citation, which I have made, is given by several of our antiquaries, not without some verbal variations. But the whole passage has been printed by Caxton, in which are many differences and evident mistakes.]

The translation is then resumed:—

"Hit semeth a grete wonder, how Englisch, that is the birthe tonge of Englischmen, and her owne langage and tonges, is so dyverse of souer in this oon Ilond."

Trevisa dates the conclusion of his translation in 1387. Tanner says that he died, very old, in 1412.

Ritson mentions an indenture of 1343, as the oldest English instrument known. Tyrwhitt had discovered no instance of the English language in parliamentary proceedings earlier than 1398. Ritson, however, refers to one of 1388.]

[SECTION IX. Gower. Chaucer. John the Chaplain. Lydgate.]

The first of our authors, who can properly be said to have written English, was Sir John Gower, who, in his Confession of a Lover, calls Chaucer his disciple, and may therefore be considered as the father of our poetry.

[Dr. Johnson is mistaken in saying that Gower calls Chaucer his disciple; for (1) it is Venus, whom Gower describes, at the close of his Confessio Amantis, claiming Chaucer as her scholar and bard. That Gower is to be placed before Chaucer is unquestionable. He was born before Chaucer. Authors both historical and poetical, in the century after the decease of these poets, usually coupling their names and describing their accomplishments, place Gower before Chaucer; not intending precedence in respect to talents, but merely to seniority. John Fox observes, that "he (Chaucer) and Gower were both of one time; although it seemeth that Gower was a great deale his ancient."]

"Nowe for to speke of the commune,
It is to drede of that fortune,
Which hath befallē in sondrye londes:
But ofte for defaute of bondes
All sodeinly, er it be wist,
A tunne, whan his lie arist
Tobreketh, and renneth all aboute,
Whiche els shulde nought gone out.
" And eke full ofte a littell skare
Vpon a banke, er men be ware,
Let in the streame, whiche with gret peine,
If any man it shall restreine.
Where lawe failleth, errour groweth.
He is not wise, who that ne troweth.
For it hath proued oft er this.
And thus the common clamour is
In euery londe, where people dwelleth:
And eche in his complainte telleth,
How that the worlde is miswent,
And thervpon his jugement
Yeueth euery man in sondrie wise:
But what man wolde him selfe auise
His conscience, and nought misuse,
He maie well at the first excuse

His god, whiche euer stant in one,
 In him there is defaute none
 So must it stande vpon vs selue,
 Nought onfly vpon ten ne twelue,
 But plenary vpon vs all.
 For man is cause of that shall fall."

[It would be unjust to the father of English poetry, as Dr. Johnson calls him, to exemplify his art only in the preceding dry citation. I therefore add a specimen of his fancy in describing the feelings of a lover; in which, as I have elsewhere observed, he approaches the tender gallantry of Petrarch; and to which the description of Milton's musick, that "takes the prison'd soul and laps it in Elysium," is akin.

"As the windes of the South
 Ben most of alle debonaire;
 So, whan hir liste to speke faire,
 The vertue of hir goodly speche
 Is verily myn hertes leche.
 And if it so befalle among,
 That she carol upon a song,
 Whan I it hear, I am so fedd,
 That I am fro myself so ledd
 As though I were in Paradis:
 For certes, as to myn avis,
 Whan I heare of her voice the steven,
 Me thinketh it is is a blisse of heven."]

The history of our language is now brought to the point at which the history of our poetry is generally supposed to commence, the time of the illustrious Geoffrey Chaucer, who may perhaps, with great justice, be stiled the first of our versifiers who wrote poetically. He does not however appear to have deserved all the praise which he has received, or all the censure that he has suffered. Dryden, who, mistaking genius for learning, in confidence of his abilities, ventured to write of what he had not examined, ascribes to Chaucer the first refinement of our numbers, the first production of easy and natural rhymes, and the improvement of our language, by words borrowed from the more polished languages of the continent. Skinner contrarily blames him in harsh terms for having vitiated his native speech by whole cartloads of foreign words. But he that reads the works of Gower will find smooth numbers and easy rhymes, of which Chaucer is supposed to have been the inventor, and the French words, whether good or bad, of which Chaucer is charged as the importer. Some innovations he might probably make, like others, in the infancy of our poetry, which the paucity of books does not allow us to discover with particular exactness; but the works of Gower and Lydgate sufficiently evince, that his diction was in general like that of his contemporaries: and some improvements he undoubtedly made by the various dispositions of his rhymes, and by the mixture of different numbers, in which he seems to have been happy and judicious. I have selected several specimens both of his prose and verse; and among them, part of his translation of Boethius, to which another version, made in the time of queen Mary, is opposed. It would be improper to quote very sparingly an author of so much reputation, or to make very large extracts from a book so generally known.

with sorowe. Mannes death is happy, that cometh not in youth, when a man is lustye, and in pleasure or welth: but in time of aduersitie, when it is often desyred. Alas Alas howe dull and desse be the cares of cruel death, &c.

"Whyles that I considerydde pryuyllye with my selfe the thynges before sayd, and deserybed my wofull complaynte after the maner and offyce of a wrytter, me thought I sawe a woman stand ouer
my head of a reuerend countenaunce, hauyng quycke and glysteryng clere eyes, aboue the common sorte of men in lyuely and delectable coloure, and ful of strength, although she serned so olde that by no meanes she is thought to be one of this oure tyme, her stature is of douteful knowledge, for now she shewethe herselfe at the comen length or statur of men, and other whiles she semeth so high, as though she touched heuen with the crown

mon mesure of menne: And sometye it seemed, that she touched the heven with the hight of her hedde. And when she hove her hedde higher, she perced the self heven, so that the sight of menne lokyng was in ydell: her clothes wer maked of right delic thredes, and subtel craft of perdurable matter. The whiche clothes she had woven with her owne handes, as I knewe well after by her self declaryng, and shewyng to me the beattie: The whiche clothes a darknesse of a forleten and dispised elde had dusked and darked, as it is wonte to darke by smoked Images.

" In the netherest hemme and border of these clothes menne redde i woven therein a Grekishe A. that signifieth the life activ, and above that letter, in the hiest bordure, a Grekishe C. that signifieth the life contemplative. And betwene these two letters there were seen degrees nobly wrought, in maner of ladders, by whiche degrees menne might climben from the netherest letter to the upperest: nathelesse handes of some men hadden kerve that clothe, by violence or by strength, and everiche manne of hem had borne awaie soche peeces, as he might gotten. And forsothe this foresaied woman bare smale bokes in her right hande, and in her left hand she bare a scepter. And when she sawe these Poeticall muses approchyng about my bed, and endityng wordes to my wepynges, she was a little amoved, and glowed with cruell eyen. Who (quod she) hath suffered approchen to this sike manne these commen strompettes, of which is the place that menne callen Theatre, the whiche onely ne asswage not his sorowes with remedies, but thei would feeden and norishe hym with swete venime? Forsothe that ben tho that with thornes, and prickynges of talentes of affections, whiche that ben nothyng fructuous nor profitable, distroyen the Corne, plentuous of fructes of reason. For thei holden hertes of men in usage, but thei ne deliver no folke fro maladie. But if ye muses had withdrawn fro me with your flatteries any uncomyng and unprofitable manne, of her hed. And when she wold stretch fourth her hed hygher, it also perced thorough heauen, so that mens syghie could not attaine to behold her. Her vestures or cloths were perfeft of the finyste thredes, and subtyll workemanship, and of substaunce permanent, whych vesturs she had woven with her owne hands as I perceyned after by her owne saynge. The kynde or beawtye of the whiche vestures, a certayne darkenes or rather ignorance of oldenes forgotten hadde obscuryd and darkened, as the smoke is wont to darken Images that stand nyghe the smoke. In the lower parte of the said vestures was read the Greke letter P. woven whych signifyeth practise or actyffe, and in the hygher part of the vestures the Greke letter T. which estandeth for theoria, that signifieth speculation or contemplation. And betwene both the sayd letters were sene certayne degrees, wrought after the maner of ladders, wherein was as it were a passage or waye in steppes or degrees from the lower part wher the letter P. was which is vnderstand from practys or actyf, unto the hygher parte wher the letter T. was whych is vnderstand speculation or contemplacion. Neuertheles the handes of some vyolente persones had cut the sayde vestures and had taken awaye certayne peeis thereof, such as euery one coude catch. And she her self dyd bare in her ryght hand litel bokes, and in her lefte hande a sceptre, which foresayd philosophy (when she saw the muses poetycal present at my bed, spekyng sorrowful wordes to my wepynges) beyng angry sayd (with terrible or frownyng countenance) who suffred these crafty harlottes to com to thys sycke man? whych can help hym by no means of hys griefe by any kind of medicines, but rather increase the same with swete poyson. These be they that doo destroye the fertile and plentious commodyties of reason and the fruytes therof wyth their pryckynge thornes, or barren affectes and accustome or subdue mens myndes with sickenes, as best wout to finde comunly among the peple, I would well suffre the lasse greuously. For why, in soche an unprofitable man myne ententes were nothyng endamaged. But ye withdrawn fro me this man, that hath ben nourished in my studies or scoles of Eleaticis, and of Academicis in Grece. But goeth now rather awaie ye Mermaidens, whiche that ben swete, till it be at the last, and suffreth this man to be cured and heled by my muses, that is to say, by my notefull sciences. And thus this companie of muses iblamed casten wrothly the chere downward to the yerth, and shewing by rednesse ther shame, thei passeden sorrowfully the threshold. And I of whom the sight plounged in teres was darked, so that I ne might not know what that woman was, of so Imperial aucthoritie, I woxe all abashed and stoned, and cast my sight doune to the yerth, and began still for to abide what she would doen afterward. Then came she nere, and set her doune upon the utterest corner of my bed, and she beholdyng my chere, that was cast to the yerth, hevie and grevous of wepyng, complained with these wordes (that I shall saine) the perturbacion of my thought."

and heuynes, and do not delyuer or heale them of the same. But yf your flatterye had comeyed or wythdrawen from me, any viler nyd man as the comen sorte of people are woute to be, I coude haue ben better contentyd, for in that my worke should not be hurt or hynderyd. But you haue taken and comeyed from me thys man that hath ben broughte vp in the studyes of Aristotel and of Plato. But yet get you hence mermaidens (that seme swete untill you haue brought a man to deathe) and suffer me to heale thys my man wyth my muses or scyences that be holsume and good. And after that philosophy had spoken these wordes the sayd companye of the musys poetically beyng rebukyd and sad, caste down their countenance to the ground, and by blussyng confessed their shamfastnes, and went out of the dores. But I (that had my syght dull and blynd wyth wepyng, so that I knew not what woman this was hauyng soo great aucthoritie) was amasyd or astonyed, and lokyng downward, toward the ground, I began pryvylye to look what thyng she would saye ferther, then she had said. Then she approching and drawyng nere vnto me, sat downe, &c."

The Conclusions of the ASTROLABIE.

"This book (written to his son in the year of our Lord 1391, and in the 14 of King Richard II.) standeth so good at this day, especially for the horizon of Oxford, as in the opinion of the learned it cannot be amended, says an Edit. of Chaucer."

"Lytel Lowys my sonne, I perceve well by certayne evidences thyne abylyte to lerne scyences, touching nombres and proporcions, and also well consydre I thy besye prayer in especyal to lerne the tretyse of the astrolabye. Than for as moche as a philosopher saithe, he wrapeth hym in his frende, that condiscendeth to the ryghtfull prayers of his frende: therefore I have given the a sufficient astrolabye for oure orizont, compowned after the latitude of Oxenforde: upon the whiche by mediacion of this lytell tretise, I purpose to teche the a certayne nombre of conclusions pertaining to this same instrument. I say a certayne nombre of conclusions for thre causes, the first cause is this. Truste wel that al the conclusions that have be founden, or ells possiblye might be founde in so noble an instrument as in the astrolabye, ben unknowen perfytely to anye mortal man in this region, as I suppose. Another cause is this, that sothely in any cartes of the astrolabye that I have ysene, ther ben some conclusions, that wol not in al thinges perfourme ther behestes: and some of 'hem ben to harde to thy tender age of ten yere to conceive. This tretise divided in five partes, wil I shewe the wondir light rules and naked wordes in Englishe, for Latine ne canst thou nat yet but smale, my litel sonne. But nevertheless suffiseth to the these trewe conclusyons in Englishe, as well as suffiseth to these noble clerkes Grekes these same conclusions in Greke, and to the Arabines in Arabike, and to Jewes in Hebrewe, and to the Latin folke in Latyn: whiche Latyn folke had 'hem firste out of other divers langages, and write 'hem in ther owne tonge, that is to faine in Latine.

" And God wote that in all these languages and in manye mo, have these conclusyons ben sufficientlye lerned and taught, and yet by divers rules, right as divers pathes leden divers folke the right waye to Rome.

" Now wol I pray mekely every person discrete, that redeth or hereth this lityl tretise to have my rude ententing excused, and my superfluite of wordes, for two causes. The first cause is, for that curious endityng and harde sentences is ful hevy at ones, for soch a childe to lerne. And the seconde cause is this, that sothely me semeth better to writen unto a childe twise a gode sentence, that he foriete it ones. And, Lowis, if it be so that I shewe the in my lith Englishe, as trewe conclusions touching this mater, and not only as trewe but as many and subtil conclusions as ben yshewed in Latin, in any comon tretise of the astrolabye, come me the more thanke, and praye God save the kinge, that is lorde of this langage, and all that him faith bereth, and obeieith everiche in his degree, the more and the lasse. But consydreth well, that I ne usurpe not to have founden this werke of my labour or of myne engin. I n'ame but a leude compilatour of the laboure of olde astrologiens, and have it translated in myn Englishe onely for thy doctrine: and with this swerde shal I slene envy.

" The first party.

" The first partye of this tretise shall reherce the figures, and the membres of thynce astrolaby, bycause that thou shalte have the greter knowinge of thine owne instrument.

" The seconde party.

" The seconde partye shal teche the to werken the very practike of the foresaid conclusions, as ferforthie and also narowe as may be shewed in so smale an instrument portatife aboute. For wel wote every astrologien, that smallest fractions ne wol not be shewed in so smal an instrument, as in subtil tables calculed for a cause.

The Prologue of the TESTAMENT OF LOVE.

" Many men there ben, that with eres openly sprad so moche swallowen the deliciousnesse of jestes and of ryme, by queint kuittinge coloures, that of the godenesse or of the badnesse of the sentence take they litel hede or els none.

" Sothelye dulle witte and a thoughtfulle soule so sore have mined and graffed in my spirites, that soche craft of endityng woll nat ben of mine acquaintance. And for rude wordes and boistous percen the herte of the herer to the inrest point, and planten there the sentence of thinges, so that with litel helpe it is able to spring, this hoke, that nothyng hath of the grete flocde of wytte, ne of semelyche colours, is dolen with rude wordes and boistous, and so draw togider to maken the catchers therof ben the more redy to hent sentence.

" Some men there ben, that painten with colours riche and some with wers, as with red inke, and some with coles and chalke: and yet is there gode matter to the leude peple of thylke chalkye purtreiture, as 'hem thinketh for the time, and afterward the syght of the better colours yeven to 'hem more joye for the first leudenesse. Soothly this leude clowdy occupacyon is not to prayse, but by the leude, for comenly leude leudenesse commendeth. Eke it shal yeve sight that other precyous thynges shall be the more in reverence. In Latin and French hath many sovaine wittes had grete delyte to endite, and have many noble thynges fulfild, but certes there ben some that speken ther poisye mater in Frenche, of whiche speche the Frenche men have as gode a fantasie as we have in heryng of Frenche mens Englishe. And many termes there ben in Englyshe, whiche unneth we Englishe men connen declare the knowleginge: howe should than a Frenche man borne? soche termes connejumpere in his matter, but as the jay chatereth Englishe. Right so truely the understandyn of Englishmen wolle not stretche to the privie termes in Frenche, what so ever we bosten of straunge language. Let than clerkes enditen in Latin, for they have the propertie of science, and the knowinge in that facultie: and lette Frenche men in ther Frenche also enditen ther queint termes, for it is kyndely to ther mouthes; and let us shewe our fantasies in such wordes as we lerneden of our dame's tonge. And although this boke be lytel thank worthy for the leudnesse in travaile, yet soch writing exiten men to thilke thynges that ben necessarie: for every man therby may as by a perpetual myrroure sene the vices or vertues of other, in whyche thyng lightly may be conceived to eschueperils, and necessities to catch, after as adventures have fallen to other peple or persons.

“ Nowe principally the mene to brynge in knowleging and lovyng his creatour, is the consideracyon of thynges made by the creatour, wher through by thylke thynges that ben made, understandynge here to our wyttes, arne the unsene pryvities of God made to us syghtfull and knowinge, in our contemplacion and understondinge. These thynges than forsothe moche bringen us to the ful knowleginge sothe, and to the parfytte love of the maker of heavenly thynges. Lo! David saith: thou haste delited me in makinge, as who saith, to have delite in the tune how God hat lent me in consideration of thy makinge. Wherof Aristotle in the boke de Animalibus, saith to naturell philosophers: it is a grete likynge in love of knowinge ther creature: and also in knowinge of causes in kindely thynges, considrid forsothe the formes of kindely thynges and the shap, a gret kyndely love we shulde have to the werkman that 'hem made. The crafte of a werkman is shewed in the werk. Herefore trulie the philosophers with a lyvely studie manie noble thynges, righte precious, and worthy to memorye, writen, and by a gret swet and travaille to us lesten of causes the properties in natures of thynges, to whiche therefore philosophers it was more joy, more lykinge, more herty lust in kindely vertues and matters of reson the perfeccion by busy study to knowe, than to have had all the tresour, al the riches, al the vaine glory, that the passed emperours, princes, or kinges hadden. Therefore the names of 'hem in the boke of perpetuall memorie in vertue and pece arne writen; and in the contrarie, that is to saine, in Styxe the foule pitte of helle arne thilke pressed that soch godenes hated. And bicause this boke shall be of love, and the prime causes of stering in that doinge with passions and disces for wantinge of desire, I wil that this boke be cleped the testament of love.

" But nowe thou reder, who is thilke that will not in scorne laughe, to here a dwarfe or els halfe a man, say he wil rende out the swerde of Hercules handes, and also he shulde set Hercules Gades a mile yet ferther, and over that he had power of strength to pull up the spere, that Alisander the noble might never wagge, and that passinge al thinge to ben mayster of Fraunce by might, there as the noble gracious Edwarde the thirde for al his grete prowessse in victories ne might al yet conquere ?

" Certes I wote well, ther shall be made more scorne and jape of me, that I so unworthely clothed altogether in the cloudie cloude of unconning, wil putten me in prees to speak of love, or els of the causes in that matter, sithen al the grettest clerkes han had ynough to don, and as who saith gathered up clene toforne 'hem, and with ther sharp sithes of conning al mowen and made therof grete rekes and poble, ful of al plenties to fede me and many an other. Envyce forsothe commendeth noughte his reson, that he hath in hain, be it never so trusty. And although these noble repers, as gode workmen and worthy ther hier, han al draw and bounde up in the shewes, and made many shockes, yet have I ensample to gader the smale crommes, and fullin ma walet of tho that fallen from the bourde among the smalle houndes, notwithstanding the travaile of the almoigner, that hath draw up in the cloth al the remissailes, as trenchours, and the relefe to bere to the almesse. Yet also have I leve of the noble husbunde Boece, although I be a straunger of conninge to come after his doctrine, and these grete workmen, and glene my handfuls of the shedyng after ther handes, and yf me faile ought of my ful, to encrease my porcion with that I shal drawe by privyties out of shockes; a slye servaunte in his owne helpe is often moche commended; knowynge of trouthe in causes of thynges, was more hardier in the firste sechers, and so sayth Aristotle, and lighter in us that han folowed after. For ther passing study han freshed our wittes, and oure understandynge han excited in consideration of trouthe by sharpenes of ther reson. Utterly these thinges be no dremes ne japes, to throwe to hogges, it is lyfelych mete for children of trouthe, and as they me betiden whan I pilgramed out of my kith in wintere, whan the wether out of mesure was boistous, and the wyld wynd Boreas, as his kind asketh, with dryng coldes maked the waves of the ocean se so to arise unkindely over the commune bankes that it was in point to spill all the erthe."

" Whanne that April with his shoures sote
The droughte of March hath perced to the rote,
And bathed every veine in swiche licour,
Of whiche vertue engendred is the flour;
Whan Zephirus eke with his sote brethe

(1) [Dr. Johnson has copied both the poetry and prose of Chaucer from the edition of Urry in 1721; which Mr. Tyrwhitt, the last accomplished editor of the poet's Canterbury Tales, pronounces most incorrect. This may be abundantly seen even by the comparison of so much of the Prologue, as Dr. Johnson took from Urry, with the text as now adopted from the excellent edition of Tyrwhitt. With the text of the remaining poems we must be content, till an elaborate and correct edition of the poet's works, which we greatly want, be given. Perhaps some little help is afforded towards such an important undertaking, in Illustrations of Gower and Chaucer, published in 1810; an account of several manuscripts of Chaucer, containing hitherto unemployed materials, being there given. See p. 116—132. Of the prose of Chaucer there has been less corruption.]

The tendre croppes, and the yonge sonne
 Hath in the Ram his halfe cours yronne,
 And smale foules maken melodye,
 That slepen alle night with open eye,
 So prieth hem nature in hir corages;
 Than longen folk to gon on pilgrimages,
 And palmeres for to seken strange strondes,
 To serve halwes couthe in sondry londes;
 And specially, from every shires ende
 Of Englelond, to Canterbury they wende,
 The holy blissful martyr for to seke,
 That hem hath holpen, whan that they were seke.

“ Befelle, that, in that seson on a day,
 In Southwerk at the Tabard as I lay,
 Redy to wenden on my pilgrimage
 To Canterbury with devoute corage,
 At night was come into that hostelrie
 Wel nine and twenty in a compaignie
 Of sondry folk, by aventure yfalle
 In felawship, and pilgrimes were they alle,
 That toward Canterbury wolden ride.
 The chambres and the stables weren wide,
 And wel we weren esed atte beste.

“ And shortly, whan the sonne was gone to reste,
 So hadde I spoken with hem everich on,
 That I was of hir felawship anon,
 And made forword erly for to rise,
 To take oure way ther as I you devise.

“ But natheles, while I have time and space,
 Or that I forther in this tale pace,
 Me thinketh it accordant to reson,
 To tellen you alle the condition
 Of eche of hem, so as it semed me,
 And whiche they weren, and of what degre;
 And eke in what araie that they were inne:
 And at a knight than wol I firste beginne.

THE KNIGHT.

“ A knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
 That fro the time that he firste began
 To riden out, he loved chevalrie,
 Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie.
 Ful worthy was he in his lordes werre,
 And therto hadde he riden, no man ferre,
 As wel in Cristendom as in Hethenesse,
 And ever honoured for his worthinesse.

“ At Alisandre he was whan it was wonne.
 Ful often time he hadde the bord begonne
 Aboven alle nations in Pruce.
 In Lettowe hadde he reysed and in Ruce, .

No cristen man so ofte of his degre.
 In Gernade at the siege eke hadde he be
 Of Algesir, and riddn in Belmarie.
 At Leyes was he, and at Satalie,
 Whan they were wonne; and in the Grete see
 At many a noble armee hadde he be;
 And foughten for our faith at Tramissene
 In listes thries, and ay slain his fo.

"This ilke worthy knight hadde ben also Somtime with the lord of Palatie.
 Agyn another hethen in Turkie:
 And evermore he hadde a sovercine pris.
 And though that he was worthy he was wise;
 And of his port as meke as is a mayde.
 He never yet no vilanie ne sayde
 In alle his lif, unto no manere wight.
 He was a veray parfit gentil knight.

"But for to tellen you of his araie,
 His hors was good, but he was not gaie.
 Of fustian he wered a gipon,
 All besmottred with his habergeon,
 For he was late ycome fro his viage,
 And wente for to don his pilgrimage."

The House of Fame.

The First Boke.

"Now harken, as I have you saied,
 What that I mette or I abraied,
 Of December the teneth daie,
 When it was night, to slepe I laie,
 Right as I was wonte for to doen,
 And fill aslepe wonder sone,
 As he that was werie forgo
 On pilgrimage miles two
 To the corps of saint Leonarde,
 To maken lithe that erst was harde.

"But as me slept me mette I was Within a temple imade of glas,
 In whiche there weren no images
 Of golde, standyng in sondrie stages,
 Sette in no riche tabernacles,
 And with perre no pinnacles,
 And no curious portraiture,
 And queint maner of figures
 Of golde worke, then I sawe ever.

"But certainly I n'ist never
 Where that it was, but well wist I
 It was of Venus redily
 This temple, for in portreiture
 I sawe anone right her figure

Nakid fletyng in a se,
And also on her hedde parde
Her rosy garland white and rellde,
And her combe to kembe her hedde,
Her doves, and Dan Cupido
Her blinde sonne, and Vulcano,
That in his face was full broune.

“ But as I romed up and doune,
I founde that on the wall there was
Thus written on a table of bras.
I woll now syng, if that I can,
The armes, and also the man,
That first came through his destine
Fugitive fro Troye the countre
In to Itaile, with full moche pine,
Unto the strondes of Lavine,
And tho began the storie anone,
As I shall tellen you echone.

“ First sawe I the distruction
Of Troie, through the Greke Sinon
With his false untrue forswerynges,
And with his chere and his lesynges,
That made a horse, brought into Troy,
By whiche Trojans loste all her joy.

“ And after this was graved, alas
How Ilions castell assailed was,
And won, and kyng Priamus slain,
And Polites his sonne certain,
Dispitously of Dan Pyrrhus.

“ And next that sawe I how Venus.
When that she sawe the castell brende,
Doun from hevin she gan discende,
And bade her sonne Æneas fle,
And how he fled, and how that he Escaped was from all the pres,
And toke his father, old Anchises,
And bare hym on his backe awaie,
Crying alas and welawaie!
The whiche Anchises in his hande,
Bare tho the goddess of the lãnde
I mene thilke that unbrenned were.

“ Then sawe I next that all in fere
How Crusa, Dan Æneas wife,
Whom that he loved all his life,
And her yong sonne cleped Iulo,
And eke Ascanius also,
Fledden eke, with drerie chere,
That it was pite for to here,
And in a forest as thei went
At a tournyng of a went

BALADE OF THE VILLAGE WITHOUT PAINTYNG.Plaintife to Fortune.

“ This wretched worldes transmutation
 As wele and wo, nowe pore, and now honour,
 Without order or due diſcretion
 Governed is by fortunes enſour,

(t) [I have in this and the following poems often preferred the readings of the old editions of Chaucer to those given by Dr. Johnson.]

But nathelesse the lacke of her favour
 Ne maie not doe me syng though that I die,
J'ay tout perdu, mon temps et labour,
 For finally fortune I defie.

Yet is me left the sight of my resoun
 To knowen frende fro foe in thy mirrour,
 So moche hath yet thy turnyng up and down,
 Itaughten me to knowen in an hour;
 But truely no force of thy reddour
 To hym that over hymself hath maistrie,
 My suffisaunce yshal be my succour,
 For finally fortune I defie.

Q Socrates, thou stedfast champion,
 She ne might never be thy turmentour,
 Thou never dreddist her oppression,
 Ne in her chere founde thou no favour,
 Thou knewe the disceyte of her colour,
 And that her moste worship is for to lie:
 I knowe her eke a false dissimulour,
 For finally fortune I defie.

The Answer of Fortune.

No man is wretched but hymself it wene,
 He that yhath hymself hath suffisaunce.
 Why saiest thou then I am to the so kene,
 That hast thy self out of my governaunce?
 Saie thus, grant mercie of thin habundaunce,
 That thou hast lent or this, thou shalt not strive,
 What wost thou yet how I wyl the avaunce?
 And eke thou hast thy beste frende alive.

I have the taught dīvision betwene
 Frende of effecte, and frende of countinaunce,
 The nedeth not the galle of an hīne,
 That cureth eyen derke for ther penaunce,
 Now seest thou clere that wer. in ignoraunce,
 Yet holt thine anker, and thou maicst arive
 There bountie bereth the key of my substaunce,
 And eke thou haste thy beste frende alive.

How many have I refused to sustene,
 Sith I have the fostred in thy plesaunce?
 Wolt thou then make a statute on thy quene,
 That I shall be aie at thine ordinaunce?
 Thou born art in my reign of variaunce,
 About the whele with other must thou driv
 My lore is bet, then wicke is thy grevance,
 And eke thou hast thy beste frende alive.

THE HISTORY OF THE

The Answer to Fortune.

“ That lore dampne, it is adversitie,
 My frend maist thou not reven blind goddessse,
 That I thy frendes knowe I thanke it the,
 Take hem again, let hem go lie a presse,
 The nigardes in kepyng her richesse
 Pronostike is thou wolt ther toure assaile,
 Wicke appetite cometh aie before sickennesse,
 In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

Fortune.

“ Thou pinchest at my mutabilitie,
 For I the lent a droppe of my richesse,
 And now me liketh to withdrawen me,
 Why shouldest thou my roialtie oppresse?
 The se maie ebbe and flowen more and lesse,
 The welken hath might to shine, rain, and haile,
 Right so must I kithee my brotelnesse,
 In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

The Plaintiffe.

“ Lo, the execution of the majestie,
 That all purveigheth of his rightwisenesse,
 That same thyng fortune clepin ye,
 Ye blinde bestes full of leudeness!
 The heven hath propertie of sikernes,
 This worlde hath evir restlesse travaile,
 The last daie is the ende of myne entresse,
 In generall this rule ne maie not faile.

The voye of Fortune.

“ Princès I praie you of your gentillesse,
 Let not this man on me thus crie and plain,
 And I shall quiten you this businesse,
 And if ye lyste releve hym of his pain,
 Praie ye his best frende of his noblesse
 That to some better state he maie attain.”

[Of nearly the same time with Chaucer were the metrical translators Johannes Capellanus or John the Chaplain, as he has been generally called, and Thomas Hoccleve or Oecleve. The latter is also the writer of a few original poems; none of which, nor any part of his translation de Regimine Principum, afford a specimen of language at this period more to the purpose of illustration, than the lines which presently follow from Lydgate. Nor of the former would more than the bare mention be requisite, if he had not been mistaken by (u) Casley for Lydgate; and by (x) Ritson, who pretended to correct Casley, for John Walton canon of Oseney. This person, whose name is (y) added to a copy of his work, was John Tebaud alias Watyrbeche. His labour, which is a translation of Boethius, bears the date of 1410. Of himself he thus modestly speaks.

“ To Chawceer that was flour of rhetoryk
In Englysh tonge, and excellent pöete,
This woot I wel, no thyng may I do lyk :”

And, in the manner of Lydgate, confesses

“ Defaut of langage and of eloquence :
*And certayn I have tasted wonder lyte
At of the welles of Calliope.*”]

Lydgate was a monk of Bury, who wrote about the same time with Chaucer. Out of his prologue to his third book of the Fall of Princes a few stanzas are selected, which, being compared with the style of his two contemporaries, will show that our language was then not written by caprice, but was in a settled state.

“ Like a pilgrime which that goeth on foote,
And hath none horse to releue his trauayle,
Whote, drye and wery, and may find no bote
Of wel cold whan thrust doth hym assayle,
Wine nor licour, that may to hym auayle,
Right so fare I which, in my businesse,
No succour fynde my rudenes to redresse.

“ I meane as thus, I haue no fresh licour
Out of the conduites of Calliope,
Nor through Clio in rhethorike no flouré,
In my labour for to refresh me :
Nor of the susters in noumber thrise three,
Which with Cithera on Parnaso dwell,
They neider me gaue drinke once of their wel.

“ Nor of theyr springes clere and christaline,
That sprange by touchyng of the Pegase,
Their fauour lacketh my making ten lumine
I fynde theyr bawme of so great scarcitie,
To tame their tunnes with some drop of plentie
For Poliphemus throw his great blindnes,
Hath in me derked of Argus the brightnes.

“ Our life here short of wit the great dulnes
The heuy soule troubled with trauayle,
And of memorye the glasyng brotelnes,
Drede and vncunning haue made a strong batail
With werines my spirite to assayle,
And with their subtil creping in most queint
Hath made my spirit in makyng for to feint.

“ And ouermere, the ferefull frowardnes
Of my stepmother called obliuion,
Hath a bastyll of foryetfulnes,
To stoppe the passage, and shadow my reason
That I might haue no clere direccion,
In translating of new to quicke me,
Stories to write of olde antiquite.

“ Thus was I set and stode in double werre
 At the metyng of fearful wayes twayne,
 The one was this, who euer list to lere,
 Whereas good wylle gan me constrayne,
 Bochas accomplish for to doo my payne,
 Came ignoraunce, with a menace of drede,
 My penne to rest I durste not procede.”

[SECTION XII. Pecock.]

[The following is a specimen of prose in the days immediately subsequent to Chaucer, as the preceding lines from Lydgate are of the versification. Pecock was made bishop of St. Asaph in 1444, afterwards of Chichester. He was an opponent of the Wicliffites; and a man of great learning. From his book, entitled (z) The Repressor, written in 1449, the passage is selected; in which there is more than one sentiment that has been considered similar to the reasoning, and expression, employed by the venerable Hooker on similar points.

“ Seie to me, good sire, and answeere hereto; whanne men of the cuntree uplond bringen into Londoun, in Mydsomer eve, braunchis of trees fro Bischopis-wode and flouris fro the feld; and bitaken tho to citessins of Londoun, for to therwith araie her housis; schulen men of Londoun, receyving and taking tho braunchis and flouris, seie and holde, that tho braunchis grewen out of the cartis which broughten hem to Londoun, and that tho cartis or the hondis of the bringers weren groundis and fundamentis of tho braunchis and flouris? Goddis forbode so litel witt be in her hedis. Certis thoug Crist and his apostlis weren now lyvyng at Londoun, and wolde bringe, so as is now seid, braunchis fro Bischopis-wode and flouris fro the feeelde into Londoun, and wolden hem delyvere to men, that thei make her housis gay into remembrance of Seint John Baptist, and of this that it was prophecied of him, that manye schulden joie in his burthe: yet tho men of Londoun, receyving so tho braunchis and flouris, oughten not to seie and feele, that tho braunchis and flouris grewen out of Christis hondis and out of the apostlis hondis.—Tho braunchis grewen out of the bowis, upon which thei in Bischopis-wode stoden; and tho bowis grewen out of stockis or tronchons; and the tronchons or shaftis grewen out of the roote; and the roote out of the next erthe therto, upon whiche and in whiche the roote is buried. So that neither the cart, neither the hondis of the bringers, neither tho bringers, ben the groundis or fundamentis of tho braunchis.

“ The hool office and werk, into which God ordeyned holy scripture, is for to grounde articlis of feithe, and for to reherce and witnesse moral trouthis of (a) lawe of (b) kind grounded in moral philosophie; that is to seie, in (c) doom of resoun; that the reders be remembrid, stirrid, and exortid, bi so miche the better and the more, and the sooner for to fulfille hem.”]

[SECTION XIII. Fortescue.]

Fortescue was chief justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of king Henry VI. He retired in 1471, after the battle of Tewkesbury, and probably wrote most of his works in his privacy. The following passage is selected from his book of the Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy.

[The citation, which follows, is from the second chapter of the work, which was published, in 1714, with some remarks, by J. Fortescue-Aland, of the Inner Temple, from a (u) collation of manuscripts. In the preface, this learned editor adverts to the style of Fortescue; which here deserves especial notice.

“(e) As to the language, it is the English of those times, participating very much of the nature of the Saxon tongue; for it has in it many words, and terminations of words, as also many phrases, purely Saxon. And I chose to publish it in its own native dress, not only as it is a curious piece of antiquity, but that every man may be a judge for himself of the true sense and meaning of our author, and lay no imputation on the publisher of altering the sense, in attempting to give it a more modern dress.”]

CHAP. II.

“ Hyt may peradventure be marvelid by some men, why one Realme is a Lordshyp only Royall, and the Prynce thereof rulyth yt by his Law, callid Jus Regale; and another Kyngdome is a Lordschip, Royal and Politike, and the Prince thereof rulyth by a Lawe, callyd Jus Politicum & Regale; sythen thes two Princes both of egall Astate.

“ To this dowte it may be answeryd in this manner: the first Institution of thes two Realmys, upon the Incorporation of them, is the Cause of this diversyte.

“ Whan Nembroth by Might, for his own Glorie, made and incorporate the first Realme, and subduyd it to hymself by Tyrannye, he would not have it governyd by any other Rule or Lawe, but by his own Will; by which and for th’ accomplishment thereof he made it. And therfor, though he had thus made a Realme, holy Scripture denyd to cal hym a Kyng, Quia Rex dicitur a Regendo. Whyth thyng he dyd not, but oppressyd the People by Myght; and therfor he was a Tyrant, and callid Primus Tyrannorum. But holy Writ callith hym Robustus Venator voram Deo. For as the Hunter takyth the wyld beste for to sle and eate hym; so Nembroth subduyd to him the People with Might, to have their service and their goods, using upon them the Lordschip that is callid Dominium Regale tantum. After hym Belus that was callid first a Kyng, and after hym his Sone Nynus, and after hym other Panymys; They, by Example of Nembroth, made them Realmys, would not have them rulyd by other Lawys than by their own Wills. Which Lawys ben right good under good Princes; and their Kyngdoms ar then most resemblyd to the Kyngdome of God, which reynith upon Man, rulyng him by hys own Will. Wherfor many Crystyn Princes usen the same Lawe; and therfor it is, that the Lawys sayen, Quod Principi placuit, Legis habet vigorem. And thus I suppose first beganne, in Realmys; Dominium tantum Regale. But afterward, when Mankynd was more mansuete, and better disposyd to Vertue, Grete Communalities, as was the Feliship, that came into this Lond with Brute, wylling to be unyed and made a Body Politike callid a Realme, havynge an Heed to governe it; as, after the Saying of the Philosopher, every Commualtie unyed of many parts must needs have an Heed; than they chose the same Brute to be their Heed and Kyng. And they and he upon this Incorporation and Institution, and onyng of themself into a Realme, ordeyned the same Realme, so to be rulyd and justyfyd by such Laws, as they al would assent unto; which Law therfor is callid Politicum; and bycause it is mynystrid by a Kyng, it is callid Regale. Dominium Politicum dicitur quasi Regimen, plurimum Scientia sive Consilio ministratum. The Kyng of Scotts reynith upon his People by this Lawe, videlicet, Regimine Politico & Regali. And as Diodorus Syculus saith, in his Boke de priscis Historiis, The Realme of Egypte is rulid by the same Lawe, and therfor the Kyng therof chaungith not his Lawes, without the Assent of his People. And in like forme as he saith is ruled the Kyngdome of Saba, in Felici Arabia, and the Lond of Libie; and also the more parte of al the Realmys in Afarike. Which manner of Rule and Lordship the sayd Diodorus, in that Boke, praysith gretely. For it is not only good for the Prince, that may thereby the more sewery do Justice, than by his owne Arbitriment; but it is also good for his People, that receyve therby such Justice as they desyer themself. Now as he seymth, it ys shewyd opynly ynough, why one Kyng rulyth and reynith on his People, Dominio tantum Regali, and that other reynith Dominio Politico & Regali: For that one Kyngdome beganne of, and by, the Might of the Prince; and that other beganne by the Desier, and Institution, of the People of the same Prince."

(d) [There is a valuable manuscript of this work, which escaped the inquiry of the learned editor; and which presents some verbal variations. Lambeth MSS. No. 262. fol. 106. The same Codex contains another curious work, in manuscript, of Sir John Fortescue.]

[SECTION XIV. Lord Rivers. Caxton.]

[Before we pass to Barclay, or to Sir Thomas More the next author cited by Dr. Jolinson, it may be proper briefly to exhibit two earlier and curious specimens of composition: the one from the translation, entitled The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers, by Anthony Wydville, earl Rivers, which was published in 1477: the other from The Mayster of Sentence, printed by Caxton in 1483. Fabian, the chronicler, and Fisher, bishop of Rochester, are also writers anterior to Sir Thomas More; in whose labours, however, there is nothing so remarkable as to require an extract. The pithiness of the following extracts cannot but please.

"(f) Ther be thre estates of men that be knowen in thre maners, that is to witt, the pacient is not knowen but in his adversite, and in his ire; the valiaunt man is not knowen but in werre; and the frende is not knowen but in necessity. Of all other maners and condicions the warste is, a man to be suspicious of his frende; and to discover thinges secrete; to truste and affiaunce in every man; to speke over muche of thinges unprofitable; and to be in daunger of evyl people for covetice of goodes temporale. Bewar and kepe the that thou be not suspicious; for suspencion taketh away the love from the people. Witte without doctrine is as a tre without fruyte. For to be joyous, and to salew every manne gladly, to be liberale in yeven and receyvyng, and to foryeve gladly his evyl will, maken a man to be beloved of yche body." —

"(g) Be not glad of the falle or evyl fare of thy neyghbour, lest God turne his wreth fro hym to the; and so thou sholdest falle in the same or worse. But be glad to sorowe for hym that is diseasid; and evermore morrie his myschief, as thou woldest thyn' oune. Love peace outward and inward; peace wyth all men: and make peace there hate is. Fle chydyng; be warre and doo aweye the occasion of stryf, and lyve allewey in peace. Lete no thyng passe thy lippys, that may defoule the eiris of the herers. For a vayne word is fake of a veyn conscience; and suche as the word is, suche is the soule. Therefore besy the not to speke that lykyth, but that that nedyth. Take hede what thou spekest, and what thou spekest not; and both in spekyng and not spekyng be right well warre; for thou mayest not call ayene that thou hast seyde. Kut fro thy tunge the synne of backbytyng. And defoule not thy mouth with another mannys synne, but be sory of hym; and that thou backbytest in another, drede it in thyself. When thou blamest another, thynke on thyn oune synne, and loke not on other mennys. For thou shalt never backbite, yf thou wylt beholde thyself."]

[SECTION XV. Barclay.]

[Alexander Barclay, rector of Allhallows, Lombard-street, London, is known as a poet principally by his Ship of Fools; which was written, not in 1550, as Dr. Johnson has misdated it, but in 1508, as the author himself tells us. I have therefore removed the specimen of his style, from the close of Dr. Johnson's history of the language, to its proper place.]

Of Mockers and Scorners, and false Accusers.

" O heartless fooles, haste here to our doctrine,
Leaue off the wayes of your enormitie,
Enforce you to my preceptes to encline,
For here shall I shewe you good and veritie:
Encline, and ye finde shall great prosperitie,
Ensuing the doctrine of our fathers olde,
And godly lawes in valour worth great golde.

" Who that will followe the graces manyfolde
Which are in vertue, shall finde auancement:
Wherefore ye fooles that in your sinne are bolde,
Ensue ye wisdom, and leaue your lewde intent,
Wisdom is the way of men most excellent:
Therefore haue done, and shortly spede your pace,
To quaynt your self and company with grace.

" Learne what is vertue, therin is great solace,
Learne what is truth, sadnes and prudence,
Let grutche be gone, and grautie purchase,
Forsake your folly and inconuenience,
Cease to be fooles, and ay to sue offence,
Followe ye vertue, chiefe roote of godlynnes,
For it and wisdom is ground of clenlynnes.

" Wisdom and vertue two thinges are doubtles,
Whiche man endueth with honour speciall,
But suche heartes as slepe in foolishnes
Knoweth nothing, and will nought know at all:
But in this little barge in principall
All foolish mockers I purpose to reprene,
Clawe he his backe that feeleth itche or grene.

“ Mockers and scorers that are harde ofbeleue,
With a rough combe here will I clawe and grate,
To proue if they will from their vice remeue,
And leaue their folly, which causeth great debate :
Suche caytiues spare neyther poore man nor estate,
And where their selfe are moste worthy derision,
Other men to scornè is all their most condition.

“ Yet are no fooles of this abusion,
Whiche of wise men despiseth the doctrine,
With mowes, mockes, scorne, and collusion,
Rewarding rebukes for their good discipline :
Shewe to suche wisdom, yet shall they not encline
Unto the same, but set nothing therby,
But mocke thy doctrine, still or openly.

“ So in the worlde it appeareth commonly,
That who that will a foole rebuke or blame,
A mocke or mowe shall he haue by and by :
Thus in derision haue fooles their speciall game.
Correct a wise man that woulde eschue ill name,
And fayne would learne, and his lewde life amende,
And to thy wordes he gladly shall intende.

“ If by misfortune a rightwise man offende,
He gladly suffereth a iuste correction,
And him that him teacheth taketh for his frende,
Him selfe putting mekely unto subiection,
Folowing his preceptes and good direction :
But yf that one a foole rebuke or blame,
He shall his teacher hate, slaunder, and diffame.

“ Howbeit his wordes oft turne to his own shame,
And his owne dartes retourne to him agayne,
And so is he sore wounded with the same,
And in wo endeth, great misery, and payne.
It also proued full often is certayne,
That they that on mockers alway their mindes cast,
Shall of all other be mocked at the last.

“ He that goeth right, stedfast, sure, and fast,
May him well mocke that goeth halting and lame,
And he that is white may well his scornes cast,
Agaynst a man of Inde : but no man ought to blame
Anothers vice, while he vseth the same.
But who that of sinne is cleane in deede and thought,
May him well scorne whose liuing is starke nought.

“ The scornes of Naball full dere should haue been bought,
If Abigayl his wife, discrete and sage,
Had not by kindnes right crafty meanes sought,
The wrath of Dauid to temper and asswage.
Hath not two beares in their fury and rage
Two and fortie children rent and torne,
For they the prophete Helyseus did scorne?

“ So might they curse the time that they were borne,
For their mocking of this prophete diuine :
So many other of this sort often mourne
For their lewde mockes, and fall into ruine.
Thus is it folly for wise men to encline
To this lewde flocke of fooles, for see thou shall Them moste scorning that are most bad of all!”

The Lenuoy of Barclay to the Fooles.

“ Ye mocking fooles that in scorne set your ioy,
Proudly despising Gods punishment :
Take ye example by Cham the sonne of Noy,
Which laughed his father vnto derision,
Which him after cursed for his transgression,
And made him seruaunt to all his lyne and stocke.
So shall ye caytifs at the conclusion,
Since ye are nought, and other scorne and mocke.”

[SECTION XVI. Sir Thomas More. Skelton.]

Of the works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a larger specimen, both because our language was then in a great degree formed and settled, and because it appears from Ben Jonson, that his works were considered as models of pure and elegant style. The tale, which is placed first, because earliest written, will show what an attentive reader will, in perusing our old writers, often remark, that the familiar and colloquial part of our language, being diffused among those classes who had no ambition of refinement, or affectation of novelty, has suffered very little change. There is another reason why the extracts from this author are more copious: his works are carefully and correctly printed, and may therefore be better trusted than any other edition of the English books of that, or the preceding ages.

A merry iest how a sergeant would learne to playe the frerc. Written by maister THOMAS MORE in hys youth.

“ Wyse men alway,
Affyrme and say,
That best is for a man ;
Diligently,
For to apply,
The busines that he can,
And in no wyse,
To enterpryse,
An other faculte,
For he that wyll,
And can no skylle,
Is neuer lyke to the.
He that hath lafte
The hosiers crafte,
And falleth to making shone,
The smythe that shall,
To payntyng fall,
His thrift is well nigh done.

A blacke draper,
 With whyte paper,
 To goe to writyng scole,
 An olde butler,
 Becum a cutler,
 I wene shall proue a foler
 And an'oldé trot,
 That can I wot,
 Nothyng but kysse the cup,
 With her phisick,
 Wil kepe one sicke,
 Tyll she have soused hym vp
 A man of lawe,
 That neuer sawe
 The wayes to bye and sell,
 Wenying to ryse,
 By marchaundise,
 I wish to spede hym well.
 A marchaunt eke,
 That wyll goo seke,
 By all the meanes he may,
 To fall in sute,
 Tyll he dispute
 His money cleane away,
 Pletying the lawe
 For every strawe,
 Shall proue a thrifty man,
 With bate and strife,
 But by my life,
 I cannot tell you whan.
 Whan an hatter
 Wyll go smatter,
 In philosophy,
 Or a pedlar,
 Ware a medlar
 In theology,
 All that ensue
 Suche craftes new,
 They driue so farre a cast,
 That euermore,
 They do therfore
 Beshrewe themselfe at last.
 This thing was tryed
 And veretyed,
 Here by a sergeaunt late,
 That thriftly was,
 Or he coulde pas,
 Rapped about the pate,
 Why! that he would See how he could
 A little play the frere:

Now yf you wyll.
 Knowe how it fyll,
 Take hede and ye shall here.
 It happed so,
 Not long ago,
 A thrifty man there dyed,
 An hundred ponde,
 Of nobles rounde,
 That had he layd a side :
 His sonne he wolde
 Should haue this golde,
 For to begynne with all :
 But to suffise
 His chylde, well thrise,
 That money was to smal.
 Yet or this day
 I have hard say,
 That many a man, certesse,
 Hath with good cast,
 Be ryche at last,
 That hath begonne with lesse.
 But this yonge manne
 So well beganne
 His money to imploy,
 That, certainly,
 His policy,
 To see it was a joy,
 For lest sum blast
 Myght ouer cast
 His ship, or by mischaunce,
 Men, with sum wile,
 Myght hym begyle,
 And minish his substaunce,
 For to put out
 Al maner dout,
 He made a good puruay
 For euery whyt,
 By his owife wyt,
 And toke an other way :
 First fayre and wele,
 Therof much dele,
 He dygged it in a pot,
 But then him thought,
 That way was nought,
 And there he left it not.
 So was he faine,
 From thence agayne,
 To put it in a cuppe
 And by and by,
 Couetously,
 He supped it fayre vp,

In his owne brest,
 He thought it best
 His money to enclose,
 Than wist he well,
 What euer fell,
 He coulde it neuer lose:
 He borrowed then,
 Of other men,
 Money and marchaundise:
 Neuer payd it,
 Up he laid it,
 In like maner wyse.
 Yet on the gere,
 That he would were,
 He reight not what he spent,
 So it were nyce,
 As for the price,
 Could him not discontent.
 With lusty sporte,
 And with resort,
 Of ioly company,
 In mirth and play,
 Full many a day,
 He liued merely.
 And men had sworne,
 Some man is borne,
 To haue a lucky howre,
 And so was he,
 For such degre
 He gat and suche honour,
 That without dout,
 Whan he went out,
 A sergeaunt well and fayre,
 Was redy straye,
 On him to wayte,
 As sone as on the mayre.
 But he doubtlesse,
 Of his mekenesse,
 Hated such pompe and pride,
 And would not go,
 Companied so,
 But drewe himself a side.
 To saint Katharine,
 Streight as a line,
 He gate him at a tyde,
 For deuocion,
 Or promocion,
 There would he nedes abyde
 There spent he fast,
 Till all were past,
 And to him came there meny

To aske theyr det,
 But none could get,
 The valour of a peny.
 With visage stout,
 He bare it out,
 Euen vnto the harde hedge,
 A month or twaine,
 Tyll he was faine
 To laye his gowne to pledge.
 Than was he there,
 In greater feare,
 Than ere that he came thithe
 And would as fayne,
 Depart againe,
 But that he wist not whither.
 Than after this,
 To a frende of his,
 He went and there abode,
 Where as he lay,
 So sick alway,
 He myght not come abroad.
 It happed than,
 A marchant man,
 That he ought money to,
 Of an officere
 Than gan enquire,
 What him was best to do.
 And he answerde,
 Be not aserde,
 Take an accion therfore,
 I you behest
 I shall hym reste,
 And than care for no more.
 I feare, quod he,
 It wyll not be,
 For he wyll not come out.
 The sergeaunt said,
 Be not astayd,
 It shall be brought about.
 In many a game,
 Lyke to the same,
 Haue I bene well in vre,
 And for your sake,
 Let me be bake,
 But yf I do this cure.
 Thus part they both,
 And foorth then goth
 A pace this officere,
 And for a day,
 All his array,
 He chaunged with a frere.

So, was he dight,
 That no man might
 Hym for a frere deny,
 He dopped and dooked,
 He spake and looked,
 So religiously.
 Yet in a glasse,
 Or he would passe,
 He toted and he peered,
 His harte for pryde
 Lepte in his syde,
 To see how well he freered.
 Than forth a pace,
 Unto the place,
 He goeth withouten shame
 To do this dede,
 But now take hede,
 For here begynneth the game.
 He drew hym ny,
 And softly
 Streight at the dore he knocked :
 And a damsell,
 That hard hym well,
 There came and it vnlocked.
 The frere sayd,
 Good spede fayre mayd,
 Here lodgeth such a man,
 It is told me :
 Well syr, quod she,
 And yf he do what than ?
 Quod he, maystresse,
 No harm doutlesse :
 It longeth for our order,
 To hurt no man,
 But as we can,
 Euery wight to forder.
 With hym truly
 Fayne speake would I.
 Sir, quod she, by my fay,
 He is so sikè,
 Ye be not lyke
 To speake with hym to day.
 Quod he, fayre may,
 Yet I you pray,
 This much at my desire,
 Vouchesafe to do,
 As go hym to,
 And say an Austen frere
 Would with him speke,
 And matters breake,
 For his ausyle certayn.

Quod she, I wyll,
 Stonde ye here styll,
 Tyll I come downe agayn.
 Vp is she go,
 And told hym so,
 As she was bode to say.
 He mistrustying
 No maner thyng,
 Sayd, mayden go thy way,
 And fetch him hyder,
 That we togyder,
 May talk. A downe she gothe,
 Vp she hym brought,
 No harme she thought,
 But it made some folke wrothe.
 This officere,
 This fayned frere,
 Whan he was come aloft,
 He dopped than,
 And grete this man,
 Religiously and oft.
 And he agayn,
 Ryght glad and fayn,
 Toke hym there by the hande :
 The frere than sayd,
 Ye be dismayd,
 With trouble I understande.
 In dede, quod he,
 It hath with me
 Bene better than it is.
 Syr, quod the frere,
 Be of good chere,
 Yet shall it after this.
 But I would now
 Comen with you,
 In counsaile yf you please,
 Or ellys nat
 Of matters that,
 Shall set your heart at ease.
 Downe went the mayd,
 The marchaunt sayd,
 Now say on, gentle frere,
 Of thys tydyng,
 That ye me bryng,
 I long full sore to here.
 Whan there was none,
 But they alone,
 The frere, with euyll grace,
 Sayd, I rest the,
 Come on with me,
 And out he toke his mace :

THE HISTORY OF THE

Thou shalt obey,
Come on thy way,
I have the in my clouche,
Thou goest not hence,
For all the pense,
The mayre hath in his pouche.
This marchaunt there,
For wrath and fere,
He waxyng welnygh wood,
Sayd, horson thefe,
With a mischefe,
Who hath taught the thy good?
And with his fist,
Vpon the lyst,
He gaue hym such a blow,
That backward downe,
Almost in sowne,
The frere is ouerthrow.
Yet was this man,
Well fearder than,
Lest he the frere had slayne,
Tyll with good rappes,
And heuy clappes,
He dawde hym vp agayne.
The frere toke harte,
And vp he starte,
And well he layde about,
And so there goth,
Betwene them both,
Many a lusty clout.
They rent and tere
Eche others here,
And claue togyder fast,
Tyll with luggyng,
And with tuggyng,
They fell downe bothe at last.
Than on the grounde,
Togyder rounde,
With many a sadde stroke,
They roll and rumble,
They turne and tumble,
As pygges do in a poke.
So long aboue,
They heue and shoue,
Togider that at last,
The mayd and wyfe,
To breake the strife,
Hyed them vpward fast.
And whan they spye
The captaynes lye,
Both waltring on the place.

The freres hood,
 They pulled a good,
 Adowne about his face.
 Whyle he was blynde,
 The wenche behynde,
 Lent him, leyd on the flore,
 Many a ioule,
 About the noule,
 With a great batyldore.
 The wyfe came yet,
 And with her fete,
 She holpe to kepe him downe,
 And with her rocke,
 Many a knocke,
 She gaue hym on the crowne.
 They layd his mace,
 About his face,
 That he was wood for payne :
 The fryre frappe
 Gate many a swappe,
 Tyll he was full nygh slayne.
 Vp they hym lift,
 And with yll thrift,
 Hedlyng a long the stayre,
 Downe they hym threwe,
 And sayde, adewe,
 Commende us to the mayre.
 The frere arose,
 But I suppose,
 Amased was his hed,
 He shoke his eares,
 And from grete feares
 He thought hym well yfled.
 Quod he, now lost
 Is all this cost,
 We be neuer the nere.
 Ill mote he be,
 That caused me,
 To make my self a frere.
 Now masters all,
 Here now I shall
 Ende there as I began,
 In any wyse,
 I would auyse,
 And counsaile euery man,
 His owne craft vse,
 All newe refuse,
 And lyghtly let them gone :
 Play not the frete,
 Now make good chere,
 And welcome euerych one."

THE HISTORY OF THE

A rueful lamentacion (written by master THOMAS MORE in his youth) of the deth of quene Elisabeth mother to king Henry the eight, wife to king Henry the seuenh, and eldest doughter to king Edward the fourth, which quene Elisabeth dyed in childbed in February in the yere of our Lord 1503, and in the 18 yere of the raigne of king Henry the seuenh.

“ O ye that put your trust, and confidence,
In worldly ioy and frayle prosperite,
That so lyue here as ye should neuer hence,
Remember death and loke here vppon me.
Ensaumple I thynke there may no better be.
Your selfe wotte well that in this realme was I
Your quene but late, and lo now here I lye.

“ Was I not borne of olde worthy linage?
Was not my mother queene, my father kyng?
Was I not a kinges fere in marriage?
Had I not plenty of euerie pleasaunt thyng?
Mercifull God, this is a straunge reckenyng:
Rychesse, honour, welth, and auncestry,
Hath me forsaken, and lo now here I ly.

“ If worship myght haue kept me, I had not gone.
If wyt myght haue me saued, I neded not fere.
If money might haue holpe, I lacked none.
But O good God, what vayleth all this gere?
When deth is come thy mighty messangere,
Obey we must there is no remedy,
Me hath he sommoned, and lo now here I ly.

“ Yet was I late promised otherwyse,
This yere to liue in welthe and delice.
Lo where to commeth thy blandishyng promyse,
O false astrology and deuynatrice,
Of Goddes secretes makyng thy seife so wyse.
How true is for this yere thy prophecy.
The yere yet lasteth, and lo nowe here I ly.

“ O bryttill welth, as full of bitternesse,
Thy single pleasure doubled is with payne.
Account my sorow first and my distresse,
In sondry wyse, and reckon there agayne,
The ioy that I haue had, and I dare sayne,
For all my honour, endured yet haue I,
More wo then welth, and lo now here I ly.

“ Where are our castels, now where are our towers,
Goodly Rychmonde sone art thou gone from me,
At Westminster that costly worke of yours,
Myne owne dere lorde, now shall I neuer see.
Almighty God vouchsafe to graunt that ye,
For you and your children well may edefy.
My palyce bylded is, and lo now here I ly.

“ Adew myne owne dere spouse my worthy lorde,
The faithfull loue, that dyd vs both combyne,

In mariage and peasable concorde,
 Into your handes here I cleane resyne,
 To be bestowed vppon your children and myne.
 Erst wer you father, and now must ye supply
 The mothers part also, for lo now here I ly.
 " Farewell my doughter lady Margarete.
 God wotte full oft it greued hath my mynde,
 That ye should go where we should seldome mete.
 Now am I gone, and haue left you behynde.
 O mortall folke that we be very blynde.
 That we least feare; full oft it is most nye,
 From you depart I fyrst, and lo now here I lye.

" Farewell Madame my lordes worthy mother,
 Comfort your sonne, and be ye of good chere.
 Take all a worth, for it will be no nother.
 Farewell my doughter Katherine late the fere
 To prince Arthur myne owne chyld so dere,
 It booteth not for me to wepe or cry,
 Pray for my soule, for lo now here I ly.

" Adew lord Henry, my louyng sonne adew.
 Our lorde encrease your honour and estate,
 Adew my doughter Mary bright of hew,
 God make you vertuous wyse and fortunate.
 Adew swete hart my litle doughter Kate,
 Thou shalt swete babe, suche is thy desteny,
 Thy mother neuer know, for lo now here I ly.

" Lady Cicyly, Anne, and Katheryne,
 Farewell my welbeloved sisters three,
 O lady Briget other sister myne,
 Lo here the ende of worldly vanitee.
 Now well are ye that earthly folly flee,
 And heuently thynges loue and magnify,
 Farewell and pray for me, for lo now here I ly.

" Adew my lordes, adew my ladies all,
 Adew my faithful seruauntes euerych one,
 Adew my commons whom I neuer shall
 See in this world; wherfore to the alone,
 Immortall God, verely three and one,
 I me commende. Thy infinite mercy,
 Shew to thy seruant, for lo now here I ly."

Certain meters in English written by master THOMAS MORE in hys youth for the boke of fortune, and caused them to be printed in the begynnyng of that boke.

The words of Fortune to the People.

" Mine high estate, power, and auctoritie,
 If ye ne know, enserche and ye shall spye,
 That richesse, worship, welth, and dignitie,
 Joy, rest, and peace, and all thyng fynally,
 That any pleasure or profit may come by,

THE HISTORY OF THE

To mannes comfort, ayde, and sustinaunce,
Is all at my deuysse and ordinaunce.

“ Without my fauour there is nothyng wonne.
Many a matter haue I brought at last,
To good conclusion, that fondly was begonne.
And many a purpose, bounden sure and fast
With wise prouision, I haue ouercast.
Without good happe there may no wit suffise.
Better is to be fortunate than wyse.

“ And therefore hath there some men bene or this,
My deadly foes and written many a boke,
To my dispraise. And other cause there nys,
But for me list not frendly on them'loke.
Thus lyke the fox they fare that once forsoke
The plesaunt grapes, and gan for to defy them,
Because he lept and yet could not come by them.

“ But let them write, theyr labour is in vayne.
For well ye wote, myrth, honour, and richesse,
Much better is than penury and payne.
The nedy wretch that lingereth in distresse,
Without myne helpe is euer comfortlesse,
A wery burden odious and loth,
To all the world, and eke to him selfe both.”

“ But he that by my fauour may ascende
To mighty power and excellent degree,
A common wele to gouerne and defende,
O in how blist condicions standeth he :
Him self in honour and felicity,
And ouer that, may forther and increase
A region hole in ioyfull rest and peace.

“ Now in this poynt there is no more to say,
Eche man hath of him selfe the gouernaunce.
Let euery wight than folowe his owne way,
And he that out of pouertes and mischaunce,
List for to liue, and wyll him selfe enhaunce,
In wealth and richesse, come forth and wayte on me.
And he that wyll be a beggar, let hym be.”

THOMAS MORE to them that trust in Fortune.

“ Thou that are prowde of honour, shape or kynne,
That hepest vp this wretched worldes treasure,
Thy fingers shrined with gold, thy tawny skynne
With fresh apparyle garnished out of measure,
And wenest to haue Fortune at thy pleasure,
Cast vp thine eye, and loke how slipper chaunce
Illudeth her men with chaunge and varyaunce.”

“ Sometime she loketh as louely, fayre, and bright,
As goodly Venus mother of Cyppe.
She beckett and she smileth on euery wight.
But this chere fayned may not long abide.
There cometh a cloude, and farewell all our pryde.

Like any serpent she beginneth to swell,
And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell.

“ Yet for all that we brotle men are fayne,
(So wretched is our nature and so blykde)
As soone as Fortune list to laugh agayne,
With fayre countenaunce and disceitfull mynde,
To crouche and knele and gape after the wynde,
Not one or twayne but thousandes in a rout,
Lyke swarmyng bees come flickeryng her aboute.

“ Then as a bayte she bryngeth forth her ware,
Siluer, gold, riche pèrle, and precious stone :
On whiche the mased people gase and stare,
And gape therefore, as dogges doe for the bone.
Fortune at them laugheth, and in her trone
Amyd her treasure and waueryng rychesse,
Prowdly she houeth as lady and empressse.

“ Fast by her syde doth wery labour stand,
Pale fere also, and sorow all bewept,
Disdayn and hatred on that other hand,
Eke restles watche fro slepe with trauayle kept,
His eyes drowsy and lokyng as he slept.
Before her standeth daunger and enuy,
Flattery, dysceyt, mischiefe and tiranny.

“ About her commeth all the world to begge.
He asketh lande, and he to pas would bryng
This toye and that, and all not worth an egge :
He would in loue prosper aboue all thyng :
He kneleth downe and would be made a kyng :
He forceth not so he may money haue,
Though all the worlde accompt hym for a knaue.

“ Lo thus ye see diuers heddes, diuers wittes.
Fortune alone as diuers as they all,
Vnstable here and there among them flittes :
And at auenture downe her giftes fall,
Catch who so may she throweth great and small
Not to all men, as commeth sonne or dewe,
But for the most part, all among a fewe.

“ And yet her brotell giftes long may not last.
He that she gaue them, loketh prowde and hye.
She whirleth about and pluckth away as fast,
And geueth them to an other by and by.
And thus from man to man continually,
She vseth to geue and take, and slily tosse,
One man to wynnyng of an others losse.

“ And when she robbeth one, down goth his pryde.
He wepeth and wayleth and curseth her full sore.
But he that receueth it, on that other syde,
Is glad, and blesther often tymes therefore.
But in a while when she loueth hym no more,
She glydeth from hym, and her giftes to,
And he her curseth, as other fooles do.

THE HISTORY OF THE

“ Alas the folysh people can not cease,
 Ne voyd her trayne, tyll they the harne do fele.
 About her alway, besely they preace.
 But lord how he doth thynk hym self full wele,
 That may set once his hande vppon her whele.
 He holdeth fast: but vpward as he flieth,
 She whippet h^r whele about, and there he lyeth.

“ Thus fell Julius from his mighty power.
 Thus fell Darius the worthy kyng of Perse.
 Thus fell Alexander the great conquerour.
 Thus many mo, then I may well reherse.
 Thus double Fortune, when she lyst reuerse
 Her slipper fauour fro them that in her trust,
 She fleeth her wey and leyeth them in the dust.

“ She sodeinly enhaunceth them aloft.
 And sodeynly mischeueth all the flocke.
 The head that late lay easily and full soft,
 In stede of pylows lyeth after on the blocke.
 And yet alas the most cruell proude mocke:
 The deyntie mowth that ladyes kissed haue,
 She bryngeth in the case to kisse a knaue.

“ In chaungyng of her course, the chaunge shewth this,
 Vp startth a knaue, and downe there falth a knight,
 The beggar ryche, and the ryche man pore is,
 Hatred is turned to loue, loue to despyght.
 This is her sport, thus proueth she her mayght.
 Great boste she maketh yf one be by her power,
 Welthy and wretched both within an howre.

“ Pouertee that of her giftes wyl nothing take,
 Wyth mery chere, looketh vppon the praece,
 And seeth how Fortunes houshold goeth to wrake.
 Fast by her standeth the wyse Socrates.
 Arristippus, Pythagoras, and mahy a lese
 Of olde philosophers. And eke agaynst the sonne
 Bekyth hym pore Diogenes in his tonne.

“ With her is Byas, whose countrey lackt defence,
 And whylom of their foes stode so in dout,
 That eche man hastely gan to cary thence,
 And asked hym why he nought caryed out.
 I bere quod he all myne with me about:
 Wisdom he ment, not Fortunes brotle fees.
 For nought he counted his that he might leese

“ Heraclitus eke lyst felowship to kepe
 With glad pouertee, Democritus also:
 Of which the fyrst can neuer cease but wepe,
 To see how thicke the blynded people go,
 With labour great to purchase care and wo.
 That other laugheth to see the foolysh apes,
 Howe earnestly they walk about theyr capes.

“ Of this poore sect, it is comen vsage,
Onely to take that nature may sustayne,
Banishing cleane all other surplusage,
They be content, and of nothyng complayne.
No nygarde eke is of his good so fayne.
But they more pleasure haue a thousande folde,
The secrete draughtes of nature to beholde.

“ Set Fortunes servauntes by them and ye wull,
That one is free, that other euer thrall,
That one content, that other neuer full.
That one in suretye, that other lyke to fall.
Who lyst to aduise them bothe, parceyue he shall
As great difference between them as we see,
Betwixte wretchednes and felicite.

“ Nowe haue I shewed you bothe: these whiche ye lyst,
Stately Fortune; or humble Pouertee:
That is to say, nowe lyeth it in your fyst,
To take here bondage, or free libertee.
But in thys poynte and ye do after me,
Draw you to Fortune, and labour her to please,
If that ye thynke your selfe to well at ease.

“ And fyrst vppon the louely shall she smile,
And frendly on the cast her wandering eyes,
Embrace the in her armes, and for a whyle,
Put the and kepe the in a fooles paradise:
And foorth with all what so thou lyst deuise,
She wyll the graunt it liberally parhappes:
But for all that beware of after clappes.

“ Recken you neuer of her fauoure sure:
Ye may in clouds as easily trace an hare,
Or in drye lande cause fishes to endure,
And make the burnyng fyre his heate to spare,
And all thys worlde in compace to forfare,
As her to make by craft or engine stable,
That of her nature is euer variable.

“ Serue her day and nyght as reuerently,
Vppon thy knees as any seruaunt may,
And in conclusion, that thou shalt winne thereby
Shall not be worth thy servyce I dare say.
And looke yet what she geueth the to day,
With labour wonne she shall haply to morow
Pluck it agayne out of thyne hande with sorow.

“ Wherefore yf thou in suretye lyst to stande,
Take Pouerties parte and let prowde Fortune go,
Receyue nothyng that commeth from her hande.
Loue maner and vertue: they be onely tho,
Whiche double Fortune may not take the fro.
Then mayst thou boldly defy her turnyng chaunce:
She can the neyther hynder nor auaunce.

THE HISTORY OF THE

" But and thou wylt nedes medle with her treasure,
 Trust not therein, and spende it liberally.
 Beare the not proude, nor take net out of measure.
 Bylde not thyne house on heyth vp in the skye, .
 None falleth farre, but he that climbeth hye,
 Remember nature sent the hyther bare,
 The gyftes of Fortune count them borrowed ware."

THOMAS MORE to them that seke Fortune.

" Who so delyteth to prouen and assay,
 Of waveryng Fortune the vncertayne lot,
 If that the aunswere please you not alway,
 Blame ye not me : for I commaunde you not,
 Fortune to trust, and eke full well ye wot,
 I haue of her no brydle in my fist,
 She renneth loose, and turneth where she lyst.
 " The rollyng dyse in whom your lucke doth stande,
 With whose vnhappy chaunce ye be so wroth,
 Ye knowe your selfe came neuer in myne hande.
 Lo in this ponde be fyshe and frogges both.
 Cast in your nette : but be you lief or lothe,
 Hold you content as Fortune lyst assyne :
 For it is your owne fishyng and not myne.

" And though in one chaunce Fortune you offend,
 Grudge not there at, but beare a mery face.
 In many an other she shall it amende.
 There is no manne so farre out of her grace,
 But he sometyme hath comfort and solace :
 Ne none agayne so farre foorth in her fauour,
 That is full satisfyed with her behauour.

" Fortune is stately, solemne, proude, and hye :
 And rychesse geueth, to haue seruyce therefore.
 The nedy begger catcheth an halpenny :
 Some manne a thousande ponde, some lesse, some more.
 But for all that she kepeth euer in store,
 From euery manne some parcell of his wyll,
 That he may pray therfore and serue her styll.

" Some manne hath good, but chyldren hath he none.
 Some man hath both, but he can get none health.
 Some hath al thre, but vp to honours trone
 Can he not crepe by no maner of stelth.
 To some she sendeth children, ryches, welthe,
 Honour, woorschyp, and reuerence all hys lyfe :
 But yet she pyncheth hym with a shrewde wyfe.

" Then for asmuch as it is Fortunes guyse,
 To graunt no manne all thyng that he wyll axe,
 But as her selfe lyst order and deuyse,
 Doth euery manne his parte diuide and tax,
 I counsaile you eche one trusse vp your packes,

And take no thyng at all, or be content,
 With suche rewarde as fortune hath you sent.
 " All thynges in this boke that ye shall rede,
 Doe as ye lyst, there shall no manne you bynde,
 Them to beleue, as surely as your crede.
 But notwithstanding certes in my mynde,
 I durst well swere, as true ye shall them fynde.
 In euery poynt eche answer by and by,
 As are the iudgementes of astronomye."

• • The Description of RICHARD the thirde.

" Richarde the third sonne; of whom we nowe entreate, was in witte and courage egall with either of them, in bodye and prowesse farre vnder them bothe, little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menye otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth, euer frowarde. It is for trouth reported, that the duches his mother had so much a doe in her trauaile, that shee coulde not bee deliuered of him vncutte: and that hee came into the worlde with the secte forwarde, as menne bee borne outwarde, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntothed, whither menne of hatred reporte about the treaue, or elles that nature chaunged her course in hys beginninge, whiche in the course of his lyfe many thinges vnnaturallie committed. None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposicion was more metely then for peace. Sundrye victories hadde hee, and sommotime querthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne parson, either of hardinesse or polytike order, free was hee called of dyspence, and somewhat aboute hys power liberall, with large giftes hee get him vntedfaste frendshippe, for whiche hee was faine to pil and spoyle in other places, and get him stedfast hatred. Hee was close and secrete, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly coumpinable where he inwardely hated, not letting to kisse whome hee thoughte to kyll: dispitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the suretie or encrease of his estate. Frende and foe was muche what indifferent, where his aduauntage grew, he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstoode his purpose. He slew with his owne handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundement or knoweledge of the king, whiche woulde vndoubtedly, yf he had entended that thinge, haue appoynted that boocherly office to some other then his owne borne brother.

" Somme wise menne also weene, that his drift couertly conuayde, lacked not in helping furth his brother of Clarence to his death: whiche hee resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as menne deme) more faintly then he that wer hartely minded to his welth. And they that thus deme, think that he long time in king Edwardes life, forethought to be king in that case the king his brother (whose life hee looked that euill dyete shoulde shorten) shoulde happen to decease (as in dede he did) while his children wer yonge. And thei deme, that for thys intente he was gladde of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes haue hindered hym so entendinge, whither the same duke of Clarence, hadde kepte him true to his nephew the yonge king, or enterprised to be kyng himselfe. But of al this point, is there no certaintie, and whoso diuineth vppon coniectures, maye as wel shote to farre as to short. Howbeit this haue I by credible informacion leaped, that the selfe night in whiche kynge Edwardē died, one Mysterbrooke longe ere mornynge, came in greate haste to the house of one Pottyer dwelling in Reddecrosse strete without Crepulgate: and when he was with hastye rapping quickly letten in, hee shewed vnto Pottyer that kynge Edwardē was departed. By my trouthe manne quod Pottyer then wyll my mayster the duke of Gloucester bee kynge. What cause hee hadde soo to thynke harde it is to saye, whyther hee being toward him, anye thyng knewe that hee suche thyng purposed, or otherwyse had anye inkelynge thereof: for hee was not likelye to speake yt of noughte.

“ But nowe to returne to the course of this hystorye, were it that the duke of Gloucester hadde of old fore-minded this conclusion, or was nowe at erste thereunto moued, and putte in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the younge princes, his nephues (as opportunitie and lykelyhoode of speede, putteth a manne in courage of that hee neuer entended) certayn is it that hee contriued theyr destruccion, with the vsurpacion of the regal dignitie vppon hymselfe. And for as muche as hee well wiste and holpe to mayntayn, a long continued grudge and hearte brennyng betwene the quenes kinred and the kinges blood eyther partye enuyng others authoritye, hee nowe thought that their deuision shoulde bee (as it was in dede) a fortherlyc begynnynge to the pursuite of his intente, and a sure ground for the foundation of al his building yf he might firste vnder the pretext of reuengynge of olde displeasure, abuse the anger and ygnorance of the one partie, to the destruccion of the tother: and then wyne to his purpose as manye as he coulde: and those that coulde not be wonne, myght be loste ere they looked therefore. For of one thyng was hee certayne, that if his entente were perceiued, he shold soone haue made peace betwene the bothe parties, with his owne bloude.

“ Kynge Edwardē in his life, albeit that this discencion beetwene hys frendes sommewhat yrked hym: yet in his good health hee sommewhat the lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoeuer busines shoulde falle betwene them, hymselfe should alwaye bee hable to rule bothe the parties.

“ But in his last sicknesse, when hee receiued his naturall strengthe soo sore enfebled, that hee dyspayred all recouerye, then hee consyderynge the youthe of his chyldren, albeit hee nothyng lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well forseyng that manye harmes myghte growe by theyr debate, whyle the youth of hys children shoulde lacke discrecion of themself and good counsaile of their frendes, of whiche either party shold counsaile for their owne commodity and rather by pleasure aduise too wyne themselfe fauour, then by profitable aduertisements to do the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variaunce, and in especyall the lorde marquēs Dorsette the quenes sonne by her fyrste housebande, and Richarde the lorde Hastings, a noble man, than lorde chaunberlayne agayne whome the quene specially grudged, for the great fauoure the kyng bare hym, and also for that shee thoughte hym secretly familyer with the kyng in wanton companye. Her kynred also bare hym sore, as well for that the kyng hadde made hym captayne of Calyce (whiche office the lorde Ryuers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kinges former promyse as for diuerse other great giftes which hee receyued, that they looked for. When these lordes with diuerse other of bothe the parties were comme in presence, the kyng lyfinge vppe himselfe and vnder sette with pillowes, as it is reported on this wyse sayd vnto them, My lordes, my dere kinsmenne and alies, in what plight I lye, you see, and I feelee. By whiche the lesse whyle I looke to lyue with you, the more depelye am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, suche bee my children lyke to fynde you. Whiche if they shoulde (that Godde forbydde) fynde you at variaunce, myght happe to fall themselfe at warre ere their discrecion woulde serue to sette you at peace. Ye see their youthe, of which I reckon the onely suretie to reste in youre concord. For it suffiseth not that al you loue them, yf eche of you hate other. If they wer menne, your faithfulnessse happelye woulde suffice. But childehood must be maintained by mens authorite, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsaile, which neither they can haue, but ye geue it; nor ye geue it, yf ye gree not. For wher eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of ech of others parson, impugneth eche others counsaile, there must it nedes bee long ere anye good conclusion goe forward. And also while either partye laboureth to be chiefe, flattery shall haue more place then plaine and faithfull aduise, of whyche muste needes ensue the euill bringing vpp of the prynce, whose mynd in tender youth infect, shal redily fal to mischief and riot, and drawe down with this noble realme to ruine, but if grace turn him to wisdom: which if God send, then thei that by euill menes before pleased him best, shal after fall farthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euil driftes drene to nought, and good plain wayes prosper. Great variaunce hath ther long bene betwene you, not alway for great causes. Sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruccion turneth vnto worse or a smal displeasure done vs, eyther our owne affeccion or euil tongaes agreth. But this wote I well ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be al men, that we be christen men, this shall I leaue for preachers to tel you (and yet I wote nere whither any preachers wordes ought more to moue you, then this that is by and by gooying to the place that thei all preache of.) But this shal I desire you to remember, that the one parte of you is of my bloode, the other of myne alies, and eche of yow with other, eyther of kinred or affinitie, whiche spirytual kynred of affynity, if the sacramentes of Christes church, beare that weyght with vs that woulde Godde thei did, shoulde no lesse moue vs to charite, then the respecte of fleshlye consanguinitye. Oure Lorde forbydde, that you loue together the worse, for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth. And no where fynde wee so deadlye debate, as amonge them, whyche by nature and lawe moste oughte to agree together. Suche a pestilente serpente is ambicion and desyre of vaine glorye and soueraintye, whiche amonge states where he once entreth crepeth forth so farre, tyll with deuision and variaunce hee turneth all to mischief. Firste longing to be nexte the best, afterwarde egall with the beste, and at laste chiefe and about the beste. Of which immoderate appetite of woorship, and thereby of debate and dissencion what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hathe within these fewe yeares growen in this realme, I praye Godde as well forgeate as wee well remember.

“Whiche thinges yf I coude as well haue foresene, as I haue with my more payne then pleasure proued, by Goddes blessed Ladie (that was euer his othe) I woulde neuer haue won the courtesye of mennes knees, with the losse of soo many heades. But sithen thynges passed cannot be gaine called, muche oughte wee the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken soo greate hurte afore, that we estesoones fall not in that occasion agayne. Nowe be those griefes passed, and all is (Godde be thanked) quiete, and likelic righte wel to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder youre coseyns my children, if Godde sende them life and you loue. Of whyche twoo thinges, the lesse losse wer they by whome thoughte Godde dydde hys pleasure, yet shoulde the realme alway finde kinges and paradventure as good kinges. But yf you among youre selfe in a chilles reygne fall at debate, many a good man shall perish and happely he to, and ye to, ere thys land finde peace again. Wherefore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speak with you: I exhort you and require you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me, for the loue that I haue euer born to you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this time forward, all grieues forgotten, eche of you loue other. Whiche I verelye truste you will, if ye any thing earthly regard, either Godde or your king, affinitie or kinred, this realme, your owne countrey, or your owne surety. And therewithal the king no longer enduring to sitte vp, laide him down on his right side, his face towarde them: and none was there present that coulede refrain from weping. But the lordes recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as thei thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence (as by their wordes appered) ech forgaue other, and ioyned their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their dedes) their hearts wer far a sonder. As sone as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne drew toward London, which at the time of his decease, kept his houshold at Ludlow in Wales. Which countrey being far of from the law and recourse to iustice, was begon to be farre oute of good wyll and waxen wild, robbers and riuers walking at libertie vncorrected. And for this encheason the prince was in the life of his father sente thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence, should refraine euill disposed parsons fro the boldnes of their former outrages, to the gouernaunce and ordering of this yong prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Antony Wodvile lord Riuers and brother vnto the quene, a right honourable man, as valiaunte of hardie as politike in counsaile. Adioyned wer there vnto him other of the same partie, and in effect euery one as he was nerest of kin vnto the quene, so was planted next about the prince. That drifte by the quene not vnwisely deuised, whereby her blode mighte of youth be rooted in the princes fauor, the duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that ground set the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whom soeuer he perceiued, either at variance with them, or bearing himself their fauor, hee brake vnto them, some by mouth, som by writing and secret messengers, that it neyther was reason nor in any wise to be stiffered, that the yong king their master and kinsmanne, should bee in the handes and custodie of his mothers kinred, sequestred in maner from theyr compani and attendance, of which euery one ought him as faithfull seruice as they, and manye of them far more honorable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was ful vnmetely to be matched with his: whiche nowe to be as who say remoued from the kyng, and the lesse noble to be left aboute him, is (quod he) neither honorable to hys magestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no surety to haue the mightiest of his frendes from him, and vnto vs no little iopardy, to suffer our welproued euil willers, to grow in ouergret authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is lighte of beliefe and sone perswaded. Ye remember I trow king Edward himself, albeit he was a manne of age and of discrecion, yet was he in manye thynges ruled by the bende, more then stode either with his honour, or our profite, or with the commoditie of any manne els, except onely the immoderate aduancement of them selfe. Whiche whether they sorer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it wer hard I wene to gesse. And if some folkes frendship had not holden better place with the king, then any respect of kinred, thei might peraduenture easily haue be trapped and brought to confusion somme of vs ere this. Why not as easily as they haue done some other alreadye, as neere of his royal bloode as we. But our Lord hath wrought his wil, and thanke be to his grace that peril is paste. Howe be it as great is growing, yf wee suffer this yonge kyng in oure enemyes hande, whiche without his wyttyng, might abuse the name of his commaundement, to ani of our vndoing, which thyng God and good prouision forbyd. Of which good prouision none of us hath any thing the lesse nede, for the late made attonement, in whiche the kinges pleasure hadde more place then the parties willes. Not none of vs I beleue is so vnwyse, ouersone to truste a newe frende made of an olde foe, or to think that an houerly kindnes, sodainely contract in one houre continued, yet scant a fortnight, shold be deper settled in their stomackes: then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

“ With these wordes and writynges and suche other, the duke of Gloucester sone set a fyre, them that were of themselves ethe to kindle, and in especiall twayne, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Richard lord Hastings and chaumberlayn, both men of honour and of great power. The one by longe succession from his auncestrie, the tother by his office and the kinges fauor. These two not bearing eche to othre so muche loue, as hatred bothe vnto the queenes parte: in this poynte accorded together wyth the duke of Gloucester, that they wolde vtterlye amoue fro the kynges company, all his mothers frendes, vnder the name of their eifemyes. Vpon this concluded, the duke of Gloucester vnderstandyng, that the lordes whiche at that tyme were aboute the kyng, entended to bryng him vppe to his coronacion, accompanied with suche power of theyr frendes, that it shoulde bee harde for hym to bryng his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemble of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the ende he wiste was doubtuous, and in which the kyng being on their side, his part shoulde haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretly therefore by diuers meanes, caused the queene to be perswaded and brought in the mynd, that it neither wer nede, and also shold be ieopardous, the king to come vp strong. For where as nowe euery lord loued other, and none other thing studyed vppon, but aboute the coronacion and honoure of the king: if the lordes of her kinred shold assemble in the kinges name muche people, thei shoulde geue the lordes atwixte whome and them hadde bene sommetyme debate, to feare and suspecte, leste they shoulde gather thys people, not for the kynges sauegarde whome no manne empugned, but for theyr destruccion, hauyng more regarde to their olde variaunce, then their newe attonement. For whiche causo thei shoulde assemble on the other partie muche people agayne for their defence, whose power she wyste wel farre stretched. And thus shoulde all the realme fall on a rore. And of al the hurte that therof shoulde ensue, which was likely not to be litle, and the most harme there like to fal wher she lest would, all the worlde woulde put her and her kinred in the wyght, and say that thei had vnwyselye, and vntrewlye also, broken the amitie and peace that the kyng her husband so prudentelye made betwene hys kinne and hers in his death bed, and whiche the othre party faithfully obserued.

“ The queene being in this wise perswaded, suche woordes sente vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother being aboute the kyng, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester hymselfe and other lordes the chiefe of hys bende, wrote vnto the kyng so reuerentelye, and to the queenes frendes, there soo louyngelye, that they nothyng earthelye mystrustyng, broughte the kyng vppe in greate haste, not in good spede, with a sober companye. Nowe was the king in his waye to London gone, from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckyngham came thither. Where remained behynd, the lord Ryuers the kynges vncler, entendyng on the morowe to folow the kyng, and bee with hym at Stonye Stratford miles thence, carely or hee departed. So was there made that nyghte muche frendely chere betwene these dukes and the lord Riuers a greate while. But incontinente after that they were oppenlye with greate courtesye departed, and the lord Riuers lodged, the dukes secretelye, with a fewe of their moste priuie frendes, sette them downe in counsaile, wherein they spent a great parte of the nyght. And at their risinge in the dawning of the day, thei sent about priuily to their seruantes in their innes and lodgynges about, geuyng them commaundemente to make them selfe shortely readye, for their lordes wer to horsebackward. Vppon whiche messages, manye of their folke were attendaunt, when manye of the lord Riuers seruantes were vnreadye. Nowe hadde these dukes taken also into their custodye the keyes of the inne, that none shoulde passe forth without theyr licence.

“ And ouer this in the hygh waye toward Stonye Stratforde where the kynge laye, they hadde bestowed certayne of theyr folke, that shoulde send backe agayne, and compell to retourne, anye manne that were gotten oute of Northampton toward Stonye Stratforde, tyll they should geue other lycence. For as muche as the dukes themselfe entended for the shewe of their dylygence, to bee the fyrste that shoulde that daye attende vppon the kynges highnesse oute of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande. But when the lorde Ryuers vnderstode the gates closed, and the wayes on euerye side besette, neyther hys seruantes nor hymself suffered to go oute, perceiuyng well so greate a kyng without his knowledge not begun for noughte, comparyng this manner present with this last nightes chere, in so few houres so gret a chaunge marueylouslye misliked. How be it sithe hee coulde not geat awaye, and keepe himselfe close, hee woulde not, leste he shoulde seeme to hyde himselfe for some secret feare of hys owne faulte, whereof he saw no such cause in hym self: he determined vppon the suretie of his own conscience, to goe boldelye to them, and inquire what thys matter myghte meane. Whome as soone as they sawe, they beganne to quarrell with hym, and saye, that hee intended to sette distaunce beeweene the kynge and them, and to brynge them to confusion, but it shoulde not lye in hys power. And when hee beganne (as hee was a very well spoken manne) in goodly wise to excuse himself, they taryed not the ende of his aunswere, but shortely tooke him and putte him in ward, and that done, forthwyth wente to horsebacke, and tooke the waye to Stonye Stratforde. Where they founde the kinge with his companie readye to leape on horsebacke, and departe forward, to leaue that lodging for them, because it was streighte for bothe companies. And as sone as they came in his presence, they lighte adowne with all their companie aboute them. To whome the duke of Buckingham saide, goe afore gentlemenne and yemen, kepe youre rowmes. And thus in goodly arraye, thei came to the kinge, and on their knees in very humble wise, salued his grace; whiche receyued them in very ioyous and amiable maner, nothinge earthlye knowing nor mistrustinge as yet. But euen by and by in his presence, they piked a quarell to the lorde Richard Graye, the kynges other brother by his mother, sayinge that hee with the lorde marques his brother and the lorde Riuers his vncle, hadde compassed to rule the kinge and the realme, and to sette variaunce among the states, and to subdewe and destroye the noble blood of the realm. Toward the accomplishinge whereof, they sayde that the lorde Marques hadde entered into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the kynges treasure, and sent menne to the sea. All whiche thinge these dukes wiste well were done for good purposes and necessari by the whole counsaile at London, sauing that somnewhat thei must sai. Vnto whiche woordes, the king answered, what my brother Marques hath done I cannot saie. But in good faith I dare well aunswere for myne vncle Riuers and my brother here, that thei be innocent of any such matters. Ye my liege quod the duke of Buckingham thei haue kept their dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith thei arrested the lord Richarde and Sir Thomas Waughan knyghte, in the kynges presence, and broughte the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsaile. And there they sent awaie from the kinge whom it pleased them, and sette newe seruantes aboute him, suche as lyked better them than him. At whiche dealinge hee wepte and was nothing contente, but it booted not. And at dyner the duke of Gloucester sente a dishe from his owne table to the lord Riuers, prayinge him to bee of good chere, all should be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and prayed the messenger to beare it to his nephewe the lorde Richard with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more nede of comfort, as one to whom such aquersitie was straunge. But himself had been al his dayes in vre therewith, and therefore coulede beare it the better. But for al this comfortable courtesye of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the lord Riuers and the lorde Richarde with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the Northe countrey into diuers places to prison, and afterward al to Pomfrait, where they were in conclusion beheaded."

A letter written with a cole by Sir THOMAS MORE to hys doughter maistres MARGARET ROPER, within a whyle after he was prisoner in the Towre.

" Myne own good doughter, our Lorde be thanked I am in good helthe of bodye, and in good quiet of minde : and of worldly thynges I no more desyer then I haue. I beseeche hym make you all mery in the hope of heauen. And such thynges as I somewhat longed to talke with you all, concerning the worlde to come, our Lorde put them into your myndes, as I truste he dothe, and better to, by hys holy Spirite : who blesse you and preserue you all. Written wyth a cole by your tender louing father, who in hys pore prayers forgetteth none of you all, nor your babes, nor your nurses, nor your good husbandes, nor your good husbandes shrewde wyues, nor your fathers shrewde wyfe neither, nor our other frendes. And thus fare ye hartely well for lacke of paper.

" THOMAS MORE, knight."

Two short ballettes which Sir THOMAS MORE made for hys pastime while he was prisoner in the Tower of London.

LEWYS the lost louer.

" Ey flattering fortune, loke thou neuer so fayre,
Or neuer so pleasantly begin to smile,
As though thou wouldst my ruine all repayre,
During my life thou shalt me not begile.
Trust shall I God, to entre in a while
Hys hauen or heauen, sure and vniforme.
Euer after thy calme, loke I for a storme."

DARY the dyer.

" Long was I, lady Lucke, your seruing man,
And now haue lost agayne all that I gat,
Wherfore whan I thinke on you nowe and than,
And in my mynde remember this and that,
Ye may not blame me though I beshrew your cat,
But in fayth I blesse you agayne a thousand times,
For lending me now some laysure to make rymes."

At the same time with Sir Thomas More lived Skelton, the poet laureate of Henry VIII. from whose works it seems proper to insert a few stanzas, though he cannot be said to have attained great elegance of language.

[Erasmus pronounced Skelton "the light and ornament of English scholars." He was an ecclesiastick ; principally distinguished, however, by his propensity to satire. If, as Dr. Johnson says, he did not attain great elegance of language, he however possessed great knowledge of it. From his works may be drawn an abundance of terms, which were then in use among the vulgar as well as the learned ; and which by no other writer of his time are so obviously (and often so wittily) illustrated. At the same time he was frequently coarse and illiberal. The works of Skelton are, as yet, most incorrectly printed.]

The Prologue to the Bouge of Courte.

“ In Autumpne whan the sonne in vyrgyne
By radyante hete enryped hath our corne ;
Whan Luna, full of mutabylyte,
As emperes the dyademe hath worne
Of our pole artyke, smylunge halfe in scorne
At our foly, and our vntedfastnesse,
The time whan Mars to warre hym dyd dres ;

“ I callynge to mynde the greate auctoryte
Of poetes olde, whiche full craftely
Vnder as couerte termes as coulede be
Can touché a trouth, and cloke subtylly
With fresshe vtteraunce full sentencyously
Dyuerse in style ; some spared not vyce to wryte,
Some of mortalitie nobly dyd endyte ;

“ Whereby, I rede, theyr renome and theyr fame
Maye neuer dye, but euermore endure ;
I was sore moued to aforse the same :
But ignoraunce full soone dyde me dyscure,
And shewed that in this arte I was not sure ;
For to illumine she sayd I was to dulle,
Aduysynge me my penne awaye to pulle
“ And not to wryte, for he so wyll atteyne Exceedyng ferther than his connyng is ;
His heed maye be harde, but feble his brayne :
Yet haue I knowen suche er this.

But of reproche surely he maye not mys,
That clymmeth hyer than he may fotinge haue,
What and he slyde downe, who shall him saue ?

“ Thus vp and downe my mynde was drawen and cast,
That I ne wyste what to do was beste,
So sore enwored, that I was at the laste
Enforced to slepe, and for to take some reste,
And to lye downe as soone as I me dreste,
At Harwyche porte slumbrynge as I laye
In myne hostes house called Powers keye.”

[SECTION XVII. Lord Surrey. Sir Thomas Wyat. N. Grimoald. Songs and Sonnets of uncertain Authors.]

Of the wits that flourished in the reign of Henry VIII. none have been more frequently celebrated than the earl of Surrey ; and this history would therefore have been imperfect without some specimens of his works, which yet it is not easy to distinguish from those of Sir Thomas Wyat and others, with which they are confounded in the edition that has fallen into my hands. The three first are, I believe,

Surrey's; the rest, being of the same age, are selected, some as examples of different measures, and one as the oldest composition which I have found in blank verse.

[Dr. Johnson is right in considering the first, second, and third, of the following poems, as compositions of lord Surrey. Of these I have corrected the text by means of a recent edition of this nobleman's works, which has been formed with great accuracy as well as elegance by the Rev. Dr. Nott, prebendary of Winchester. For the rest, the two ballads are the productions of uncertain authors; and the death of Zoroast was written by Nicholas Grimoald, chaplain to the martyr Ridley. The edition, to which Dr. Johnson resorted, was that of 1557. The specimen of blank verse, which Grimoald's poem exhibits, is not the oldest composition of this kind, which it appeared to be to Dr. Johnson; but is the second; lord Surrey having preceded him in breaking the shackles of rhyme. There is much beauty, both in the diction and cadences, in this citation from Grimoald.]

Description of Spring, wherein eche thing renews, save only the lover.

“ The soote season that bud and bloome fourth brings,
With grene hath cladde the hyll, and eke the vale,
The nightingall with fethers new she singes;
The turtle to her make hath told her tale:
Somer is come, for every spray now springes,
The hart hath hunge hys olde head on the pale,
The bucke in brake his winter coate he flynges;
The fishes flete with newe repayred scale:
The adder all her slough away she flynges,
The swift swallow pursueth the flyes smale,
The busy bee her honey now she mynges;
Winter is worne that was the floures bale.
And thus I see among these pleasant thynges
Eche care decays, and yet my sorrow sprynges.”

Description of the restless estate of a lover.

“ When youth had led me half the race,
That Cupides scourge had made me runne;
I looked back to mete the place,
From whence my weary course begunne:
“ And then I saw howe my desyre
By guiding ill had lett my waye;
Myne eyne, to greedy of theyre hyre,
Had made me lose a better prey.
“ For when in sighes I spent the day,
And could not cloake my grief with game;
The boyling smoke dyd still bewray
The persant heat of secret flame:
“ And when salt teares did bayne my breast,
Where love his pleassent traynes had sown,
The fruit thereof the fruytes opprest,
Or that the buddes were spronge and blowne.
“ And when myne eyen dyd still pursue
The flying chase of theyre request;

Theyre greedy looks dyd oft renew

The hydden wounde within my breste.

“ When every loke these cheekes might stayne,

From dedly pale to glowing red ;

By outward signes appeared playne,

The wo wherewith my hart was fed.

“ But all to late Love learneth me

To paynt all kynd of colours new ;

To blynd theyre eyes that else should see

My sparkled chekes with Cupids hew.

“ And now the covert brest I chame,

That worships Cupide secretely ;

And nourisheth hys sacred flame,

From whence no blasing sparks do flye.”

Description of the fickle Affections, Pangs, and Sleightes of Love.

“ Such wayward wayes hath Love, that most part in discord

Our willes do stand, whereby our hartes but seldom do accord :

Dereyte is hys delighte, and to begyle and mocke

The simple hartes which he doth strike with froward divers stroke.

He causeth th' one to rage with golden burning darte,

And doth alay, with leaden cold, again the others harte.

Whot gleames of burning fyre, and easy sparkes of flame,

In balance of unequal weyght he pondereth by ame.

From easye ford, where I myghte wade and pass full well,

He me withdrawes and doth me drive into a dark depe hell :

And me withholdes where I am calde and offred place,

And willes, that still my mortal foe I do beseke of grace ;

And lettes me to pursue a conquest welnere wonne

To follow where my paynes were spilt, ere that my sute begunne.

Lo, by these rules I know how soon a hart may turne

From warre to peace, from truce to stryfe, and so agayne returne.

I know how to convert my will in others lust,

Of little stuffe unto my self to weave a webbe of trust :

And how to hyde my harne with soft dyssembled chere,

When in my face the painted thoughtes would outwardly appeare.

I know how that the bloud forsakes the face for dred,

And how by shame it staynes agayne the chekes with flamyng red :

I know under the grene the serpent how he lurkes :

The hammer of the restless forge I wote eke how it workes.

I know and can by roate the tale that I would tell ;

But ofte the woordes come fourth awrye of him that loveth well.

I know in heate and colde the lover how he shakes,

In synging how he can complayne, in sleeping how he wakes.

To languish without ache, sicklesse for to consume,

A thousand thynges for to devyse, resolvyng all in fume ;

And though he lyste to see his ladyes grace full sore

Such pleasure as delyghts his eye doth not his helthe restore.

I know to seke the tract of my desyred foe,
 And fere to fynde that I do seek : but chiefly this I know ;
 That lovers must transfourme into the thyng beloved,
 And live (alas ! who could believe ?) with sprite from lyfe removed.
 I knowe in hartie sighes and laughiters of the spleene,
 At once to chaunge my state, my will, and eke my colour cleene.
 I know how to deceyve my self wythouten helpe,
 And how the lyon chastised is, by beatyng of the whelpe.
 In standyng nere the fyre, I know how that I freese ;
 Farre of I burne, in both I waste, and so my lyfe I leese.
 I know how Love doth rage upon a yeylden mynde,
 How smalle a nete may take and meash a harte of gentle kynde :
 With seldom tasted swete to season hepes of gall,
 Revived with a glynt of grace old sorrowes to let fall.
 The hydden traynes I know, and secret snares of Love,
 How soone a loke may prynte a thoughte that never will remove.
 The slapper state I know, the sodein turnes from wekthe,
 The doubtfull hope, the certaine woce, and sure despair of helthe."

A praise of his ladie.

" Geve place you ladies and be gone,
 Boast not your selves at all,
 For here at hande approcheth one,
 Whose face will stayne you all.

" The vertue of her lively lookes
 Excels the precious stone,
 I wishe to have none other bookes
 To reade or look upon.

" In eche of her two christall eyes,
 Smyleth a naked boy ;
 It would you all in heart suffise
 To see that lampe of joye.

" I think nature hath lost the moulde,
 Where she her shape did take ;
 Or else I doubte if nature coulde
 So fayre a creature make.

" She may be well comparde
 Unto the Phenix kinde,
 Whose like was never seene nor heard,
 That any man can fynde.

" In lyfe she is Diana chast,
 In trouth Penelopey,
 In woord and eke in dede stedfast ;
 What will you more we say ?

" If all the world were sought so farre,
 Who coulde finde suche a wight ?
 Her beauty twinkleth lyke a starre
 Within the frosty night."

THE HISTORY OF THE

The Lover, refused of his love, embraceth vertue.

“ My youthfull yeres are past,
My joyfull dayes are gone.
My lyfe it may not last,
My grave and I am one.

“ My myrth and joyes are fled,
And I a man in wo,
Desirous to be ded,
My misciefe to forgo.

“ I burne and am a colde,
I freeze amyddes the fyer,
I see she doth withholde
That is my honest desyre.

“ I see my helpe at hande,
I see my lyfe also,
I see where she doth stande
That is my deadly fo.

I see when I come nye,
How fayne she would be gone.

She will me gladly kill,
And you shall see therfore
That she shall have her will.

“ Now clattring armes, now raging broyls of warre,
Gan passe the noys of dreddfull trumpetts clang,
Shrowded with shafts, the heaven with cloude of dartes,
Covered the ayre. Against full fatted bulles,
As forceth kyndled yre the lyons keene,
Whose greedy gutts the gnawing hunger prickcs;
So Macedons against the Persians fare,
Now corpses hyde the purpurde soyle with blood;
Large slaughter on eche side, but Perses more,
Moyst fieldes bebled, theyr heartes and numbers bate,
Fainted while they gave backe, and fall to flighte.
The litening Macedon by swordes, by gleaves,

By bandes and troups of footemen, with his garde,
 Spedes to Dary, but hym his merest kyn,
 Oxate preserves with horsemen on a plumpe
 Before his carr, that none his charge should give.
 Here grunts, here groans, eche where strong youth is spent :
 Shaking her blondy hands, Bellone among

THE HISTORY OF THE

Of mothers bed, why lovest thou thy strokes
 Cowardes among? Turn thee to me, in case
 Manhood there be so much left in thy heart,
 Come fight with me, that on my helmet weare
 Apollos laurell both for learnings laude,
 And eke for martiall praise, that in my shielde
 The seven fold Sophie of Minerve contain,
 A match more mete, Syr King, then any here.
 The noble prince amoved takes ruth upon
 The wilfull wight, and with soft words ayen,
 O monstrous man (quoth he) what so thou art,
 I pray thee live, ne do not with thy death
 This lodge of Lore, the Muses mansion marre;
 That treasure house this hand shall never spoyle,
 My sword shall never bruise that skilfull brayne,
 Long gatherd heapes of science sone to spill;
 O how fayre fruites may you to mortall men
 From Wisdoms garden give; how many may
 By you the wiser and the better prove:
 What error, what mad mood, what frenzy thee
 Perswades to be downe sent to depe Avene,
 Where no artes flourish, nor no knowledge vailes
 For all these sawes. When thus the sovereign said,
 Alighted Zoroas, with sword unsheathed,
 The careless king there smoate above the greve,
 At th' opening of his quishes wounded him,
 So that the blood down trailed on the ground:
 The Macedon perceiving hurt, gan gnashe,
 But yet his mynde he bent in any wise
 Hym to forbear, sett spurrs unto his stede,
 And turnde away, lest anger of his smarte
 Should cause revenger hand deale balefull blowes.
 But of the Macedonian chieftaines knights,
 One Meleager could not bear this sight,
 But ran upon the said Egyptian rude,
 And cutt him in both knees: he fell to ground,
 Wherewith a whole rout came of souldiours sterne,
 And all in pieces hewed the sely seg;
 But happely the soule fled to the starres,
 Where, under him, he hath full sight of all,
 Whereat he gazed here with reaching looke.
 The Persians waild such sapience to forgoe,
 The very fone the Macedonians wisht
 He would have lived, king Alexander selfe
 Demde him a man unmete to dye at all;
 Who wonne like praise for conquest of his yre,
 As for stoute men in field that day subdued,
 Who princes taught how to discern a man,

That in his head so fere a jewel beares ;
But over all those same Camenes, those same,
Divine Camenes, whose honour he procurde,
As tender parent doth his daughters weale,
Lamented, and for thankes, all that they can,
Do cherish hym deceast, and sett him free,
From dark oblivion of devouring death."

[SECTION XVIII. Sir Thomas Elyot. Leland. Bale. Archbishop Cranmer.]

[The reign of our eighth Henry abounded with learned men; and I will close it with some of those to whom our literature is in a higher degree indebted, than to the poetical wits adduced by Dr. Johnson. I therefore select Sir Thomas Elyot, Leland, Bale, and Archbishop Cranmer.

Sir Thomas Elyot was a writer, who contributed much towards the improvement of the language. So early as in 1538 he had published a Dictionary declaring Latin by English. He wrote also upon the Education of Children. His Castle of Health, and his Governour, are works by which he has been most distinguished. From the latter, which was first published in 1544, I copy his descriptions of Affability and Mercy.

"Of Affabilitie, and the utilitie thereof in every estate. B. 2. cap. 5."

"Affabilitie is of wondrous efficacie or power in procuring love. And it is in sundry wise, but most properly, where a man is facile or easy to be spoken unto. It is also where a man speaketh courteysly, with a sweet speach or countenance; wherewith the hearers (as it were with a delicate odour) be refreshed and allured to love him, in whome is thys moste delectable qualitie. As contrariwise, men vehemently hate them, that have a prowde and hautie countenance, be they never so high in estate or degree. How often have I hearde people say, when men in great authoritie have passed by without making gentyll countenance to those which have done to them reverence, 'Thys man weeneth with a looke to subdue all the worlde! Nay, nay; mens heartes be free, and will love whom they lyst.' And therto all the other do consent in a murmure, as it were bees."

"That a Governour ought to be mercifull, &c. B. 2. cap. 7."

"Mercy is and hath bene ever of such estimation with mankinde, that not onely reason perswadeth, but also experience proveth, that in whom mercy lacketh and is not founden, in him all other vertues be drowned, and lose their just commendation. The vice called crueltie, whyche is contrary to mercy, is by good reason most odious of all other vices; inasmuche as like a poison, or continuall pestilence, it destroyeth the generation of man. Also, lykewise as noryshing meates and drinkes in a sicke bodye doe lose their bountie, and augmenteth malady; semblably, divers vertues in a person cruell and malicious be not onely obfuscate or hid, but do minyster occasyon and assistance to crueltie.

"But nowe to speake of the inestimable price and value of mercy. Lette governours, whych knowe that they have received their power from above, revolve in their myndes in what perylle they themselfe be dailye, if in God were not abundance of mercy."

Leland was an ecclesiastick, and the king's librarian. He was commissioned by Henry to investigate the antiquities, and examine the records, of the whole kingdom. From his report to the king the following extract is made

“(a) That profyt hath rysen¹ by the aforsayd jourteye, in bryngynge full manye thynges to light, as concernyng² the usurped autoryte of the byshopp of Rome and hys complices, to the manyfest and vyolent derogacyon of kyngely dygnyte, I refferre my selfe moste humbly to your moste prudent, lerned, and hygh judgement, to descerne my dylygence in the longe volume, wherin I have made answer for the defence of your supreme dygnyte; alonly lenynge to the stronge pyllour of holye scripture agaynste the whole college of the Romanystes, clokyng their crafty assercyons and argumentes undre the name of one poore Pighius of Ultrajecte in Germany, and standynge to them as to their only anker-holde agaynst tempestes that they knowe wyll aryse, yf truthe maye be by lycens lette in, to have a voyce in the generall counsell. Yet herein only I have not pytched the supreme work of my labour, wherunto your grace, moste lyke a kyngelye patrone of all good learnynge, did anymate me. But also consyderynge and expendynge with my selfe, how great a numbre of excellent godly wyttes and wryters, learned with the best, as the tymes served, hath bene in thys your regyon, not onely at suche tymes as the Romane emprours had recourse to it, but also in those dayes that the Saxons prevayled of the Brytaynes, and the Normannes of the Saxons; coulde not but, with a fervent zeale and an honest corage, comiende them to memory: els alas, lyke to have bene perpetually obscured, or to have bene lyghtelye remembred, as uncerteyne shaddowes. Wherfor I knowynge, by infynyte varyete of bokes and assyduouse readynge of them, who hath bene learned and who hath written from tyme to tyme in this realme, have digested into iiij bokes the names of them with their lyves and monumentes of learnynge.”

Bale was bishop of Ossory; a man of great learning, and a bitter enemy of the papists. The following citation, from one of his numerous labours, is extremely curious, as it respects our literary history at the begining of our Reformation.

“(b) Never had we bene offended for the losse of our lybraryes, beyng so many in nombre, and in so desolate places for the more parte, yf the chiefe monumentes and moste notable workes of our excellent wryters had bene reserved. If there had bene in every shyre of Englande but one solempne lybrary, to the preservacyon of those noble workes, and preferment of good lernynge in oure posterite, it had bene yet sumwhat. But to destroye all without consyderacyon, is and wyll be unto Englande for ever a moste horryble infamy, amonge the grave senyours of other nacyons. A greate nombre of them, which purchased those superstycyouse mansyons, reserved of those lybrarye bokes some to serve theyr jakes, some to scour theyr candelstyckes, and some to rubbe their bootes. Some they solde to the grossers and sope-sellers, and some they sent over see to the bokebynders, not in small nombre, but at tymes whole shyppes full, to the wonderynge of the foren nacyons. Yea, the unyversytees of this realme are not all clere in this detestable fact. But cursed is that bellye, whyche seketh to be fedde with suche ungodly gaynes, and so depelye shameth hys natural contreye. I knowe a merchaunt man, which shall at thys tyme be namelesse, that boughte the contentes of two noble lybraryes for xl shyillynges pryce, a shame it is to be spoken. Thys stuffe hath he occupied in the stede of graye paper by the space of more than these x yeares, and yet he hath store ynough for as many yeares to come. A prodygyouse example is this, and to be abhorred of all men which love their nacyon as they shoulde do.”

But among those, who “by their knowledge of learning were then meet for the people,” of most eminent distinction was Archbishop Cranmer. It has been lately well observed,

(a) [Leland's Newe Yeares Gyst to K. Hen. VIII. 1546, published by Bale in 1549. He had been commissioned by the king in the 35th year of his reign.]

(b) [Bale, Pref. to Leland's Laborious Journey, &c. 1549.]

by Dr. Laurence, that he is always clear and flowing, eloquent and impressive; that his diction has a certain unobtrusive elegance about it, which mocks description. Bishop Hurfet has rashly pronounced the style of Cranmer as unconnected; which he certainly could not have done, if he had read with attention the compositions of the primate. He must have also forgotten the share which Cranmer had in the composition, called the Institution of a Christian Man, noted for the purity of its style; and in the production of our Liturgy, than which a specimen of more refined and dignified language will not easily be found. What can be more perspicuous, and at the same time deeply impressive, than the style in which Cranmer speaks of one of his labours, and addresses his readers?

“(c) The Lord graunt, that this my travayle and labour in his vineyard be not in vayne; but that it may prosper, and bring forth good fruites to his honoure and glory. For when I see his vyneyarde overgrown with thornes, brambles, and weedes, I knowe that everlastyng wo appertayneth unto me, if I holde my peace, and put not to my handes and tongue, to labour in pourgyng his vineyard. God I take to wytnesse, who seeth the heartes of all menne thoroughly unto the bottome, that I take this labour for none other consideration but for the glory of his name, and the discharge of my dutie, and the zeale that I beare towarde the flocke of Christ. I know in what office God hath placed me, and to what purpose; that is to saye, to set forth his worde trewly unto his people, to the uttermost of my power, withoute respecte of personne, or regarde of thyng in the worlde, but of hym alone. I knowe what accompte I shall make to hym hercof at the laste daye, when every manne shall aunswere for his vocation, and receyve for the same good or ill, accordyng as he hath done. I knowe how Antichriste hath obscured the glory of God, and the trewe knowledge of his word, overcastyng the same with mystes and cloudes of errour and ignorance, through false gloses and interpretations. It pitieth me to see the simple and hungry flocke of Christe ledde into corrupt pastures, to be caryed blindfelde they knowe not whither, and to be fedde with poyson in the steede of holsome meates. And moved by the duetie, office, and place, whereunto it hath pleased God to call me, I geve warnyng in his name unto all that professe Christe, that they flee farre from Babylon, if they wyll save their soules; and to beware of that great harlot, that is to say, the pestiferous see of Rome, that she make you not drunke with her pleasaunte wyne. Truste not her sweete promyses, nor bankette not with her; for instede of wine she wyll geve you sour dregges, and for meate she wyll feede you with ranke poyson. But come to oure Redeemer and Saviour Christ, who refresheth all that trewely come unto hym, be theyr anguish and hevynesse never so greate. Geve credite unto hym, in whose mouthe was never founde guyle, nor untruthe. By hym you shall be clearly delyvered from all your diseases: of hym you shall have full remission à peccat et à culpa. He it is that feedeth contynually all, that belong unto hym, with his owne fleshe that hanged upon the crosse; and gyveth them drynke of the bloud flowyng out of his owne syde; and maketh to sprynge within them water that floweth unto everlastyng lyfe. Lysten not to the false incantations, sweet whisperinges, and crafty jugglynges of the subtyll Papystes; wherewith they have this many years deluded and bewytched the worlde. But hearken to Christe; gyve eare unto his wordes, which shall leade you the ryght waye unto everlastyng lyfe, there with hym to lyve ever as heyres of his kyngdome. Amen.”

This composition brings us to the reign of Edward the sixth, in which no writer, that may be compared with Cranmer, occurs.]

(c) [Answer of Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner and Dr. R. Smith, &c. fol. 1551. To the Reader.]

[SECTION XIX. Dr. Wilson.]

About the year 1553 wrote (d) Dr. Wilson, a man celebrated for the politeness of his style, and the extent of his knowledge: what was the state of our language in his time, the following may be of use to show.

“Pronunciation is an apte orderinge bothe of the voyce, countenance, and all the whole bodye, accordynge to the worthines of suche woordes and mater as by speache are declared. The vse hereof is suche for anye one that liketh to haue prayse for tellynge his tale in open assemblie, that hauing a good tongue, and a comely countenance, he shal be thought to passe all other that haue the like vtterance: though they haue much better learning. The tongue geneth a certayne grace to euerye matter, and beautifieth the cause in like maner, as a swete soundynge lute muche setteth forthe a meane deuised ballade. Or as the sounde of a good instrumente styrreth the hearers, and moueth muche delite, so a cleare soundyng voice comforteth muche our deintie cares with muche swete melodie, and causeth vs to allowe the matter rather for the reporters sake, then the reporter for the matters sake. Demosthenes therefore, that famous oratour, beyng asked what was the chiefest point in al oratorie, gaue the chiefe and onely praise to Pronunciation; being demaunded, what was the seconde, and the thirde, he stil made answere, Pronunciation, and would make none other aunswere, till they lefte askyng, declaryng hereby that arte without vtterance can dooe nothyng; vtterance without arte can dooe right muche. And no doubt that man is in outwarde appaunce halfe a good clarke, that hath a cleane tongue, and a comely gesture of his body. Æschines lykwyse beyng bannished his countrie through Demosthenes, when he had redde to the Rhodians his own oration, and Demosthenes aunswere thereunto, by force whereof he was bannished, and all they marueiled muche at the excellencie of the same: then (quod Æschines) you would haue marueiled muche more if you had heard hymselfe speak it. Thus beyng cast in miserie and bannished for euer, he could not but geue such great reporte of his deadly and mortal enemy.”

[With Wilson, and the following remark, Dr. Johnson closes his history: “Thus haue I deduced the English language from the age of Alfred to that of Elizabeth; in some parts imperfectly for want of materials; but I hope, at least, in such a manner that its progress may be easily traced, and the gradations observed, by which it advanced from its first rudeness to its present elegance.”]

[SECTION XX. Writers contemporary with Wilson. Notices of eminent Writers, from the Time of Elizabeth to the present.]

[For the harvest of good writing, which arose in the time of Elizabeth, Ascham, Sir Thomas Smith, and Sackville lord Buckhurst, contemporaries of Wilson, contributed to prepare the soil. Of their works a specimen, for the purposes of comparison, may here be proper.

The work of Wilson was published in the reign of Edward the sixth: that of Ascham a little before the commencement of it, and republished in the earlier part of Elizabeth's. This is the Toxophilus, or School of Shooting; from the preface to which the following extract is made.

“If any man would blame me, eyther for takinge such a matter in hande, or els for wrytinge it in the English tongue, this aunswere I may make him, that when the best of the realme thinke it honest for them to use, I, one of the meanest sorte, ought not to suppose it vile for me to wryte: and thoughte to have written it in another tongue, had bene both more profitable for my study, and also more honest for my name, yet I can thinke my labour well bestowed, if with a little hindrance of my profite and name, may come any furthurance to the pleasure or commodity of the gentlemen and yomen of Englande, for whose sake, I take this matter in hand. And as for the Latine or Greeke tongue, everye thinge is so excellentlye done in them, that none can do better: In the Englishe tongue, contrary, everye thinge in a maner so meanlye both for the matter and handelinge, that no man can do worse. For therein the least learned, for the most part, have bene alwayes most readye to write. And they which had least hope in Latine, have bene most bold in Englishe: when surely everye man that is most readye to talke, is not most able to write. He that will write well in any tongue, must follow this counsell of Aristotle, to speake as the comon people do, to thinke as wyse men do: as so shoulde everye man understand him, and the judgement of wyse men alowe him. Manye Englishe writers have not done so, but usinge straunge wordes, as Latine, Frenche, and Italian, do make all thinges darke and harde. Once I communed with a man which reasoned the Englishe tongue to be enriched and encreased thereby, sayinge: ‘Who will not prayse that feast where a man shall drinke at a dinner both wyne, ale, and beere?’ ‘Truly (quoth I) they be al good, every one taken by himselfe alone, but if you put malvesya and sacke, redde wyne and white, ale and beere and al in one pot, you shall make a drinke not easye to be knowen, nor yet holosome for the bodye.’ Cicero, in folowing Isocrates, Plato, and Demosthenes, encreased the Latine tongue after another sort. ‘This way, because divers men that wryte, do not know, they can neyther folow it, because of theyr ignoraunce, nor yet will prayse it for over arrogancye, two faultes, seldome the one out of the others companye. Englishe writers, by diversity of time, have taken dyvers matters in hand. In our fathers time no thinge was read but bookes of fayned chevalrie, wherein a man by readinge shoulde be led to none other ende, but onely to manslaughter and baudrye. If anye man suppose they were good enough to passe the time with all, he is deceived. For surely vaine wordes do worke no small thinge in vaine, ignorant, and young mindes, especially if they be given any thinge thereunto of their owne nature. These Bookes (as I have heard say) were made the most part in abbayes, and monasteries, a very likely and fit fruite of such an ydle and blind kind of lyving. In our tyme now, when every man is geven to know, much rather than to live wel, very many do write, but after such a fashion as very many do shoote. Some shooters take in hande stronger howes, than they be able to maintaine. This thinge maketh them some time to over shoote the marke, some time to shoote far wyde, and perchaunce hurt some that looke on.”

From these curious remarks on our language and literature we proceed to the notice of Sir Thomas Smith, who is said to have been “(e) a great refiner of the English writing,” which at the time of his attempt, in 1542, is called “(f) too rough and unpolished.” Accordingly his Orations on the proposed marriage of Elizabeth, have been considered as “(g) notable specimens of oratory and history.” The encomium is too high. But a citation shall be given.

“(h) The Danes enjoyed once this realm too long. Of which although some of them were born here, yet so long as the Danes blood was in them, they could never but favour the poor and barren realm of Denmark more than the rich country of England.

“The Normans after wan and possessed the realm. So long as ever the memory of their blood remained, the first most, and so less and less, as by little and little they grew to be English, what did they? keep down the English nation, magnifie the Normans; the rich abbies and priories they gave to their Normans; the chief holds, the noble seignories, the best bishopricks, and all. Yea, they went so low as to the parsonages and vicarages; if one were better to the purse than another, that a Norman had. Poor English men were glad to take their leavings. And so much was our nation kept under, that we were glad to dissemble our tongue, and learn theirs: whereupon came the proverb, Jack would be a gentleman if he could speak French."

We come now to a composition of particular importance in the history of our language, the first regular drama. This is the tragedy of Gorboduc written by Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurst, when he was young; and supposed by Mr. Warton to have been finished early in the reign of Mary. It was printed surreptitiously, and inaccurately, in 1565; correctly, in 1571. I select a speech of Gorboduc to his counsellors, in answer to their advice upon his intention to give his realm in his life-time to his sons.

" I see no cause to draw my mind
To fear the nature of my loving sons,
Or to misdeem that envy or disdain
Can there work hate, where nature planteth love. —
In quiet I will pass mine aged days,
Free from the travail and the painful cares
That hasten age upon the worthiest kings.
But lest the fraud, that ye do seem to fear,
Of flattering tongues corrupt their tender youth,
And writhe them to the ways of youthful lust,
To climbing pride, or to revenging hate,
Or to neglecting of their careful charge,
Lewdly to live in wanton recklessness,
Or to oppressing of the rightful cause,
Or not to wreak the wrongs done to the poor,
To tread down truth, or favour false deceit;
I mean to join to either of my sons
Some one of those, whose long approved faith
And wisdom tried may well assure my heart,
That mining fraud shall find no way to creep
Into their fenced ears with grave advise."

Of higher mood are the strains which this noble author has penned in his Induction to the Mirror for Magistrates; the plan of which, resembling in some degree the Inferno of Dante, he is said to have formed in the same reign. Language can hardly paint expiring Famine, and Death triumphing, in stronger colours.

" But, O the doleful sight that then we see:
A griesly shape of Famine: —
Her starved corpse, that rather seem'd a shade,
Than any substance of a creature made.

" On her while we thus firmly fix'd our eyes,
That bled for ruth of such a dreary sight,
Lo suddenly she shriek'd in so huge wise,
As made hell-gates to shiver with the might,
Wherewith a dart we saw how it did light
Right on her breast, and therewithal pale Death
Enthrilling it to reave her of her breath. •

“ And by and by a dumb dead corpse we saw,
Heavy and cold, the shape of Death aright,
That daunts all earthly creatures to his law,
Against whose force in vain it is to fight.
Ne peers, ne princes, nor no mortal wight,
Ne towns, ne realms, cities, ne strongest tower,
But all perforce must yield unto his power.

“ His dart anon out of the corpse he took,
And in his hand (a dreadfull sight to see)
With great triumph eftsoones the same he shook,
That most of all my fears affrayed me :
His bodie dight with nought but bones perdie,
The naked shape of man there saw I plain,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the veyn.”

The delightfully figurative and picturesque style of our poetry is now to be observed in Spenser ; who, as Warton has well remarked, here “ stands without a rival.” Even in our prose this high descriptive manner was sometimes adopted; and the romance of Sir Philip Sidney, at once a learned, manly, and fanciful composition, illustrates the richness of our tongue as well as the taste of the age, in the time of Elizabeth.

Advancing far into her reign, we find the language perfected in the Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker. For if this noble composition be compared with the best writings of modern date, it will be found, as Lowth has pronounced, that in correctness, propriety, and purity of English style, he has hardly been surpassed, or even equalled, by any of his successors.

Among the authors of this period also, and who is to be studied as an original master of our tongue, the incomparable Shakspeare appears.

About this time, Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter and Norwich, distinguished himself as a writer of satires; of which kind of writing, so called, in our language, he has pronounced himself the first author.

“ I first adventure, with fool-hardy might,
To tread the steps of perilous despite :
I first adventure, follow me who list,
And be the second English satirist.”

He is better known as a theological writer, in the times of James the first and his successor. But as the composition illustrates existing manners and customs, I have brought forward the author at the precise date of it. Nor will I omit to notice some of his later works. These Satires were published in 1597. They often present models of elegance as well as wit, and admirable specimens of indignation as well as ridicule.

Legend I out in rhimes all richly dight !
Nor fright the reader with the pagan vaunt

Nor list I sonnet of my mistress’ face,
To paint some blowesse with a borrowed grace !
Nor can I bide to pen some hungrie scene
For thick-skin ears, and undiscerning eyne !”

 The drawling spondee, pacing it below!
 The lingring spondee, labouring to delay
 The breathless dactyls with a sudden stay!
 Whoever saw a colt, wanton and wild,
 Yok'd with a slow-foot ox on fallow field,
 Can right arced how handsomely besets
 Dull spondee with the English dactylets.
 If Jove speak English in a thundring cloud,
Thwick-thwack, and riss-rass, roars he out aloud!
 Fie on the forged mint that did create
 New coin of words never articulate!"

"Thou canst maske in garish gauderie,
 To suit a fool's far-fetched liverie.
 A French head joyn'd to necke Italian,
 Thy thighs from Germanie, and breast from Spain:
 An Englishman in none, a fool in all;
 Many in one, and one in severall!"

B. V. SAT. II.

"House-keeping's dead! ———
 Along thy way thou canst not but descry
 Fair glittering halls to tempt the hopeful eye.—
 So this gay gate adds fuel to thy thought,
 That such proud piles were never rais'd for nought.
 Beat the broad gates! a goodly hollow sound
 With double echoes doth again rebound;
 But not a dog doth bark to welcome thee,
 Nor churlish porter canst thou chafing see:
 All dumb and silent, like the dead of night,
 Or dwelling of some sleepy Sybarite.
 The marble pavement hid with desert weed,
 With house-leek, thistle, dock, and henlock seed! —
 Look to the towred chimnies, which should be
 The wind-pipes of good hospitality,
 Through which it breatheth to the open air,
 Betokening life and liberal well-fare;
 Lo, there the unthankful swallow takes her rest,
 And fills the tunnell with her circled nest!"

I know not whether it has been remarked, that, in the Characters of Virtues and Vices, published by this author in 1608, his propensity to satire, without the aid of poetry, is also very obvious. But Bishop Hall has acquired, from his sententious way of writing, the name of the Christian Seneca; and his Meditations, which have been often printed, have been resembled to the Morals of the Philosopher. His style indeed is always pithy, sometimes highly animated, often delicate and tender. From his Treatise of Contentation I select the description of those, (k) who know how to want.

(i) [This alludes to an absurd fashion, at that time, of publishing what were called English verses composed according to Latin rules.]

“Those only know how to want, that have learnt to frame their mind to their estate; like to a skilful musician, that can let down his strings a peg lower when the tune requires it; or like to some cunning spagyrick, that can intend or remit the heat of his furnace according to occasion. Those, who, when they must be abased, can stoop submissly; like to a gentle reed, which, when the wind blows still, yields every way. Those, that in an humble obeysance can lay themselves low at the foot of the Almighty, and put their mouth in the dust; that can patiently put their necks under the yoke of the Highest, and can say with the prophet, Truly this is my sorrow, and I must bear it. Those, that can smile upon their afflictions, rejoicing in their tribulation, singing in the jail with Paul and Silas at midnight. Lastly, those, that can improve misery to an advantage; being the richer for their want, bettered with evils, strengthened with infirmities; and can truly say to the Almighty, I know that of very faithfulness thou hast afflicted me.”

As a fine writer, and one of the greatest of our literary benefactors, the brave and accomplished Raleigh is now to be noticed. His History of the World is a proud and undecaying monument of the power both of his talents and our tongue. To the dignity of history his style is particularly suited; pure, and never wanting nerve to strengthen it. There are also some (l) poetical remains, which elegantly exemplify his varied abilities.

Of Bacon the style is admirably diversified in the subjects of which he treats. The scholar accordingly marks the boldness of his imagery supported by suitable grandeur of diction. To the philosopher his discoveries are detailed with precision and perspicuousness. And to those of common attainments his easy and sententious language never speaks in vain. Of his Essays he has told us, that they, “(m) of all his other works, have been most current; for that, as it seems, they come home to men’s business and bosoms.”

For abundant illustrations of popular diction, as well as graces of fine writing, the curious investigator of our language may next resort to Jonson, the most learned and judicious comedian, as (n) Milton and his nephew Phillips call him. If in his language there was any fault, Dryden says, “(o) it was that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his comedies especially: perhaps, too, he did a little too much romanize our tongue, leaving the words which he translated almost as much Latin as he found them; wherein, though he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the idiom of ours.”

In ascertaining the copiousness of our tongue, further assistance may be derived from the Anatomy of Melancholy, by Burton; a book described by Antony Wood as “(p) so full of variety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time, and are put to a push for invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or scholastical discourse and writing.” Burton was also distinguished as a “(q) thorough-paced philologist.” Quaint as his style is, the work abounds with wit and learning; often with expressions of happy choice; and rarely without such digression from grave to gay, as to relieve the tediousness of perpetual citation. As a poet he might have excelled, if we may judge from the verses prefixed to his book; in which how pleasing the imagery and versification are, a stanza or two will show.

“ When I go musing all alone,
Thinking of divers things fore-known;
When I build castles in the air,
Void of sorrow, and void of fear,
Pleasing myself with phantasms sweet;
Methinks the time runs very fleet.
All my joys to this are folly,
Nought so sweet as melancholy.—

“ When to myself I act, and smile,
With pleasing thoughts the time beguile,
By a brook-side, or wood so green,
Unheard, unsought-for, and unseen;
A thousand pleasures do me bless,
And crown my soul with happiness.
All my joys besides are folly,
Nought so sweet as melancholy.”

In commendation of this mental luxury we also find the poets Beaumont and Fletcher, contemporary with Burton, employed. The Song in their drama, entitled Nice Valour, displaying the moral, the figure, and the disposition of melancholy, has been repeatedly observed to have suggested sentiments in the Il Penseroso of Milton. To these poets our language is, according to Dryden, in the greatest degree indebted. “ (r) Their plots were generally more regular than Shakspeare’s, especially those that were made before Beaumont’s death; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better. — Humour, which Ben Jonson derived from particular persons, they made it not their business to describe: they represented all the passions very lively, but above all, love. I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its highest perfection; what words have since been taken in, are rather superfluous than ornamental.”

About this period wrote Owen Feltham, or Felltham; of whose principal work, entitled Resolves, a second edition was published in 1628. These Resolves are short Essays upon various subjects, displaying fine sentiments and harmonious language; and sometimes highly poetical conception. He has indeed written some poetry; but it is by his prose that he is distinguished. “ (s) Love those pleasures well,” he says, “ that are on all sides legitimated by the bounty of heaven; after which no private gripe, nor fancied goblin, comes to upbraid my sense for using them; but such as may with equal pleasure be again dreamed over, and not disturb my sleep. This is to take off the parchings of the summer sun, by bathing in a pure and chrystal fountain.” Again: “ (t) Wisdom and knowledge are sweet as the wakened musings of delightful thoughts, which not only dew the mind with perfumes that ever refresh us, but raise us to the mountain that gives us view of Canaan; and shews us rays and glimpses of the glory that shall after crown us. Yet it is the object only that makes these good unto man, when God is the ocean that all his streams make way unto.” Yet once more will I cite this attractive writer; and the very beginning of the citation will call to the scholar’s mind the words of Milton in his Lycidas:

(r) [Essay on Dramatick Poesy.]

(s) [Res. B. ii. 50.]

(t) [Disc. on Eccl. ii. 11.]

“ Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise,
The last infirmity of noble mind :”

And he may find that elsewhere also, Feltham says, “ (u) In noble minds praise is certainly a spur, if not reward, to virtue.”

“ (x) Desire of glory is the last garment that even wise men lay aside. For this you may take Tacitus : ‘ Etiam sapientibus cupido gloriæ novissima exuitur.’ Not that it betters himself, being gone ; but that it stirs up those that follow him to an earnest endeavour after noble actions ; which is the only means to win the fame we wish for. Themistocles that streamed out his youth in wine and venery, and was suddenly changed to a virtuous and valiant man, told one that asked what did so strangely change him, that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. Tamerlane made it his practice to read often the heroick deeds of his progenitors ; not as boasting in them, but as glorious examples propounded to enfire his virtues. Surely nothing awakes our sleeping virtues, like the noble acts of our predecessors. They are flaming beacons, that fame and time have set on hills, to call us to a defence of virtue, whenever vice invades the commonwealth of man. Who can endure to sculk away his life in an idle corner, when he has means ; and finds how fame has blown about deserving names ? Worth begets, in weak and base minds, envy ; but, in those that are magnanimous, emulation. Roman virtue made Roman virtues lasting. Brave men never die, but like the phoenix ; from whose preserved ashes one or other still springs up, like them.” —

We now approach the time, when “ our language began to lose the stability which it had obtained in that of Elizabeth ; and was considered by every writer as a subject on which he might try his plastick skill, by moulding it according to his own fancy.” Such is the remark of (y) Dr. Johnson, arising from a consideration of the style of Sir Thomas Brown ; a style “ vigorous, but rugged ; learned, but pedantick ; deep, but obscure : it strikes, but does not please ; it commands, but does not allure : his tropes are harsh, and his combinations uncouth.” This is attributed to the disposition of the age already noticed. “ Milton,” it is added, “ in consequence of this encroaching licence, began to introduce the Latin idiom ; and Brown, though he gave less disturbance to our structure and phraseology, yet poured in a multitude of exotick words ; many, indeed, useful and significant, which, if rejected, must be supplied by circumlocution ; and some so obscure, that they conceal his meaning rather than explain it.” Of Brown Dr. Johnson was an admirer, and in some respects an imitator. In our immortal Milton (to whose prose alone the preceding observation applies) he has injuriously omitted to notice, that, though the structure of his sentences may sometimes be affected, the most glowing diction abounds, and perspicuity, comprehensiveness, dignity, and closeness are often found united. If there were not innumerable passages, which might be cited from his prose-works, to illustrate those powers of his expression as well as the elevation of his thought, the Areopagitica and the Treatise on Education are distinct proofs of this assertion.

The influx of Latin words is also to be traced to an earlier period. It must have made some progress in the time of Sir Philip Sidney, who, in a kind of masque presented before queen Elizabeth, introduces master Rombus, a pedagogue, eloquent in Anglo-Latinisms, which it is evidently the object of Sidney to ridicule. But the pedantick style was triumphant in the reign of James. The pious and learned bishop Andrews, pedantick in his conceits as well as diction, was styled the star of preachers. The great Bacon could sometimes sacrifice his judgement to the absurd fondness for the Latin and English intermixture. And Dryden has considered Jonson not only as occasionally "romanizing our tongue too much," but also in the practice as "not enough complying with our own idiom." The love of latinizing is to be found in many writers of little note till late in the seventeenth century. But I know none, in whom it is so glaring, and often so offensive, as in Waterhouse, the learned commentator on Fortescue. Heylin, in 1658, made this remark: "(z) Many think, that they can never speak elegantly, nor write significantly, except they do it in a language of their own devising; as if they were ashamed of their mother-tongue, and thought it not sufficiently curious to express their fancies. By means whereof more French and Latin words have gained ground upon us since the middle of queen Elizabeth's reign, than were admitted by our ancestors (whether we look upon them as the British or Saxon race) not only since the Norman but the Roman conquest." Of Heylin himself, a voluminous, acute, and learned writer, it has been said (a) that he so spoke as to be understood by the meanest hearer, and so wrote as to be comprehended by the most vulgar reader.

In referring to the reigns of our first and second Charles, we meet, however, with abundance of fine writing; with the clear and lively style which Chillingworth displays in exposing the tricks of sophistry; with the unadorned but manly periods of Hammond, "(b) spreading the treasur'd stores of truth divine;" with language strong and pure in the dangerous compositions of Hobbes; and with phraseology, though not laboured, correctly dignified, in the sentences of Clarendon, which always gratify by the precision with which they describe events, and more particularly characters. But in bishop Jeremy Taylor the diction of our country "(c) bursts out into sudden blaze." It is grand, it is awful, it is pathetick; bright and energetick; it irresistibly seizes the attention; copiously diversified, it has charms for the unlettered as well as for the scholar and the man of taste. His painting of the various ways, in which the last enemy that shall be destroyed, accosts us, is perhaps unrivalled.

"(d) Death meets us every where, and is procured by every instrument, and in all chances; and enters in at many doors: by violence, and secret influence; by the aspect of a star, and the stink of a mist; by the emissions of a cloud, and the meeting of a vapour; by the fall of a chariot, and the stumbling at a stone; by a full meal, or an empty stomach; by watching at the wine, or by watching at prayers; by the sun or the moon; by a heat or a cold; by sleepless nights, or sleeping days; by water frozen into the hardness and sharpness of a dagger, or water thawed into the floods of a river; by a hair or a raisin; by violent motion, or sitting still; by severity, or dissolution; by God's mercy, or God's anger; by every thing in providence, and every thing in manners; by every thing in nature; and every thing in chance. Eripitur persona, manet res; we take pains to heap up things useful to our life, and get our death in the purchase; and the person is snatched away, and the goods remain: and all this is the law and constitution of nature; it is a punishment to our sins, the unalterable event of providence, and the decree of heaven. The chains that confine us to this condition are strong as destiny, and immutable as the eternal laws of God.

"I have conversed with some men who rejoiced in the death or calamity upon others, and accounted it as a judgement upon them for being on the other side, and against them in the contention; but within the revolution of a few months the same man met with a more uneasy and unhandsome death; which when I saw, I wept, and was afraid ; for I knew that it must be so with all men : for we also shall die, and end our quarrels and contentions, by passing to a final sentence.

With what elegant vivacity of diction has he illustrated a more attractive subject, if I may make one more citation from his admirable works ! “ (c) Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities and churches, and heaven itself. Celibacy, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in perpetual sweetness, but sits alone, and is confined and dies in singularity ; but marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labours and unites into societies and republicks, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys their king, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good things to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world.”

*About the same time flourished Dr. Henry More, the celebrated Platonist, esteemed one of our greatest divines and philosophers, and no mean poet. Though now perhaps little remembered, it may be proper to exemplify his style. Nor will it be found that he, who in the seventeenth century was so enthusiastically admired, wanted power of fancy or considerable vigour of expression.

“ (f) Then wilt thou say, God rules the world,
Though mountain, over mountain hurl'd,
Be pitch'd amid the foaming main :—
Though inward tempests fiercely rock
The tottering earth, that with the shock
High spires and heavy rocks fall down :—
Though pitchy blasts from hell up-borne
Stop the outgoings of the morn ;
And nature play her fiery games,
In this forc'd night, with fulgorant flames,
Baring by fits, for more affright,
The pale dead visages (ghastly sight)
Of men astonish'd at the stour
Of heaven's great rage, the rattling shower
Of hail, the hoarse bellowing of thunder,
Their own loud shrieks made mad with wonder :
All this confusion cannot move
The purged mind, freed from the love
Of converse with her body dear,
Cell of sad thoughts, sole spring of fear !”

“ (g) Whether therefore our eyes be struck with that more radiant lustre of the sun, or whether we behold that more placid and calm beauty of the moon ; or be refreshed with the sweet breathings of the open air ; or be taken up with the contemplation of those pure sparkling lights of the stars ; or stand astonished at the gushing down-falls of some mighty river, as that of Nile ; or admire the height of some insuperable and inaccessible rock or mountain ; or with a pleasant horror and chillness look upon some silent wood, or solemn shady grove ; whether the face of heaven smile upon us with a cheerful bright azure, or look upon us with a more sad and minacious countenance, dark pitchy clouds being charged with thunder and lightning to let fly against the earth; whether the air be cool, fresh, and healthful, or whether it be sultry, contagious, and pestilential, so that while we gasp for life we are forced to draw in a sudden and inevitable death; whether the earth stand firm and prove favourable to the industry of the artificer, or whether she threaten the very foundations of our buildings with trembling and tottering earthquakes accompanied with remugient echoes and ghastly murmurs from below; whatever notable emergencies happen for either good or bad to us; these are the Joves and Vejoves that we worship, which to us are not many but one God, who has the only power to save or destroy. And therefore from whatever part of this magnificent temple of his, the world, he shall send forth his voice, our hearts and eyes are presently directed thitherward with fear, love, and veneration.

“Nor does our devotion stop here, or rather stay only without; but those more notable alterations, and commotions, we find within ourselves, we attribute also to him whose spirit, life, and power filleth all things. And therefore those very passions of love and wrath, on the former whereof dependeth all that kindly sweetness of affection that is found in either the friendship of men or love of women, as on the latter all the pomp and splendour of war; these, with the rest of the passions of the soul, we look upon as manifestations of his presence, who worketh every where for our solace, punishment, or trial.”

Hence we proceed to the learned and copious, I might say occasionally redundant, Barrow; in whom accuracy of erudition, energy of style, and force of reasoning, are alike conspicuous. His description of wit is a masterpiece of composition.

“(h) First, it may be demanded, what the thing we speak of is? Or what this facetiousness doth import? To which questions I might reply, as Democritus did to him that asked the definition of a man, ‘Tis that which we all see and know.’ Any one better apprehends what it is by acquaintance, than I can inform him by description. It is, indeed, a thing so versatile and multiform, appearing in so many shapes, so many postures, so many garbs, so variously apprehended by several eyes and judgments, that it seemeth no less hard to settle a clear and certain notion thereof, than to make a portrait of Proteus, or to define the figure of the fleeting air. Sometimes it lieth in pat. allusion to a known story, or in seasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale: sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound: sometimes it is wrapped in a dress of humorous expression: sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude: sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly divesting or cleverly retorting an objection: sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense: sometimes a scenical representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture, passeth for it: sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness giveth it being: sometimes it riseth only from a lucky hitting upon what is strange: sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose. Often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable, and inexplicable; being answerable to the numberless roving of fancy, and windings of language. It is, in short, a manner of speaking out of the simple and plain way, (such as reason teacheth and proveth things by,) which, by a pretty surprizing uncouthness in conceit or expression, doth affect and amuse the fancy, stirring in it some wonder, and breeding some delight thereto. It raiseth admiration, as signifying a nimble sagacity of apprehension, a special felicity of invention, a vivacity of spirit, and reach of wit more than vulgar; it seeming to argue a rare quickness of parts, that one can fetch in remote conceits applicable; a notable skill, that he can dextrously accommodate them to the purpose before him; together with a lively briskness of humour, not apt to damp those sportful flashes of imagination. (Whence in Aristotle such persons are termed εὐρίεργοι, dextrous men, and εὐεργετοί, men of facile or versatile manners, who can easily turn themselves to all things, or turn all things to themselves.) It also procureth delight, by gratifying curiosity with its rareness, as semblance of difficulty: (as monsters, not for their beauty, but their rarity; as juggling tricks, not for their use, but their abstruseness, are beheld with pleasure :) by diverting the mind from its road of serious thoughts; by instilling gaiety and airiness of spirit; by provoking to such dispositions of spirit; in way of emulation or complaisance, and by seasoning matters, otherwise distasteful or insipid, with an unusual and thence grateful tang."

Coeval with Barrow was bishop Pearson; of whose writings the very dust has been pronounced by Bentley gold. That for exactness of method, correctness of language, and well-turned periods, he is to be ranked among our best writers, all will acknowledge who have read with attention his Exposition of the Creed. I will select his analogical illustration of the resurrection.

"(i) Beside the principles of which we consist, and the actions which flow from us, the consideration of the things without us, and the natural course of variations in the creature, will render the resurrection yet more highly probable. Every space of twenty-four hours teacheth thus much, in which there is always a revolution amounting to a resurrection. The day dies into a night, and is buried in silence and in darkness; in the next morning it appeareth again and reviveth, opening the grave of darkness, rising from the dead of night; this is a diurnal resurrection. As the day dies into night, so doth the summer into winter: the sap is said to descend into the root, and there it lies buried in the ground; the earth is covered with snow, or crusted with frost, and becomes a general sepulchre; when the spring appeareth all begin to rise, the plants and flowers peep out of their graves, revive, and grow and flourish; this is the annual resurrection. The corn by which we live, and for want of which we perish with famine, is notwithstanding cast upon the earth, and buried in the ground, with a design that it may corrupt, and being corrupted may revive and multiply; our bodies are fed by this constant experiment, and we continue this present life by succession of resurrections. Thus all things are repaired by corrupting, are preserved by perishing, and revive by dying; and can we think that man, the lord of all these things, which thus die and revive for him, should be detained in death as never to live again? Is it imaginable that God should thus restore all things to man, and not to restore man to himself? If there were no other consideration, but of the principles of human nature, of the liberty and remunerability of human actions, and of the natural revolutions and resurrections of other creatures, it were abundantly sufficient to render the resurrection of our bodies highly probable.

"We must not rest in this school of nature, nor settle our persuasions upon likelihoods; but as we passed from an apparent possibility, unto a high presumption and probability, so must we pass from thence unto a full assurance of an infallible certainty. And of this indeed we cannot be assured but by the revelation of the will of God; upon his power we must conclude that we may, from his will that we shall, rise from the dead. Now the power of God is known unto all men, and therefore all men may infer from thence a possibility; but the will of God is not revealed unto all men, and therefore all have not an infallible certainty of the resurrection. For the grounding of which assurance, I shall shew that God hath revealed the determination of his will to raise the dead, and that he hath not only delivered that intention in his Word, but hath also several ways confirmed the same."

(i) [Expos. of the Creed, Art. XI. The Resurrection of the Body.]

Of the same period was Cowley, the ease and unaffected structure of whose sentences Dr. Johnson has especially commended. Hence a learned biographer of the critick has taken occasion to consider his injudicious partiality to Brown; and in the following discriminative remarks to introduce some of our finest writers, with a comparative estimate also of Addison and Johnson. "(k) Cowley," he observes, "may be placed at the head of those who cultivated a clear and natural style. Dryden, Tillotson, and Sir William Temple, followed. Addison, Swift, and Pope, with more correctness, carried our language well nigh to perfection. Of Addison Johnson was used to say, He is the Raphael of Essay writers. How he differed so widely from such elegant models, is a problem not to be solved, unless it be true, that he took an early tincture from the writers of the last century, [the seventeenth,] particularly Sir Thomas Brown. Hence the peculiarities of his style, new combinations, sentences of an unusual structure, and words derived from the learned languages. His own account of the matter is, When common words were less pleasing to the ear, or less distinct in their signification, I familiarized the terms of philosophy, by applying them to popular ideas. But he forgot the observation of Dryden, If too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them. There is, it must be admitted, a swell of language, often out of all proportion to the sentiment; but there is, in general, a fulness of mind, and the thought seems to expand with the sound of the words. Determined to discard colloquial barbarisms and licentious idioms, he forgot the elegant simplicity that distinguishes the writings of Addison. He had what Locke calls a round-about view of his subject; and though he was never tainted, like many modern wits, with the ambition of shining in paradox, he may be fairly called an original thinker. His reading was extensive. He treasured in his mind whatever was worthy of notice, but he added to it from his own meditation. He collected que reconderet, quætaque promeret.

"Addison was not so profound a thinker. He was born to write, converse, and live with ease: and he found an early patron in lord Somers. He depended, however, more upon a fine taste than the vigour of his mind. His Latin poetry shows that he relished, with a just selection, all the refined and delicate beauties of the Roman classicks; and, when he cultivated his native language, no wonder that he formed that graceful style which has been so justly admired; simple, yet elegant; adorned, yet never over-wrought; rich in allusion, yet pure and perspicuous; correct, without labour; and though sometimes deficient in strength, yet always musical. His essays in general are on the surface of life; if ever original, it was in pieces of humour. Sir Roger de Coverley, and the tory fox-hunter, need not to be mentioned.

"Johnson had a fund of humour, but he did not know it; nor was he willing to descend to the familiar idiom, and the variety of diction, which that mode of composition required. The letter in the Rambler, No. 12., from a young girl that wants a place, will illustrate this observation.

"Addison possessed an unclouded imagination, alive to the first objects of nature and of art. He reaches the sublime without any apparent effort. When he tells us, 'If we consider the fixed stars as so many oceans of flame, that are each of them attended with a different set of planets; if we still discover new firmaments, and new lights, that are sunk farther in those unfathomable depths of æther; we are lost in a labyrinth of suns and worlds, and confounded with the magnificence and immensity of nature.' The ease, with which this passage rises to unaffected grandeur, is the secret charm that captivates the reader.

"Johnson is always lofty; he seems, to use Dryden's phrase, to be o'er-inform'd with meaning, and his words do not appear to himself adequate to his conception. He moves in state, and his periods are always harmonious. His oriental tales are in the true style of eastern magnificence, and yet none of them are so much admired as the visions of Mirza. In matters of criticism, Johnson is never the echo of preceding writers: he thinks and decides for himself.

"If we except the Essays on the Pleasures of Imagination, Addison cannot be called a philosophical critick. His Moral Essays are beautiful; but in that province nothing can exceed the Rambler; though Johnson used to say, that the Essay on the Burthens of Mankind (in the Spectator, No. 558.) was the most exquisite he had ever read.

"Talking of himself, Johnson said, 'Topham Beauclerk has wit, and every thing comes from him with ease; but when I say a good thing, I seem to labour.' When we compare him with Addison, the contrast is still stronger. Addison lends grace, and ornament to truth; Johnson gives it force and energy. Addison makes virtue amiable; Johnson represents it as an awful duty. Addison insinuates himself with an air of modesty; Johnson commands like a dictator, but a dictator in his splendid robes, not labouring at the plough. Addison is the Jupiter of Virgil, with placid serenity talking to Venus, 'vultu, quo cœlum tempestatesque serenat.' Johnson is Jupiter tonans: he darts his lightning, and rolls his thunder, in the cause of virtue and piety. The language seems to fall short of his ideas; he pours along, familiarizing the terms of philosophy, with bold inversions, and sonorous periods; but we may apply to him what Pope has said of Homer: 'It is the sentiment that swells and fills out the diction, which rises with it, and forms itself about it; like glass in the furnace, which grows to a greater magnitude, as the breath within is more powerful, and the heat more intense.'

"It is not the design of this comparison to decide between these two eminent writers. In matters of taste every reader will choose for himself. Johnson is always profound, and of course gives the fatigue of thinking. Addison charms while he instructs; and writing, as he always does, a pure, an elegant, and idiomatick style, he may be pronounced the safest model for imitation."

The great master of our language, however, in the estimation of Johnson himself, is evidently Dryden. "(I) Dryden," he says, "in his prose is always another and the same; he does not exhibit a second time the same elegances in the same form, nor appears to have any art other than that of expressing with clearness what he thinks with vigour. His style could not easily be imitated, either seriously or ludicrously; for, being always equable and always varied, it has no prominent or discriminative characters. The beauty, who is totally free from disproportion of parts and features, cannot be ridiculed by an overcharged resemblance. From his prose, however, Dryden derives only his accidental and secondary praise: the veneration, with which his name is pronounced by every cultivator of English literature, is paid to him as he refined the language, improved the sentiments, and tuned the numbers, of English poetry."

Allowing Dryden this supremacy, the cultivators of our literature, however, will acknowledge, with pride as well as gratitude, their obligations to those who flourished near his time: to Tillotson and Temple, each distinguished for simplicity of style; the former also for his perspicuity, the latter for ease and harmony: to Swift, who, regardless of harmonious periods, writes with plainness and with precision; who "(m) studied purity," and has rarely missed it; who of correct English is a model: to Addison, "the sweetest child of Attick elegance:" to Pope, of whom Watts has said, that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, or a phrase poetically elegant in the English language, which he has not inserted into his version of Homer: to South, whose rich diction is rarely unaccompanied with honest indignation, or keen sarcasm: to the polished and graceful Atterbury: to Scott, the eloquent author of the Christian life: to Locke, who "(n) yields not the palm of metaphysical acuteness to the sullen sophistry of Hobbes, or the cold scepticism of Hume:" and to Berkeley, before whose "brilliancy of imagination, and delicacy of taste," the labour and pomp of Shaftesbury sink into insignificance.

We come now to the contemporaries of Johnson, and find in Warburton the force and freedom of the lexicographer, but not the splendid diction. The character of Warburton's style, "(b) is freedom and force united." Nobody understood the philosophy of grammar better; yet in the construction of his terms he was not nice, rather he was somewhat negligent.—To say all in a word, he possessed, in an eminent degree, those two qualities of a great writer, sapere et fari; I mean, superior sense, and the power of doing justice to it by a sound and manly eloquence. It was an ignorant cavil, that charged him with want of taste. The objection arose from the originality of his manners; but he wrote, when he thought fit, with the greatest purity and even elegance, notwithstanding his strength and energy, which frequently exclude those qualities." Of a different excellence of style and manner we have a most pleasing example in Goldsmith. All is inartificial. His periods, however, are "so smooth and full of melodious sounds," that to a true English ear "the harp of Orpheus cannot be more charming." To his contemporary, who assumed the name of Junius, Johnson himself has conceded (p) liveliness of imagery, pungency of periods, and fertility of allusion; but cannot think the style of this writer secure from criticism, or that his expressions are not often trite, and his periods feeble. At another time Johnson said, "(q) I should have believed Burke to be Junius, because I know no man but Burke who is capable of writing these letters; but Burke spontaneously denied it to me. The case would have been different, had I asked him if he was the author; a man so questioned, as to an anonymous publication, may think he has a right to deny it." To the eloquent, the malignant, and still unmasked calumniator, Burke is certainly not inferior in any charm of composition; and when Burke impugned the characters or opinions of others, he had recourse to "open war," and not to "covert guile." If we look for simple elegance of style, where is it more conspicuous than in his philosophical criticism on the Sublime and Beautiful? if for richer ornaments of diction, for rhetoric both splendid and affecting, where are they more thickly sown than in his tract upon the French Revolution? But by his morals as well as faculties Burke gratifies the reader; and is not found like the infidel philosopher to whom England is indebted for one of her histories, or like the learned investigator of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, sullyng the finest graces of language with indecent sneers against revealed religion. Lastly, as to a model of the elegant diction of modern times, and which is not made the vehicle of licentious opinions, we may resort to Warton, the historian of English poetry. His style is remarkable for its perspicuity; and the modulation or dignity of his periods is exceeded only by those of him, "WHOSE WRITINGS HAVE GIVEN HARDOUR TO VIRTUE AND CONFIDENCE TO TRUTH."

Of the power over language, which the last great writer has exercised, his preface to this Dictionary is an ample and noble specimen. But to few readers are any of Dr. Johnson's compositions unknown. Mr. Warton's delightful work, on account of its learned allusions and antiquarian research, has not been so generally explored. An extract from it, therefore, may to some be a novel display of the richness of our tongue; and may be not the less gratifying, if it opens to their view some exploded ceremonies of "the olden time."

"(r) The age of queen Elizabeth is commonly called the golden age of English poetry. It certainly may not improperly be styled the most poetical age of these annals.

"Among the great features which strike us in the poetry of this period, are the predominancy of fable, of fiction, and fancy, and a predilection for interesting adventures and pathetic events. I will endeavour to assign and explain the cause of this characteristic distinction, which may chiefly be referred to the following principles, sometimes blended, and sometimes operating singly: The revival and vernacular versions of the classics, the importation and translation of Italian novels, the visionary reveries or refinements of false philosophy, a degree of superstition sufficient for the purposes of poetry, the adoption of the machineries of romance, and the frequency and improvements of allegoric exhibition in the popular spectacles.

"When the corruptions and impostures of popery were abolished, the fashion of cultivating the Greek and Roman learning became universal: and the literary character was no longer appropriated to scholars by profession, but assumed by the nobility and gentry. The ecclesiastics had found it their interest to keep the languages of antiquity to themselves, and men were eager to know what had been so long injuriously concealed. Truth propagates truth, and the mantle of mystery was removed not only from religion but from literature. The laity, who had now been taught to assert their natural privileges, became impatient of the old monopoly of knowledge, and demanded admittance to the usurpations of the clergy. The general curiosity for new discoveries, heightened either by just or imaginary ideas of the treasures contained in the Greek and Roman writers, excited all persons of leisure and fortune to study the classics. The pedantry of the present age was the politeness of the last. An accurate comprehension of the phraseology and peculiarities of the ancient poets, historians and orators, which yet seldom went farther than a kind of technical erudition, was an indispensable and almost the principal object in the circle of a gentleman's education. Every young lady of fashion was carefully instituted in classical letters: and the daughter of a duchess was taught, not only to distil strong waters, but to construe Greek. Among the learned females of high distinction, queen Elizabeth herself was the most conspicuous. Roger Ascham, her preceptor, speaks with rapture of her astonishing progress in the Greek nouns; and declares with no small degree of triumph, that during a long residence at Windsor-castle, she was accustomed to read more Greek in a day, than some prebendary of that church did Latin, in one week.' And although perhaps a princess looking out words in a lexicon, and writing down hard phrases from Plutarch's Lives, may be thought at present a more incompatible and extraordinary character, than a canon of Windsor understanding no Greek and but little Latin, yet Elizabeth's passion for these acquisitions was then natural, and resulted from the genius and habitudes of her age.

"The books of antiquity being thus familiarized to the great, every thing was tinctured with ancient history and mythology. The heathen gods, although discountenanced by the Calvinists on a suspicion of their tending to cherish and revive a spirit of idolatry, came into general vogue. When the queen paraded through a country-town, almost every pageant was a pantheon. When she paid a visit at the house of any of her nobility, at entering the hall she was saluted by the Penates, and conducted to her privy-chamber by Mercury. Even the pastry-cooks were expert mythologists. At dinner, select transformations of Ovid's Metamorphoses were exhibited in confectionary; and the splendid icing of an immense historic plum-cake, was embossed with a delicious basso-relievo of the destruction of Troy. In the afternoon, when she condescended to walk in the garden, the lake was covered with Tritons and Nereids: the pages of the family were converted into Wood-Nymphs, who peeped from every bower; and the footmen gamboled over the lawns in the figure of Satyrs." —

I have thus made some slight additions to Dr. Johnson's history of our language; showing a variety of style which has obtained, and humbly guiding the curious to more ample information on the subject. An elaborate and regular history of the English tongue is a desideratum in our literature; and instead of a paucity of materials subservient to this object, as Dr. Johnson would insinuate, there is abundance. Volumes are due to it. Let the investigator mark the unwearied labours of Wanley in his description of Saxon manuscripts; let him explore others, which in the libraries of our cathedrals, and colleges, and other repositories, exist, and have not received the advantage of Wanley's notice: and he will not complain of the paucity of materials. Next, let him attend to the following remark of Mr. Tyrwhitt. "In order to trace with exactness the progress of any language, it seems necessary, 1. that we should have before us a continued series of authors; 2. that those authors should have been approved, as having written, at least, with purity; and 3. that their writings should have been correctly copied. In the English language, we have scarce any authors within the first century after the Conquest; of those, who wrote before Chaucer, and whose writings have been preserved, we have no testimony of approbation from their contemporaries or successors; and lastly, the copies of their works, which we have received, are in general so full of inaccuracies, as to make it often very difficult for us to be assured, that we are in possession of the genuine words of the author." Such materials let him examine with care; and he will find, what in the present sketch I have occasionally but briefly shown, that the collation of what is printed with what is written will often establish that which has been disputed, and rectify that which has been perverted. Let him moreover precisely ascertain and compare our provincial dialects. And thus his labours may tend to form a complete history of the language, and at the same time illustrate the general philosophy of speech.]

[APPENDIX.]

Concerning the Norman Tongue.

I HAVE observed, in the history of the language, that the Norman was never popular. See p. xlvii. Brerewood, noticing the attempt of William the Conqueror to subdue the language as well as the country, pronounces his injunctions, "that French only should be taught in the schools here; and that all the laws of the land should be written, and all the pleadings performed, in that language;" as wholly unavailing to accomplish his design. "For the English being far more numerous than the Normans, the effect and result of all his labour was only that a few French words were mixed with the English. Such was the success of the Franks among the Gauls, and of the Goths among the Italians and Spaniards." The Norman of the period, when William planned his secondary conquest, might have been cited: it is as follows, in his Laws.

Edward the third enacted, as it is recorded in this old French, a law for the restoration of the language which had been disused in legal proceedings; assigning, as the reason of the statute, that, in foreign countries, justice was always observed to be best done, where their laws were studied and practised in their own language. The statute is too curious to be here omitted.

ADDITIONS TO THE PRECEDING HISTORY.

P. xlv. I ought to have observed, that the composition of Layamon occasionally exhibits an intermixture of rhymes.

P. lviii. What I have ascribed, in the note, solely to the old printers respecting the letter z, may be also said of old transcribers.

P. lxxiv. A Balade of the Village without Paintyng is ascribed by Ritson to Lydgate. Bibl. Poet. p. 70. Mr. Tyrwhitt considers, however, what is here cited, as one of the genuine works of Chaucer. Canterb. Tales, 4to. edit. vol. 2. p. 529, 530. DICTIONARY

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Where this mark * follows the word, it signifies that such word is not to be found in the Dictionary of Dr. Johnson.

Where this mark † follows the word, it signifies that addition or alteration is made in respect either to the etymology, or definition, or example, of the word given by Dr. Johnson.

A, † The first letter of the European alphabets, has, in the English language, three different sounds, which may be termed the broad, open, and slender. This is Dr. Johnson's distinction of the sounds of this letter; which other grammarians augment. But, in fact, it has regularly only two sounds peculiar to itself; a short and a long one; all other sounds being irregular; and those of a are various, according to its combination with other letters.

The broad sound resembling that of the German a is found in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt; in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. Many of these words were anciently written with au, as, sault, waulk; which happens to be still retained in fault. This was probably the ancient sound of the Saxons, since it is almost uniformly preserved in the rustick pronunciation, and in the Northern dialects, Dr. Johnson says; as, muun for man, haund for hand. But the Northern pronunciation is rather that of mon, and hond or hont.

A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found, Dr. Johnson says, in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c. This pronunciation is indeed found in rath, but not in its derivative rather, the a of which is usually uttered as in fancy.

A slender, or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pair, or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and e; to this the Arabick a is said nearly to approach. Of this sound we have examples in the words, place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in ation; as, relation, nation, generation.

A is also, in some words, transient and unobserved, as in the last syllables of carriage and marriage; in others less faintly sounded, as in those of captain and chaplain; and in some obscurely uttered, as in collar, jocular, pillar, regular, where the sound most resembles that of short u.

A is short, as, glass, grass; or long, as, glaze, graze: it is marked long, generally, by an e final, as, plane, or by an i added, as, plain. The short a is open, the long a close.

1. A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree; denoting the number one, as a man is coming, that is, no more than one; or an indefinite indication, as a man may come this way; that is, any man. This article has no plural signification. Before words beginning with a vowel and h mute, and also aspirated words accented on the second syllable, it is written an; as, an ox, an egg, an honour, an habitual practice. Formerly an preceded all words beginning with h. Indeed an is the original article from the Saxon. The Saxons wrote an tpeop, a tree, an peopa, a few; which succeeding times contracted into a. It is the adjective ane, een, an, one; applied as the French and Italians apply their numerals un, une; the Dutch their een; and the Germans their ein.

2. A taken materially, or for itself, is a noun; as, a great A, a little a.

Truly, were great A, before I would be willing to be so abused, I should wish myself little a, a thousand times.

Wallis's Correction of Hobbes, § 5.

3. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered by Wallis as a contraction of at, when it is put before a word denoting some action not yet finished; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surnames; as Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it seems to signify to, like the French à. And in some cases, Dr. Johnson might have added, it signifies in.

A hunting Chloë went.

Prior.

They go a begging to a bankrupt's door.

Dryden.

May peace still slumber by these purling fountains!

Which we may every year

Find when we come a fishing here.

Wotton.

Now the men fell a rubbing of armour, which a great while had lain oiled.

Wotton.

He will knap the spears a pieces with his teeth.

Mora, Antag. against Atheism.

Another falls a ringing a Pescennius Niger, and judiciously distinguishes the sound of it to be modern.

Addison on Medals.

His lordship might allude to the proverb of Italy, "Me venga la morte di Spagna," Let my death come from Spain: For then it is sure to be long a coming.

Bacon, P. part in the House of Commons.

Let 'em brew and bake too, husband, a God's name.

Benamont and Fl. Knight of the Burn. Pts. iii. 1.

Let such, a God's name, with fine wheat be fed.

Pope, Wigs of Bath, v. 43.

4. A, prefixed to many or few, implies one whole number, an aggregate of few or many collectively taken; and, subjoined to many, denotes sometimes an object separately considered.

Told of a many thousand warlike French.

Shakspeare.

Party in the madness of many for the gain of a few.

Swift.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen.

Gray.

5. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another. Thus we say, The landlord hath a hundred a year; The ship's crew gained a thousand pounds a man.

The river Inn passes through a wide open country, during all its course through Bavaria: which is a voyage of two days, after the rate of twenty leagues a day.

Addison on Italy.

6. A is used in burlesque poetry, to lengthen out a syllable, without adding to the sense.

For cloves and nutmeg to the line-a,

Add even for oranges to China.

Dryden.

7. A is sometimes, in familiar writings, put by a barbarous corruption for he; as, will a come, for will he come.

Stand here by me, Master Robert Shallow; I will make the King do you grace; I will leer upon him as a comes by.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. ii.

By the faith of my body a has put me into such a fright, that I tremble (as they say) as a were an aspine leaf.

Benam. and Fl. Kn. of the Burn. Pts. iii. 1.

8. It is also a barbarous corruption for have.

I had not thought my body could a yielded

All those foul scurvy names that she has call'd me.

Beaum. and Fl. Wit at sev. Weapons, iii. 1.

9. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French à in these phrases, à droit, à gauche, &c. and sometimes to be contracted from at, Dr. Johnson says; as, aside, aslope, asfoot, asleep, athirst, aware. Yet some of these are not so contracted. They are the same as on side, on foot, on sleep. So adays was formerly written on days; aboard, on board; ablaze, on blaze; and arose, on rose. As to the augment a, as in awary, (one of the examples produced, in this division, by Dr. Johnson,) this not inelegant usage yet obtains, though less than in a very brilliant era of our literature, the time of Addison. Thus ameliorate is written instead of meliorat. Thus, formerly alongeth by Cowet, for longeth; aduant by Skelton, for dant, &c. The composition of such words is explained by Lye in his Anglo-Saxon Dictionary. A, he says, is an initial augment, commonly altering nothing in the sense of the word; whence, in the modern language it is generally omitted: Thus from the Saxon abreacan, we have the English to break. And it is to be observed that a, be, poþ, 3, to, are often indifferently and interchangeably prefixed to the past tense of verbs, to participles of the past tense, and to verbal nouns.

It may here also be noticed, that there are words, of which the a is become so component a part as not to be displaced; as, afresh, alive, aloud, anew.

I gin to be a-weary of the sun;

And wish the state o' the world were now undone.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

And now a breeze from shore began to blow,

The sailor ship their oars, and cease to row;

Then hoist their yards a-trip, and all their sails

Let fall, to court the wind, and catch the gales.

Dryden, Cezar and Alcione.

A little house with trees a-row,

And like its master very low.

Pope, Hor.

10. A is sometimes redundant; as, arise, arouse, awake; the same with rise, rouse, wake. See the preceding paragraph.

11. A, in abbreviations, stands for artium, or arts; as, A. B. batchelor of arts, artium baccalaureus; A. M. master of arts, artium magister; or, anno; as, A. D. anno domini.

12. A, with the addition of the two Latin words per se, meaning by itself, is used by our elder writers to denote a nounsuch. It may have been adopted from the custom of the child's school, in which every letter, we may presume, was taught to be expressed per se. So we find in 1612 a pamphlet published with the title of "O per se O, or a New Cryer of Lanthorne and Candle Light;" and in another publication, called "Wits Recreations, I per se." But the phrase is as old as the time of Chaucer, who calls "faire Cresceide the flowre and a per se of Troie and Greece," Test. of Cresceide. Mr. Boucher has assimilated this phrase to "I am alpha," Rev. i. 8. which Junius had before done. But they are incorrect. For, as Dr. Jamieson has well observed, the force of the one metaphor lies in the use of a by itself; of the other, in its being connected with omega, as denoting Him, who is not only the First, but the Last. See Scottish Etymolog. Dictionary. They both refer, however, to the use of alpha among the Romans in the sense of a principal or distinguished person, as Martial calls Codrus, "alpha penulatum," i. e. king of the beggars. In our old dramattick writers the phrase per se is found without a, and also with the duplication of the letter.

In faith, my sweet honeycomb, I'll love thee à per se a.
Wily Beguiled, (1635.)

AAO'NIC. * adj. That which relates to the priesthood of Aaron.

The state of the New Testament must be more perfect than the law; but, in the law, there was one high pastor, the high priest on earth; therefore there must be one now also, and with rather. I answer, we have him indeed, our chief bishop and high priest, of whom the Aaronical priest was but a shadow, namely Jesus Christ. Fulke's Retentive, p. 256.

It [the surplice] was ordained by God to be worn, under the Aaronical priesthood.

Lucia's Source, in Finch's, of the Ch. of Eng. No. 14.

AB, † at the beginning of the names of places, generally shews that they have some relation to an abbey, as, Abingdon. Gibson.

This town of Abingdon was written, abban-zune, abbat mona vel collis. Luc.

ABACIST. * n. s. [Fr. abaciste, Lat. abacista.] He who casts accounts; a calculator. See ABACUS.

ABA'CK. † adv. [Goth. abakai, Sax. on bac.] Backwards. Obsolete.

But when they came where thou thy skill didst show,
 They drew aback, as half with shame and half with woe.

Spenser, Pastoral, l. 10.

All doubts put aback, I put you in memory that I am not of your kindred so near. Hist. of Oliver of Castile, ch. 9.

A noble heart ought not the sooner yield,
 Nor shrink aback for any weal or woe. Mir. for Mag. p. 179.

2. A sea term. Backward with the sails flatted against the mast. Dict.

ABA'CK. * n. s. [Fr. abacque, Lat. abacus.] A plinth, or flat square stone, on the capital of a pillar: as Cotgrave defines it. See also ABACUS. Ben Jonson uses it simply for a square surface.

In the center or midst of the pegen, there was an aback or square, in which this elegy was written. Coronation Pageant.

ABACOT. * n. s. The word is noticed in the old French glossaries, and is called by Cowel, the cap of state, used in old times by our English kings, wrought up in the figure of two crowns.

ABACTOR. † n. s. [Latin.] One who drives away or steals cattle in herds, or great numbers at once, in distinction from those that steal only a sheep or two. This is Dr. Johnson's definition of the word from Blount. The word was probably used formerly, like the old French abacteur, for a thief in general. Thus the obsolete adjective abacted, i. e. carried away by violence, yet exists in our old Glossaries; as also the obsolete substantive abaction.

ABACUS. n. s. [Latin.]

1. A counting-table, anciently used in calculations.
 2. [In architecture.] The uppermost member of a column, which serves as a sort of crowning both to the capital and column. Dict.

ABA'FT. † adv. [Goth. aftraro, Sax. abaftran, bhind.] From the fore-part of the ship, towards the stern. Dict.

ABA'ISANCE. n. s. [from the French abaisser, to depress, to bring down.] An act of reverence, a bow. Obeysance is considered by Skinner as a corruption of abaisance, but is now universally used.

To ABA'LIENATE. † v. a. [from abalieno, Lat.]

1. To make that another's which was our own before. A term of the civil law, not much used in common speech.

2. To estrange; to withdraw the affection.

The devil and his deceitful angels do so bewitch them, so abalienate their minds and trouble their memories.

Abp. Sandys, Sermon, fol. 132. b.

ABALIENATION. n. s. [Lat. abalienatio.] The act of giving up one's right to another person; or a making over an estate, goods, or chattels by sale, or due course of law. Dict.

To ABA'ND. † v. a. [A word contracted from abandon, but not now in use. See ABANDON.] To forsake.

They stronger are

Than they which sought at first their helping hand,
 And Vortiger enforce'd the kingdom to aband.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. l. 65.

Which when Severus old did understand,

All pleasures quite and joys he did aband.

Pursuing war.

Mir. for Mag. p. 172.

To ABA'NDON. † v. a. [Fr. abandonner.] Derived according to Menage, from the Italian abbandonare, which signifies to forsake his colours: bandum [i. e. bandum] deserere. Pasquier thinks it a coalition of à ban donner, to give up to a proscription: in which sense we, at this day, mention the ban of the empire. So abandon, Sax. Chron. denounced. Ban, in our own old dialect, signifies a curse; and to abandon, if considered as compounded between French and Saxon, is exactly equivalent to drive down. To this etymology, admitted by Dr. Johnson, I must add, that the Moes-Goth. bandi, a band or chain, with the proposition af, i. e. af-band, loosed from the chain, set at liberty, has been also offered as the etymological explanation. But Wachter gives the old Goth. band, a standard: implying, that he who abandons himself to a particular person or purpose, enlists himself under the standard of the same; and so derives the word secondarily from band and down. So, in one of our very ancient songs, "I am in his bandoun," means, "I am at his command."

1. To give up, resign, or quit: often followed by the particle to; and formerly used in a good sense, but not in later times.

There founded they at home sitting

Lucrece, his wife, all environed

With women, which were abandoned

To werche; and she wrought eke withall.

With worthie knightes environed,

The kynge him selfe hath abandoned

To the temple in good intent.

If she be so abandon'd to her sorrow,

As it is spoke, she never will admit me.

Gower, Conf. Am. l. 8.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

The passive gods behold the Greeks defile

Their temples, and abandon to the spoil

Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire

To save a sinking town, involv'd in fire,

Who is he so abandoned to sottish credulity, as to think, that a clod of earth in a sack may ever, by eternal shaking, receive the fabrick of man's body?

Bentley, Sermon.

Must he, whose altar on the Phrygian shore,

With frequent rites, and pure, avow'd thy power,

Be doom'd the worst of human ills to prove,

Unless'd, abandon'd to the wrath of Jove?

Popé, Odyssey, i. 80.

2. To desert; to forsake: in an ill sense.

The prince, using the passions of fearing evil, and desiring to escape, only to serve the rule of virtue, not to abandon one's self, leapt to a rib of the ship,

Sidney, Arcadia, l. ii.

Seeing the hurt stag alone,

Left and abandon'd of his velvet friends,

Tis right, quoth he; thus misery doth part

The flux of company.

Shakespeare, A. you like it.

What fate a wretched fugitive attends,
Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends. Dryden, Rn. 2.
But to the parting goddess thus she pray'd;
Propitious still be present to my aid,
Nor quite abandon your once favour'd maid. Dryden, Fables.
The parts that God gave them they held in unrighteousness, sloth, and sensuality; and this made God to desert and abandon them to themselves; so that they have had a doting and a decrepit reason long before age had given them such a body.
South, Term. ii. 239.

3. To forsake; to leave.
He boldly spake, Sir knight, if knight thou be,
Abandon this forestalled place at erst,
For fear of further harm, I counsel thee. Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. 39.
Abandon soon, I read, the captive spoil,
Of that same outcast carcass. Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 12.

4. To drive away; to banish.
This thing confessed by Peter doth not only abandon one heretic, but, whereas the church like a good shippe is tossed with many waves of the sea, the same must be the bar against all heretics!

Rp. of Chichester's Sermon before the Queen, 1576. F. v. b.
The time seems thirty [years] unto me;
Being all this time abandon'd from your bed.
Shakespeare, Tam. of the Shrew, Induct.

Learn by me the rather to be wise,
And to abandon hate and malice far;
To banish all ambitious bloody war. Mir. for Mag. p. 76.
But a Vespasian and Titus, and Antoninus Pius, and Macerinus, whipt them [delators and informers] in the amphitheatre, and abandoned them out of their dominions.

Rp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.
To ABANDON OVER.† v. a. [A form of writing not usual, perhaps not exact.] To give up to, to resign.

Look on me as a man abandoned o'er
To an eternal lethargy of love;
To pull, and pinch, and wound me, cannot cure,
And but disturb the quiet of my death. Dryden, Sp. Friar.
Abandoning themselves over to spending and sensuality; and,
for one particular, immoderate drinking; are evil dispositions to eminency, and will make them both unable to maintain the publick good, and unfit to govern others.

Dr. J. White's Sermon at Paul's Cross, (1615.) p. 22.

ABA'NDON.* n. s. [The French, in their elder glossaries, interpret this word licence, or liberty; in later times, relinquishment; as "l'abandon des biens du monde." In which sense, our language exhibits the word applied both to things and persons.]

1. A forsaker; he who has abandoned or left a thing.

A friar, an abandon of the world, a man wholly rapt with divine affections and extasies. Sir E. Sandy, Sale of Religion.

2. A relinquishment.
These heavy exactions have occasioned an abandon of all mines but what are of the richer sort. Ld. Kames.

ABANDONED.† particip. adj. Corrupted in the highest degree; as, an abandoned wretch. In this sense, it is a contraction of a longer form, abandoned [given up] to wickedness.

The confusion he was in, upon such an unexpected provocation, extremely disordered him, and he immediately sent away this abandoned prostitute with great indignation.

Kelson, Life of Bp. Bull, p. 459.

He, [the drunkard] goeth down quick to perdition, where only he can meet with greater monsters, and more abandoned reprobates, than those he left behind him.

Delany, Christmas Sermon.

ABA'NDONER.* n. s. [Fr. abandonneur.] A for-saker. "Desertor; qui luisse et abandonne;" as Huloet explains it. Cotgrave, who gives the word abandoner also, adds to these definitions, "a prosititutor of."

Oh! sacred, shadowy, cold, and constant queen,
Abandoner of revels, mute, contemplative!

Deauna and Fl. Two Nob. Kinnien, v. 5.

ABA'NDONED.† n. s. [from abandon.] This is an old English noun, found in Huloet, Barret, and Minshew; and by them interpreted a leaving or forsaking. Dr. Johnson has cited an example; the word abandoning from Clarendon, by whom however it is used not as a noun, but as a participle; as the passage will shew: I produce from Bishop Hall a forcible application of the substantive.

He hoped his past meritorious actions might outweigh his present abandoning the thought of future action.

Clarendon, Hist. b. viii.

What is it that Satan can despair persuading men unto, if he can draw them to an unnatural abandoning of life, and pursuit of death. Rp. Hall, Occ. Meditations, cxvii.

ABA'NDONMENT.† n. s. [abandonnement, Fr.]

1. The act of abandoning.
The quitting, abandonment, or prostitution of a thing to others. Cotgrave.

A supreme power is placed at the head of this nominal re-publick, with a more open avowal of military despotism than at any former period; with a more open and undisguised abandonment of the names and pretences under which that despotism long attempted to conceal itself.

Speech of W. Pitt, Feb. 3. 1800.

2. The state of being abandoned.
When thus the helm of justice is abandoned, an universal abandonment of all other posts will succeed.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

ABANNITON. n. s. [Lat. abannitio.] A banishment for one or two years for manslaughter. Obsolete.

Dict.

To ABA'RE. v. a. [abapian, Sax.] To make bare, uncover, or disclose. Dict.

ABARTICULATION. n. s. [from ab, from, and articulus, a joint, Lat.] A good and apt construction of the bones, by which they move strongly and easily; or that species of articulation that has manifest motion. Dict.

To ABA'SE.† v. a. [Fr. abaisser, from the Lat. basis, or bassus, a barbarous word, signifying low, base;
or from the Ital. abbassare. These and also the Span. abaxar, to lessen or keep under, are all re-ferrible to the Gr. βασις, the foot of a pillar. Hence to abase is as much as to say, mettre à bas. Gower writes the word abesse.]

1. To depress, to lower.
It is a point of cunning to wait upon him with whom you speak with your eye;—yet with a demure abasing of it sometimes. Bacon, Essay xxii.

Saying so, he abased his lance against him that had answered.
Shelton, Trans. of D. Quix. i. 4.

2. To cast down, to depress, to bring low: in a figurative and personal sense, which is the common use.

Happy shepherd, to the gods be thankful, that to thy advancement their wisdoms have thee abased. Sidney, b. i.

Behold every one that is proud, and abase him. Job, xl. 11.

With unresisted might the monarch reigns;

He levels mountains and he raises plains;

And, not regarding difference of degree,

Abas'd your daughter, and exalted me. Dryden, Fables.

If the mind be curbed and humbled too much in children;
if their spirits be abased and broken much by too strict an hand over them; they lose all their vigour and industry.

Locke on Education, § 46.

ABA'SED. adj. [with heralds] a term used of the wings of eagles, when the top looks downwards towards the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut;

the natural way of bearing them being spread with the top pointing to the chief of the angle.

Bailey and Chambers.

ABASEMENT.† n. s. The state of being brought low; the act of bringing low; depression.

There is an abacement because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate. Ecclesiasticus, xx. 11.

The devil could not appear in human shape, whilst man was in his integrity; because he was a spirit fallen from his first glorious perfection, and therefore must appear in such shape, which might argue his imperfection and abacement, which was the shape of a beast. Mede, Disc. xl.

TO ABA'SH.† v. n. [Fr. abaissier, Dr. Johnson says. Ital. abbassare. Some also assign the Fr. esbahir, to affrighten, as the etymology of our English word; but the Fr. abaissier, is nearer of kin to it. In Wiclif and Chaucer we have the verb abais, and its pret. abaisit, for abash, and abashed. The Scotch also use abaisit in the same sense. The verb abate, peculiar to Chaucer, no doubt is derived from esbahir. Barret in his ancient Alvenrie or Dictionary, translates "to be abashed or astonied" by "etre abaché et espouvanté." After all, we must look to the Sax. berceban. See TO BASH.]

1. To put into confusion; to make ashamed. It generally implies a sudden impression of shame.

They heard and were abash'd. Milton, P. L. i. 331.

This heard, the imperious queen sat mute with fear;

Nor further durst incense the gloomy thunderer.

Silence was in the court at this rebuke:

Nor could the gods, abash'd, sustain their sovereign's look.

Dryden, Fables.

2. The passive admits the particle at, sometimes of, before the causal noun.

In no wise speak again: the truth, but he abashed of the error of thy ignorance. Ecclesiasticus, iv. 25.

I said unto her, from whence is this kid? Is it not stolen? But she replied upon me, it was given for a gift, more than the wages: however, I did not believe her, and I was abashed at her. Tobit, ii. 13, 14.

In the admiration only of weak minds

Led captive: cease to admire, and all her plumes,

Full flat, and sink into a trivial toy,

At every sudden slighting quite abish. Milton, P. L. ii. 223.

The little Cupids hovering round,

As pictures prove, with garlands crown'd,

Abash'd at what they saw and heard,

Flew off, nor ever more appear'd. Swift, Miscellanies.

ABA'SHMENT.* n. s. [from abash.] That this excellent old word should have escaped the notice of Mr. Boucher, surprises me. It is found in our oldest glossaries; in those of Huloet, Barret, and Minsheu; and is interpreted, "a great fear or astonying, consternatio;" and also, "hontissement, verecundia." The judicious use of the word, in modern times, has also been overlooked. Gower uses abash as a substantive.

1. The state of being ashamed.

She was afayde;

The ruddy shamefastness in her vysage fyll,

Which manner of abashment became her not yll.

Skellon's Poems, p. 38.

Is the utmost abashment and consternation of mind, pulling up a good heart, and taking breath, Lipsius most submissively begged pardon of his majesty for any fault he might have committed. Translation of Boecellini, (1626.) p. 21.

2. Cause of confusion.

Methinks it may be some abashment to reason, and that vast perfection to which some men would extol it, that it scarce knows what Man or Itself is.

Ellis's Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 54

TO ABA'TE.† v. a. [Fr. abatre, Ital. abbattere, Sp. abatir; which in one sense signify to beat down: in another, to subtract, as in arithmetick. See Dr. Johnson's third definition of this word. Some have proposed the privative a and the Belg. batten, which means profit or interest; because, by diminishing a thing it becomes less profitable. Barret, has defined abating as an arithmetical subtraction, viz. withdrawing from a greater sum.]

1. To lessen; to diminish.

Who can tell whether the divine wisdom, to abate the glory of those kings, did not reserve this work to be done by a queen, that it might appear to be his own immediate work.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

If you did know to whom I gave the ring,

And how unwillingly I left the ring,

You would abate the strength of your displeasure. Shakespeare.

Here we see the hopes of great benefit and light from expositors and commentators are in a great part abated; and those who have most need of their help, can receive but little from them. Locke, Essay on St. Paul's Epist.

2. To deject, or depress the mind.

This iron world

Brings down the stoutest hearts to lowest state:

For misery doth bravest minds abate.

Spenser, M. Hubbard's Tale.

Have the power still

To banish your defenders, till at length

Your ignorance deliver you,

As most abated captives to some nation

That won you without blows. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

Time that changes all, yet changes us in vain,

The body, not the mind; nor can controul

Th' immortal vigour, or abate the soul. Dryden, Fench.

3. In commerce, to let down the price in selling, sometimes to beat down the price in buying.

In letting leases of his impropriations, if he found the curates' wages but small, he would abate much of his fine to increase their pensions. Sir G. Paul's Life of Abp. Whitgift, p. 38.

TO ABA'TE. v. n.

1. To grow less: as, his passion abates: the storm abates. It is used sometimes with the particle of before the thing lessened.

Our physicians have observed, that in process of time, some diseases have abated of their virulence, and have, in a manner, worn out their malignity, so as to be no longer mortal.

Dryden, Hind and Panther.

2. [In common law.]

It is in law used both actively and neuterly; as, to abate a castle, to beat it down. To abate a writ, is, by some exception, to defeat or overthrow it. A stranger abateth, that is, entereth upon a house or land void by the death of him that last possessed it, before the heir take his possession, and so keepeth him out. Wherefore as he that putteth out him in possession, is said to dispossess: so he that steppeth in between the former possessor and his heir, is said to abate. In the neuter signification thus: The writ of the demandant shall abate, that is, shall be disabled, frustrated, or overthrown. The appeal abateth by covin, that is, that the accusation is defeated by deceit. Cowel.

3. [In horsemanship.] A horse is said to abate or take down his curvets; when working upon curvets, he puts his two hind-legs to the ground both at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times. Dict.

ABATEMENT.† n. s. [abatment, Fr.]

1. The act of abating or lessening.

Xenophon tells us, that the city contained about ten thousand houses, and allowing one man to every house, who could have any share in the government, (the rest consisting of women, children and servants) and making other obvious abatements, these tyrants, if they had been careful to adhere together, might have been a majority even of the people collectively. Swift on the Cyn. in Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being abated.

Coffee has, in common with all nuts, an oil strongly combined and entangled with earthly particles. The most noxious part of oil exhales in roasting to the abatement of near one quarter of its weight. Arbutnot on Aliments.

3. The sum or quantity taken away by the act of abating.

Another act of charity he had; the selling of corn to his poor neighbours, at a rate below the market-price; which though, as he said, he had reason to do, gaining thereby the charge of portage, was a great benefit to them, who besides the abatement of price, and possibly forbearance, saved thereby a day's work. Fell's Life of Hammond, sect. 1.

The law of works is that law, which requires perfect obedience, without remission or abatement: so that, by that law, a man cannot be just, or justified, without an exact performance of every tittle. Locke.

4. The cause of abating: extenuation.

As for advantages towards practising and promoting piety and virtue were greater than those of other men: so will our excuse be less, if we neglect to make use of them. We cannot plead in abatement of our guilt, that we were ignorant of our duty, under the prepossession of ill habits, and the bias of a wrong education. Atterbury's Sermons.

5. [In law.] The act of the abator; as, the abatement of the heir into the land before he hath agreed with the lord. The affection or passion of the thing abated; as, abatement of the writ. *Cocul.*6. [With heralds.] An accidental mark, which being added to a coat of arms, the dignity of it is abased, by reason of some stain or dishonourable quality of the bearer. Dict.

Throwing down the stars, (the nobles and senators,) to the ground; putting dishonourable abatements into the fairest coats of arms. Dr. Spencer, Righteous Ruler, p. 27.

ABA'TER.† n. s. The agent or cause by which an abatement is procured; that by which any thing is lessened.

They are both abaters of the joys of life, and lessen the plenitude of happiness that man is capable of.

Abaters of acrimony or sharpness, are expressed oils of ripe vegetables, and all preparations of such; as of almonds, pistachoes, and other nuts. Arbutnot on Diet.

ABATIS.* Fr. A military term; of which our military dictionaries, however, give us no other explanation, than that it means trees cut down, and so laid with their branches, &c. turned towards the enemy, as to form a defence for troops stationed behind them. Borel, in his Treasury of old French words, and also Lacombe, explains abateis or abbatis as meaning a forest or wood; but Roquefort impugns this explanation, and defines it carnage, destruction, from advustatio.ABA'ROE. n. s. [a law-term.] One who intrudes into houses or land, void by the death of the former possessor, and yet not entered upon or taken up by his heir. *Dict.*ABVUDE. n. s. [A word used in old records.] Any thing diminished. *Bailey.*A'ATURE. n. s. [from abatre, French.] Those sprigs of grass which are thrown down by a stag in his passing by. *Dict.*ADD. n. s. The yarn on a weaver's warp; a term among clothiers. *Chambers.*ABBA.† n. s. [Heb. אבא] A Syriack word which signifies father.

Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Rom. viii. 15.

A'BBACY. n. s. [Lat. abbatia.] The rights or privileges of an abbot. See ABBEY.

According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office; and, therefore, even a secular person, who has the care of souls, is sometimes, in the canon law, also styled an abbot.

ABBA'TIAL.* adj. [Fr.] Relating to an abbey. It is quite a modern word.

Abbatial government was probably much more favourable to national prosperity, than baronial authority.

A'BBESS.† n. s. [Lat. abbatissa, from whence the Saxon abbasissa, abusissa, then probably abuesse, and by contraction abbesse in Fr. and abbess, Eng. And formerly also abbess, as in the Mirour for Magistrates, p. 235.] The superiour or governess of a nunnery or monastery of women.

They fled
Into this abbey, whither we pursued them;
And here the abbess shuts the gate upon us,
And will not suffer us to fetch him out.

Shakespeare, Com. of Errors.

I have a sister, abbess in Tereus,
Who lost her lover on her bridal-day.

Dryden, D. Sebastian.

Constantia, as soon as the solemnities of her reception were over, retired with the abbess into her own apartment. Addison.

A'BBEY, or ABBY. n. s. [Lat. abbatia; from whence probably first ABBACY; which see.] A monastery of religious persons, whether men or women; distinguished from religious houses of other denominations by larger privileges. See ABBOT.

With easy roads he came to Leicester;
Lodg'd in the abbey, where the reverend abbot,
With all his convent, honourably receiv'd him. Shakespeare.

A'BBEY-LUBBER. n. s. See LUBBER. A slothful loiterer in a religious house, under pretence of retirement and austerity.

This is no Father Dominic, no huge overgrown abbey-lubber; this is but a diminutive sucking friar. Dryden, Sp. Friar.

A'BBOT. n. s. [in the lower Latin abbas, from אב father, which sense was still implied: so that the abbots were called patres, and abbesses matres monasterii. Thus Fortunatus to the abbot Paternus: Nominis officium jure, Paterne, geris.] The chief of a convent, or fellowship of canons. Of these, some in England were mitred, some not: those that were mitred, were exempted from the jurisdiction of the diocesan, having in themselves episcopal authority within their precincts, and being also lords of parliament. The other sort were subject to the diocesan in all spiritual government. See ABBEY. *Cocul.*A'BBOTSHIP. n. s. The state or privilege of an abbot. *Dict.*To ABBREVIATE. v. a. [Lat. abbreviare.]

1. To shorten by contraction of parts without loss of the main substance; to abridge.

It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting off.

The only invention of late years, which hath contributed towards politeness in discourse, is that of abbreviating or reducing words of many syllables into one, by lopping off the rest. Swift.

2 To shorten; to cut short.

Set the length of their days before the flood; which were abbreviated after, and contracted into hundreds and three-scores. Brown, Vulgar Errors, vi. 6.

ABBREVIATE.* n. s. [from the verb.] An abridgement.

The epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, St. John, St. James, and Judas, the Apostles, do contain counsels and advertisements, in the form of orations, reciting divers places as well out of the Old Testament as out of the Gospels, as it were an abbreviate, called of the Greeks and Latins epitome.

Sir T. Elgot's Gov. fol. 205. b.

The abbreviates of life.

Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 4.

This true abbreviate of all his works.

Brevint, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 104.

ABBREVIATION. † n. s. [from the verb.]

The act of abbreviating.

Abbreviation and prolongation of life stand upon the same foundation: and the self-same arguments either confirm them, or overthrow them, both together. Smith, Old Age, p. 201.

2. The means used to abbreviate, as characters signifying whole words; words contracted.

Such is the propriety and energy in them all, that they never can be changed, but to disadvantage, except in the circumstance of using abbreviations.

This book — was laid up as sacred in the church of Winchester; and for that reason, as graver authors say, was called "liber domus Dei," and by abbreviation "domesday book."

Temple, Intr. Hist. of Eng.

ABBREVIATOR. † n. s. [abbreviateur, Fr.] One who abbreviates, or abridges.

In Xiphilin and Theodosius the two abbreviators of Dio Cassius, may be observed the like agreement and disagreement.

West on the Resurrection, p. 24.

ABBREVIATORY. * adj. That which abbreviates, or shortens.

ABBREVIATURE. † n. s. [Fr. from abbreviatura, Lat.]

1. A mark used for the sake of shortening.

The hand of Providence written often by abbreviations, hieroglyphicks, or short characters. Brown, Christ. Mor. p. 1. § 25.

Of the Jews' abbreviatures: This short writing is common in all their authors. Lightfoot's Miscell. p. 132.

2. A compendium or abridgement.

He is a good man, who grieves rather for him that injures him, than for his own suffering; who prays for him, that wrongs him, forgiving all his faults; who sooner shows mercy than anger; who offers violence to his appetite, in all things endeavouring to subdue the flesh to the spirit. This is an excellent abbreviature of the whole duty of a Christian.

Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

ABBREUVOIR. [In French, a watering-place. Ital. abbeverato, dal verbo bevere. Lat. biberi. Abbeverari i Castellis. This word is derived by Menage, not much acquainted with the Teutonic dialects, from adbibere for adbibere; but more probably it comes from the same root with bric. See BREW.] Among masons, the joint or juncture of two stones, or the interstice between two stones to be filled up with mortar. Dict.

A'BBY. See ABBEY.

A, B, C. †

1. The alphabet; as, he has not learned his a, b, c.

To walk alone, like one that has the pestilence; to sigh, like a school-boy that has lost his A, B, C; to weep like a young wench that had buried her grandam.

Shakespeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

I find

They know the right and left hand file, and may with some impulsion, no doubt, be brought to pass the A, B, C, of war, and come unto the horn-book. Braun. and Fl. Th. and Theodoret, ii. 1.

2. The little book by which the elements of reading are taught.

Then comes question like an a, b, c, book. Shakespeare.

ABDICANT. * part. adj. [Lat. abdicō.] Abdicating, renouncing, with of.

All that falsely usurp this title of physician, and practise it, to the sad cost of many; what are they but the scum of the people! Take off their vizards, and underneath appears wicked Jews, murderers of Christians, monks abdicant of their orders, &c. Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 93.

TO ABDICATE. † v. a. [Lat. abdicō.]

1. To give up right; to resign; to lay down an office. Mr. Malone thinks, that at the time of the Revolution, the managers and penmen of the Bill of Rights doubtless carefully examined the history of the deposition of Richard II. and in Hall's Chronicle found the word which created so much debate. But it had been long before an established word.

Now it was no mastery to persuade a man being desperate, penitent, and full of dolor, to abdicate himself from his empire and imperial pre-eminence.

Hall's Chronicle, fol. viii. b.

He ought to lay down his commission, and to abdicate that power he hath, rather than to suffer it forced to a willing injustice.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, D. ii. c. 6.

2. To deprive of right.

The father will disinherit or abdicate his child, quite cashier him.

Barton, Anat. Mel. To the Reader, p. 35.

The Turks abdicated Cornutus, the next heir, from the empire, because he was so much given to his book.

Barton, Anat. Mel. p. 126.

Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicate him, after the possession of three thousand years.

Dryden, Pref. to his Third Miscellany.

TO ABDICATE. * v. n. To resign; to give up right.

See ABDICATION.

He cannot abdicate for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses. Swift.

ABDICATION. † n. s. [abdicatio, Lat.]

1. The act of abdicating; resignation; quitting an office by one's own proper act before the usual or stated expiration.

Neither doth it appear how a prince's abdication can make any other sort of vacancy in the throne, than would be caused by his death; since he cannot abdicate for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses.

Swift on the Sentiments of a Ch. of Eng. Man.

2. The act of renouncing any thing.

The chief sign whereby he is to be discerned, is the abdication and contemning of bodily pleasures.

L. Addison's Wife of Mahomed, p. 81.

3. Deprivation; rejection.

Utter, final, irreversible abdication.

Hammond's Works, i. 217.

The first of them a mark of their not yet total abdication, their continuance in sonship whom God thus chastens here, that he may not condemn them with the world. Ibid, p. 215.

ABDICATIVE. adj. That which causes or implies an abdication. Dict.

ABDITIVE. adj. [from abdo, to hide.] That which has the power or quality of hiding. Dict.

ABDITORY. * n. s. [Low Lat. abditum.] A place to hide and preserve goods, plate, or money in. Cowel.

ABDOMEN. n. s. [Lat. from abdo, to hide.] A cavity commonly called the lower venter or belly: It contains the stomach, guts, liver, spleen, bladder, and is within lined with a membrane called the peritonæum. The lower part is called the hypogastrium; the foremost part is divided into the epigastrium, the right and left hypochondria, and the navel; 'tis bounded above by the cartilago ensiformis and the diaphragm, sideways by the short or lower ribs, and behind by the vertebrae of the loins, the bones of the coxendix, that of the pubes and os sacrum. It is covered with several muscles, from whose alternate relaxations and contractions in respiration, digestion is forwarded, and the due motion of all the parts therein contained, promoted, both for secretion and expulsion. Quincy.

The abdomen consists of parts containing and contained. Wicquias's Surgery.

ABDOMINAL. } adj. Relating to the abdomen.

ABDUCE. v. a. [Lat. abduco.] To draw to a different part; to withdraw one part from another. A word chiefly used in physick or science.

If we abduce the eye into either corner, the object will not duplicate; for, in that position, the axis of the cones remain in the same plane, as is demonstrated in the opticks, and delivered by Galen. Brown, Vulg. Err. iii. 20.

ABDUCTOR. adj. Muscles abducent, are those which serve to open or pull back divers parts of the body; their opposites being called adducent. Dict.

ABDUCTION. n. s. [abductio, Lat.]

1. The act of drawing apart, or withdrawing one part from another.

They [the muscles] can stir the limb in ward, outward, forward, backward; upward, downward; they can perform adduction, abduction; flexion, extension. Smith's Old Age, p. 62.

2. A particular form of argument.

3. Taking away; of, as in Cockeram's Dictionary, lending away.

The forcible abduction or stealing away of man, woman, or child, from their own country, and selling them into another, was capital by the Jewish law. Blackstone's Comm.

ABDUCTOR. n. s. [abductor, Lat.] The name given by Anatomists to the muscles, which serve to draw back the several members.

He supposed the constrictors of the eyelids must be strengthened in the supercilious; the abductors in drunkards, and contemplative men, who have the same steady and grave motion of the eye. Arbutnot and Pope, Mart. Scriblerus.

TO ABEAR. v. a. [Sax. abæpan.] To bear; to behave; to demean. See ABEANCE.

Thus did the gentle knight himself abeare

Amongst that rusticke rout in all his deeds,

That even they, thy which his rivals were,

Could not maligne him, but commend him needs. Spenser, F. Q. vi. ix. 45.

ABEANCE. n. s. [from abear.] Behaviour. The technical term, as Mr. Boucher has observed, for such behaviour as the law deems unexceptionable; in which sense Blackstone employs it.

The other species of recognizance with sureties is for the good abeance, or good behaviour. Blackstone's Comm. Formerly it was abearing, in the same sense.

Not to be released, till they formed sureties for their good abearing. Ld. Herbert, Hist. of Hen. VIII. p. 381.

ABECEDARIAN. n. s. [from the names of a, b, c, the three first letters of the alphabet, Lat. also, abecedarius.] He that teaches or learns the alphabet, or first rudiments of literature. This word is used, Dr. Johnson says, by Wood in his Athene Oxonienses, where, mentioning Farnaby the critick, he relates, that in some part of his life, he was reduced to follow the trade of an abecedarian by his misfortunes. 'But this word was in general use long before Wood's application of it to Farnaby. In Cockeram's Dictionary, an abecedarian is "one that teacheth the cross-row."

ABECEDARY. adj. See ABECEDARIAN.

1. Belonging to the alphabet.

2. Inscribed with the alphabet.

This is pretended from the sympathy of two needles touched with the loadstone, and placed in the centre of two abecedary circles, or rings of letters, disposed round about them, one friend keeping one, and another the other, and agreeing upon an hour wherein they will communicate. Brown, Vulg. Err. ii. 2.

ABED. adv. [from a, for at, and bed.]

1. In bed.

It was a shame for them to marr their complexions, yea and conditions too, with long lying abed: when, she was of their age, she would have made a handkerchief by that time o'day. Sidney, b. ii.

She has not been abed, but in her chapel

All night devoutly watch'd. Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. To bed. A vulgarism.

Her mother dream'd before she was deliver'd,

That she was brought abed with a buzzard. Beaum. and Fl. False One; iv. 3.

ABERRANCE. } n. s. [from aberro, Lat. to wander
ABERRANCY. } from the right way.] A deviation from the right way; an error; a mistake; a false opinion.

They do not only swarm with errors, but vices depending thereon. Thus they commonly affect no man any farther than he deserts his reason, or complies with their aberrancies. Brown, Vulg. Err. i. 3.

Could a man be composed to such an advantage of constitution, that it should not at all adulterate the images of his mind: yet this second nature would alter the crisis of his understanding, and render it as obnoxious to aberrances as now. Glauville, Sceptis Scientificis, c. 16.

ABERRANT. adj. [from aberrans, Lat.] Deviating, wandering from the right or known way. Dict.

ABERRATION. n. s. [from aberratio, Lat.] The act of deviating from the common or from the right track.

If it be a mistake, there is no heresy in such an harmless aberration; the probability of it will render it a lapse of easy pardon. Glauville, Sceptis Scientificis, c. 11.

We draw near to God, when, repenting us of our former aberrations from him, we renew our covenant with him. Bp. Hall, Rom. p. 90.

ABERRING. part. [from the verb aberr, of aberro, Lat.] Wandering, going astray. The verb aberr I have found no example.

Divers were out in their account, aberring several ways from the true and just compute, and calling that one year, which perhaps might be another. Brown, Vulg. Err. iv. 12.

TO ABERU'NCATE. v. a. [averuenco, Lat.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly. Dict.

TO ABET. v. a. [from betan, Sax. signifying, Dr. Johnson says, to enkindle or animate. So in old Fr. abetter means to incite or animate. The word may also be traced to the Goth. beita, having a similar meaning.] To push forward another, to support him in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help. It was once indifferent, but is almost always taken by modern writers, in an ill sense; as may be seen in ABETTER.

To abet signifieth in our common law, as much as to encourage or set on. Cowel.

Then shall I soon, quoth he, so God me grace,

Abet that virgin's tears disconsolate,

And shortly back return. Spenser, F. Q. i. 2. 64.

A widow who by solemn vows,

Contracted to me,

Combin'd with him to break her word,

And has abetted all

Mudras, P. iii. cant. 3.

Men lay to great and strong right opinions, and eagerness of abetting them, that they account that the injury necessary.

They abetted both parties in the civil war, and always furnished supplies to the weaker side, but there should be an end put to these fatal divisions.

Addison, Freeholder, No. 28.

ABETTER, n. s. [from the verb.] The act of abetting or assisting. Not now in use.

I am thine cine; the shame were unto me

As well as thee, if thou shouldst abet

Through mine abet that he thine honour shent.

Chaucer, Tr. et Criseid. 357.

Lo! favour, there thy meede unto thee take,
The meede of thy mischance and abet.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. iii. 11.

ABETMENT, n. s. The act of abetting.

When the principal reason of their excuse should cease, namely, these fresh stirrings so near them, which seemed to require their abetment, then they would give us more particular satisfaction.

Watson's Rem. p. 542.

ABETTER, or ABETTOR, n. s. He that abets; the supporter or encourager of another.

Whilst calumny has two such potent abettors, we are not to wonder at its growth, as long as men are malicious and deceiving, they will be traducers.

You shall be still plain Torridon with me,

The abettor, partner, (if you like the name)

The husband of a tyrant, but no king;

Thou deserve that title by your justice.

These considerations, though they may have no influence on the multitude, ought to sink in the minds of those who are their abettors, and who, if they escape punishment here, must know, that these several mischiefs will be one day laid to their charge.

Addison, Freeholder, No. 50.

ABEYANCE, n. s. [old Fr. abeyance, abbaiance,] in expectation; bayer, bay, attendre avec impressement, to look eagerly after some advantage; as, "bayer à l'argent;" so beance, "en beance," in expectation of. Dr. Johnson assents to the derivation of the word from aboyer, allatray, to bark at; which is not to be defended. Abeyance is expectation; though now only a forensick term.] This word, in Littleton, cap. Discontinuance, is thus used. The right of re-simple lieth in abeyance, when it is all only in the remembrance, intendment, and consideration of the law. The frank tenement of the glebe or the parsonage, is in no man during the time that the parsonage is void, but is in abeyance.

Coxe.

Sometimes the fee may be in abeyance, that is, as the word signifies, in expectation, remembrance, and contemplation of law; there being no person in case, in whose name rest and maintenance, though the law considers it as always presently existing, and ready to vest, whenever a proper owner appears.

Blackstone, Commentaries, i. 130.

TO ABGREGATE, * [Lat. abgrego.] To separate from the flock. The old dictionaries which sum-

Dr. Johnson with abgregation, exhibit also abgregate; and therefore this word is noticed.

ABGREGATION, n. s. [abgregatio, Lat.] A separation from the flock.

Dict.

TO ABHOR, n. s. [abhorreo, Lat.]

1. To hate with animosity; to detest to extremity; to loath; to abominate.

Whilst I was big in clamour, came a man,

Who having seen me in my wrother state,

Shunn'd my abhor'd society.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

That son, who on the quiet state of men

Such trouble brought, affecting to subdue

Rational liberty.

Milton, P. L. xii. 79.

The self-same thing they will abhor

One way, and long another for.

Hudibras, P. i. c. 1.

A church of England man abhors the humour of the age, in counting to bring scandals upon the clergy in general; which, besides the disgrace to the reformation, and to religion itself, cast an ignominy upon the kingdom.

Saunders, Ch. of Eng. Man.

2. To disdain; to neglect.

He has not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted.

Psalms xlii. 24.

When Thou lookest upon thee to deliver man, Thou didst not abhor the Virgin's womb.

Te Deum.

3 With from. A Latinism.

Many are at discord with all musick, and singing with art and curiosity, in sacred psalmody; from which neither David, nor the devoutest Jews of old, nor the holy Christians of former times, did abhor.

Hp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 119.

ABHORRENCE, n. s. [from abhor.]

ABHORRENCY, n. s. [from abhor.]

1. The act of abhorring; detestation.

It draws upon him the hatred and abhorrence of all men here; and subjects him to the wrath of God hereafter.

South, Serm.

2. The disposition to abhor; hatred.

Even a just and necessary defence does, by giving men acquaintance with war, take off somewhat from the abhorrence of it, and insensibly dispose them to hostilities.

The first tendency to any injustice that appears, must be suppressed with a show of wonder and abhorrency in the parents and governors.

Locke on Education, § 110.

3 With from.

He declares himself either to affect an universal tyranny over, or an abhorrency from, society with other men.

Barrow's Works, l. 287.

Her knowledge, her conjugal virtues, her abhorrency from the vanities of her sex,—are likewise celebrated by our author.

Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

ABHORRENT, adj. [from abhor.]

1. Struck with abhorrence; loathing.

For if the worlds

In worlds inclos'd could on his senses burst,

He would abhorrent turn.

Thomson, Summer, l. 310.

2. Contrary to; foreign; inconsistent with. It is used with the particles from or to, but more properly with from.

This I conceive to be an hypothesis, well worthy a rational belief; and yet is it so abhorrent from the vulgar, that they would as soon believe Anaxagoras, that snow is black, as him that should affirm it is not white.

Glauville, Scriptis Scient. c. 12.

Why then these foreign thoughts of state employments,

Abhorrent to your function and your breeding?

Poor droning trants of impractic'd cells,

Bred in the fellowship of bearded boys,

What wonder is it if you know not men?

Dryden.

ABHORRENTLY, * adv. In an abhorrent manner.

ABHORRER, n. s. [from abhor.] The person that abhors; a hater, detester.

The abhorers of solitude are not solitary; for God, and reason concur against it.

Donne's Devotions, p. 20.

in many cases, that time and calmer considerations, different customs, which (like the tide or flood) sweep over both manners and minds of men, do oft keenness of men's spirits against those things, where sometimes were great abhorers.

Hp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 134.

The lower clergy were called at, for disputing the power of the bishops, by the knowledge of abhorers of episcopacy, and abused for doing nothing in the prosecutions, by these very men who wanted to bind up their hands.

Saunders, Examiner, Nov. 21.

ABHORRING, n. s. [from abhor.] Dr. Johnson cites an instance of the word abhorring as a participial noun, which he defines, "The object of abhor-rence;" but considers it not to be the proper use of such a noun. The word, however, is an old English substantive, which Barret defines, "Abhorring of things; or loathing; desire or will to vomit: Nausea." Such is the use of the word in Donne. The second example belongs to Dr. Johnson's definition.

I find no decay in my strength; my provisions are not cut off; I find no abhorring in my appetite.

Donne's Devotions, p. 233.

"They shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be abhorring unto all flesh."

Isaiah, lxxvi. 44.

To ABIDE. † v. n. I bode or abid. [Goth. beidan, to wait, Sax. abidan. Su. bula, Goth. also gabanan, to dwell.]

1. To dwell in a place; not remove; to stay.

Thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, if I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. Now therefore I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad, a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren.

Gen. xlv. 32, 33.

2. To dwell.

The Marquis Dorset, as I hear, is fled

To Richmond, in the parts where he abides. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Those who apply themselves to learning, are forced to acknowledge one God, incorruptible and unbegotten; who is the only true being, and abides for ever above the highest heavens, from whence he beholds all the things that are done in heaven and earth. Stillingfleet, Def. of Diss. on Rom. Idolat.

3. To remain; not cease or fail; to be immovable.

They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever.

Psal. cxxv. 1.

4. To continue in the same state.

The fear of the Lord tendeth to life; and he that hath it shall abide satisfied.

Prov. xix. 23.

There can be no study without time; and the mind must abide and dwell upon things, or be always a stranger to the inside of them.

South.

5. To endure without offence, anger, or contradiction.

Who can abide, that against their own doctors, six whole books should by their fatherhoods be imperiously obtruded upon God and his church?

Bp. Hall.

6. It is used with the particle with before a person, and at or in before a place.

It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: Abide with me.

Gen. xxix. 19.

For thy servant vowed a vow, while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, if the Lord shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then I will serve the Lord.

2 Sam. xv. 8.

7. It is used with by before a thing; as, to abide by his testimony; to abide by his own skill; that is, to rely upon them; to abide by an opinion; to maintain it; to abide by a man, is also, to defend or support him. But these forms are something low.

To ABIDE. † v. a. [Of the participle abid, Dr. Johnson says, he found only the example Th. He brings from Woodward; and should ad determine that abide in the active sense is a passive participle, or compounded preterite. abidden, however, is found in our dictionaries. In the seventeenth century; and is translated into the French attendu, demeuré, and duré. In Chaucer and Gower the preterite abit is found; and Chaucer also uses abiden and abidden. Woodward's usage of abid has been preceded in the translation of part of the Aeneid by Phayer; and by Turberville; poets of the sixteenth century; and Hale writes, "a law that hath abidden the test of time."]

1. To wait for, expect, attend, wait upon, await; used of things prepared for persons, as well as of persons expecting things.

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed,

Where many skilful leeches him abide,

To save his hurts.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. 17.

While lions war, and battle for their deus,

Poor harmless lamb abide their enmity. Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. 3.

Bonds and afflictions abide me.

Acts, xx. 23.

2. To bear or support the consequences of a thing.

Ah me! they little know

How dearly I abide that boast so vain.

Milton, P. L.

3. To bear or support, without being conquered or destroyed.

But the Lord he is the true God, he is the living God, and an everlasting king: At his wrath the earth shall tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation.

Jer. x. 10.

It must be allowed a fair presumption in favour of the truth of my doctrines, that they have abid a very rigorous test now for above thirty years, and more strictly they are look'd into, the more they are confirmed.

Woodward, Letter i.

4. To bear without aversion: in which sense it is commonly used with a negative.

Thou canst not abide Tiridates; this is but love of thyself.

Sidney, b. ii.

Thy vile race,

Though thou didst learn, had that in't, which good natures

Could not abide to be with; therefore wast thou

Deservedly confin'd into this rock.

Shakespeare, Tempest.

5. To bear or suffer.

Girt with circumcious tides

He still calamitous constraint abides.

Pope, Od. ii. iv. 750.

ABIDERS; † n. s. [from abide.] The person that abides or dwells in a place; perhaps that lives or endures. A word little in use.

He said, they [soldiers] were the masters of war, and ornaments of peace, speedy goers, and strong abiders, triumphers both in camps and courts.

Sidney, Def. of Poets.

ABIDING; † n. s. [from abide.]

1. Continuance; stay; fixed state.

We are strangers before thee and sojourners, as were all our fathers: our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding.

1 Chron. xxix. 15.

The air in that region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have any.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

2. For abiding it signified, remaining behind. "Abiding, or staying b. a. d. remansio, commoratio."

exti

Barret's Alvearie.

ABJECT; † adj. [abjectus, Lat. thrown away as of no value.]

Johnson

and Fm; worthless; base; groveling; spoken of persons, or their qualities.

Rebellion

Came like itself in base and abject routs,

Led on by bloody youth goaded with rage,

And countenanced by boys and beggary. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

I was at first as other beasts that graze

The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low.

Milton, P. L. ix. 571.

- Honest men, who tell their overrights what they expect from them, and what obedience they shall be always ready to pay them, are not upon an equal foot with base and abject flatterers.

Addison, Whig Examiner.

- Spoken also of language, mean or low.

What the best critics have observed of diction in general, that its excellence consists in being perspicuous, and not abject, is peculiarly applicable to the style of an authorised biblical version.

Bp. Newcome on the Transl. of the Bible, p. 300.

3. Being of no hope or regard; used of condition.

The rarer thy example stands,
By how much from the top of wond'rous glory,
Strongest of mortal men,
To lowest pitch of abject fortune thou art fall'n.

Milton, Samson Agonistes.

We see man and woman in the highest innocence and perfection, and in the most abject state of guilt and infirmity.

Adison, Spectator, No. 273.

4. Mean and despicable; used of actions.

The rapine is so abject and profane,
They not from trifles, nor from gods refrain. Drayden, Juv. viii.
To what base ends, and by what abject ways
Are mortals urg'd through sacred lust of praise? *

Pope, Essay on Criticism.

A'BJECT.† n. s. A man without hope; a man whose miseries are irretrievable; one of the lowest condition.

Yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me.

Psaln xxxv. 15.

They never became any lords, but persecuted abjects, as many are now adaves.

Bale, Course at the Romish Forge, fol. 37. b.

I deem'd it better so to die,

Than at my foemen's feet an abject lie. Mir. for Mag. p. 20.

TO ABJECT.† v. a. [Lat. abjicio.] Dr. Johnson says only that it means "to throw away," and is a word rarely used; but gives no example. The word, on the contrary, is by no means of rare occurrence; but is used, with good effect, by some of our best writers.

1. To throw or cast away.

They set forth suddenly an heavy and sorrowful countenance, as if they were abjected and brought unto extreme desperation.

Sir T. Elmot, Gor. fol. 138. b.

To think without faith we may enjoy the eating and drinking thereof, [the Lord's Supper,] or that that is the fruition of it, is but to dream a gross carnal feeding, basely abjecting and binding ourselves to the elements and creatures.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 293.

What is it, that can make this gallant so to stoop and to abject himself so basely unto a stock, and a stone, as to creep and kneel unto them!

Fotherby, Athromastix, p. 48.

2. To throw or cast down.

The damsell straight went, as she was directed,
Unto the rocke; and there, upon the soyle
Having herselfe in wretched wize abjected,
Can weepe and wayle.

Spenser, F. Q. v. ix. 9.

ABJECTEDNESS. n. s. [from abject.] The state of an abject.

Our Saviour would love at no less rate than death; and from the supereminent height of glory, joyed and abused himself to the sufferance of the extremest indignities, and sunk himself to the bottom of abjectedness, to exalt our condition to the contrary extreme.

Callice Works.

ABJECTION.† n. s. [from abject.]

1 gen.

1. Meanness of mind; want of spirit; servility; baseness.

That this should be termed baseness, abjection of mind, or servility, is it credible?

Hooker, b. v. § 47.

The just medium lies betwixt pride and the abjection, the two extremes.

L'Ettrange.

2. The state of being cast away, or lost; a powerful use of the word, which has hitherto been overlooked.

I have exiled my selfe for ever from mine own native contrie, kyndred, friends, acquaintance, (which are the great delights of this life,) and am wel contented for Jesus Christes sake, and for the comforte of my brethren there, to suffre povertie, penury, abjection, reproof.

Bale on the Revel. Pref. A. vi. b.

I have been informed, that Amninus did hold, as the Lutherans in Germany do, not only intercision for a time, but also abscission, and abjection too, for ever.

Mountagu's Appeal to Cæsar, p. 16.

2. The state of being cast down.

Abjection from heaven. Bp. Taylor, Sermon. (1651.) p. 243.

4. The act of humbling; humiliation.

The nature of a right and religious fast consists in an humble demission and abjection of ourselves before Almighty God.

Mede, Disc. xli.

A'BJECTLY.† adv. [from abject.] In an abject manner, meanly, basely, servilely, contemptibly.

Let him, that thinks of me so abjectly, know, that this gold must coin a stratagem.

Tit. Andron. ii. 3.

They formerly lawnd abjectly upon them.

Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time, b. 2.

A'BJECTNESS. n. s. [from abject.] Abjection, servility, meanness.

Servility and abjectness of humour is implicitly involved in the charge of lying.

Governant of the Tongue, § 8.

By humility I mean not the abjectness of a base mind; but a prudent care not to over-value ourselves upon any actant.

Green, Cosmology & Sacra, ii. 7.

ABILIMENT.* n. s. Formerly the spelling of habilitment, in its various senses. See HABILIMENT. It is also used for ability.

Never liv'd gentleman of greater merit,

Hope, or abiliment to steer a kingdom. Ford's Broken Heart.

ABILITY. n. s. [habilité, Fr.]

1. The power to do any thing, whether depending upon skill, or riches, or strength, or any other quality.

Of singing thou hast got the reputation,

Good Thyrsis, mine I yield to thy ability;

My heart doth seek another estimation.

Sidney, b. i.

If aught in my ability may serve,

To lighten what thou suffer'st, and appease

Thy mind with what amends as in my power.

Milton, S. 4.

They gave after their ability unto the treasure

Teren. b. 1. 9.

If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ.

1 Pet. iv. 11.

Wherever we find our abilities too weak for the performance,

He assures us of the assistance of his holy spirit. Reverend, Sermon.

2. Capacity of mind; force of understanding; mental power.

Children in whom there was no blunish, but well-favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace.

Dan. i. 4.

3. When it has the plural number, abilities, it frequently signifies the faculties or powers of the mind, and sometimes the force of understanding given by nature, as distinguished from acquired qualifications.

Whether it may be thought necessary, that in certain tracts of country, like what we call parishes, there should be one man, at least, of abilities to read and write?

Swift.

ABINTESTATE. adj. [of ab, from, and intestatus, Lat.]

A term of law, implying him that inherits from a man, who, though he had the power to make a will, Testet did not make it.

ABJURATION.* n. s. [from abjur.] The act of abjuring; the oath taken for that end.

Until Henry VIII. his time, if a man, having committed felony, could go into a church or church-yard, before he were apprehended, he might not be taken from thence to the usual trial of law, but confessing his fault to the justices, or to the coroner, gave his oath to forsake the realm for ever, which was called abjuration.

There are some abjurations still in force among us here in England; as by the statute of the 25th of king Charles II. all persons that are admitted into any office, civil or military, must take the test; which is an abjuration of some doctrines of the Church of Rome.

There is likewise another oath of abjuration, which laymen and clergymen are both obliged to take; and that is, to abjure the Pretender. Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

TO ABJU'RE. v. a. [abjuro, Lat.]

1. To cast off upon oath, to swear not to do or not to have something.

Either to die the death, or to abjure

For ever the society of man. Shakspeare, Mid. N. Dream.

No man, therefore, that hath not abjured his reason, and sworn allegiance to a preconceived fantastical hypothesis, can undertake the defence of such a supposition. Hale.

2. To retract, recant, or abnegate a position upon oath.

I put myself to thy direction, and

Unspeak mine own detraction; here abjure

The faults and blames I laid upon myself. Shakspeare, Macb.

3. To banish. From the custom of abjuring the realm by felons who had taken sanctuary.

By the old law the person abjured must banish himself into a foreign, yet a Christian, country.

Sadler, Rights of the Kingdom, p. 173.

Whereby he hop'd the queen to have abjur'd.

Drayton, Barons' Wars, iv.

TO ABJU'RE. v. n. To abjure the realm.

One Thomas Harding of Buckinghamshire, an ancient man, who had abjured in the year 1506, was now observed to go often into woods, and was seen sometimes reading.

Burnet, Hist. Ref. i. 166.

The case of Sanctuary is very considerable, being, of all, the most forlorn; for, being denied the privilege of Sanctuary, it could not abjure. For this was appendant to Sanctuary; whither the offended did first fly, and then abjure.

Sadler, Rights of the Kingdom, p. 173.

ABJU'REMENT. n. s. [from abjuro.] Renunciation.

Such sins as the e are venial in youth, especially if expiated with timely abjuration. John Hall, Pref. to his Poems.

ABJURER. n. s. [from abjuro.] He who abjures.

TO ABLAC'TATE. v. a. [Lat. ablactare.] To wean from the breast. This word is given by Dr.

Johnson, without reference to any authority. But, in our old dictionaries, we find ablactat, i. e. weaned.

ABLACTATION. n. s. One of the methods of grafting; and according to the signification of the word, as it were a weaning of a cyon by degrees from its mother stock, not cutting it off wholly from the stock, till it is firmly united to that on which it is grafted.

ABLAQUEATION. n. s. [ablaqueatio, Lat.] The act or practice of opening the ground about the roots of trees, to let the air and water operate upon them.

Trench the ground, and make it ready for the spring: Prepare also soil, and use it where you have occasion: Dig borders. Uncover as yet roots of trees, where ablaqueation is requisite.

Evelyn's Kite, iv.

The tenure in chief is the very root that doth mainsilver stem, that by many rich and fruitful branches itself: so if it be suffered to starve, by want of and other good husbandry, this yearly fruit will decrease.

Bacon's W. y. Alienations.

ABLATION. n. s. [ablatio, Lat.] The act of taking away.

AB'BLATIVE. adj. [ablative, Lat.]

1. That which takes away.
2. The sixth case of the Latin nouns; the case which among other significations, includes the person from whom something is taken away. A term of grammar.

A'BLE. † adj. [Sax. abal, strength, perhaps from the Su. Goth. baella, to avail; Fr. adj. abel, Bas Bret. abyl. Dr. Johnson merely mentions the Fr. habile, and the Lat. habilis.]

1. Having strong faculties, or great strength or knowledge, riches, or any other power of mind, body, or fortune.

Henry VII. was not afraid of an able man, as Lewis the Eleventh was. But, contrariwise, he was served by the ablest men that were to be found; without which his affairs could not have prospered as they did. Bacon's Henry VII.

Such gambol faculties he hath, that shew a weak mind and an able body, for the which the prince admits him.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV. p. ii.

2. Having power sufficient; enabled.

All mankind acknowledge themselves able and sufficient to do many things, which actually they never do. South's Sermons.

Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God, which he hath given thee. Deut. xvi. 17.

3. Before a verb, with the particle to, it signifies generally having the power.

Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy?

Prov. xxvii. 4.

4. With for it is not often nor very properly used.

There have been some inventions also, which have been able for the utterance of articulate sounds, as the speaking of certain words.

Wilkins, Mathemat. Magic.

5. Fit; proper.

A manly man, to be an abbot able.

Chaucer, Prologue.

TO A'BLE. † v. a. To make able; to enable, which

Dr. Johnson says, is the word commonly used.

But the example which he has given of able, from Shakspeare, seems to present the word under another signification; that of uphold. I will therefore illustrate its first sense.

Whom shall we chon e

As the most apt and abled instrument

To minister it to him? B. Jon. , Sejanus, ii. 1.

The plant, thus abled, to itself did force

A place where no place was. Deane's Poems, p. 298.

One of those small bodies, fitted so,

This soul inform'd; and abled it to row

Itself with finny oars. Hud. p. 351.

Plate sin with gold,

And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;

Arm it with rage, a pigmy's straw do pierce it.

None does offend, none, I say none; I'll able 'em;

Take that of me, my friend. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

ABLE-BODIED. adj. Strong of body.

It lies in the power of every fine woman, to secure at least half a dozen abled men to his majesty's service.

Adams, Freeholder, No. 4.

A'BLOCATION. n. s. [from ablocare.] A letting out to hire.

To ABLU'DE. v. n. [abludo, Lat.] To be unlike; to differ.

Neither doth it much ablude from this, that our English divines at D. call the decree of God, whereby he hath appointed in and by Christ to save those that repent, believe, and persevere, decretum annunciatum salutis omnibus, etc.

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 376.

A'BLUENT. adj. [abluens, Lat. from abluo, to wash away.]

1. That which washes clean.
2. That which has the power of cleansing. Dict.

ABLU'TION. n. s. [ablutio, Lat.]

1. The act of cleansing, or washing clean.
There is a natural analogy between the ablution of the body and the purification of the soul; between eating the holy bread and drinking the sacred chalice, and a participation of the body and blood of Christ. Bp. Taylor, Worlthy Communicant.
2. The water used in washing.
Wash'd by th' briny wave, the pious train
Are cleans'd, and I cast th' ablutions in the main. Pope, Iliad.

3. The rinsing of chymical preparations in water, to dissolve and wash away any acrimonious particles.
4. The cup given, without consecration, to the laity in the popish churches.

A'BLV. adv. [from able.] With ability. This is an old English adverb, found in Sherwood, and by him translated fortement, habilement, &c. Yet it has escaped the notice of modern lexicographers, not excepting Dr. Ash. "The cause has been ably managed. The work is ably written."

To A'BNEGATE. v. a. [from abnego, Lat.] To deny.

They have abnegated the idea of independent rights of the people. De Lolme, Const. Eng.

To recant or abnegate a position on oath.

Johnson, in F. abnegare.

ABNEGATION. n. s. [abnegatio, Lat. denial, from abnego, to deny.] Denial, renunciation.

The abnegation or renouncing of all his own holds and interests, and trusts of all that man is most apt to depend upon, that he may the more expeditely follow Christ. Hammond.

A'BNEGATOR. n. s. [from abnego, Lat.] One who denies, renounces, or opposes any thing.

A serpentine generation wholly made of fraud, policies, and practices; lovers of the world, and haters of truth and godliness; fighters against the light, protectors of darkness, persecutors of marriage, and patrons of brothels; abnegators and dispensers against the laws of God. Sir E. Sandys, State of Rel.

ABNODATION. n. s. [abnodatio, Lat.] The act of cutting away knots from trees; a term of gardening.

Dict.

ABNORMITY. v. n. [Barb. Lat. abnormitas, i. e. enormitas. V. Du Cange.] Irregularity; deformity; departure from accustomed form. Dict.

signified a house; in which sense, to go aboard, is to take up residence in a ship.]

1. In a ship.

He loudly call'd to such as were aboard,
The little bark unto the shore to draw,
And him to ferry over that deep ford. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 6.
He might land them, if it pleased him, or otherwise keep them aboard. Raleigh, Essays.

2. Into a ship.

When morning rose, I sent my mates to bring Supplies of water from a neighbouring spring;
Whilst I the motions of the winds explored;
Then summon'd in my crew, and went aboard.
Addison, Ovid's Metam. b. iii.

ABO'ARD. prep. On board; in; with.

Thou hast nothing in the world to lose
Aboard thee, but one piece of beef.
Beaumont and Fl. Hon. Man's Fortune, A. & S. act.
Lucius, Oh!

Divine's patroness, and midwife, gentle
To those that cry by night, convey thy deity
Aboard our dancing boat! Pericles, iii. i.

ABO'DANCE. n. s. [from to abode.] An omen.

The prophet no doubt did write and intend Cherez, not Cheren; for it had been verbum valde curat on, an ill abodance, if the first of these five Egyptian cities, which were to speak the language of Canaan, should be called the city of destruction. Dr. Jackson's Works, ii. 635.

ABO'DE. v. n. [Tent. bode or bed, a house; Welsh, bod.] See To ABIDE.

1. Habitation; dwelling; place of residence.

But I know thy abode, and thy going out, and thy coming in. 2 Kings, xix. 27.

Others may use the ocean as their road,
Only the English make it their abode;
Whose ready sails with every wind can fly.
And make a covenant with th' inconstant sky. Waller

2. Stay; continuance in a place.

Sweet friends, your patience for my long abode:
Not I, but my affairs, have made you wait.

Shakespeare, Mer. of Ven.

Making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judged the business but of ten months. Dryden, Dedical. to Æneid.

The woodcocks early visit, and abode
Of long continuance in our temperate clime,
Foretell a liberal harvest. Philips.

3. To make abode. To dwell, to reside, to inhabit.

Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode,
Thence full of fate returns, and of the god. Dryden, Æn. 6.

4. Stop; delay.

The knight _____
Upon his courser sett the lovely lode,
And with her fled away without abode.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. viii. 19.

And soon without abode the troop went forth.

Tasso's Tasso, vi. 22.

To ABO'DE. v. a. [See BODE.] To foretoken or foreshow; to be a prognostick, to be ominous. It is taken, with its derivatives, in the sense either of good or ill.

Every man

After the hideous storm that follow'd, was
A thing inspir'd; and, not consulting, broke
Into a general prophecy that this tempest,
Dashing the garment of this peace, aboded
The sudden breach of it. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

To ABO'DE. v. n. To be an omen.

This abode's sadly. Decay of Christ. Piety, p. 149.

ABO'DEMENT. n. s. [from to abode.] A secret anticipation of something future; an impression upon the mind of some event to come; prognostication; omen.

I like not this.

For many men that stumble at the threshold,
Are well foretold that danger lurks within.—
—Tush! man, abodements must not now affright us.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. iii.

My lord bishop took the freedom to ask him, [the duke of Buckingham] Whether he had never any secret abodement in his mind? No, replied the duke; but I think some adventure may kill me as well as another man. Wotton's Rem. p. 235.

ABO'DING.* n. s. [from to abode.] Presentiment; prognostication.

What strange ominous abodings and fears do many times on a sudden seize upon men, of certain approaching evils, whereof at present there is no visible appearance!

Bp. Bull's Works, ii. 489.

ABOLE'TE.* adj. [Lat. abolitus.] Old; out of use. Dict.

To ABO'LISH. v. a. [abdoleo, Latin.]

1. To annul; to make void. Applied to laws or institutions.

For us to abolish what he hath established, were presumption most intolerable. Hooker, b. iii. § 10.

On the parliament's part it was proposed, that all the bishops, deans, and chapters, might be immediately taken away, and abolished. Clarendon, b. viii.

2. To put an end to; to destroy.

The long continued wars between the English and the Scots, had then raised invincible jealousies and hate, which long continued peace hath since abolished. Sir John Hayward.

That shall Perocles well requite, I wot,
And, with thy blood, abolish so reprobous blot.

Spenser, F. Q.

More destroyed than they,
We should be quite abolished, and expire. Milton, P. L.

Or wilt thou thyself
Abolish thy creation, and unmake
For him, what for thy glory thou hast made?

Milton, P. L. iii. 163.

Nor could Vulcanian flame
The stench abolish or the savour tame. Dryden, Virg. Geo. iii.

Fermented spirits contract, harden, and consolidate many fibres together, abolishing many canals; especially where the fibres are the tenderest, as in the brain. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ABO'LISHABLE.† adj. [from abolish.] That which may be abolished. Dr. Johnson gives this adjective without reference to any authority; but it is found in our old dictionaries, where Cotgrave calls it abolishable, extinguishable.

ABO'LISHER. n. s. [from abolish.] He that abolishes.

ABO'LISHMENT.† n. s. [Fr. abolissement.] The act of abolishing.

The plain and direct way had been to prove, that all such ceremonies, as they require to be abolished, are retained by us with the hurt of the church, or with less benefit than the abolishment of them would bring. Hooker, b. iv.

He should think the abolishment of episcopacy among us, would prove a mighty scandal and corruption to our faith, and manifestly dangerous to our monarchy.

Swift, Ch. of Eng. Man.

ABOLI'TION.† n. s. [Fr. abolition.] The act of abolishing. This is now more frequently used than abolishment. And Dr. Johnson might have added, that it is a very old English word; as the example, which I bring from Abp. Cranmer, shews.

The said natures and substances remaining with all their natural properties and conditions, without transubstantiation, abolition, or confusion of any of the two natures.

Cranmer, Answ. to Gardiner, p. 353.

From the total abolition of the popular power, may be dated the ruin of Rome: for had the reducing hereof to its ancient condition, proposed by Agrippa, been accepted instead of Mæcenæ's model, that state might have continued unto this day.

Grew, Cosmol. Sacra, iii. 4.

An apoplexy is a sudden abolition of all the senses, and of all voluntary motion, by the stoppage of the flux and reflux of the animal spirits through the nerves destined for those motions. Arbuthnot on Diet.

ABO'MINABLE. adj. [abominabilis, Lat.]

1. Hateful, detestable; to be loathed.*

This infernal pit

Abominable, accurs'd, the house of woe. Milton.

The queen and ministry might easily redress this abominable grievance, by endeavouring to choose men of virtuous principles. Swift, Proj. for the Advan. of Religion.

2. Unclean.

The soul that shall touch any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. Leviticus, vii. 21.

3. In low and ludicrous language, it is a word of loose and indeterminate censure.

They say you are a melancholy fellow.—I am so; I do love it better than laughing.—Those that are in extremity of either, are abominable fellows; and betray themselves to every modern censure, worse than drunkards. Shakespeare, As you like it.

ABO'MINABLENESS. n. s. [from abominable.] The quality of being abominable; hatefulnes; odiousness.

Till we have proved, in its proper place, the eternal and essential difference between virtue and vice, we must forbear to urge atheists with the corruption and abominableness of their principles. Bentley's Sermons.

ABO'MINABLY.† adv. [from abominable.] Excessively; extremely; exceedingly; in an ill sense, as Dr. Johnson says; but he adds, that it is a word of low or familiar language, and not often seriously used. Yet it exists in our translation of the Bible, and in one of the best writers of our language, (as in many others which I could cite,) and is in neither a low or familiar word.

Ahab did very abominably in following idols. 1 Kings, xxi. 26.

Directly to intend or endeavour that which may work his own death, is abominably wicked, and no less than the worst murder. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. 2. c. 10.

I have observed great abuses and disorders in your family; your servants are mutinous and quarrelsome, and cheat you most abominably. Arbuthnot.

To ABO'MINATE. v. a. [abominor, Lat.] To abhor, detest, hate utterly.

• Pride goes hated, cursed, and abominated by all. Hammond.

We are not guilty of your injuries,

No way consent to them; but do abhor,

Abominate, and loath this cruelty. Southern's Oroonoko.

He professed both to abominate and despise all mystery, refinement, and intrigue, either in a prince or a minister. Swift.

ABOMINA'TION. n. s.

1. Hatred; detestation.

To assist king Charles by English or Dutch forces, would render him odious to his new subjects, who have nothing in so great abomination, as those whom they hold for heretics. Swift.

2. The object of hatred.

Every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians.

Genesis, xli. 34.

3. Pollution; defilement.

And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie.

Rev. xxi. 27.

4. Wickedness; hateful or shameful vice.

The adulterous Antony, most large

In his abominations, turns you off,

And gives his potent regiment to a trull,

That noses it against us.

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

5. The cause of pollution.

And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption, which Solomon the king of Israel, had builded for Ashtoreth the abomination of the Zidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom, the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king defile. 2 Kings, xxiii. 13.

ABO'RID.* n. s. [Fr. abord.] Address; salutation; approach.

He [a blind man] would at the first aboard of a stranger, as soon as he spoke to him, frame a right apprehension of his stature, bulke, and manner of making.

Sir K. Digby's Treat. of Bodies, p. 253.

Your aboard, I must tell you, was too cold and unform.

Ld. Chesterfield.

To ABO'RD.* v. a. [Fr. aborder.] To approach; to come near to. The word is in our old dictionaries.

Along the coasts held by the Portingnize;

Ev'n to the verge of gold, aboarding Spain,

Tr. of Soliman and Perseda.

ABORI'GINAL.* adj. [from aborigines.] Primitive; pristine.

Their Language [the Bissayan] is accounted aboriginal, and unmixed with either Latin, French, or Spanish.

Swinburne's Trav. through Spain, Let. 44.

The aboriginal Britons did not suffer their invaders to advance with any degree of precipitation,

Warton's Hist. of Kiddington, p. 65.

ABORI'GINES.† n. s. [Lat.] The earliest inhabitants of a country; those of whom no original is to be traced: as, the Welsh in Britain.

The antiquities of the Gentiles made the first inhabitants of most countries as produced out of the soil, calling them Aborigines, &c.

Selden on Drayton, viii.

That conceit of deriving the whole race of men from the aborigines of Attica, was entertained but by a few.

Bentley, Serm. 2.

ABO'RSEMENT.* n. s. Abortion. Yet Dr. Ash has asserted that the word wants authority. It certainly is not worthy to be in use.

The endeavour of these artists is not to force an aborsement, but to bring forward a natural birth.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. 2. C. 3.

To ABOR'T.† v. n. [aborto, Lat.] To bring forth before the time; to miscarry.

Queen Katherine — grieving at the prosperity and fruitfulness of queen Anne, (now with child again, whereof she yet aborted) fell into her last sickness at Kimbolton.

Ld. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 403.

It [the parliament] is aborted before it was born, and nullified after it had a being. Sir H. Wotton to Sir E. Bacon, 1644.

ABO'RT.* n. s. [from the verb.] An abortion.

Though it be against Hippocrates' oath, some of them [knaveish physicians] will — make an abort, if need be.

Burton, Anat. of Mkt. p. 504.

Julia, a little before, dying of an abort in childbed.

Wotton's Rem. p. 241.

ABO'RTION. n. s. [abortio, Lat.]

1. The act of bringing forth untimely.

These then need cause no abortion.

Sandys.

2. The produce of an untimely birth.

His wife miscarried; but, as the abortion proved only a female fetus, he comforted himself. Arbutnot and Pope, Mart. Scrib.

Behold my arm thus blasted, dry and wither'd,

Shrunk like a foul abortion, and decay'd,

Like some untimely product of the seasons.

Rowe.

ABO'RTIVE. n. s. That which is born before the due time. Perhaps anciently any thing irregularly produced.

No common wind, no custom'd event,
But they will pluck away its nat'ral causes,
And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs,

Abortives, and presages, tongues of heav'n Plainly denouncing vengeance upon John. Shakspeare, K. John.

Take the fine skin of an abortive, and, with starch thin laid on, prepare your ground or tablet.

Peacham on Drawing.

Many are preserved, and do signal service to their country, who, without a provision, might have perished as abortives, or have come to an untimely end, and perhaps have brought, upon their guilty parents, the like destruction.

Addison, Guardian, No. 106.

ABO'RTIVE. adj. [abortivus, Lat.]

1. That which is brought forth before the due time of birth.

If ever he have child, abortive be it,

Prodigious, and untimely brought to light.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

All th' unaccomplish'd works of nature's hand,

Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mix'd,

Dissolved on earth, fleet hither.

Milton, P. L. iii. 456.

Nor will his fruit expect

The autumnal season, but, in summer's pride

When other orchards smile, abortive fail.

Philips.

2. Figuratively, that which fails for want of time.

How often hast thou waited at my cup.

Remember it, and let it make thee crest-fall'n;

Ay, and allay this thy abortive pride. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. ii.

3. That which brings forth nothing.

The void profound

Of unessential night receives him next,

Wide-gaping! and with utter loss of being

Threatens him, plung'd in that abortive gulf.

Milton, P. L. ii. 451.

4. That which fails or miscarries, from whatever cause.

This is less proper.

Many politick conceptions, so elaborately formed and wrought, and grown at length ripe for delivery, do yet, in the issue, miscarry and prove abortive.

South, Serm.

ABO'RTIVELY.† adv. [from abortive.] Born without the due time; immaturely; untimely.

If abortively poor man must die,

Nor reach what reach he might, why die in dread?

Young, Night Th. 7.

ABO'RTIVENESS. n. s. [from abortive.] The state of abortion.

ABO'RTMENT. n. s. [from abort.] The thing brought forth out of time; an untimely birth.

Concealed treasures, now lost to mankind, shall be brought into use by the industry of converted penitents, whose wretched carcasses the impartial laws dedicate, as untimely feasts, to the worms of the earth, in whose womb those deserted mineral riches must ever lie buried as lost abortments, unless those be made the active midwives to deliver them.

Bacon, Phys. Remains

ABO'VE.† prep. [Goth. a-ufan, Sax. on ufan, abuse, abufan, North of England, aboon.]

1. To a higher place; in a higher place.

So when with crackling flames a candleon fries.

The bubbling waters from the bottom rise;

Above the brims they force their fiery way;

Black vapours climb aloft, and cloud the day.

Dryden, Æneid vii. 645.

2. More in quantity or number.

Every one that passeth among them, that are unnumbered from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord.

Exodus, xxx. 14.

3. In a superiour degree, or, to a superiour degree of rank, power, or excellence.

The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens.

Psalms cxlii. 4.

The publick power of all societies is above every soul contained in the same societies.

Hooker, b. i.

There is no riches above a sound body, and no joy above the joy of the heart.

Ecclesiasticus, xxx. 16.

To her

Thou didst resign thy manhood, and the place
Wherein God set thee above her, made of thee,

And for thee: whose perfection far excell'd

Her's in all real dignity.

Milton, P. L. x. 147.

Latona sees her shine above the rest,

And feeds with secret joy her silent breast. Dryden, Æneid.

4. In a state of being superiour to; unattainable by.
It is an old and true distinction, that things may be above our reason, without being contrary to it. Of this kind are the power, the nature, and the universal presence of God, with innumerable other points. Swift.

5. Beyond; more than.
We were pressed out of measure, above strength; insomuch that we despaired even of life. 2 Cor. i. 8.
In having thoughts unconfused, and being able to distinguish one thing from another, where there is but the least difference, consists the exactness of judgment and clearness of reason, which is in one man above another. Locke.
The inhabitants of Tirol have many privileges above those of the other hereditary countries of the emperor. Addison.

6. Too proud for; too high for. A phrase chiefly used in familiar expression.
Kings and princes, in the earlier ages of the world, laboured in arts and occupations, and were above nothing that tended to profuse the conveniences of life. Pope, Odys. Notes.

ABOVE. † adv.

1. Over-head: in a higher place.
To men standing below, men standing aloft seem much lessened to those above, men standing below, seem not so much lessened. Huon.
When he established the clouds above; when he strengthened the fountains of the deep; when he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth: then I was by him, as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him. Proverbs, viii. 23.
Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. James, i. 17.
The Trojans from above their foes beheld;
And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd. Dryden, Æn.

2. In the regions of heaven.
Your praise the birds shall chant in every grove,
And winds shall waft it to the powers above. Pope, Past.

3. Before. [See ABOVE-CITED.]
I said above, that these two machines of the balance, and the dira, were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without them. Dryden, Ded. to the Æneid.

4. Chief in rank or power.
The Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath. Deut. xxviii. 13.

ABOVE ALL. In the first place; chiefly.
I had also studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves somewhat to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but above all, the elegance of his expression, and the harmony of his numbers. Dryden, Dedication to the Æneid.

ABOVE-BOARD.

1. In open sight; without artifice or trick. A figurative expression, borrowed from gamblers, who, when they put their hands under the table, are changing their cards. It is used only in familiar language.

It is the part also of an honest man to deal above-board, and without tricks. L'Estrange.

2. Without disguise or concealment.
Though there have not been wanting such heretofore, as have practised these unworthy arts, for as much as there have been villains in all places, and all ages, yet now-a-days they are owned above-board. South, Sermons.

ABOVE-CITED. Cited before. A figurative expression, taken from the ancient manner of writing books on scrolls; where whatever is cited or mentioned before in the same page, must be above.
It appears from the authority above-cited, that this is a fact confessed by heathens themselves. Addison on the Chr. Rel.

ABOVE-GROUND. † An expression used to signify alive; not in the grave.

ABOVE-MENTIONED. See ABOVE-CITED.
I do not remember, that Homer any-where falls into the fault above-mentioned, which were indeed the false refinements of latter ages. Addison, Spectator No. 279.

To ABOVE-UND. v. n. [abundo, Lat. abonder, French.]
1. To have in great plenty; to be copiously stored.
It is used sometimes with the particle in, and sometimes the particle with.

The king-becoming graces,
I have no relish of them, but abound
In the division of each several crime,
Acting it many ways. Shakespeare, Macbeth.
Corn, wine, and oil, are wanting to this ground,
In which our countries fruitfully abound. Dryden, Ind. Emp.
A faithful man shall abound with blessings; but he that maketh haste to be rich, shall not be innocent. Prov. xxviii. 20.

Now that languages are made, and abound with words, standing for combinations, an usual way of getting complex ideas, is by the explication of those terms that stand for them. Locke.

2. To be in great plenty.
And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. Matthew, xxiv. 12.
Words are like leaves, and where they most abound,
Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found. Pope, Essay on Criticism.

ABOUNDING. † n. s. [from abound.] Increase.
Before the execution of this judgement, [the flood,] and amidst those aboundings of sin and wickedness, yet God left not himself without a witness in the hearts of men. South, Sermon, ii. 220.

ABOUT. prep. [abutan, or abuton, Sax. which seems to signify encircling on the outside.]

1. Round, surrounding, encircling.
Let not mercy and truth forsake thee. Bind them about thy neck; write them upon the table of thy heart. Proverbs, iii. 3.

She cries, and tears her cheeks,
Her hair, her vest; and, stooping to the sands,
About his neck she cast her trembling hands. Dryden, Fab.

2. Near to.
Speak unto the congregation, saying, get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Exodus.

Thou dost nothing, Sergius:
Thou canst endeavour nothing, nay, not think;
But I both see and hear it; and am with thee,
By and before, about and in thee too. B. Jonson, Cato.

3. Concerning, with regard to, relating to.
When Constantine had finished an house for the service of God at Jerusalem, the dedication he judged a matter not unworthy; about the solemn performance whereof, the greatest part of the bishops in Christendom should meet together. Hooker.

The painter is not to take so much pains about the drapery as about the face, where the principal resemblance lies. Dryden.

They are most frequently used as words equivalent, and do both of them indifferently signify either a speculative knowledge of things, or a practical skill about them, according to the exigency of the matter or thing spoken of. Tillotson, Sermon i.

Theft is always a sin, although the particular species of it, and the denomination of particular acts, doth suppose positive laws about dominion and property. Stillingfleet.

Children should always be heard, and about kindly answered, when they ask after any thing they would know, and desire to be informed about. Curiosity should be as carefully cherished in children, as other appetites suppressed. Locke.

It hath been practised as a method of making men's court, when they are asked about the rate of lands, the abilities of tenants, the state of trade, to answer, that all things are in a flourishing condition. Swift, Short View of Ireland.

4. In a state of being engaged in, or employed upon.

Our blessed Lord was pleased to command the representation of his death and sacrifice on the cross, should be made by breaking of bread, and effusion of wine; to signify to us the nature and sacredness of the liturgy we are about. Bp. Taylor.

Labour, for labour's sake, is against nature. The understanding, as well as all the other faculties, chooses always the shortest way to its end, would presently obtain the knowledge it is about, and then set upon some new enquiry. But this, whether laziness or haste, often misleads it. Locke.

Our armies ought to be provided with secretaries, to tell their story in plain English, and to let us know, in our mother-tongue, what it is our brave countrymen are about.

Addison, Spect. No. 309.

5. Appendant to the person; as cloaths.

If you have this about you,
As I will give you when we go, you may Boldly assault the necromancers' hall.

Milton, Comus.

It is not strange to me, that persons of the fairer sex should like, in all things about them, that hand-someness for which they find themselves most liked. Boyle on Colours.

6. Relating to the person, as a servant, or dependant.

Liking very well the young gentleman, such I took him to be, I admitted this Deiphantus about me, who well shewed, there is no service like his that serves because he loves.

Sidney, b. ii.

7. Relating to person, as an act or office.

Good corporal, for my old dame's sake, stand my friend: she hath no body to do any thing about her when I am gone, and she is old and cannot help herself. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

ABOUT. adv.

1. Circularly, in a round; circum.

The weird sisters, hand in hand,
Posters of the sea and land,
Thus do go about, about,
Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine,
And thrice again to make up nine.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

2. In circuit, in compass.

I'll tell you what I am about. — Two yards and more. — No quips now, Pistol: indeed I am in the waist two yards about; but I am about no waste, I am about thrift. Shakspeare.

A tun about was ev'ry pillar there,
A polish'd mirror shone not half so clear. Dryden, Fables.

3. Nearly; circiter.

When the boats were come within about sixty yards of the pillar, they found themselves all bound, and could go no further; yet so as they might move to go about, but might not approach nearer. Bacon, New Atlantis.

4. Here and there: every way; circa.

Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
And looked all about, if she might spy
Her lovely knight. Spenser, F. Q. i. ii. 33.

A wolf that was past labour, in his old age, borrows a habit, and so about he goes, begging charity from door to door, under the disguise of a pilgrim. L'Estrange.

6. With to before a verb; as, about to fly; upon the point, within a small distance of.

These dying lovers, and their floating sons,
Suspend the fight, and silence all our guns:
Beauty and youth, about to perish, finds
Such noble pity in brave English minds. Waller.

5. Round; the longest way, in opposition to the short straight way.

Gold hath these natures; greatness of weight; closeness of parts; fixation; pliantness, or softness; immunity from rust; colour, or tincture of yellow: Therefore the sure way (though most about) to make gold, is to know the causes of the several natures before rehearsed. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 328.

Spies of the Volscians

Held me in chace, that I was forced to wheel
Three or four miles about; else had I, Sir,
Half an hour since brought my report. Shakspeare, Coriolan.

7. To bring about; to bring to the point or state desired; as, he has brought about his purposes.

Whether this will be brought about, by breaking his head, I very much question. Spectator.

8. To come about; to come to some certain state or point. It has commonly the idea of revolution, or gyration.

Wherefore it came to pass, when the time was come about, after Hannah had conceived, that she bare a son. 1 Sam. i. 20.

One evening it befel, that looking out,
The wind they long had wish'd was come about;
Well pleas'd they went to rest; and if the gale
'Till morn continued, both resolv'd to sail. Dryden, Fables.

9. To go about; to prepare to do it.

Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me? John, vii. 19.

In common language, they say, to come about a man, to circumvent him.

Some of these phrases seem to derive their original from the French à bout; venir à bout d'une chose; venir à bout de quelqu'un.

ABP. for Archbishop; which see.

ABRAICA. A superstitious charm against agues.

Abraicabra, a mysterious word, to which the superstitious in former times attributed a magical power to expel diseases, especially the tertian ague, worn about their neck, written triangularly. Aubrey's Misc. p. 105.

To ABRAYDE. † v. a. [Lat. abrado.] To rub off; to wear away from the other parts; to waste by degrees.

By this means there may be a continued supply of what is successively abraded from them by decursion of waters. Hale.

Abreading some parts, at the same time insinuating and supplying others. Bp. Berkeley, Ser. § 143.

Nor deem it strange that rolling years abrade.
The social bias. Shelstone, Econ. P. 1.

ABRAHAM'S BALM. The name of an herb.

To ABRAD. * v. a. [Sax. abradan.] To rouse; to awake. Formerly also used as a verb neuter in this sense. But in this, as in other meanings, (which the Saxon original likewise exhibits,) the word has long ceased to be employed.

ABRASION. † [See ABRADE.]

1. The act of abrading or rubbing off.
2. [In medicine.] The wearing away of the natural mucus, which covers the membranes, particularly those of the stomach and guts, by corrosive or sharp medicines, or humours. Quincy.
3. The matter worn off by the attrition of bodies.

The abrasions of all terrestrial things being rendered volatile and elastic by fire, and at the same time lessening the volatility and expansive force of the fire, whose particles they attract and adhere to, there is produced a new fluid, more volatile than water or earth, and more fixed than fire.

Bp. Berkeley, Ser. § 163.

ABREAST. adv. [See BREAST.] Side by side; in such a position that the breasts may bear against the same line.

My con in Suffolk,

My soul shall thine keep company to heav'n:

Tarry, sweet soul, for mine, then fly abreast.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

For honour travels in a straight so narrow
Where one but goes abreast. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

The riders rode abreast, and one his shield,
His lance of cornel-wood another held. Dryden, Fables.

ABRENUCIATION. * n. s. [Barb. Lat. abrenuntiatio.]

The act of renouncing.

With his I renounce and abhorre, his detestations and abrenunciations, he [M Craig] did so appease the simple people.

that they, not able to conceive all those things, utterly gave over, falling back to poperie, or remaining still in their former ignorance. Conference at Hampton Court, p. 39.

Those, who were to be baptised, first made their abrenunciacion in the church. Mede, Churches, &c. p. 42.

They called the former part of this form, the abrenunciacion, viz. of the devil, and all those idols wherein the devil was worshipped among the heathens.

Bp. Bull's Works, ii. 553.

ABREPT'ION. * n. s. [from abripio.] The state of being carried away.

Cardan relates of himself, that he could when he pleased fall into this abruptus, disjunction or abreption of his soul from his body. Hallywell's Melamp. p. 73.

ABRICOCK. † n. s. So apricot was formerly written [Fr. abricot. Dan. abricose.] See APRICOT.

Nor there the damson wants, nor abricock.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 18.

To ABRIDGE. v. a. [abreger, Fr. abbrevio, Lat.]

1. To make shorter in words, keeping still the same substance.

All these sayings, being declared by Jason of Cyrene, in five books, we will essay to abridge in one volume. 2 Macc. ii. 23.

2. To contract; to diminish; to cut short.

The determination of the will, upon enquiry, is following the direction of that guide; and he, that has a power to act or not to act, according as such determination directs, is free. Such determination abridges not that power wherein liberty consists. Locke.

3. To deprive of; to cut off from. In which sense it is followed by the particle from, or of, preceding the thing taken away.

I have disabled mine estate,

By shewing something a more swelling port,

Than my faint means would grant continuance;

Nor do I now make moan to be abridg'd

From such a noble rate. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

They were formerly, by the common law, discharged from portage and moirage; but this privilege has been abridged them since by several statutes. Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

ABRIDGED OF. part. Deprived of; debarred from; cut short.

ABRIDGER. † n. s. [from abridge.]

He that abridges, a shortener.

If to make away, or give away our lives, differ not much, most men deserve the name of Senecas, or self-destroyers; at least, abridgers of their lives.

Whitlock, Mann. of the English, p. 4.

2. A writer of compendiums or abridgements.

We shew many causes, why we reject that prophane writing of Jason's abridger. Pulke's Retentive, p. 31.

Even the abridger, compiler, and translator, though their labours cannot be rankel with those of the diurnal historiographer, yet must not be rashly doomed to annihilation.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 145.

ABRIDGEMENT. † n. s. [For so it should be written, and not abridgment, as Dr. Johnson gives it, abregement, French.]

1. The epitome of a larger work contracted into a small compass; a compend; a summary.

Surely this commendment containeth the law and the prophet; and, in this one word, is the abridgement of all volume of scripture. Hooker, b. ii. § 5.

Idolatry is certainly the first-born of folly, the great and leading paradox; nay, the very abridgement and sum total of all absurdities. South, Sermon.

2. A diminution in general.

All trying, by a love of littleness,

To make abridgements, and to draw to less,

Even that nothing, which at first we were.

Donne.

3. Contraction; reduction.

The constant desire of happiness, and the constraint it puts upon us, no body, I think, accounts an abridgement of liberty, or at least an abridgement of liberty to be complained of. Locke.

4. Restraint from any thing pleasing; contraction of any thing enjoyed.

It is not barely a man's abridgement in his external accommodations which makes him miserable, but when his conscience shall tell him that it was his sin and his folly which brought him under that abridgement. Stault.

To ABROACH. * v. a. [Sax. abpræcan. See To BROACH.] To tap; to set abroach. This old verb is noticed by Minshew. For indeed it is in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, viz. "To abrochen vessels with drynke." Where Chaucer uses it, Urry has altered the old reading; and given the modern set alroche, instead of it. Tyrwhitt has adopted the reading of the best manuscripts, in which I find the verb.

Then may'st thou chesen whether thou wilt sippe

Of thilke tonne that I shall abroche. Wife of Bath's Prologue.

ABROACH. † adv. [from the verb.]

1. In a posture to run out, or yield the liquor contained; properly spoken of vessels.

The jars of generous wine,

He set abroach, and for the feast prepar'd.

Dryden, Virgil.

The Templer spruce, while every spout's abroach,

Stays 'till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.

Swift, Miscell.

2. In a figurative sense; in a state to be diffused or extended, in a state of such beginning as promises a progress.

That man that sits within a monarch's heart,

And ripens in the sunshine of his favour,

Would he abuse the count'nance of the king,

Alack! what mischiefs might be set abroach,

In shadow of such greatness! Shakespeare, Hen IV. P. ii.

If Paul and Barnabas had been persuaded, they would haply have used the terms otherwise, speaking of the masters themselves who did first set that error abroach.

Hooker, Discourse of Justification.

Speak; if not, this stand

Of royal blood shall be abroach, tilt, and run

Even to the lees of honour. Beaumont and Fl. Philaster, v. 1.

To ABRO'AD. * v. n. [Sax. abprædan.] To extend; to issue; to be dispersed. Dr. Jamieson notices the Scottish active verb abraid, in the sense of spread abroad; but has no example of its use: nor has it obtained any place in other dictionaries. Our old language, however, possesses it. The verb is now obsolete.

Look at the merchants of London, and ye shall see their riches must abrode in the country to buy farms, yea, now also to buy parsonages and benefices.

Learner's Sermons, (preached in 1552.) fol. 4.

ABRO'AD. † adv. [Compounded, Dr. Johnson says, of a and broad. It is the old English on brede: "It [the rose] ne was so sprede on brede," i. e. abroad, Chaucer's Rom. of the Rose. And this may be from the Sax. verb abprædan. The word may be also traced to the Goth. brant.]

1. Without confinement; widely; at large.

Intermit no watch

Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad,

Through all the coasts of dark destruction seek Deliverance. Milton, P. L. ii. 463.

Again, the lonely fox roams far abroad,

On secret rapine bent, and midnight fraud;

Now haunts the cliff, now traverses the lawn,

And flies the hated neighbourhood of man.

Prior.

2. Out of the house.

Welcome, Sir,

This cell's my court; here have I few attendants

And subjects none abroad. Shakespeare, Tempest.

Lady — walked a whole hour abroad, without dying after it. Pope, Letters.

3. In another country.

They thought it better to be somewhat hardly yoked at home, than for ever abroad, and discredited. Hooker, Pref.

- Whosoever offers at verbal translation, shall have the misfortune of that young traveller, who lost his own language abroad, and brought home no other instead of it.

Sir J. Denham.

What learn our youth abroad, but to refine

The homely vices of their native land? Dryden, Span. Friar.
He who sojourns in a foreign country, refers what he sees and hears abroad, to the state of things at home.

Atterbury, Serm.

4. In all directions, this way and that; with wide expansion.

Full in the midst of this infernal road,

An elm displays her dusky arms abroad. Dryden, Virg. Æn. vi.

5. Without, not within.

Bodies politic, being subject, as much as natural, to dissolution, by divers means, there are undoubtedly more states overthrown through diseases bred within themselves, than through violence from abroad. Hooker, Dedication.

To A'BROGATE. v. a. [abrogo, Lat.] To take away from a law its force; to repeal; to annul.

Laws have been made upon special occasions, which occasions ceasing, laws of that kind do abrogate themselves.

Hooker, b. iv. § 14.

The negative precepts of men may cease by many instruments, by contrary customs, by publick disrelish, by long omission: but the negative precepts of God never can cease, but when they are expressly abrogated by the same authority.

Bp. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

A'BROGATE. * part. adj. Annulled; abolished.

Whether they have declared to their parishioners the articles concerning the abrogation of certain superfluous holydays, and done their endeavour to persuade the said parishioners to keep and observe the same inviolably; and whether any of those abrogate days hath been kept as holy days.

K. Edw. VI. Injunct. Sp. p. 26.

ABROGA'TION. n. s. [abrogatio, Lat.] The act of abrogating; the repeal of a law.

The commissioners from the confederate Roman catholicks, demanded the abrogation and repeal of all those laws, which were in force against the exercise of the Roman religion.

Clarendon, b. viii.

ABROOD.* adv. See BROOD. In the action of brooding.

He can make all these cockatrice eggs, on which this generation of vipers (that eat out the bowels of their mother) have set so long abroad, windy at last, and addle; and he will do it.

Abp. Sanerost, Serm. p. 134.

The word in the original (as St. Hierom tells us from the Hebrew traditions) implies that the Spirit of God sate abroad upon the whole rude mass, as birds upon their eggs.

Ibid. p. 135.

ABROODING. * n. s. [from abrood.] Sitting abroad.

Incubatio, incubitus. Couvenent. Barret.

To ABRO'OK. v. a. [from To brook, with a superabundant, a word not in use.] *To brook, to bear, to endure.

Sweet Nell, ill can thy noble mind abrook

The abject people gazing on thy face

With envious looks, still laughing at thy shame.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. 2.

ABRU'PT. adj. [abruptus, Lat. broken off.]

1. Broken, craggy.

Resistless, roaring, dreadful, down it comes

From the rude mountain, and the mossy wild,

Tumbling through rocks abrupt.

Thomson, Winter.

2. Divided, without any thing intervening.

Or spread his airy flight,

Upborn with indefatigable wings,

Over the vast abrupt, ere he arrive

The happy isle.

Milton, P. L. ii. 409.

3. Sudden, without the customary or proper preparatives.

My lady craves

To know the cause of your abrupt departure. Shakspeare.

The abrupt and unkind breaking off the two first parliaments, was wholly imputed to the Duke of Buckingham. Clarendon.

Abrupt, with eagle-speed she cut the sky;

Instant invisible to mortal eye:

Then first he recogniz'd th' ethereal guest. Pope, Odys. i.

4. Unconnected.

The abrupt style, which hath many breaches, and doth not seem to end but fall. B. Jonson, Discovery.

To ABRU'PT. * v. a. [abruptus, Lat. a word not much used.] To disturb; to interrupt.

Our contentments stand upon the tops of pyramids ready to fall off, and the insecurity of their enjoyments abrupteth our tranquillities. Brown, Christ. Mor. sect. ii. p. 112.

The effects of their activity are not precipitously abrupted, but gradually proceed to their cessation.

Brown, Vulg. Err. vi. 10.

ABRU'PTION. † n. s. [abruptio, Lat.] Breaking off; violent and sudden separation.

Those which are inclosed in stone, marble, or such other solid matter, being difficultly separable from it, because of its adhesion to all sides of them, have commonly some of that matter still adhering to them, or at least marks of its abruption from them, on all their sides. Woodward, Nat. Hist. p. 4.

They feel from separation a total destitution of happiness, a sudden abruption of all their prospects, a cessation of all their hopes.

Johnson.

ABRU'PTLY. † adv. [See ABRU'PT.]

1. Hastily, without the due forms of preparation.

The sweetness of virtue's disposition, jealous even of itself, suffered her not to enter abruptly into questions of Musidorus.

Sidney, b. ii.

Now missing him their joy so lately found,

So lately found, and so abruptly gone. Milton, P. R. ii. 10.

They both of them punctually observed the time thus agreed upon, and that in whatever company or business they were engaged, they left it abruptly, as soon as the clock warned them to retire.

Addison, Spectator, No. 241.

2. Ruggedly; unevenly.

We came to an high promontory, which lay directly cross our way, and broke off abruptly at the sea-side. Mumfrell, p. 32.

ABRU'PTNESS. † n. s. [from abrupt.]

1. An abrupt manner, haste, suddenness, untimely vehemence.

Forgive the abruptness of your faithful servant.

Cheyne to Hammond, Ham. Works, i. 158.

Pope lengthened the abruptness of Waller, and at the same time contracted the exuberance of Dryden.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, i. 10.

The abruptness and brevity of the sentences are much in character.

Ibid. ii. 27.

2. The state of an abrupt or broken thing; roughness, craginess; as of a fragment violently disjointed.

The crystallized bodies found in the perpendicular intervals, have always their root, as the jewellers call it, which is only the abruptness, at the end of the body whereby it adhered to the stone, or sides of the intervals; which abruptness is caused by its being broke off from the said stone. Woodw. Nat. Hist. p. 4.

It must be granted that some other languages, for their soft and smooth melting fluency, as having no abruptness of consonants, have some advantage of the English.

Howell's For. Trav. p. 158.

ABSCISS. † n. s. [abscessus, Lat.] A preternatural separation of some of the animal fluids from the route of circulation; a tumour filled with matter; a term of chirurgery.

If the patient is not relieved, nor dies in eight days, the inflammation ends in a suppuration and an abscess in the lungs, and sometimes in some other part of the body.

Arbuthnot on Diet.

Lindanus conjectured it might be some hidden abscess in the mesentery, which, breaking some few days after, was discovered to be an apostem of the mesentery. Harvey on Consumptions.

To ABSCI'ND. † v. a. To cut off, either in a natural or figurative sense.

When two syllables are abscinded from the rest, they evidently want some associate sounds to make them harmonious. Johnson's Rambler, No. 90.

ABSCISS. * n. s. [Dr. Johnson has chosen to give only the Latin word abscissa, not knowing that absciss, in the same sense, had been before used by one of the politest writers of his time.]

Suppose x to be one absciss of a curve, and z another absciss of the same curve. Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 35.

It is supposed that the absciss x and z are unequal. Ibid.

ABSCISSA. [Lat.] Part of the diameter of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex and a semi-ordinate.

ABSCISSION. † n. s. [abscissio, Lat.]

1. The act of cutting off.

Fabricius ab Aquapendente renders the abscission of them difficult enough, and not without danger. Wiseman's Surgery.

2. The act of disannulling.

The blessed Jesus had in him no principle of sin, original nor actual; and therefore this designation of his, in submitting himself to the bloody covenant of circumcision, which was a just and express abscission of it, was an act of glorious humility. Bp. Taylor, Great Exemp. p. 60.

3. The state of being cut off.

By cessation of oracles, with Montautius, we may understand this intercession, not abscission, or consummate desolation. Brown, Vulg. Err. vi. 12.

To ABSCO'ND. * v. a. [abscondo, Lat.] To conceal.

Do not abscond and conceal your sins; manifest them publicly both to God and men. Hewitt, Sermon, p. 50.

'Tis concluded by astronomers, that the atmosphere of the moon hath no clouds nor rains, but a perpetual and uniform serenity; because nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded from us by the interposition of any clouds or mists, but such as rise from our own globe. Bentley, Sermon, 3.

To ABSCO'ND. † v. n. [abscondo, Lat.] To hide one's self; to retire from the publick view: generally used of persons in debt, or criminals eluding the law.

The marmotte or mus alpinus which absconds all winter, lives on its own fat: for in autumn when it shuts itself up in its hole, it is very fat; but in the spring time, when it comes forth again, very lean. Ray on the Creation.

If the kingdom, which the Christians expected, were of this world, they would renounce their religion rather than die, and certainly endeavour, by flight or absconding, to save themselves for what they expected to enjoy. Hucker, 20th Jan. Sermon, p. 5.

ABSCONDER. n. s. [from abscondo.] The person that absconds.

ABSENCE. n. s. [See ABSENT.]

1. The state of being absent, opposed to presence.

Sir, 'tis fit

You have strong party to defend yourself

By calmness, or by absence: all's in danger. Shakespeare, Coriol.

His friends beheld, and pity'd him in vain,

For what advice can ease a lover's pain?

Absence, the best expedient they could find,

Might save the fortune, if not cure the mind. Dryden, Tristram.

You have given no dissertation upon the absence of lovers, nor laid down any methods how they should support themselves under those separations. Addison, Spectator, No. 241.

2. Want of appearance, in the legal sense.

Absence is of a fourfold kind or species. The first is a necessary absence, as in banished persons; this is entirely necessary. A second, necessary and voluntary; as, upon the account of the commonwealth, or in the service of the church. The third kind the civilians call a probable absence; as, that of students on the score of study. And the fourth, an absence entirely voluntary; as, on the account of trade, merchandize, and the like. Some add a fifth kind of absence, which is committed cum dolo & culpa, by a man's non-appearance on a citation; as, in a contumacious person, who, in hatred to his contumacy, is, by the law, in some respects, reputed as a person present. Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

3. Inattention, heedlessness, neglect of the present object.

I continued my walk, reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind. Addison, Spectator, No. 77.

4. It is used with the particle from.

His absence from his mother off he'll mourn,

And, with his eyes, look wishes to return. Dryden, Juv. ii.

ABSENT. adj. [absens, Lat.]

1. Not present: used with the particle from.

In spring the fields, in autumn hills I love;

At morn the plains, at noon the shady grove;

But Delia always: absent from her sight,

Nor plains at morn, nor groves at noon delight. Pope, Past.

Where there is advantage to be given,

Both more and less have given him the revolt;

And none serve with him but constrained things,

Whose hearts are absent too. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Whether they were absent or present, they were vexed alike

Wisdom, vi. 15

2. Absent in mind, inattentive; regardless of the present object.

I distinguish a man that is absent, because he thinks of something else, from him that is absent, because he thinks of nothing. Addison, Spectator, No. 77.

To ABSE'NT. v. a. To withdraw, to forbear to come into presence.

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,

Absent thee from felicity a while,

And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,

To tell my tale. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Go—for thy stay, not free, absents thee more.

Milton, P. In ix. 372.

Though I am forc'd thus to absent myself

From all I love, I shall contrive some means,

Som' efficacious intervals, to visit thee. Southern, Spart. Dame.

The Arango is still called together in cases of importance; and if, after due summons, any number absents himself, he is to be fined to the value of about a penny English. Addison, Remarks on Italy.

ABSENTA'NEOUS. adj. Relating to absence; absent.

Dict.

ABSENTEE. n. s. He that is absent from his station or employment, or country. A word used commonly with regard to Irishmen living out of their country.

Then was the first statute made against absentees, commanding all such as had land in Ireland, to return and reside thereupon. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

A great part of estates in Ireland are owned by absentees, and such as draw over the profits raised out of Ireland, refunding nothing. Child's Discourse on Trade.

ABSE'NTER. * n. s. He that is absent from his duty.

You have heard what a deficiency there was of the special jury, which was imputed to their backwardness to serve a prosecution against the princess. He [Judge Foster] has fined all the absenters 20*l.* a piece.

Ed. Ch. Thurlow, in the Life of Sir M. Foster.

ABSE'NTMENT. * n. s. [from absent.] The state of being absent.

All other phrases and circumlocutions, by which human death is expressed either in holy Scripture, or in usual language—such for instance, as these in Scripture, a peregrination, or absentment from the body, &c. might easily be shewed to be applicable to the death of our Saviour. Barrow's Works, ii. 383.

ABSINTHIAN. * adj. [from absinthium.] Partaking of the nature of wormwood.

Best physick then, when gall with sugar meets,

Temp'ring absinthian bitterness with sweets.

Randolph's Poems, p. 60.

ABSINTHIATED. part. [from absinthium.] Imbittered, impregnated with wormwood. Dict.

ABSINTHIUM. * n. s. [Fr. absinthe, Lat. absinthium.] Wormwood.

To ABSISTE. s. n. [absisto, Lat.] To stand off, to leave off. Dict.

ABSOLVATORY. * adj. [from absolve. Fr. also, absolvatoire.] Relative to pardon; forgiving, as Cotgrave renders the French word.

To ABSOLVE. v. a. [absolve, Lat.]

1. To clear, to acquit of a crime in a judicial sense.

Your great goodness, out of holy pity,
Absolv'd him with an axe. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Our victors, blest in peace, forget their wars,
Enjoy past dangers, and absolve the stars. Tickell.

As he hopes and gives out, by the influence of his wealth, to be here absolved; in condemning this man, you have an opportunity of belying that general scandal, or redressing the credit lost by former judgments. Swift, Miscellanies.

2. To set free from an engagement or promise.

Compell'd by threats to take that bloody oath,
And the act ill, I am absolv'd by both. Waller, Maud's Trag.
This command, which must necessarily comprehend the persons of our natural fathers, must mean a duty we owe them, distinct from our obedience to the magistrate, and from which the most absolute power of princes cannot absolve us. Locke.

3. To pronounce sin remitted, in the ecclesiastical sense.

But all is calm in his eternal sleep;
Here grief forgets to groan, and love to weep;
Ev'n superstition loses every fear;
For God, not man, absolves our frailties here. Pope, Eloisa to Abolard.

4. To finish, to complete. This use is not common.

What cause
Mov'd the Creator, in his holy rest
Through all eternity, so late to build
In chaos; and the work begun, how soon

If that which is so supposed infinitely distant from what is now current, is distant from us by a finite interval, and not infinitely, then that one circulation which preceded it, must necessarily be like ours, and consequently absolved in the space of twenty-four hours. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

ABSOLVER. * n. s. [from absolve.] He who pronounces sin remitted.

They that take upon them to be the only absolvers of sin, are themselves held fast in the snares of eternal death.

More, Against Idolatry, Preface.

A divine, a ghostly confessor,

A sin-absolver. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

ABSOLUTE. adj. [absolutus, Lat.]

1. Complete; applied as well to persons as things.

Because the things that proceed from him are perfect, without any manner of defect or main; it cannot be but that the words of his mouth are absolute, and lack nothing which they should have, for performance of that thing whereunto they tend. Hooker, b. ii. § 6.

What is his strength by land? —

— Great and increasing: but by sea

He is an absolute master. Shakspeare, Ant. and Chop.

2. Unconditional; as an absolute promise.

Although it runs in forms absolute, yet it is indeed conditional, as depending upon the qualification of the person to whom it is pronounced. South, Sermon.

3. Not relative; as, absolute space.

I see still the distinctions of sovereign and inferior of absolute and relative worship, will bear any man out in the worship of any creature with respect to God, as well at least as it doth in the worship of images.

Stillfleet, Def. of Disc. on Rom. Idol.

An absolute mode is that which belongs to its subject, without respect to any other beings whatsoever: but a relative mode is derived from the regard that one being has to others.

Watts, Logic.

In this sense we speak of the ablative case in absolute grammar.

4. Not limited; as, absolute power.

My crown is absolute, and holds of none;

I cannot in a base subjection live,

Nor suffer you to take, though I would give. Dryden, Ind. Emp.

5. Positive; certain; without any hesitation. In this sense it rarely occurs.

Long is it since I saw him,

But time hath nothing blurr'd those lines of favour,

Which then he wore; the snatches in his voice,

And burst of speaking were as his: I'm absolute,

'Twas very Cloten.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

ABSOLUTELY. adv. [from absolute.]

1. Completely, without restriction.

All the contradictions which grow in those minds, that neither absolutely climb the rock of virtue, nor freely sink into the sea of vanity. Sidney.

What merit they can build upon having joined with a protestant army, under a king they acknowledge, to defend their own liberties and properties, is, to me, absolutely inconceivable; and, I believe, will equally be so for ever. Swift, Presb. Plea.

2. Without relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve either willingness to live, or forwardness to die.

Hooker, b. v.

These then being the perpetual causes of zeal; the greatest good, or the greatest evil; either absolutely so in themselves, or relatively so to us; it is therefore good to be zealously affected for the one against the other. Sprat, Sermon.

No sensible quality, as light and colour, and heat, and sound, can be subsistent in the bodies themselves, absolutely considered, without a relation to our eyes and ears, and other organs of sense. These qualities are only the effects of our sensation, which arise from the different motions, upon our nerves, from objects without, according to their various modifications and positions. Bentley, Sermon.

3. Without limits or dependance.

The prince long time had courted fortune's love,

But, once possess'd, did absolutely reign:

Thus, with their Amazons, the heroes strove,

And conquer'd first those beauties they would gain.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.

4. Without condition.

And of that nature, for the most part, are things absolutely unto all men's salvation necessary, either to be held or denied, either to be done or avoided. Hooker's Preface.

5. Peremptorily, positively.

Being as I am, why didst not thou

Command me absolutely not to go,

Going into such danger, as thou saidst? Milton, P. L. ix.

ABSOLUTENESS. * n. s. [from absolute.]

1. Completeness; or, as Minshew explains the word, perfection.

To the second part of the objection, the strength whereof is, that to tie up God in his actions to the reason of things, destroys his liberty, absoluteness, and independency: I answer, it is no imperfection for God to be determined to good; it is no bondage, slavery, or contraction, to be bound up to the eternal laws of right and justice. R. A. Russell's Disc. of Truth, p. 189.

This should silence the proud regrets, and murmurings of our hearts, at the absoluteness of God's decrees and purposes: for why may not his decrees be absolute as his power?

South, Sermon. viii. 241.

2. Freedom from dependance, or limits.

The absoluteness and illimitableness of his commission was generally much spoken of. Clarke, b. viii.

There is nothing that can raise a man to that generous absoluteness of condition, as neither to cringe, to fawn, or to depend meanly; but that which gives him that happiness within himself, for which men depend upon others. South, Sermon.

3. Despotism.

He kept a strait hand on his nobility, and chose rather to advance clergymen and lawyers, which were more obsequious to him, but had less interest in the people; which made for his absoluteness, but not for his safety. Bacon, Hen. VII.

They dress up power with all the splendor and temptation absoluteness can add to it. Locke.

ABSOLUTION. † n. s. [absolutio, Lat.]

1. Acquittal.

Absolution, in the civil law, imports a full acquittal of a person by some final sentence of law; also a temporary discharge of his farther attendance upon a mesne process, through a failure or defect in pleading; as it does likewise in the canon law, where, and among divines, it likewise signifies a relaxation of him from the obligation of some sentence pronounced either in a court of law, or else in foro penitentiali. Thus there is, in this kind of law, one kind of absolution, termed judicial, and another, stiled a declaratory or extra-judicial absolution.

Ayliffe, Par. Juris Canonici.

2. The remission of sins, or penance, declared by ecclesiastical authority.

The absolution pronounced by a priest, whether papist or protestant, is not a certain infallible ground to give the person, so atolved, confidence towards God. South Sermon.

3. Delivery; pronouncement.

Some men are tall and big; so some language is high and great. Then the words are chosen, their sound ample, the composition full, the absolution plenteous, and poured out, all grave, sinewy, and strong. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

ABSOLUTORY. adj. [absolutorius, Lat.] That which absolves.

Though an absolatory sentence should be pronounced in favour of the persons, upon the account of nearness of blood; yet, if adultery shall afterwards be truly proved, he may be again proceeded against as an adulterer. Ayliffe, Parergon.

ABSONANT. † adj. [See ABSONOUS.] Contrary to reason, wide from the purpose.

For Stoicism to rejoice at funerals, and lament at births of men, is more absonant to nature than reason.

Quarles, Judg. & Mer. The Mourner.

ABSONOUS. † adj. [absonus, Lat. ill-sounding.]

1. Absurd, contrary to reason. Dr. Johnson says, it is not much in use; and it may be doubted whether it should be followed by to or from. He cites an instance from Glanville with to; which indeed I take to be the usual concomitant. But he has given no definition of a second sense, in which it is powerfully employed, and without any particle.

To suppose an uniter of a middle constitution, that should partake of some of the qualities of both, is unwarranted by any of our faculties; yea, most absonous to our reason.

Glanville, Secp. Scientifica, c. 4.

Parity of degrees in church-government, hath no foundation in holy scripture, and is as absonous to reason, as parity in a state or family. Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 139.

2. Unmusical; Cockeran calls absonous also untunable.

That noise, as Macrobius truly inferreth, must be of necessity either sweet and melodious, or harsh and absonous.

Fotherby, Atheom. p. 318.

TO ABSORB. v. a. [absorbeo, Lat. preter. absorbed; part. pret. absorbed, or absorpt.]

1. To swallow up.

Moses imputed the deluge to the disruption of the abyss; and St. Peter, to the particular constitution of that earth, which made it obnoxious to be absorpt in water. Burnet, Theology.

Some tokens shew

Of fearless friendship, and their sinking mates
Sustain; vain love, tho' laudable, absorpt
By a fierce eddy, they together found
The vast profundity.

Philips.

2. To suck up. See ABSORBENT.

The evils that come of exercise are that it doth absorb and attenuate the moisture of the body. Bacon.

Supposing the forementioned consumption should prove so durable as to absorb and extenuate the said sanguine parts to an extreme degree, it is evident, that the fundamental parts must necessarily come into danger. Harvey on Consumptions.

While we perspire, we absorb the outward air. Arbuthnot.

ABSORBENT. n. s. [absorbens, Lat.]

A medicine that, by the softness or porosity of its parts, either causes the asperities of pungent humours, or dries away superfluous moisture in the body. Quincy.

There is a third class of substances, commonly called absorbents; as the various kinds of shells, coral, chalk, crabs eyes, &c. which likewise raise an effervescence with acids, and are therefore called alkalis, tho' not so properly, for they are not salts. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ABSORBENT. * adj. That which absorbs.

ABSORPTION. * n. s. [from absorb.] Absorption.

Where to place that concurrence of water, [the river Jordan] or place of its absorption, there is no authentick decision.

Sir T. Brown's Tracts, p. 165.

ABSORPT. part. [from absorb.] Swallowed up; used as well, in a figurative sense, of persons, as, in the primitive, of things.

What can you expect from a man who has not talked these five days? who is withdrawing his thoughts, as far as he can, from all the present world, its customs and its manners, to be fully possessed and absorpt in the past. Pope, Letters.

ABSORPTION. † n. s. [from absorb.]

1. The act of swallowing up.

It was below the dignity of those sacred penmen, or the Spirit of God that directed them, to shew us the causes of this disruption, or of this absorption; this is left to the enquiries of men. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

The aversion of God's face is confusion; the least bending of his brow is perdition; but his "totus iratus," his whole fury, is the utter absorption of the creature. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 24.

2. The state of being swallowed up.

This necessarily engages us in the history of the rise, progress, and decay of the ancient Greek philosophy: in which is shewn its original, like that of legislation, from Egypt: the several revolutions it underwent in its character, constantly attendant and conformable to the several revolutions of civil power: its gradual decay, and total absorption in the schools.

Warburton, Alliance Ch. and St. (1st. ed.) p. 165.

TO ABSTAIN. v. n. [abstineo, Lat.] To forbear, to deny one's self any gratification; with the particle from.

If thou judge it hard and difficult,

Conversing, looking, loving to abstain

From love's due rites, nuptial embraces sweet;

And, with desires, to languish without hope.

Milton, P. L. x. 993.

To be perpetually longing, and impatiently desirous of any thing, so that a man cannot abstain from it, is to lose a man's liberty, and to become a servant of meat and drink, or smoke.

Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

Even then the doubtful billows scarce abstain

From the toss'd vessel on the troubled main. Dryden, Virgil.

ABSTEMIOUS. adj. [abstemius, Lat.] Temperate, sober, abstinent, refraining from excess or pleasures. It is used of persons; as, an abstemious hermit: and of things; as, an abstemious diet. It is spoken likewise of things that cause temperance.

The instances of longevity are chiefly amongst the abstemious. Abstinence in extremity will prove a mortal disease; but the experiments of it are very rare. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Clytorean streams the love of wine expel,

(Such is the virtue of the abstemious well)

Whether the colder nymph that rules the flood

Extinguishes, and harks the drunken god:

Or that Melampus (so have some assured)

When the mad Prætidæ with charms he cur'd,

And powerful herbs, both charms and simples cast

Into the sober spring, where still their virtues last.

Dryden, Fæb.

ABSTEMIOUSLY. † adv. [from abstemious.] Temperately, soberly, without indulgence.

The tone of his stomach never recovered its natural temper, even when he lived very abstemiously afterwards.

Whiston's Memoirs, p. 273.

A B S

ABSTEMIOUSNESS. † n. s. [See ABSTEMIOUS.] The quality of being abstemious.

The Bannians, though healthy through their abstemiousness, are but of weak bodies and small courage.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 115.

The best expedient he [K. Charles I.] had to reconcile it, was to contract his diet to a few dishes out of the bill of fare, and to eat in private. And his eating being usually agreeable to his exercise, this abstemiousness was in no wise displeasing; his temperance preserving his health.

Herbert's Memoirs.

ABSTENTION. † n. s. (from abstineo, Lat.) The act of holding off, or restraining; restraint.

The church superinduced times and manners of abstention, and expressions of sorrow. Bp. Taylor, Visit. of the Sick, iv. 5.

To ABSTERGE. v. a. [abstergo, Lat.] To cleanse by wiping; to wipe.

ABSTERGENT. adj. Cleansing; having a cleansing quality.

To ABSTERSE. [See ABSTERGE.] To cleanse, to purify; a word very little in use, and less analogical than absterge.

Nor will we affirm, that iron receiveth, in the stomach of the ostrich, no alteration; but we suspect this effect rather from corrosion than digestion; not any tendency to dilification by the natural heat, but rather some attrition from an acid and vitriolous humidity in the stomach, which may absterse and shave the scoriaceous parts thereof. Brown, Vulg. Err. b. iii.

ABSTERSION. n. s. [abstersio, Lat.] The act of cleansing. See ABSTERGE.

Abstersion is plainly a scouring off, or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid, and cutting between them and the part; at is found in nitrous water, which scoureth linen cloth speedily from the foulness.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 42.

ABSTERSIVE. * n. s. [Fr. abstersif.] A cleanser.

Abstersives are fuller's earth, soap, linseed-oil, and ox-gall.

Sir W. P. Mtg. Sprat's Hist. R. Soc. p. 295.

ABSTERSIVE. † adj. [Fr. abstersif.] That which has the quality of absterging or cleansing.

It is good, after purging, to use apozemes and broths, not so much opening as those used before purging; but abstersive and mundifying clysters also are good to conclude with, to draw away the reliques of the humours.

Bacon Nat. Hist.

A tablet stood off that abstersive tree,

Where Æthiop's swarthy bird did build to nest. Sir J. Denham.

There many a flow'r abstersive grew,

Thy fav'rite flow'rs of yellow hue. Swift, Miscellanies.

ABSTINENCE. n. s. [abstinentia, Lat.]

1. Forbearance of any thing; with the particle from.

Because the abstinence from a present pleasure, that offers itself, is a pain, nay, oftentimes a very great one: it is no wonder that that operates after the same manner pain does, and lessens, in our thoughts, what is future; and so forces us, as it were, blindfold into its embraces.

Locke.

2. Fasting, or forbearance of necessary food. It is generally distinguished from temperance, as the greater degree from the less; sometimes as single performances from habits; as, a day of abstinence, and a life of temperance.

Say, can you fast? your stomachs are too young:

And abstinence engenders maladies.

Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

And the faces of them, which have used abstinence, shall shine above the stars; whereas our faces shall be blacker than darkness.

2 Esdras, vii. 55.

Religious men, who hither must be sent

As awful guides of heavenly government;

To teach you penance, fasts, and abstinence,

To punish bodies for the soul's offence. Dryden, Ind. Emp.

ABSTINENCY. n. s. The same with ABSTINENCE.

Were our rewards for the abstinencies, or riots, of this present life, under the prejudices of short or infinite, the promises and threats of Christ would lose much of their virtue and energy.

Hammond on Fundamentals

A B S

ABSTINENT. † adj. [abstinens, Lat.] That uses abstinence, in opposition to covetous, rapacious, or luxurious. It is used chiefly of persons.

Seldom have you seen one continent that is not abstinent.

ABSTINENTLY. * adv. [from abstinent.]

O, if thou haddest ever re-admitted Adam into Paradise, how abstinently would he have walked by that tree!

Donne's Devotions, p. 623.

ABSTORTED. † adj. [Lat. abstortus.] Forced away; wrung from another by violence; which word Dr. Johnson has cited from some dictionary: but in our old language, the word is abstortued. Cockeram's Dict. "wrested away by force."

To ABSTRACT. † v. a. [abstraho, Lat.] This word appears to have been objected against as a verb, by Fulke, in his remarks on the Rhemish testament, 1617; and it is explained as being then not intelligible to the generality of readers.

1. To take one thing from another.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose this were innocent, it would be too light to be matter of praise.

Decay of Piety.

2. To separate by distillation.

Having dephlegmed spirit of salt, and gently abstracted the whole spirit, there remaineth in the retort a styptical substance.

Boyle.

3. To separate ideas.

Those who cannot distinguish, compare and abstract, would hardly be able to understand and make use of language, or judge or reason to any tolerable degree.

Locke.

4. To reduce to an epitome.

If we would fix in the memory the discourses we hear, or what we design to speak, let us abstract them into brief compends, and review them often.

Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

ABSTRACT. † adj. [abstractus, Lat.] See the verb To ABSTRACT.

1. Separated from something else; generally, used with relation to mental perceptions; as, abstract mathematics, abstract terms, in opposition to concrete.

Mathematics, in its latitude, is usually divided into pure and mixed. And though the pure do handle only abstract quantity in general, as geometry, arithmetic; yet that which is mixed, doth consider the quantity of some particular determinate subject. So astronomy handles the quantity of heavenly motions, music of sounds, and mechanics of weights and powers.

Wilkins, Mathem. Magic.

Abstract terms signify the mode or quality of a being, without any regard to the subject in which it is; as, whiteness, roundness, length, breadth, wisdom, mortality, life, death.

Watts, Logic.

2. With the particle from.

Another fruit from the considering things in themselves, abstract from our opinions and other men's notions and discourses on them, will be, that each man will pursue his thoughts in that method, which will be most agreeable to the nature of the thing, and to his apprehension of what it suggests to him.

Locke.

3. Refined; pure.

Love's not so pure and abstract, as they use

To say, which have no mistress but their muse.

Donne's Poems, p. 27.

ABSTRACT. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A smaller quantity containing the virtue or power of a greater.

You shall there find a man, who is the abstract

Of all faults all men follow. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

If you are false, these epithets are small;

You're then the things, and abstract of them all.

Dryden, Aurengzeb

2. An epitome made by taking out the principal parts.

A B S

When Mnemon came to the end of a chapter, he recollected the sentiments he had remarked; so that he could give a tolerable analysis and abstract of every treatise he had read, just after he had finished it. Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

3. The state of being abstracted, or disjointed.

The hearts of great princes, if they be considered, as it were, in abstract, without the necessity of states, and circumstance of time, can take no full and proportional pleasure in the exercise of any narrow bounty. Wotton.

ABSTRA'CTED. † part. adj. [from abstract.]

1. Separated; disjointed.

That space the evil one abstracted stood
From his own evil, and for the time remain'd Stupidly good. Milton.

2. Refined; purified.

Abstracted spiritual love, they like
Their souls exhal'd. Donne.

3. Abstruse; difficult.

4. Absent of mind, inattentive to present objects; as, an abstracted scholar.

And now no more the abstracted ear attends
The water's murmuring lapse; the entranced eye
Pierces no longer through the extended rows
Of thick-rang'd trees. Warton, Pleas. of Melancholy, v. 179.

ABSTRA'CTEDLY. † adv. With abstraction, simply, separately from all contingent circumstances.

Or whether more abstractedly we look,
Or on the writers or the written book:
Whence, but from heaven, could men unskill'd in arts,
In several ages born, in several parts,
Weave such agreeing truths? or how, or why
Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?
Unask'd their pains, ungrateful their advice,
Starving their gain, and martyrdom their price. Dryden, Religio Laici.

Whether the notions of absolute time, absolute place, and absolute motion, be not most abstractedly metaphysical? Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, Qu. 8.

ABSTRA'CTEDNESS. * n. s. [from abstracted.] The state of being abstracted.

Men have added to the natural difficulty of this subject, by starting all manner of subtle and wire-drawn objections to hinder any conclusion from being established; and then they complain of the subtlety and abstractedness of the arguments; as if that were not occasioned by themselves.

Baxter, Eng. into the Nat. of the Soul, ii. 354.

If these latter prepositions, which supply the place of the cases, would be of such difficult invention on account of their abstractedness, some expedient to supply their place must have been of indispensable necessity.

A. Smith on the Formation of Languages.

ABSTRA'CTER. * n. s. He who makes an abstract, epitomic, or note.

In this science or mystery of words, a very judicious abstracter would find it a hard task to be any thing copious, without falling upon an infinite collection, &c.

Mannyngham, Disc. p. 58.

ABSTRA'CTION. † n. s. [abstractio, Lat.]

1. The act of abstracting.

The word abstraction signifies a withdrawing some part of an idea from other parts of it; by which means, such abstracted ideas are formed, as neither represent any thing corporeal or spiritual; that is, any thing peculiar or proper to mind or body. Watts, Logick.

2. The state of being abstracted.

What are metaphysicks themselves but intricate subtilties and fruitless abstractions? Burton, Anat. Med. p. 167.

The great author of the method of fluxions felt this difficulty, and therefore he gave into those nice abstractions and geometrical metaphysicks, without which he saw nothing could be done on the received principles.

Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 35.

Instead of beginning with arts most easy (and those be such as are most obvious to the sense), they present their young unmatriculated novices at first coming with the most intellectual abstractions of logic and metaphysicks. Milton, of Education.

A B S

3. Absence of mind; inattention.

4. Disregard of worldly objects.

A hermit wishes to be praised for his abstraction. Pope, Let.
This was an age of vision and mystery; and every work was believed to contain a double, or secondary, meaning. Nothing escaped this eccentric spirit of refinement and abstraction. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iii. xcvi.

ABSTRA'CTIVE. adj. [from abstract.] Having the power or quality of abstracting.

ABSTRACTIVELY. * adv. In an abstractive manner.

ABSTRA'CTLY. † adv. [from abstract.] In an abstract manner, absolutely, without reference to any thing else.

Virtue is but a name abstractly trimm'd,

Interpreting what she was in effect. Drummond's Poems.

Matter, abstractly and absolutely considered, cannot have subsisted eternally. Bentley, Serm. 6.

ABSTRA'CTNESS. n. s. [from abstract.] Subtlety; separation from all matter or common notion.

I have taken some pains to make plain and familiar to your thoughts, truths, which established prejudice, or the abstractness of the ideas themselves, might render difficult. Locke.

ABSTRI'CTED. part. adj. [abstractus, Lat.] Unbound. Dict.

To ABSTRIN'GE. v. a. To unbind. Dict.

To ABSTRU'DE. v. a. [abstrudo, Lat.] To thrust off, or pull away. Dict.

ABSTRU'SE. † adj. [abstrusus, Lat. Thrust out of sight, old Fr. astruss, hidden, difficult, Welsh, astrus, crabbed, perplexed.] This word is mentioned by P. Heylin as an uncouth and unusual word in 1656. Yet it had obtained a place in Cockeram's Dictionary long before that period, where it is defined, "Hidden, secret, not easie to be understood." And it is used by Selden, in 1622, in his Pref. to Drayton's Polyobion: "Whatsoever tastes of description, battell, story, abstruse antiquity, &c."

1. Hidden; remote from view.

Th' eternal eye, whose sight discerns
Abstrusest thoughts, from forth his holy mount,
And from within the golden lamps that burn
Nightly before him, saw, without their light, Rebellion rising. Milton, P. L. v. 712.

This noise lasted about $\frac{1}{2}$ of an hour, till it had been multiplied and reverberated from the most abstruse caverns of the mountain. Sir S. Morland, Tuba Stentorophonica, p. 12.

O, who is he that could carry news to our old father, that thou wert but alive, although thou wert hidden in the most abstruse dungeons of Barbary.

Shelton's Tr. of D. Quir. b. i. p. 4. ch. 15.

2. Difficult; remote from conception or apprehension: it is opposed to obvious and easy.

So spake our Sire, and, by his count'nance, seem'd Ent'ring on studious thoughts abstruse. Milton, P. L. viii.

The motions and figures within the month are abstruse, and not easy to be distinguished, especially those of the tongue, which is moved through the help of many muscles, so easily, and habitually, and variously, that we are scarce able to give a judgment of motions and figures thereby framed. Holder.

No man could give a rule of the greatest beauties, and the knowledge of them was so abstruse, that there was no manner of speaking which could express them.

Dryden, Dufresnoy.

ABSTRU'SELY. adv. In an abstruse manner; obscurely, not plainly, or obviously.

ABSTRU'SENESS. n. s. [from abstruse.] The quality of being abstruse; difficulty, obscurity.

It is not oftentimes so much what the scripture says, as what some men persuade others it says, that makes it seem obscure, and that as to some other passages that are so indeed, since it is the abstruseness of what is taught in them, that makes them almost inevitably so; it is little less saucy, upon such a score, to find fault with the style of the Scripture, than to do so with the authour for making us but men.

Boyle on the Scripture.

ABSTRUSITY. n. s. [from abstruse.]

1. Abstruseness.

2. That which is abstruse. A word seldom used.

Authors are also suspicious, not greedily to be swallowed, who pretend to write of secrets, to deliver antipathies, sympathies, and the occult abstrusities of things. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To ABSUME. v. a. [absumo, Lat.] To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to eat up. An uncommon word.

That which had been burning an infinite time could never be burnt, no not so much as any part of it; for if it had burned part after part, the whole must needs be absumed in a portion of time. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

ABSURD. adj. [absurdus, Lat.]

1. Unreasonable, without judgement, as used of men.

Seeming wise men may make shift to get opinion: but let no man choose them for employment; for certainly you had better take for business a man somewhat absurd, than over formal. Bacon.

A man, who cannot write with wit on a proper subject, is dull and stupid; but one who shews it in an improper place, is as impertinent and absurd. Addison, Spectator, No. 291.

2. Inconsistent, contrary to reason, used of sentiments or practices.

The thing itself appeared desirable to him, and accordingly he could not but like and desire it; but then, it was after a very irrational absurd way, and contrary to all the methods and principles of a rational agent; which never will, a thing really and properly, but it applies to the means, by which it is to be acquired. South, Sermons.

But grant that those can conquer, these can cheat,
'Tis phrase absurd to call a villain great;
Who wickedly is wise, or madly brave,
Is but the more a fool, the more a knave. Pope, Ess. on Man.

ABSURDITY. n. s. [from absurd.]

1. The quality of being absurd; want of judgement, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things.

How clear soever this idea of the infinity of number be, there is nothing more evident than the absurdity of the actual idea of an infinite number. Locke.

2. That which is absurd; as, his travels were full of absurdities. In which sense it has a plural.

That satisfaction we receive from the opinion of some pre-eminence in ourselves, when we see the absurdities of another, or when we reflect on any past absurdities of our own. Addison.

ABSURDLY. adv. [from absurd.] After an absurd manner; improperly, unreasonably.

But man we find the only creature,
Who, led by folly, combats nature;
Who, when she loudly cries, Forbear,
With obstinacy fixes there;
And where his genius least inclines,
Absurdly bends his whole designs. Swift, Miscellanies.

We may proceed yet further with the atheist, and convince him, that not only his principle is absurd, but his consequences also as absurdly deduced from it. Bentley, Sermons.

ABSURDNESS. n. s. [from absurd.] The quality of being absurd; injudiciousness, impropriety. See ABSURDITY; which is more frequently used.

Such are the inferences that naturally flow from the articles of the Epicures' and the Atheists' creed: the folly and absurdness whereof I shall not endeavour to expose: themselves would not be content that they should be pursued to their proper issues. Dr. Cave, Sermon, p. 8.

ABUNDANCE. n. s. [abundantia, Fr.]

1. Plenty; a sense chiefly poetical.

At the whisper of thy word,
Crown'd abundance spreads my board.

Crashaw.

The doubled charge his subjects' love supplies,

Who, in that bounty, to themselves are kind;

So glad Egyptians see their Nihus rise,

And, in his plenty, their abundance find. Dryden, Ann. Mir.

2. Great numbers.

The river Inn is shut up between mountains, covered with woods of fir-trees. Abundance of peasants are employed in hewing down the largest of these trees, that, after they are barked and cut into shape, are tumbled down. Addison on Italy.

3. A great quantity.

Their chief enterprize was the recovery of the Holy Land; in which worthy, but extremely difficult, action, it is lamentable to remember what abundance of noble blood hath been shed with very small benefit unto the Christian state. Raleigh, Essays.

4. Exuberance, more than enough.

For well I wot, most mighty sovereign,
That all this famous antique history,
Of some, th' abundance of an idle brain,
Will judged be, and painted forgery. Spenser.

ABUNDANT. adj. [abundans, Lat.]

1. Plentiful.

Good, the more

Communicated, more abundant grows;

The author not impair'd, but honour'd more. Milton, P. L. v.

2. Exuberant.

If the vessels are in a state of too great rigidity, so as not to yield, a strong projectile motion occasions their rupture, and hæmorrhages; especially in the lungs, where the blood is abundant. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Fully stored. It is followed sometimes by in, commonly by with.

The world began but some ages before these were found out, and was abundant with all things at first; and men not very numerous; and therefore were not put so much to the use of their wits, to find out ways for living commodiously. Burnet.

4. It is applied generally to things, sometimes to persons.

The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth. Exod. xxxiv. 6.

ABUNDANTLY. adv. [from abundant.]

1. In plenty.

Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life. Genesis, i. 20.

God on thee

Abundantly his gifts hath also pour'd;

Inward and outward both, his image fair. Milton, P. L. viii.

2. Amply, liberally; more than sufficiently.

Ye saw the French tongue abundantly purified. Sprat.

Heroick poetry has ever been esteemed the greatest work of human nature. In that rank has Aristotle placed it; and Longinus is so full of the like expressions, that he abundantly confirms the other testimony. Dryden, State of Lun. Pref.

What the example of our equals wants of authority, is abundantly supplied in the insinuations of friendship, and the repeated influences of a constant conversation. Rogers, Serm.

ABUSAGE.* n. s. This word, as well as its kindred abusion, is obsolete. Abuse.

Howbeit it hath pleased the common sort of men, to stile these festival days with the name of good times; yet by reason of the gross abusage, to which the corruption of men hath made them subject, they may very well receive an alteration of their title. Whateley's Redemption of Time, (1634.) p. 1.

To ABUSE. v. a. [abutor, abusus, Lat.] In abuse the verb, s has the sound of z; in the noun, the common sound.

1. To make an ill use of.

They that use this world, as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away. 1 Cor. vii. 31.

He has fixed and determined the time for our repentance, beyond which he will no longer await the perverseness of men, no longer suffer his compassion to be abused. Rogers, Serm.

2. To violate; to defile.

Arachne figured how Jove did abuse
Europe like a bull, and on his back
Her through the sea did bear.

When Absalom abused his father's wives, was not the act of that incestuous whoredom the due reward of justice, for that David had abused the wife of his servant Urias?

Crowley's Apologie, fol. 55.

3. To deceive, to impose upon.

He perhaps,
Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
As he is very potent with such spirits,
Abuses me to damn me.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

The world hath been much abused by the opinion of making gold: the work itself I judge to be possible; but the means hitherto propounded, are, in the practice, full of error.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 126.

It imports the misrepresentation of the qualities of things and actions, to the common apprehensions of men, abusing their minds with false notions; and so, by this artifice, making evil pass for good, and good for evil, in all the great concerns of life.

South, Sermons.

Nor be with all these tempting words abus'd;
These tempting words were all to Sappho us'd.

Pope.

4. To treat with rudeness; to reproach.

I am no strumpet, but of life as honest

As you that thus abuse me.

Shakespeare, Othello.

But he mocked them, and laughed at them, and abused them shamefully, and spake proudly.

Mac. vii. 34.

Some praise at morning what they blame at night,

But always think the last opinion right.

A muse by these is like a mistress used,

This hour she's idoliz'd, the next abus'd.

Pope, Ess. on Crit.

The next criticism seems to be introduced for no other reason, but to mention Mr. Bickerstaff, whom the author every where endeavours to imitate and abuse.

Addison.

ABUSE. n. s. [from the verb abuse.]

1. The ill use of any thing.

The casting away things profitable for the sustenance of man's life, is an unthankful abuse of the fruits of God's good providence towards mankind.

Hooker, b. v. § 9.

* Little knows

Any, but God alone, to value right

The good before him, but perverts best things

To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.

Milton, P. L. b. iv.

2. A corrupt practice, bad custom.

The nature of things is such, that, if abuses be not remedied, they will certainly increase.

Swift, Advancem. of Relig.

3. Seducement.

Was it not enough for him to have deceived me, and through the deceit abused me, and after the abuse, forsaken me, but that he must now, of all the company, and before all the company, lay want of beauty to my charge?

Sidney, b. ii.

4. Unjust censure, rude reproach, contumely.

I dark in light, exposed

To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.

Milton, S. A.

ABUSER. † n. s. [from the verb abuse. Fr. also abuscur.]

1. He that makes an ill use.

The rest are cheated with a thick intoxicating potion, which a certain softness, the abuser of love's name, carries about.

Milton, Apol. for Smeectm.

Abusers of God's graces.

Hammond, Sermon. p. 561.

2. He that deceives.

Next thou, the abuser of thy prince's ear.

Denham, Sophy.

He was no brewer of holy water in court, no dallier, no abuser, but ever real and certain.

Bacon, Observ. upon a Libel, 1592.

3. He that reproaches with rudeness.

The honour of being distinguished by certain abusers, I regard as a sufficient balance to any disadvantages that can arise from their abuse.

Dr. Brown to Louth, p. 6.

4. A ravisher, a violator.

That day of vengeance, wherein God will destroy the murderers and abusers of his servants, and burn up their polluted city.

Spencer on Prodigies, p. 127.

Retire a while
Behind this bush, till we have known that vile
Abuser of young maidens.

Fletcher, Faithful Sheph. v. 1.

ABUSEFUL.  adj.* [from abuse and full.] Abusive.

He abusefully reviles the king and parliament by the abuseful names of hereticks and schismatics. Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 397.

ABUSION.  n. s.* [Old Fr. abusion.]

1. Corrupt, or improper usage.

The king's highness is bound to obviate, redress, and redress the abusions and exactions of annates or first fruits.

Acts of Parl. xxxiii. 2 § Hen. 8.

2. Reproach.

Shame light on him; that, through so false illusion,
Doth turn the name of soldiers to abusion.

Spenser, Moth. Hubb. ver. 220.

ABUSIVE. † adj. [from abuse. Fr. also abusif.]

1. Practising abuse.

An abusive and strange apprehension of covenants.

Milton, Eikonoclastes. § xiv.

In that sense or aspect, both the things themselves, and the abusive use of them, may be, branded with marks of God's dislike.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 20.

The tongue mov'd gently first, and speech was low,

Till wrangling science taught it noise and show,

And wicked wit arose, thy most abusive foe.

Pope, Miscell.

Dame Nature, as the learned show,

Provides each animal its foe;

Hounds hunt the hare, the wily fox

Devours your geese, the wolf your flocks.

Thus envy pleads a natural claim,

To persecute the muse's fame,

On poets in all times abusive,

From Homer down to Pope inclusive.

Swift, Miscell.

2. Containing abuse; as an abusive lampoon.

Next, Comedy appear'd with great applause,

Till her licentious and abusive tongue

Waken'd the magistrates coercive pow'r.

Roscommon.

A man's strength does not lie in his treasures of ill words, in a voluble dexterity of throwing out scurrilous abusive terms.

South, Sermons, viii. 200.

3. Deceitful; a sense little used, yet not improper.

Cotgrave mentions this sense of deceitful, and adds to the senses of abusive that of against custom.

It is verified by a number of examples, that whatsoever is gained by an abusive treaty, ought to be restored in integrum.

Bacon, Considerations on War with Spain.

ABUSIVELY. adv. [from abuse.]

1. Improperly, by a wrong use.

The oil, abusively called spirit, of roses swims at the top of the water, in the form of a white butter; which I remember not to have observed in any other oil drawn in any linbeck.

Boyle, Sceptical Chymist.

2. Reproachfully.

ABUSIVENESS. † n. s. [from abusc.] The quality of being abusive; foulness of language.

Who could have believed so much insolence durst vent itself from out the hide of a varlet, as thus to censure that which men of mature judgement have applauded to be writ from good reason? But this contents him not: he falls now to rave in his barbarous abusiveness.

Milton, Colasterion.

Pick out of mirth, like stones out of thy ground,

Profaneness, filthiness, abusiveness.

These are the scum, with which coarse wits abound:

The fine may spare these well, yet not go lesse.

Herbert.

TO ABUT. † v. n. [aboutir, to touch at the end,
Fr.] Dr. Johnson hastily pronounces the word obsolete. To end at; to border upon; to meet, or approach to, with the particle upon.

Two mighty monarchies,

Whose high upreared and abutting fronts

The narrow perilous ocean parts asunder.

Shakespeare, Hen. V.

The Loosers are two several corporations, distinguished by the addition of east and west, abutting upon a navigable creek, and joined by a fair bridge of many arches.

Carew.

On the south of Buckingham-green [the ridged bank] abutting with a considerable breadth and elevation on the east end of Cowley.

Warton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 55.

A B Y

ABUTTAL. † n. s. [Barb. Lat. abutare, Sax. abutan, old Fr. aboutir.] The butting or boundaries of any land. A writing declaiming on what lands, highways, or other places, it does abut. Abuttals are also known by the name of headlands. In a terrier, or description of the site of land, the sides on the breadth are called adjacentes, lying or bordering; and the ends only in length are abutantes, abutting or bounding; which in old surveys were sometimes expressed by capitare, to head; whence this designation of abuttal. See Cowel. See also BUT, a boundary.

Declaration must be made of the abuttals and sides of the land seized. Spelman.

ABUTMENT. † n. s. [from abut.] That which abuts or borders upon another.

The canal, which the Scharins of Babylonia, who were driven to Egypt, carried on from the upper point of Delta to the Red Sea, was an immense operation. They undertook it; and however other people may dispute the point, it was finished. This is evident from the abutments of the floodgates, which are still existing between the hills, through which it passed.

Bryan's Anal. of Anc. Mythol. iii. 524.

TO ABY.* v. a. [Sometimes synonymous with abide, in our elder writers, as denoting to endure; to submit to; (see ABIDE;) but usually meaning to compensate, or pay for something done amiss, by suffering for it; and accordingly may so be traced to buy, with the ancient and accustomed prefix a. Gower writes the preterperfect of this verb abought.]

1. To endure.
Whodyes, the utmost dolor doth abye. Spenser, F. Q. iii. iv. 38.
2. To pay dearly; to suffer for it.
Whoso hardie hand on her doth lay,
It dearly shall aby, and death for handsell pay.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. xi. 15.

Lo, now my sonne, what it is,
A man to cast his eie amiss;
Which Acteon hath dere abought. Gower, Conf. Am. B. 1.
Fool-hardy knight, full soon shalt thou aby
This fond reproach. Beaum. and Fl., Kn. of the Burn. Pest. iii. 1.

TO ABY.* v. n.

1. To remain. [Sax. abidan.]
But nought that wanteth rest can long aby.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. vii. 3.
2. To pay; as the active verb is used.
If I catch him in this company,
By Stygian lake I vow, whose sad annoy
The gods do dread, he dearly shall aby. Spenser, F. Q. iii. vi. 24.

ABY'SM. n. s. [abyssme, old Fr. now written contractedly abime.] A gulf; the same with abyss.
My good stars, that were my former guides,
Have empty left their orbs, and shot their fires
Into the abyss of hell. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

ABY'SS. n. s. [abyssus, Lat. ἄβυσσος, bottomless, Gr.]

1. A depth without bottom.
Who shall tempt with wand'ring feet
The dark, unbottom'd, infinite abyss,
And, through the palpable obscure, find out
His uncouth way. Milton, P. L. ii. 5.
Thy throne is darkness in the abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the sight;
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And search no further than thyself reveal'd.
Jove was not more pleas'd
With infant nature, when his spacious hand
Had rounded this huge ball of earth and seas
To give it the first push, and see it roll
Along the vast abyss. Addison, Guardian, No. 110.
2. A great depth, a gulph; hyperbolically.
The yawning earth disclos'd the abyss of hell.
Dryden, Virg. Georg. i.

A C A

3. In a figurative sense, that in which any thing is lost.

For sepulchres themselves must crumbling fall

In time's abyss, the common grave of all. Dryden, Juv. Sat. x.

If, discovering how far we have clear and distinct ideas, we confine our thoughts within the contemplation of those things, that are within the reach of our understandings, and launch not out into that abyss of darkness, out of a presumption, that nothing is beyond our comprehension. Locke.

4. The body of waters supposed at the centre of the earth.

We're here to consider what is generally understood by the great abyss, in the common explication of the deluge; and 'tis commonly interpreted either to be the sea, or subterraneous waters hid in the bowels of the earth. Burnet's Theory.

5. In the language of divines, hell.

From that insatiable abyss,
Where flames devour, and serpents hiss,
Promote me to thy seat of bliss.

Roscommon.

AC. AK. OR AKE.

Being initials in the names of places, as Acton; signify an oak, from the Saxon ac, an oak. Gibson's Camden.

ACACIA. n. s. [Lat.]

1. A drug brought from Egypt, which, being supposed the inspissated juice of a tree, is imitated by the juice of sloes, boiled to the same consistence.
Dictionnaire de Comm. Savary, and Treuxem.
2. A tree commonly so called here, though different from that which produces the true acacia; and therefore termed pseudocacia, or Virginian acacia.
Millar.

ACADEME.* n. s. [Lat. academia.]

1. A society of persons.
Our court shall be a little academe,
Still and contemplative in living art.
Shakespeare, Love's Lab. Lost, i. 1.
Tainting our towns and hopeful academes.
Marston's Scourge, i. 3.
The sacred academ above
Of doctors. Donne's Poem's, p. 341.
Into whose house, which was an academe.
Beaum. and Fl., Th. and Theodoret, i. 2.
2. The Academy, a school of philosophy. See ACADEMY. Dr. Johnson is mistaken in assigning this application of the word exclusively to Milton. It was used by Peacham many years before Milton.
Thy solitary Academe should be
Some shady grove upon the Thames' fair side.
Peacham's Emblems, Rura mihi, &c.
See there the olive grove of Academe,
Plato's retirement. Milton, P. R. iv. 244.
And lo! where, rapt in beauty's heavenly dream,
Hoar Plato walks his oliv'd Academe.
T. Warton's Newmarket, v. 192.

ACADEMIAL. adj. [from academy.] Relating to an academy, belonging to an academy.

ACADEMIAN. † n. s. [from academy.] A scholar of an academy or university; a member of an university. Wood, in his Athene Oxonienses, mentions a great feast made for the academians; as Dr. Johnson has observed; and Wood has also mentioned them elsewhere. But the word was not coined by Wood.

They were entered into the said school, there to be educated till they were fit to be academians or apprentices.

Life of A. Wood, p. 21.

Then straight comes Friscus, that neat gentleman,
That new-discarded academian,
Who, for he could cry Ergo in the school,
Straightway with his huge judgement darrs controul
Whatsoever he views.

Marston's Scourge, ii. 6.

ACADEMICAL. adj. [academicus, Lat.]

1. Belonging to an university.

He drew him first into the fatal circle, from a kind of resolved privateness; where, after the academical life, he had taken such a taste of the rural, as I have heard him say, that he could well have bent his mind to a retired course. Wotton.

No solemn day, no triumph, no publick joy, no great business, but eating must be the solemnest and most ceremonious part; coronations of kings, consecrations of bishops, academical acts and proceedings, &c. Hales, Sermon.

2. Relating to the philosophy of the academy.

Nor shall ever any one have my consent to pass for a philosopher, who keeps himself so ignorant of the Scripture, as with devotion to admire that academical inscription, ἀγνῶσθαι βίη. Smith's Old Age, p. 256.

ACADEMICALLY. * adv. In an academical manner.

These doctrines I propose academically, and for experiment sake. Cabalistical Dialogue, (1682.) p. 17.

ACADEMICIAN. † n. s. [academicien, Fr.] The member of an academy. It is generally used, Dr. Johnson says, in speaking of the professors in the academies of France; but in later times it is not so.

Don Antonio Ulloa, who, in company with the late Don George Juan, travelled into Peru to assist the French academicians in ascertaining the figure of the globe, published an account of their tour. Swinburne, Trav. Spain, Let. 42.

Milton recommended this species on the organ, as the fittest mean for composing the minds of his young academicians after they had concluded their gymnastick exercises. Mason, Ch. Mus. p. 56.

In this country an academy could be expected to do but little. If an academician's place were profitable, it would be given by interest; if attendance were gratuitous, it would be rarely paid, and no man would endure the least disgust. Unanimity is impossible, and debate would separate the assembly. Johnson, Life of Roscommon.

ACADEMICK. † n. s. [from academy.]

1. A student of an university.

A young academick shall dwell upon a journal that treats of trade, and be lavish in the praise of the author; while persons skilled in those subjects, hear the tattle with contempt. Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

2. An academick philosopher.

Mellifluous streams, that water'd all the schools
Of Academicks old and new. Milton, Par. Reg.
Thales, Pythagoras, all the Academicks and Stoicks, and not many to be excepted, unless the Epicures, taught this divinity. Macle, Apostasy of the Later Times, p. 111.

ACADEMICK. † adj. [academicus, Lat.]

1. Relating to an university.

While through poetick scenes the genius roves,
Or wanders wild in academick groves. Pope, Dunciad, iv. 481.

2. Applicable to a particular philosophy.

Plato's philosophy took its name of Academick from the academy. Harris's Phil. Inquiries.

The exalted Stoick pride, the Cynick sneer,
The slow-compenting Academick doubt. Thomson, Lib. part 2.

ACADEMISM. * n. s. [from academy.] The doctrine of the academical philosophy.

This is the great principle of academism and scepticism, that truth cannot be perceived, on maintaining of which their honour is staked. Baxter, Enq. into the Nat. of the Soul, ii. 275.

ACADEMIST. † n. s. [Fr. academiste.]

1. The member of an academy. This is not often used.

It is observed by the Parisian academists, that some amphibious quadrupeds, particularly the sea-calf or seal, hath his epiglottis extraordinarily large. Ray on the Creation.

2. An academical philosopher.

A certain great author is sometimes a dogmatist, and gives us a scheme of virtue independent of any Deity; and sometimes a regular and precise academist.

Baxter, Enq. into the Nat. of the Soul, ii. 276.

ACA'DEMY. † n. s. [Anciently, and properly, with the accent on the first syllable, now usually on the second. Academia, Lat. from Academus of Athens, whose house was turned into a school, from whom the Groves of Academe in Milton.] Dr. Johnson has given an example of this word from Shakespeare, where the reading should be academe, as the best editions give it; a word, as I have shewn, not unusual. Another example, therefore, must be supplied, of the first sense which Dr. Johnson assigns to academy.

1. An assembly or society of men, uniting for the promotion of some art.

In the private academies of Italy, whither I was favoured to resort. Milton, Reas. of Ch. Gov. i.

The learned and affable meeting of frequent academies.

Id. ii.

It [the book] took so here, that the new academy of wits have given a publick and far higher clogium of it than it deserves. Howell's Letters, i. 6.

2. The places where sciences are taught.

Amongst the academies, which were composed by the rare genius of those great men, these four are reckoned as the principal; namely the Athenian school, that of Sicyon, that of Rhodes, and that of Corinth. Dryden, Dufrsnoy.

Give me leave to complain: where can I do it better than at a court, the professed academy of honour?

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 45.

3. An university.

How much are all we bound, that are scholars, to those munificent Ptolemies, bountiful Mecanates, heroic patrons, divine spirits,—that have provided for us so many well-furnished libraries as well in our publick academies in most cities, as in our private colleges. How shall I remember Sir Thomas Bodley, &c.

Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 278.

Some Jesuits, and two reverend men
Of our two academies I nam'd. Donne, Poems, p. 130.

4. A place of education, in contradistinction to the universities or publick schools. The thing, and therefore the name is modern. Dr. Johnson says; but the name, in this sense, is old.

Affliction is a school or academy, wherein the best scholars are prepared, &c. Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 717.

The first [request] is, that you would employ the utmost of this your power and interest, both with the king and parliament, to suppress and extinguish those private, blind, conventicling schools or academies of grammar and philosophy, set up and taught secretly by fanatics, here and there all the kingdom over. South, Sermons, v. 45.

5. The academy; the school of philosophy.

Had the poor vulgar rout only, who were held under the prejudices and prepossessions of education, been abused into such idolatrous superstitions, as to adore a marble, or a golden deity, it might have been detested indeed, or pitied, but not so much to be wondered at: But for the Stoas, the Academy, or the Peripaton, to own such a paradox,—this (as the Apostle says) was without excuse. South, Sermons, ii. 245.

ACANTHUS. n. s. [Lat.] The name of the herb bears-breech, remarkable for being the model of the foliage on the Corinthian chapter.

On either side

Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub,
Fenc'd up the verdant wall. Milton, P. L. iv. 696.

ACATALE'TICK. n. s. [ἀκαταληκτός, Gr.] A verse which has the compleat number of syllables, without defect or superfluity.

ACATALEPSIA. * n. s. [Gr. ἀκαταληψία, from ἀ and καταλαμβάνω. Fr. acatalepsie.] Impossibility of complete discovery.

That shutteth up all our endeavours for knowledge under an acatalepsia, impossibility of certainty, or full discovery, even of nature, while we look in this glass of the body.

Whitlock on the Manners of the English, p. 222.

ACATER.* n. s. [See ACATES.] Provider or purchaser of provisions. Obsolete. In the dramatic personæ of B. Jonson's Sad Shepherd, we find "Robin Hood's bailiff or acater." Chaucer best defines the character.

A gentil manciple was ther of a temple,
Of which achatours might take ensemple,
For to ben wise in buying of vitaille.

Prologue, C. T.

ACA'TES.* n. s. [Old Fr. acat, achat, purchase; acheter, pronounced acaten in Picardy and Languedoc, to purchase. Ital. accattare, to beg or borrow.] Provisions; victuals; viands; in more modern language, catcs. This is a frequent word in our elder writers. Cotgrave, explaining the word pittance, says, that it meant "meat, food, acates, victual of all sort, bread and drink excepted." Chaucer uses the word in the singular number more than once; and defines coemption as "comen achate or buying together."

Transl. of Boeth. p. 362. col. 1.

The kitchen clerk, that hight Digestion,
Did order all th' acates in seemly wise.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 31.

To see him served by all the damsels with marvellous silence
— the setting before him such variety of acates, and those so excellently dressed as his appetite knows not to which of them it shall first address his hand.

Shelton's Tr. of D. Quir. B. 1. P. 4. ch. 23.

To ACCE'DE.† v. n. [accedo, Lat.] The existence of this word may be traced to the beginning of the seventeenth century. "To accede, to approach, or have access unto; also to assent unto." Florio's New World of Words, 1611.

1. To be added to, to come to; generally used in political accounts; as, another power has acceded to the treaty; that is, has become a party.

An accessory is said to be that which does accede unto some principal fact or thing in law.

Ayliffe, Par. Jur. Case.

This obvious reflection convinced me of the absurdity of the treaty of Hanover in 1725, between France and England, to which the Dutch afterwards acceded.

Chesterfield.

To accede to, or to be added to. Johnson in F. Accrue.

2. To come over; to assent.

We must therefore only thus far accede to the account of the people of Suyrna.

Bryant on Troy.

To ACCELERATE. v. a. [accelero, Lat.]

1. To make quick, to hasten, to quicken motion; to give a continual impulse to motion, so as perpetually to encrease.

Take new beer, and put in some quantity of stale beer into it; and see whether it will not accelerate the clarification, by opening the body of the beer, whereby the grosser parts may fall down into lees.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 307.

By a skilful application of those notices, may be gained the accelerating and bettering of fruits, and the emptying of mines, at much more easy rates than by the common methods.

Glanville, Scep. Sc.

If the rays endeavour to recede from the densest part of the vibration, they may be alternately accelerated and retarded by the vibrations overtaking them.

Newton, Opticks.

Spices quicken the pulse, and accelerate the motion of the blood, and dissipate the fluids; from whence leanness, pains in the stomach, loathings, and fevers.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space

Returning with accelerated course,

The rushing comet to the sun descends. Thomson, Sum. 1690.

2. It is generally applied to matter, and used chiefly in philosophical language; but is sometimes used on other occasions.

In which council the king himself, whose continual vigilancy did suck in sometimes causeless suspicions, which few else knew, inclined to the accelerating a battle.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

- Perhaps it may point out to a student now and then what may employ the most useful labours of his thoughts, and accelerate his diligence in the most momentous enquiries. Watts.

ACCELERATION.† n. s. [acceleratio, Lat.]

1. The act of quickening motion.

The law of the acceleration of falling bodies, discovered first by Galileo, is, that the velocities acquired by falling, being as the time in which the body falls, the spaces through which it passes, will be as the squares of the velocities, and the velocity and time taken together, as in a quadruplicate ratio of the spaces.

2. The state of the body accelerated, or quickened in its motion.

The degrees of acceleration of motion, the gravitation of the air, the existence or non-existence of empty spaces, either coacervate or interspersed, and many the like, have taken up the thoughts and times of men in disputes concerning them.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

3. The act of hastening.

Considering the languour ensuing that action in some, and the visible acceleration it maketh of age in most, we cannot but think venery much abridgeth our days.

Brown.

We most humbly desire an acceleration of his majesty's answer, according to his good time and royal pleasure.

Bacon, Speech in Parliament, Jac. 7.

ACCELERATIVE.* adj. [from accelerate.] Increasing the velocity of progression. The word is used by Sir Isaac Newton to express one kind of quantity of centripetal force.

Sir Isaac Newton explains very distinctly what he understands by the absolute quantity, what by the accelerative quantity, and what by the motive quantity of a centripetal force.

Keid's Inquiry.

To ACCE'ND. v. a. [accendo, Lat.] To kindle, to set on fire; a word very rarely used.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accended, would, as theirs, burn up innumerable books of this sort.

De'gay of Piety.

ACCEN'SION. n. s. [accensio, Lat.] The act of kindling, or the state of being kindled.

The fulminating damp will take fire at a candle, or other flame, and, upon its accension, gives a crack or report, like the discharge of a gun, and makes an explosion so forcible as sometimes to kill the miners, shake the earth, and force bodies, of great weight and bulk, from the bottom of the pit or mine.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

ACCENT. n. s. [accentus, Lat.]

1. The manner of speaking or pronouncing, with regard either to force or elegance.

I know, Sir, I am up flatterer; he that beguiled you in a plain accent was a plain knave; which, for my part, I will not be.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. The sound given to the syllable pronounced.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

3. In grammar, the marks made upon syllables to regulate their pronunciation.

Accent, as in the Greek names and usage, seems to have regarded the tune of the voice; the acute accent raising the voice in some certain syllables to a higher, i. e. more acute pitch or tone, and the grave depressing it lower, and both having some emphasis, i. e. more vigorous pronunciation.

Holder.

4. Poetically, language or words.

How many ages hence

Shall this our lofty scene be acted o'er,

In states unborn, and accents yet unknown.

Shakspeare, Julius Caesar.

Winds on your wings to heaven her accents bear;

Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden, Virg. Past. 3.

5. A modification of the voice, expressive of the passions or sentiments.

The tender accent of a woman's cry
Will pass unheard, will unregarded die;

When the rough seaman's louder shouts prevail,
When fair occasion shews the springing gale.

To AC'CENT. v. a. [from accentus, Lat. formerly elevated at the second syllable, now at the first.]

1. To pronounce, to speak words with particular regard to the grammatical marks or rules.

Having got somebody to mark the last syllable but one, where it is long, in words above two syllables (which is enough to regulate her pronunciation, and accenting the words) let her read daily in the gospels, and avoid understanding them in Latin, if she can.

Locke on Education, § 177.

2. In poetry, to pronounce or utter in general

O my unhappy lines! you that before
Have serv'd my youth to vent some wanton cries,
And, now congeal'd with grief, can scarce implore
Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies!

Wotton.

3. To write or note the accents.

ACCE'NTUAL.* adj. from accent.] Rhythmical; relating to accent.

The term figurate, which we now employ to distinguish florid from more simple melody, was used to denote that which was simply rhythmical or accentual.

Mason, Ch. Mus. p. 28.

In order to form any judgement of the versification of Chaucer, it is necessary we should know the syllabical value (if I may use the expression) of his words, and the accentual value of his syllables.

Tyrrhitt on Chaucer's Versification.

To ACCE'NTUATE. v. a. [accentuare, Fr.] To place the proper accents over the vowels.

ACCENTUA'TION. n. s. [from accentuate.]

1. The act of placing the accent in pronunciation.

2. Marking the accent in writing.

The division, scansion, and accentuation of all the rest of the Psalms in the bishop's edition, is left naked and destitute of demonstration, of all colour or shadow of proof whatsoever.

Lowth, Conf. of Bp. Hare, p. 18.

To ACCE'PT. v. a. [accipio, Lat. accepter, Fr.]

1. To take with pleasure; to receive kindly; to admit with approbation. It is distinguished from receive, as specifick from general; noting a particular manner of receiving.

Neither do ye kindle fire on my altar for nought. I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts, neither will I accept an offering at your hand.

Malachi, i. 10.

God is no respecter of persons: but, in every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.

Acts, x. 34, 35.

You have been graciously pleased to accept this tender of my duty.

Dryden, Dedication to his Fables.

Charm by accepting, by submitting away,
Yet have your humour most when you obey.

Pope.

2. It is used in a kind of juridical sense; as, to accept terms, accept a treaty.

They slaughtered many of the gentry, for whom no sex or age could be accepted for excuse.

Sidney.

His promise Palamon accepts, but pray'd
To keep it better than the first he made.

Dryden, Fables.

Those who have defended the proceedings of our negotiators at the treaty of Gertruydenburgh, dwell upon their zeal and patience in endeavouring to work the French up to their demands, but say nothing of the probability that France would ever accept them.

Swift.

3. In the language of the Bible, to accept persons, is to act with personal and partial regard.

He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

Job, xiii. 10.

4. It is sometimes used with the particle of.

I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterwards I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me.

Genesis, xxxii. 20.

5. To acknowledge, in a commercial sense. See ACCE'PTANCE, in law, &c.

The curate comforted him, and said, that as soon as his lord were found, he would deal with him to renew his grant, and write it in paper, according to the common use and practice; forasmuch as those which were written in tablets, were of no value, and would never be accepted or accomplished.

Sheldon, Tracts of D. Quin, fol. 59. b.

ACCEPTAB'ILITY. n. s. The quality of being acceptable. See ACCEPTABLE.

He hath given us his natural blood to be shed, for the remission of our sins, and for the obtaining the grace and acceptability of repentance.

Bp. Taylor, Worthly Communicant.

ACCE'PTABLE. adj. [acceptable, Fr. from the Latin.]

It is pronounced by some with the accent on the first syllable, as by Milton; by others, with the accent on the second, which is more analogical.

1. That which is likely to be accepted; grateful; pleasing. It is used with the particle to before the person accepting.

This woman, whom thou mad'st to be my help,
And gav'st me as thy perfect gift, so good,
So fit, so acceptable, so divine,
That from her hand I could expect no ill.

Paradise Lost, b. ii.

I do not see any other method left for men of that function to take, in order to reform the world, than by using all honest arts to make themselves acceptable to the laity.

Swift.

After he had made a peace so acceptable to the church, and so honourable to himself, he died with an extraordinary reputation of sanctity.

Addison on Italy.

ACCEPTABLENESS. n. s. [from acceptable.] The quality of being acceptable.

It will thereby take away the acceptableness of that conjunction.

Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, ii. 2.

ACCE'PTABLY. adv. [from acceptable.] In an acceptable manner; so as to please; with the particle to. For the accent, see ACCEPTABLE.

Do not omit thy prayers, for want of a good oratory; for he that prayeth upon God's account, cares not what he suffers, so he be the friend of Christ; nor where nor when he prays, so he may do it frequently, fervently, and acceptably.

Bp. Taylor.

If you can teach them to love and respect other people, they will, as your age requires it, find ways to express it acceptably to every one.

Locke on Education, § 145.

ACCE'PTANCE. n. s. [acceptance, Fr.]

1. Reception with approbation.

By that acceptance of his sovereignty, they also accepted of his laws; why then should any other laws be now used amongst them?

Spenser, State of Ireland.

If he tells us his noble deeds, we must also tell him our noble acceptance of them.

Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Thus I embolden'd spake, and freedom us'd
Permissive, and acceptance found.

Milton, P. L. viii. 435.

Some men cannot be fools with so good acceptance as others.

South, Sermons.

2. The meaning of a word as it is received or understood; acceptation is the word now commonly used.

That pleasure is man's chiefest good, because indeed it is the perception of good that is properly pleasure, is an assertion most certainly true, though, under the common acceptance of it, not only false but odious: for, according to this, pleasure and sensuality pass for terms equivalent; and therefore he, who takes it in this sense, alters the subject of the discourse.

South.

ACCE'PTANCE. n. s. [In law.] The receiving of a rent, whereby the giver binds himself, for ever, to allow a former fact done by another, whether it be in itself good or bad. Cowel.—[In commerce.] The acknowledgement of being accountable for the payment of a sum at a given period: as, the bill has been presented for acceptance.

ACCE'PTA'TION. n. s. [from accept.]

1. Reception, whether good or bad. This large sense seems now wholly out of use.

Yet, poor soul! know he no other, but that I do suspect, neglect, yea, and detest him! For, every day, he finds one way or other to set forth himself unto me; but all are rewarded with the like coldness of acceptance. Sidney, b. ii.

What is new finds better acceptance, than what is good or great. Denham, Sophy.

2. Good reception; acceptance.

Cain, envious of the acceptance of his brother's prayer and sacrifice, slew him; making himself the first manslayer, and his brother the first martyr. Raleigh, History of the World, b. i.

3. The state of being acceptable; regard.

Some things, although not so required of necessity, that, to leave them undone, excludeth from salvation, are notwithstanding of so great dignity and acceptance with God, that most ample reward in heaven is laid up for them. Hooker, b. ii.

They have those enjoyments only as the consequences of the state of esteem and acceptance they are in with their parents and governors. Locke on Education, § 53.

4. Acceptance in the juridical sense. This sense occurs rarely.

As, in order to the passing away a thing by gift, there is required a surrender of all right on his part that gives; so there is required also an acceptance on his part to whom it is given. South, Sermons.

5. The meaning of a word, as it is commonly received.

Thereupon the earl of Lauderdale made a discourse upon the several questions, and what acceptance these words and expressions had. Clarendon, b. viii.

All matter is either fluid or solid, in a large acceptance of the words, that they may comprehend even all the middle degrees between extreme fixedness and coherency, and the most rapid intestine motion of the particles of bodies. Bentley, Sermon.

ACCEPTER. † n. s. [from accept.] The person that accepts.

God is no accepter of persons; neither riches nor poverty are a means to procure his favour. Chillingworth, Sermon 3.

ACCEPTILATION. † n. s. [acceptilatio, Lat.] A term of the civil law, importing the remission of a debt by an acquittance from the creditor, testifying the receipt of money which has never been paid.

This payment or imaginary discharge of a debt, is made from the creditor to a debtor in this form: Tiens tu pas pour en, et receve ce que je t'ay promis ? says the debtor; whereto the other answers, Ouy, je le tiens. Codgrave.

ACCEPTION. † n. s. [acceptio, Fr. from acceptio, Lat.]

1. The received sense of a word; the meaning; which however, Dr. Johnson says, is not in use.

That this hath been esteemed the due and proper acceptance of this word, I shall testify by one evidence, which gave me the first hint of this notion. Hammond on Fundamentals.

To let pass the original sense and diverse acceptations of the word. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

Belief hath two acceptions most considerable; one more general and popular, the other more restrained and artificial.

Barrow, Expos. of the Creed, Works, i. 359.

2. Acceptance; the state of being accepted.

Neither those places of the scripture before alleged, neither the doctrine of the blessed martyr Cyprian, neither any other godly and learned man, when they, in extolling the dignity, profit, fruit, and effect, of virtuous and liberal alms, do say that it washeth away sins, and bringeth us to the favour of God, do mean that our work and charitable deeds is the original cause of our acceptance before God.

Homilies, b. ii. of Alms-Deeds.

ACCEPTIVE. * adj. [from accept.] Ready to accept.

The people generally are very acceptive, and apt to applaud any meritable work. B. Jonson, Case is altered, ii. 7.

ACCES. † n. s. [In some of its senses, it seems derived from accessus; in others, from accessio, Lat. acces, Fr. It is found often in modern works, with the accent on the first syllable.]

1. The way by which any thing may be approached.

The access of the town was only by a neck of land. Bacon.
There remained very advantageous accesses for temptations to enter and invade men, the fortifications being very slender, little knowledge of immortality, or any thing beyond this life, and no assurance that repentance would be admitted for sin.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

And here the access a gloomy grove defends;

And here the unavigable lake extends,
O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
No bird presumes to steer his airy flight. Dryden, Æneid, vi.

2. The means or liberty of approaching either to things or men.

When we are wrong'd, and would unfold our griefs,
We are deny'd access unto his person,
Ev'n by those men that most have done us wrong. Shakespeare.

They go commission'd to require a peace,
And carry presents to procure access. Dryden, Æneid, vii. 209.

He grants what they besought;
Instructed that to God is no access
Without Mediator, whose high office now
Moses in figure bears. Milton, P. L. xii. 239.

3. Encrease; enlargement; addition.

The gold was accumulated, and store of treasure, for the most part; but the silver is still growing. Besides, infinite is the access of territory and empire by the same enterprise.

Bacon, Holy War.

Nor think superfluous their aid;
I, from the influence of thy looks, receive
Access in every virtue; in thy sight
More wise, more watchful, stronger. Milton, P. L. b. ix.

Although to opinion there be many gods, may seem an access in religion, and such as cannot at all consist with atheism, yet doth it deductively, and upon inference, include the same; for unity is the inseparable and essential attribute of Deity.

Brown, Vulg. Err. i. 10.

The reputation
Of virtuous actions past, if not kept up
With an access, and fresh supply of new ones,
Is lost and soon forgotten. Denham, Sophy.

4. It is sometimes used, Dr. Johnson says, after the French, to signify the returns or fits of a distemper; but that this sense seems yet scarcely received into our language; to which, however, I do not accede. In this sense it is a word frequently occurring in the works of the father of English poetry; and common in later authors. Mr. Boucher has also observed that the glossarists pronounce the word to be common in Lancashire, Northumberland, and Scotland, as denoting the ague. The French accès de fièvre is also traced to the Latin. Alfè tribus puteis pari mensura aquas miscent, et prolabant novo fœtilli: reliquum dant in tertius accessu febrium bibendum. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. xxviii. c. 4. The Italians use accesso for a fit of an ague. See Florio's Dictionary.

— Upon him he had an hot access,
That day by day him shoke full pitouslie.

Chaucer, Black Knight, ver. 126.

If a man take their seeds [the seeds of the colocintida] of even number, and hang them about the neck or arms of them that have the ague, they will drive the access, or fit, away.

Holland, Tr. of Pliny, ii. 38.

The first accesses of this sickness. Donne's Devotions, p. 35.

For all relapses make diseases

More desperate than their first accesses. Hudibras.
There were many very apparent suspicions of his being poisoned: for though the first access looked like an apoplexy, yet it was plain in the progress of it that it was no apoplexy.

Burnet, Hist. of his own Time, 1685.

ACCESSARILY. * adv. [from accessory.] In the manner of an accessory.

ACCESSARINESS. n. s. [from accessory.] The state of being accessory.

Perhaps this will draw us into a negative accessariness to the mischief.

Devy of Picty

ACCESSARY. adj. [A corruption, as it seems, of the word accessory, which see; but now more commonly used than the proper word.] That which, without being the chief constituent of a crime, contributes to it. But it had formerly a good and general sense.

As for those things that are accessary hereunto, those things that so belong to the way of salvation, &c. Hooker, b. iii. § 3.

He had taken upon him the government of Hull, without any apprehension or imagination, that it would ever make him accessary to rebellion. Clarendon, b. viii.

A'CESSARY.* n. s. Formerly used in the senses of ACCESSORY, which see.

ACCE'SSIBLE.† adj. [accessibilis, Lat. accessibile, Fr.] That which may be approached; that which we may reach or arrive at.

It is applied both to persons and things, with the particle to, and without it.

Some lie more open to our senses and daily observation; others are more occult and hidden, and though accessible, in some measure, to our senses, yet not without great search and scrutiny, or some happy accident. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Those things, which were indeed inexplicable, have been racked and tortured to discover themselves, while the plainer and more accessible truths, as if despicable while easy, are clouded and obscured. Decay of Piety.

As an island, we are accessible on every side, and exposed to perpetual invasions; against which it is impossible to fortify ourselves sufficiently, without a power at sea. Addison, Freeholder.

It [charity] is most frankly accessible, most affable, most tractable, most sociable, most apt to interchange good offices.

Barrow's Works, i. 260.

In conversation, the tempers of men are open and accessible, their attention is awake, and their minds disposed to receive the strongest impressions; and what is spoken is generally more affecting, and more apposite to particular occasions. Rogers.

ACCE'SSION.† n. s. [accessio, Lat. accession, Fr.]

1. Encrease by something added, enlargement, augmentation.

Nor could all the king's bounties, nor his own large accessions, raise a fortune to his heir; but after vast sums of money, and great wealth gotten, he died unlamented. Clarendon.

There would not have been found the difference here set down betwixt the force of the air, when expanded, and what that force should have been according to the theory, but that the included inch of air received some little accession during the trial. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

The wisest among the nobles began to apprehend the growing power of the people; and therefore, knowing what an accession thereof would accrue to them, by such an addition of property, used all means to prevent it. Swift.

Charity, indeed, and works of munificence are the proper discharge of such over-proportioned accessions, and the only virtuous enjoyment of them. Rogers, Sermon.

2. The act of coming to, or joining one's self to; as, accession to a confederacy.

Beside, what wise objections he prepares

Against my late accession to the wars?

Does not the fool perceive his argument

Is with more force against Achilles bent?

I am free from any accession by knowledge, contriving, counsel, or any other way, to his late majesty's death. Dryden, Fables.

Mar. of Argyle, Speech on the Scaffold.

3. The act of arriving at; as, the king's accession to the throne.

King Edward after his restoration, or rather first accession to the crown, ever appeared more favourable and partial to the Normans than was well resented by his English subjects in general. Temple, Intr. Hist. of England.

4. Approach.

Should steady spring exclude summer's accession?

Or summer spoil the spring with furious hot oppression?

More, Song of the Soul, 2. iii. § 4.

5. The beginning of a paroxysm, like access.

These disabilities may be increased by the accession of bodily distempers. South, Sermon, ix. 223.

A'CESSORILY. adv. [from accessory.] In the manner of an accessory.

A'CESSORY. adj. Joined to another thing, so as to increase it; additional.

In this kind there is not the least action, but it doth somewhat make to the accessory augmentation of our bliss. Hooker.

A'CESSORY.† n. s. [accessorius, Lat. accessoire, Fr.] This word, which had anciently a general signification, is now almost confined to forms of law.]

1. Applied to persons.

A man that is guilty of a felonious offence, not principally, but by participation; as, by commandment, advice, or concealment. And a man may be accessory to the offence of another, after two sorts, by the common law, or by statute: and, by the common law, two ways also; that is, before or after the fact. Before the fact; as, when one commandeth or adviseth another to commit a felony, and is not present at the execution thereof; for his presence makes him also a principal; wherefore there cannot be an accessory before the fact in manslaughter; because manslaughter is sudden and not premeditated. Accessory after the fact, is, when one receiveth him, whom he knoweth to have committed felony. Accessory by statute, is he that abets, counsels, or hides any man committing, or having committed an offence made felony by statute. Cowell.

By the common law, the accessories cannot be proceeded against, till the principal has received his trial.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

But pause, my soul! and study, ere thou fall

On accidental joys, th' essential.

Still before accessories do abide

A trial, must the principal be try'd.

Donne.

Now were all transform'd

Alike, to serpents all, as accessories

To his bold riot.

Milton, P. L. x. 520.

2. Applied to thing.

An accessory is said to be that which does accede unto some principal fact or thing in law; and, as such, generally speaking, follows the reason and nature of its principal. Ayliffe.

3. That which advances a design; he who contributes towards it.

When there is joy in the presence of the angels of God for a sinner that repents, he may be an immediate accessory to that blessed triumph, and be concerned beyond the rate of a bare spectator. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 3.

Diet was a casual thing, and an accessory to their lives, who were bred in Parthian education, and had nothing until they could catch it. Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iv. 22.

A'CCIDENCE.† n. s. [a corruption of accidents, from accidentia, Lat. It is written accedence by Milton, as accidentiary is written accedentiary by bishop Morton.] The little book containing the first rudiments of grammar, and explaining the properties of the eight parts of speech.

I do confess I do want eloquence,

And never yet did learn mine accidence. Taylor the Water-poet.

Learning first the accidence then the grammar.

Milton, Accedence commenced Grammar.

A'CCIDENT. n. s. [accidens, Lat.]

1. The property or quality of any being, which may be separated from it, at least in thought.

If she were but the body's accident,

And her sole being did in it subsist,

As white in snow, she might herself absent,

And in the body's substance not be miss'd. Sir John Davies.

An accidental mode, or an accident, is such a mode as is not necessary to the being of a thing; for the subject may be without it, and yet remain of the same nature that it was before; or it is that mode which may be separated or abolished from its subject. Watts, Logic.

2. In grammar, the property of a word.

The learning of a language is nothing else but the informing of ourselves, what composites of letters are, by consent and institution, to signify such certain notions of things, with their modalities and accidents. Holder, Elements of Speech.

3. That which happens unforeseen; casualty, chance.

General laws are like general rules in physics, according whereunto, as no wise man will desire himself to be cured, if there be joined with his disease some special accident, in regard whereof, that whereby others in the same infirmity, but without the like accident, recover health, would be, to him, either hurtful, or, at the best, unprofitable. Hooker, v. 9.

The flood, and other accidents of time, made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden. Raleigh, Hist. World.

Our joy is turn'd
Into perplexity, and new amaze
For whither is he gone? What accident
Hath rapt him from us?

Milton, P. R.

And trivial accidents shall be forborn,
That others may have time to take their turn. Dryden, Fables.

The reformation owed nothing to the good intentions of king Henry. He was only an instrument of it (as the logicians speak) by accident. Swift, Miscell.

ACCIDENTAL. † n. s. [accidental, Fr. See ACCIDENT.]

A property nonessential.

Its similitude consisteth partly in essentials, or the likeness of nature; partly in accidentals, or the likeness in figure, or affections. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

Conceive, as much as you can, of the essentials of any subject, before you consider its accidentals. Watts, Logick.

ACCIDENTAL. † adj. [from accident.]

1. Having the quality of an accident, nonessential; used with the particle to, before that in which the accident inheres.

A distinction is to be made between what pleases naturally in itself, and what pleases upon the account of machines, actors, dances, and circumstances, which are merely accidental to the tragedy. Rymer, Tragedies of the last Age.

This is accidental to a state of religion, and therefore ought to be reckoned among the ordinary difficulties of it. Tillotson.

2. Casual, fortuitous, happening by chance.

Thy sin's not accidental, but a trade. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

So shall you hear
Of accidental judgements, casual slaughters;
Of deaths put on by cunning, and forc'd cause.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Look upon things of the most accidental and mutable nature; accidental in their production, and mutable in their continuance; yet God's prescience of them is as certain in him, as the memory of them is, or can be, in us. South, Serm.

3. In the following passage it seems to signify adventitious.

Ay, such a minister as wind to fire,
That adds an accidental fierceness to
Its natural fury.

Denham's Sophy.

ACCIDENTALLY. † adv. [from accidental.]

1. After an accidental manner; nonessentially.

Other points no less concern the commonwealth, though but accidentally depending upon the former. Spenser, State of Irel.

I conclude choler accidentally bitter, and acrimonious, but not in itself. Harvey on Consumptions.

2. Casually, fortuitously.

Although virtuous men do sometimes accidentally make their way to preferment, yet the world is so corrupted, that no man can reasonably hope to be rewarded in it, merely upon account of his virtue. Swift, Miscell.

ACCIDENTALNESS. n. s. [from accidental.] The quality of being accidental. *Dict.ACCIDENTIARY. † adj. [from accident.] Belonging to the accidents or accident.

You know the word "sacerdotes" to signify priests, and not the lay-people, which every accidentiary boy in schools knoweth as well as you. Bp. Marton's Discharge, p. 186.

ACCIPIENT. n. s. [accipiens, Lat.] A receiver, perhaps sometimes used for recipient. *Dict.To ACCITE. † v. a. [Dr. Johnson derives this from the doubtful word accito; Mr. Boucher, from accitus, the participle of the preter tense of the verb accitor, to be sent for, or summoned. The word is now written cited.] To call; to summon; a word not in use now.

Our coronation done, we will accite

(As I before remember'd) all our state;

And, heaven consigning to my good intents,

No prince, no peer, shall have just cause to say,

Heaven shorten Harry's happy life one day. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He under foot hath trodden in my sight

My strong men; he did company accite

To break my young men.

Donne's Poems, p. 354.

To ACCLAIM. † v. n. [Lat. acclamo. Dr. Johnson erroneously says, that this verb is lost. See the substantive ACCLAIM.] To applaud.

That, which is the purer from error and corruption, must take the wall, managré all the loud throats of acclaiming parasites. Rp. Hall, Remains, p. 403.

Attended by a glad acclaiming train

Of those he rescued had from gaping hell,

Then turn'd the knight.

Thomson, Castle of Indol. c. 2.

ACCLAIM. † n. s. [acclamo, Lat. from which probably first the verb acclaim, now lost, Dr. Johnson says, but not accurately; and then the noun.] A shout of praise, acclamation.

Back from pursuit thy Powers, with loud acclaim,

Thee only extol'd.

Milton, P. L. iii. 397.

The herald ends; the vaulted firmament

With loud acclaims, and vast applause, is rent. Dryden, Fables.

ACCLAMATION. † n. s. [acclamatio, Lat.].

1. Shouts of applause; such as those with which a victorious army salutes the general.

It hath been the custom of Christian men, in token of the greater reverence, to stand, to utter certain words of acclamation, and, at the name of Jesus, to bow. Hooker, v. 29.

Gladly then he mix'd

Among those friendly Powers, who him receiv'd

With joy, and acclamations loud, that one,

That, of so many myriads fall'n, yet one

Return'd, not lost.

Milton, P. L. vi. 23.

Such an enchantment is there in words, and so fine a thing does it seem to some, to be ruined plausibly, and to be ushered to their destruction with panegyrick and acclamation. South.

2. Unanimous and immediate election.

When they [the Saxons] consented to any thing, it was rather in the way of acclamation, than by the exercise of a deliberative voice, or a regular assent or negative.

Burke, Abr. Eng. Hist. ii. 7.

ACCLAMATORY. † adj. [from acclaim.] Pertaining to acclamation.

ACCLIVE. † adj. [Lat. acclivis.] Rising.

From hence to Gorhamby is about a little mile, the way easily ascending, hardly so acclive as a desk.

Letters, Aubrey's Acc. of Verulam, ii. 231.

ACCLIVITY. n. s. [from acclivus, Lat.] The steepness or slope of a line inclining to the horizon, reckoned upwards; as, the ascent of an hill is the acclivity, the descent is the declivity. Quincy.

The men, leaving their wives and younger children below, do, not without some difficulty, clamber up the acclivities, dragging their kine with them, where they feed them, and milk them, and make butter and cheese, and do all the dairy work.

Ray on the Creation.

ACCLIVOUS. † adj. [acclivus, Lat.] Rising with a slope.

To ACCLOY. † v. a. [Junius refers the etymology of this word to clog; which indeed seems to give occasionally the same meaning. Others cite the Fr. encloquer, to lock up, from claudo. The Promptuarium Parvulorum gives acclavo. The modern word is cloy.]

1. To fill up, in an ill sense; to crowd, to stuff full; a word almost obsolete.

At the well-head the purest streams arise :
But mucky filth his branching arms annoys,
And with uncomely weeds the gentle wave accloys.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 3.

- 2 To fill to satiety ; in which sense clay is still in use.
They that escape best in the temperate zone, would be accloyed with long nights, very tedious, no less than forty days.

Ray on the Creation.

To ACCOIL. v. n. See COIL. To croud, to keep a coil about, to bustle, to be in a hurry ; a word now out of use.

About the cauldron many cooks accoil'd,
With hooks and ladles, as need did require ;
The while the viands in the vessel boil'd,
They did about their business sweat, and sorely toil'd.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 3.

A'CCOLENT. n. s. [accolens, Lat.] He that inhabits near a place ; a borderer. Dict.

ACCOMMODABLE. adj. [accommodabilis, Lat.] That which may be fitted ; with the particle to.

As there is infinite variety in the circumstances of persons, things, actions, times, and places ; so we must be furnished with such general rules as are accommodable to all this variety, by a wise judgement and discretion. Watts, Logic.

ACCOMMODABLENESS. * n. s. The capability of accommodating.

To ACCOMMODATE. † v. a. [accommodo, Lat.]

1. To supply with conveniencies of any kind. Sometimes having with.

These three, —

(The rest do nothing,) with this word, stand, stand, Accommodated by the place, (more charming
With their own nobleness, which could have turn'd
A distaff to a lance,) gilds pale looks. Shakspeare, Cymb.

He, for his part, would so accommodate him with all things necessary, as he might enter into the town with decency and authority due to his person. Shelton, Trans. of D. Quix. i. iv. 15.

2. With the particle to, to adapt, to fit, to make consistent with.

He had altered many things, not that they were not natural before, but that he might accommodate himself to the age in which he lived. Dryden on Dram. Poet.

'Twas his misfortune to light upon an hypothesis, that could not be accommodated to the nature of things, and human affairs ; his principles could not be made to agree with that constitution and order which God had settled in the world. Locke.

3. Without to.

If my lord of Ormond, in this interim, doth accommodate things well, (as it is said he doth,) I take it, he hath always good understanding with your lordship. Bacon to the Earl of Essex.

Mankind by tradition had learned to accommodate the worship of their God by appropriating some place to that use.

Mede, Reverence of God's House, p. 5.

4. To reconcile ; to adjust what seems inconsistent or at variance ; to make consistency appear.

Part know how to accommodate St. James and St. Paul better than some late reconcilers. Norris.

The dispute between the king and the pope was accommodated. Louth, Life of Wykeham, § 3.

5. Phillips, in his Dictionary, defines this word thus : To fit, to apply ; also to lend. In this last sense it is still used among monied men ; who advance sums, they say, by way of accommodation.

To ACCOMMODATE. v. n. To be conformable to.

They make the particular ensigns of the twelve tribes accommodate unto the twelve signs of the zodiac. Brown.

Neither sort of chymists have duly considered how great variety there is in the textures and consistencies of compound bodies ; and how little the consistence and duration of many of them seem to accommodate and be explicable by the proposed notion. Boyle, Scept. Chym.

ACCOMMODATE. adj. [accommodatus, Lat.] Suitable, fit ; used sometimes with the particle for, but more frequently with to.

They are so acted and directed by nature, as to cast their eggs in such places as are most accommodate for the exclusion of their young, and where there is food ready for them so soon as they be hatched. Ray on the Creation.

In these cases, we examine the why, the what, and the how, of things, and propose means accommodate to the end.

L' Estrange.

God did not primarily intend to appoint this way of worship, and to impose it upon them as that which was most proper and agreeable to him, but that he condescended to it as most accommodate to their present state and inclination. Tillotson.

ACCOMMODATELY. † adv. [from accommodate.] Suitably, fitly.

Of all these [causes] Moses his wisdom held fit to give an account accommodately to the capacity of the people.

More, Conj. Cabb. p. 130.

ACCOMMODATENESS. * n. s. [from accommodate.] Fitness.

I have now shown the fitness and suitableness of the Gospel to the end for which it was designed, in that it is furnished with all those arguments of credibility that may beget assent in rational persons ; but its aptness and accommodateness to the great purpose of men's salvation may further be demonstrated.

Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, p. 80.

ACCOMMODATION. † n. s. [from accommodate.]

1. Provision of conveniencies.

We read of the prophet's accommodation and furniture in the house of the Shunamite, (11 Kings, iv. 10.) a little chamber, a table, a stool, and a candlestick. South, Sermon ix. 276.

Ambition, or untimely desire of promotion to an higher state, or place, under colour of accommodation or necessary provision, is a common temptation to men of eminency, especially being single men. Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 9.

2. In the plural, conveniencies, things requisite to ease or refreshment.

The king's commissioners were to have such accommodations, as the other thought fit to leave to them ; who had been very civil to the king's commissioners. Clarendon, b. viii.

Though there is no violence used to drive out an inhabitant, yet bad accommodations will make him dislodge.

South, Sermon ix. 157.

3. Adaptation, fitness ; with the particle to.

Indeed that disputing physiology is no accommodation to your designs, which are not to teach men to cant endlessly about materia and forma. Glennville, Sceptis.

The organization of the body, with accommodation to its functions, is fitted with the most curious mechanism. Hale, Origin.

4. Without to.

I am neither prophet nor prophetick prelate, but account it enough for my purpose, if I can bring my present business and the text together, not by design, but accommodation.

South, Sermon v. 57.

5. Having with.

Socinus's main design, or pretence at least, was to bring all the mysteries of Christianity to a full accommodation with the general notions of man's reason ; and so far the design was, no doubt, fair and laudable enough, had it kept within the bounds of a sober prosecution. South, Sermon v. 127.

6. Composition of a difference, reconciliation, adjustment.

The discords of the citizens, used to be healed by accommodations, were decided by the sword.

Fanshawe, Disc. on the Civ. Wars of Rome.

So great a demand, as the bishop had upon his predecessor's executors for dilapidations, could not very soon, or very easily, be brought to an accommodation : however, the account was at last settled between them without proceeding on either side to any action at law. Louth, Life of Wykeham, § 3.

ACCOMMODATOR. * n. s. He who manages or adjusts a thing.

Mahomet wanted the refinement of our modern accommodators. Wurburton, Doct. of Grace, ii. 331.

ACCOMPANABLE. adj. [from accompany.] Sociable ; a word now not used.

A show, as it were, of an accompanable solitariness, and of a civil wildness. Sidney, Arcad. i. 6.

ACCOMPANIER. n. s. [from accompany.] The person that makes part of the company; companion. Dict.
ACCOMPANIMENT.* n. s. [from accompany.] That which attends a thing or person.

Modern composers judiciously affix a violin accompaniment to the vocal part. Mason on Church Music, p. 74.

Without the accompaniment of the scenery and action of the opera, without the assistance either of the scene-painter, or of the poet, or of both, the instrumental music of the orchestra could produce none of the effects which are here ascribed to it.

A. Smith on the Imitative Arts, ii.

Anger is drawn with great force, and his accompaniments are boldly feigned.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry.

Just enough of the towering structure is shewn, to make an accompaniment to the tufted expanse of venerable verdure, and to compose a picturesque association.

Warton, Notes to Milton's Smaller Poems.

To ACCOMPANY. v. a. [from accompagner, Fr.]

1. To be with another as a companion. It is used both of persons and things.

Go visit her, in her chaste bower of rest,
 Accompany'd with angel-like delights. Spenser, Sonnet iii.

The great business of the senses being to make us take notice of what hurts or advantages the body, it is wisely ordered by nature that pain should accompany the reception of several ideas. Locke.

As folly is usually accompanied with perverseness, so it is here. Swift, Short View of Ireland.

2. To have commerce with another sex; as Johnson explains converse. Our old dictionaries notice this sense of the word: "Dishonestly to accompany a woman; to constiprate." Cockeram. Sir T. Smith uses the verb company in the same signification. See also ACCOMPANY. v. n.

In gross darkness the phasma, having assumed a bodily shape, or other false representation, accompanies her, at least as she imagines. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 374.

To ACCOMPANY. v. n.

1. To associate with; to become a companion to.
 No man in effect doth accompany with others, but he learneth, ere he is aware, some gesture, voice, or fashion. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. To cohabit.

The king—took the maid away with him, advanced her above her lady, loved her, and accompanied with her only, till he married Elfrida. Milton, Hist. of Eng. b. v.

ACCOMPLICE. n. s. [from complice, Fr. from compleo, a word in the barbarous Latin, much in use.]

1. An associate, a partaker; usually in an ill sense.

There were several scandalous reports industriously spread by Wood and his accomplices, to discourage all opposition against his infamous project. Swift.

2. A partner, or co-operator; in a sense indifferent.

If a tongue would be talking without a mouth, what could it have done, when it had all its organs of speech, and accomplices of sound, about it. Addison, Spectator, No. 247.

3. It is used with the particle to before a thing, and with before a person.

Childless Arturius, vastly rich before,
 Thus by his losses multiplies his store,
 Suspected for accomplice to the fire,
 That burnt his palace but to build it higher. Dryden, Juv. Sat.
 Who, should they steal, for want of his relief,
 He judg'd himself accomplice with the thief. Dryden, Job.

To ACCOMPLISH. v. a. [from accomplir, Fr. from compleo, Lat.]

1. To complete, to execute fully; as, to accomplish a design.

He that is far off shall die of the pestilence, and he that is near shall fall by the sword, and he that remaineth, and is besieged, shall die by the famine. Thus will I accomplish my fury upon them. Ezekiel, vi. 12.

2. To complete a period of time.

He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. Daniel, ix. 2.

3. To fulfil; as, a prophecy.

The vision,

Which I made known to Lucius ere the stroke
 Of this yet scarce cold battle, at this instant
 Is full accomplish'd. Shakespeare, Cymb.

We see every day those events exactly accomplished, which our Saviour foretold at so great a distance. Addison.

4. To gain, to obtain.

Tell him from me (as he will win my love)

He bear himself with honourable action;
 Such as he hath observ'd in noble ladies
 Unto their lords, by them accomplished. Shakespeare, Tam. of S.

I'll make my heaven in a lady's lap.
 Oh miserable thought, and more unlikely,
 Than to accomplish twenty golden crowns. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

5. To adorn, or furnish, either mind or body.

From the tents

The armourers accomplishing the knights,
 With busy hammers closing rivets up,
 Give dreadful note of preparation. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

ACCOMPLISHABLE.* adj. Capable of accomplishment.

ACCOMPLISHED. part. adj.

1. Complete in some qualification.

For who expects that, under a tutor, a young gentleman should be an accomplished public orator or logician. Locke.

2. Elegant; finished in respect of embellishments; used commonly of acquired qualifications, without including moral excellence.

The next I took to wife,

O that I never had! fond wish too late,
 Was in the vale of Soree, Dalila,
 That specious monster, my accomplish'd snare. Milton, S. A.

ACCOMPLISHER. v. n. [from accomplish.] The person that accomplishes.

Such inspiration as this is no distractor from, but an accomplicher and enlarger of, human faculties.

Morc, Conj. Cabb. Pref. A. 7. b.

Mahumed did not make good his pretences of being the last accomplicher of the mosaical economy.

L. Addison, Life of Mahumed, p. 41.

ACCOMPLISHMENT. n. s. [from accomplissement, Fr.]

1. Completion, full performance, perfection.

This would be the accomplishment of their common felicity, in case, by their evil, either through destiny or advice, they suffered not the occasion to be lost. Sir John Haywood.

Thereby he might evade the accomplishment of those afflictions, he now but gradually endureth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He thought it impossible to find, in any one body, all those perfections which he sought for the accomplishment of a Helena; because nature, in any individual person, makes nothing that is perfect in all its parts. Dryden, Dufres. Pref.

2. Completion; as, of a prophecy.

The miraculous success of the apostles preaching, and the accomplishment of many of their predictions, which, to those early Christians, were matters of faith only, are, to us, matters of sight and experience. Atterbury, Sermons.

3. Embellishment, elegance, ornament of mind or body.

Young heirs, and elder brothers, from their own reflecting upon the estates they are born to, and therefore thinking all other accomplishments unnecessary, are of no manner of use but to keep up their families. Addison, Spectator, No. 123.

4. The act of obtaining or perfecting any thing; attainment; completion.

The means suggested by policy and worldly wisdom, for the attainment of those earthly enjoyments, are unfit for that purpose, not only upon the account of their insufficiency for, but also of their frequent opposition and contrariety to, the accomplishment of such ends. South, Sermons.

ACCOMPT. n. s. [Fr. compter and compte, anciently acompter. Skinner.] An account, a reckoning.

See ACCOUNT.

The soul may have time to call itself to a just account of all things past, by means whereof repentance is perfected.

Hooker, iv. 46.

Each Christmas they accounts did clear;
And wound their bottom round the year.

ACCO'MPTABLE.* adj. Accountable.

I am deaf,
And, following my will, I do not stand
Accomptable to reason.

Braun, and Fl. Span. Cur. A. and S. ult.

ACCO'MPTANT. n. s. [Accomptant, Fr.] A reckoner, computer. See ACCOUNTANT.

As the account runs on, generally the accountant goes backward.

South, Sermons.

ACCO'MPTING-DAY. The day on which the reckoning is to be settled.

To whom thou much dost owe, thou much must pay;
Think on the debt against the accounting-day.

Sir J. Denham.

To ACCORD.† v. a. [Fr. accorder; derived, by some, from corda, the string of a musical instrument, by others, from corda, hearts; in the first, implying harmony, in the other, unity.]

1. To make agree; to adjust one thing to another; with the particle to.

The first sports the shepherds showed, were full of such leaps and gambols, as being accorded to the pipe which they bore in their mouths, even as they danced, made a right picture of their chief god Pan, and his companions the satyrs.

Sidney, b. i.

Her hands accorded the lute's musick to the voice; her panting heart danced to the music.

Sidney, b. ii.

The lights and shades, whose well accorded strife
Gives all the strength and colour of our life.

Pope, Epist.

2. To bring to agreement; to compose; to accommodate.

Men would not rest upon bare contracts without reducing the debt into a specialty, which created much certainty, and accorded many suits.

Sir M. Hale.

Which may better accord all difficulties.

South, Sermons.

3. To grant; as, he accorded his request. But it is rarely so used.

To ACCORD.† v. n.

1. To agree, to suit one with another; with the particle with.

Things are often spoke, and seldom meant;
But that my heart accordeth with my tongue,
Seeing the deed is meritorious,
And to preserve my sovereign from his foe.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Several of the main parts of Moses's history, as concerning the flood, and the first fathers of the several nations of the world, do very well accord with the most ancient accounts of profane history.

Tillotson, Sermon i.

Jarring interests of themselves create
The according musick of a well-mixt state.

Pope.

2. With the particle in.

The lusty throstle, early nightingale,
Accord in tune, though vary in their tale.

B. Jonson, Masques. Vis. of Delight.

ACCO'RD. n. s. [accord, Fr.]

1. A compact; an agreement; adjustment of a difference.

There was no means for him to satisfy all obligations to God and man, but to offer himself for a mediator of an accord and peace between them.

Bacon's Hen. VII.

If both are satisfy'd with this accord,
Swear by the laws of knighthood on my sword.

Dryden, Fab.

2. Concurrence, union of mind.

At last such grace I found, and means I wrought,
That I that lady to my spouse had won,
Accord of friends, consent of parents sought,
Affiance made, my happiness begun.

Spenser, F. Q.

They gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and Israel, with one accord.

Joshua, x. 2.

3. Harmony, symmetry, just correspondence of one thing with another.

Beauty is nothing else but a just accord and mutual harmony of the members, animated by a healthful constitution.

Dryden, Duffrenoy, Pref.

4. Musical note.

Try if there were in one steeple two bells of union, whether the striking of the one would move the other, more than if it were another accord.

Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 281.

We must not blame Apollo, but his lute,
If false accords from her false strings be sent.

Sir J. Davies.

5. Own accord; voluntary motion: used both of persons and things.

Ne Guyon yet spake word,

Till that they came unto an iron door,

Which to them open'd of its own accord.

Spenser, F. Q.

Will you blame any man for doing that of his own accord, which all men should be compelled to do, that are not willing of themselves.

Hooker.

All animal substances, exposed to the air, turn alkaline of their own accord; and some vegetables, by heat, will not turn acid, but alkaline.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

6. Action in speaking, correspondent to the words.

Titus, I am come to talk with thee.—

—No, not a word: how can I grace my talk,

Wanting a hand to give it that accord?

Titus Andronicus.

ACCO'RDABLE.* adj. [Fr. One of our oldest adjectives, adopted immediately from the French.]

Agreeable; consonant. Not now in use.

It is not discordable

Unto my words, but accordable.

Gower, Conf. Am. B. 5.

ACCO'RDANCE.† n. s. [from accord.]

1. Agreement with a person; with the particle with.

And prays he may in long accordance bide

With that great worth which hath such wonders wrought.

Fairfax, ii. st. 63.

2. Conformity to something.

The only way of defining of sin, is, by the contrariety to the Will of God; as of good, by the accordance with that Will.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

3. With to.

There are but two principal ways to understand every accordance to the Word of God.

Bp. Morton, Epis. Asserted, p. 24.

In accordance to which his generous freedom in alms and hospitality, he further obliged his parishioners in the setting of their tithes and dues belonging to him.

Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

4. It is also used without any preposition.

The best reason of accordance.

Bp. Morton, Cath. Appeale, p. 301.

Holy Athanasius interposed, shewing them their own unknown, and unacknowledged accordance.

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 61.

ACCORDANCY.* n. s. The same as ACCORDANCE.

This accordancy shews, that it was the narrative upon which the persons acted, and which they had received from their teachers.

Paley, View of the Evid. of Christianity.

ACCO'RDANT.† adj. [accordant, Fr.] Dr. Johnson gives an example of this word in the sense of willing, in good humour; but says, that it is not in use. It is, however, in use; and very justly, in the sense of consonant, or corresponding. The word, indeed, is properly the participle present of the verb accord; the termination of the present tense being formerly, after the Latin idiom, ant and and; as, glitterand, walkand, &c. It is found indeed in our oldest writers. "Take in remembrance a title accordant unto this," Gower, Conf. Am. B. 6.

The prince discovered that he loved your niece, and meant to acknowledge it this night in a dance; and, if he found her accordant, he meant to take the present title by the top, and instantly break with you of it.

Shakspeare, Much ado about Nothing.

It must lose all power of pleasing, if novel arrangements of melodious sounds do not rather lead than follow their accordant harmonies.

Mason on Church Musick, p. 68.

— Thou, Humanity shalt lead along
The accordant passions in their moral song,
And give our mental concert truest harmony. Mason, Elfrida.

ACCORDANTLY. * adv. In an accordant manner.

ACCORDER. * n. s.

An acorder, with, or assenter unto, another; an assistant, helper, favourer. Colgrave in V. Astipulateur.

ACCORDING. † prep. [from accord, of which it is properly a participle, and is therefore never used but with to.]

1. In a manner suitable to, agreeably to, in proportion.

Our churches are places provided, that the people might there assemble themselves in due and decent manner, according to their several degrees and orders. Hooker, v. 13.

Our zeal, then, should be according to knowledge. And what kind of knowledge? Without all question, first, according to the true, saving, evangelical knowledge. It should be according to the Gospel, the whole Gospel: not only according to its truths, but precepts: not only according to its free grace, but necessary duties: not only according to its mysteries, but also its commandments. Sprat, Sermons.

Noble is the fame that is built on candour and ingenuity, according to those beautiful lines of Sir John Denham.

Addison, Spectator.

2. With regard to.

God made all things in number, weight, and measure, and gave them to be considered by us according to these properties, which are inherent in created beings. Holder on Time.

3. In proportion. The following phrase is, I think, vitious.

A man may, with prudence and a good conscience, approve of the professed principles of one party more than the other, according as he thinks they best promote the good of church and state. Swift on the Sentiments of a Ch. of Englandman.

4. Spenser, by a poetical licence, once quits the usual adjunct to.

To adornethly forme according thy desert. F. Q. ii. iv. 26.

ACCORDINGLY. adv. [from accord.] Agreeably, suitably, conformably.

As the actions of men are of sundry distinct kinds, so the laws thereof must accordingly be distinguished. Hooker, b. i.

Sirrah, thou'rt said to have a stubborn soul,
That apprehends no further than this world;
And squar'st thy life accordingly. Shakspeare, Mens. for Mens.

Whoever is so assured of the authority and sense of scripture, as to believe the doctrine of it, and to live accordingly, shall be saved. Tillotson's Preface.

Mealy substances, fermented, turn sour. Accordingly, given to a weak child, they still retain their nature; for bread will give them the colick. Arbuthnot on Measles.

TO ACCORPORATE. * v. a. [from ad and corpus, Lat.] To unite. Dr. Johnson notices adcorporate, under which word he refers to the more usual expression accorporate, as existing in his dictionary; of which, however, there is no other notice.

Custom being but a mere face, as echo is a mere voice, rests not in ~~the~~ unaccomplishment, until by secret inclination she accorporate herself with error.

Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Div. Pref.

TO ACCOST. † v. a. [Fr. accoster, Ital. accostare, from the Lat. ad and costa.]

1. To approach; to draw near; to come side by side, or face to face. See Colgrave in Accoster. The word did not mean, in Shakspeare's time, "to speak to first, to address, or to salute," as Dr. Johnson has asserted; and perhaps there is no example, as Mr. Malone observes, of its being used in that sense so early as that period.

Accost, Sir Andrew, accost: What's that? — Accost, is, front her, board her, woo her, assail her. Twelfth Night, i. iii.

2. To speak to first; to address.

At length, collecting all his serpent wiles,
With soothing words renew'd him thus accosts.

Milton, Par. Reg. iii. 6.

I first accosted him; I sued, I sought,
And, with a loving force, to Pheneis brought. Dryden, Eneid.
He [St. Paul] was not only accosted, but even worried with a messenger from Satan. South, Sermon vi. 173.

TO ACCOST. * v. n. To adjoin. Obsolete.

all the shores, which to the sea accost,

He day and night doth ward both far and wide.

Spenser, F. Q. v. xi. 42.

ACCO'STABLE. † adj. [from accost.] Easy of access; familiar; which, however, Dr. Johnson says, is not in use. Neither it, nor its derivatives accostableness, or accostably, are indeed common.

The French are a free and accostable people, both men and women. Honch's Letters, li. 12.

They were both indubitable, strong, and high-minded men yet of sweet and accostable nature, almost equally delighting in the press and affluence of dependents and servants.

Wotton, Rem. p. 183.

ACCO'STED. * part. adj. In heraldry, signifies side by side.

ACCOUCHEUR. * n. s. Fr. what we call a man-midwife. It is now commonly used as the delicate appellation for our own strange compound.

ACCOUNT. n. s. [from the old French acompt, from computus, Lat.; it was originally written acompt, which see; but, by gradually softening the pronunciation, in time the orthography changed to account.]

1. A computation of debts or expenses; a register of facts relating to money.

At many times I brought in my accounts,

Laid them before you; yon would I throw them off,

And say you found them in mine honesty. Shakspeare, Timon.

When my young master has once got the skill of keeping accounts (which is a business of reason more than arithmetic) perhaps it will not be amiss, that his father from thenceforth require him to do it in all his concerns. Locke on Educ.

2. The state or result of a computation; as, the account stands thus between us.

Behold the have I found, saith the preacher, counting one by one, to find out the account. Ecclesiast. viii. 27.

3. Such a state of persons or things, as may make them more or less worthy of being considered in the reckoning. Value, or estimation.

For the care that they took for their wives and their children, their brethren and kindred, was in least account with them: but the greatest and principal fear was for the holy temple.

2 Maccab. xv. 18.

That good affection, which things of smaller account have once set on work, is by so much the more easily raised higher.

Hooker, v. 35.

I should make more account of their judgment who are men of sense, and yet have never touched a pencil, than of the opinion given by the greatest part of painters. Dryden, Dufresne.

4. Profit; advantage; to turn to account is to produce advantage.

We would establish our souls in such a solid and substantial virtue, as will turn to account in that great day, when it must stand the test of infinite wisdom and justice.

Addison, Spect. No. 399.

5. Distinction, dignity, rank.

There is such a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apostrophizing Ennius, it is generally applied, by that poet, only to men of account and distinction. Pope, Odys. Notes.

6. A reckoning verified by finding the value of a thing equal to what it was accounted.

Considering the usual motives of human actions, which are pleasure, profit, and ambition, I cannot yet comprehend how those persons find their account in any of the three. Swift.

The soul may have time to call itself to a just account of all things past, by means whereof repentance is perfected.

Hooker, ¶ 46.

Each Christmas they accounts did clear;
And wound their bottom round the year.

Prior.

ACCOMPTABLE. * adj. Accountable.

I am deaf,

And, following my will, I do not stand
Accomptable to reason.

Beaum. and Fl. Span. Cür. A. and S. ult.

ACCOMPTANT. n. s. [accomptant, Fr.] A reckoner, computer. See ACCOUNTANT.

As the account runs on, generally the accomptant goes backward.

South, Sermons.

ACCOMPTING-DAY. The day on which the reckoning is to be settled.

To whom thou much dost owe, thou much must pay;
Think on the debt against the accompting-day.

Sir J. Denham.

To ACCORD. † v. a. [Fr. accorder; derived, by some, from corda, the string of a musical instrument, by others, from corda, hearts; in the first, implying harmony, in the other, unity.]

1. To make agree; to adjust one thing to another; with the particle to.

The first sports the shepherds showed, were full of such leaps and gambols, as being accorded to the pipe which they bore in their mouths, even as they danced, made a right picture of their chief god Pan, and his companions the satyrs.

Sidney, b. i.

Her hands accorded the lute's musick to the voice; her panting heart danced to the musick.

If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on my account. Philemon, i. 8.

This must be always remembered, that nothing can come into the account of recreation, that is not done with delight.

Locke on Educ. § 197.

In matters where his judgement led him to oppose men on a publick account, he would do it vigorously and heartily.

Atterbury, Sermon.

The assertion is our Saviour's, though uttered by him in the person of Abraham, the father of the faithful; who, on the account of that character, is very fitly introduced. Atterbury.

These tribune kindled great dissensions between the nobles and the commons, on the account of Coriolanus, a nobleman, whom the latter had impeached.

Swift, Contests in Athens and Rome.

Nothing can recommend itself to our love, on any other account, but either as it promotes our present, or is a means to assure to us a future happiness. Rogers, Sermon v.

Sempronius gives no thanks on this account. Addison, Cato.

8. A narrative, relation; in this use it may seem to be derived from conte, Fr. a tale, a narration.

9. The review or examination of an affair taken by authority; as, the magistrate took an account of the tumult.

Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants; and when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents. Matt. xix. 23, 24.

10. The relation and reasons of a transaction given to a person in authority.

What need we fear who knows it, when none can call our power to account? Shakspeare, Macbeth.

The true ground of morality can only be the will and law of a God, who sees men in the dark, has in his hands rewards and punishments, and power enough to call to account the proudest offender. Locke.

11. Explanation; assignment of causes.

It is easy to give account, how it comes to pass, that though all men desire happiness, yet their wills carry them so contrarily. Locke.

It being, in our author's account, a right acquired by begetting, to rule over those he had begotten, it was not a power possible to be inherited, because the right, being consequent to, and built on, an act perfectly personal, made that power so too, and impossible to be inherited. Locke.

12. An opinion previously established.

These were designed to join with the forces at sea, there being prepared a number of flat-bottomed boats to transport the land forces, under the wing of the great navy: for they made no account, but that the navy should be absolutely master of the seas. Bacon, Considerations on War with Spain.

A prodigal young fellow, that had sold his clothes, upon the sight of a swallow, made account that summer was at hand, and away went his shirt too. L'Estrange, Table cxxvii.

13. The reasons of any thing collected.

Being convinced, upon all accounts, that they had the same reason to believe the history of our Saviour, as that of any other person to which they themselves were not actually eyewitnesses, they were bound, by all the rules of historical faith, and of right reason, to give credit to this history. Addison.

14. In law.

Account is, in the common law, taken for a writ or action brought against a man, that, by means of office or business undertaken, is to render an account unto another; as, a bailiff toward his master, a guardian to his ward. Cowell.

To ACCO'UNT.† n. a. [See ACCOUNT. Nor must we here omit the old Fr. acouter, and the Ital. accontare; to declare, tell, or shew.]

1. To esteem, to think, to hold in opinion.

That also was accounted a land of giants. Deut. ii. 20.

2. To reckon, to compute.

Neither the motion of the moon, whereby months are computed, nor the sun, whereby years are accounted, consisteth of whole numbers. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. To assign to, as a debt; with the particle to.

For some years, really accrued the yearly sum of two hundred thousand pounds to the king's coffers; and it was, in truth, the only project that was accounted to his own service. Clarendon.

4. To hold in esteem; with of.

Silver was not any thing accounted of in the days of Solomon. 2 Chron. ix. 20.

To ACCO'UNT. v. n.

1. To reckon.

The calendar months are likewise arbitrarily and unequally settled by the same power; by which months we, to this day, account, and they measure, and make up, that which we call the Julian year. Holder on Time.

2. To give an account, to assign the causes; in which sense it is followed by the particle for.

If any one should ask, why our general continued so easy to the last? I know no other way to account for it, but by that unmeasurable love of wealth, which his best friends allow to be his predominant passion. Swift.

3. To make up the reckoning; to answer; with for.

Then thou shalt see him plung'd, when least he fears, At once accounting for his deep arrears. Dryd. Jur. Sat. xiii.

They have no uneasy presages of a future reckoning, wherein the pleasures they now taste, must be accounted for; and, may, perhaps, be outweighed by the pains, which shall then lay hold of them. Atterbury, Sermons.

4. To appear as the medium by which any thing may be explained.

Such as have a faulty circulation through the lungs, ought to eat very little at a time; because the increase of the quantity of fresh chyle, must make that circulation still more uneasy; which, indeed, is the case of consumptive and some asthmatick persons, and accounts for the symptoms they are troubled with after eating. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ACCO'UNTABLE. adj. [from account.] Of whom an account may be required; who must answer for: followed by the particle to before the person, and for before the thing.

Accountable to none,

But to my conscience and my God alone. Oldham.

Thinking themselves excused from standing upon their own legs, or being accountable for their own conduct, they very seldom trouble themselves with enquiries. Locke on Education.

The good magistrate will make no distinction; for the judgement is God's; and he will look upon himself as accountable at his bar for the equity of it. Atterbury, Sermons.

ACCO'UNTABLENESS. * n. s. The state of being accountable.

Reason and liberty imply accountableness. Duncan's Logick.

ACCO'UNTANT. adj. [from account.] Accountable to; responsible for. Not in use.

His offence is so, as it appears

Accountant to the law upon that pain.

Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

I love her too,

Not out of absolute lust (though, peradventure,

I stand accountant for as great a sin)

But partly led to diet my revenge. Shakspeare, Othello.

ACCO'UNTANT. n. s. See ACCOMPTANT. A computer; a man skilled or employed in accounts.

The different compute of divers states; the short and irreconcilable years of some; the exceeding error in the natural frame of others; and the false deductions of ordinary accountants in most. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

ACCO'UNT-BOOK. n. s. A book containing accounts.

I would endeavour to comfort myself upon the loss of friends, as I do upon the loss of money; by turning to my account-book, and seeing whether I have enough left for my support. Swift.

ACCO'UNTING. n. s. [from account.] The act of reckoning, or making up of accounts.

This method faithfully observed, must keep a man from breaking, or running behind hand in his spiritual estate; which, without frequent accountings, he will hardly be able to prevent.
South, Sermon.

To ACCOUPLE. v. a. [accoupler, Fr.] To join, to link together. We now use couple.

He sent a solemn embassy to treat a peace and league with the king; accoupling it with an article in the nature of a request.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

ACCOUPLEMENT. n. s. [old Fr. accouplement.] A junction or union.

The son, born of such an accouplement, shall be most untoward.
Trial of Men's Wits, p. 318.

To ACCOURAGE. v. a. [Obsolete. See COURAGE.] Accented, for the rhyme's sake, by Spenser on the last syllable. To animate.

That forward pair she ever would assuage,
When they would strive the reason to exceed;
But that same froward twain would accourage,
And of her plenty add unto their need. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 2.

To ACCOURT. v. a. See To COURT. To entertain with courtship, or courtesy; a word now not in use.

Who all this while were at their wanton rest,
Accourting each her friend with lavish feast. Spenser, F. Q.

To ACCOUTRE. v. a. [accouttrer, Fr.] To dress, to equip.

Is it for this they study? to grow pale,
And miss the pleasures of a glorious meal?
For this, in rags accoutred are they seen,
And made the may-game of the publick spleen? Dryden.
The same wind that carries a ship well ballasted, if ill-rigged or accoutred, it drowns it. South, Sermon, viii. 123.

ACCOUTREMENT. n. s. [accoutrement, Fr.] Dress, equipage, furniture relating to the person; trappings, ornaments.

I profess requital to a hair's breadth; not only in the simple office of love; but in all the accoutrement, complement, and ceremony of it. Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

Christianity is lost among them, in the trappings and accoutrements of it; with which, instead of adorning religion, they have strangely disguised it, and quite stifled it in the croud of external rites and ceremonies. Tillotson, Sermon, xxviii.

I have seen the pope officiate at St. Peter's, where, for two hours together, he was busied in putting on or off his different accoutrements, according to the different parts he was to act in them. Addison, Spectator, No. 201.

How gay with all the accoutrements of war,
The Britons come, with gold well-fringed they come. Philips.

To ACCOY. v. a. [old Fr. accoisir, i. e. adoucir, mulcere, placare. V. Lacombe. We now abbreviate the word into coy, Fr. coi. Lat. glacius.]

1. To render quiet, or diffident.

Then is your careless courage accoyed. Spenser, Past. Feb.
The voice

These solemn sages not at all accoyes;
'Tis common. II. More, Phil. Poems, p. 76.

2. To soothe; to caress; in which sense, Spenser has adopted the expression from Chaucer.

With kind words accoy'd, vowing great love to me.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. viii. 59.

To ACCREDIT. v. a. [old Fr. acrediter, to put or get into credit. V. Cotgrave. Lat. acredo. This useful word is of older date in our language than may be supposed, although Johnson has taken no notice of it, and Mason has given only the participle accredited, from the modern writers, Chesterfield and Burke. The word is wanting in the vocabulary of Ash.] To countenance; to procure honour or credit to any person or thing.

Being moved as well by these reasons, as by many other which I could tell you, which accredit and fortify mine opinion.
Shelton, Trans. of D. Quir. i. 4. 6.

A company, consisting wholly of people of the first quality, cannot, for that reason, be called good company in the common acceptation of the phrase, unless they be, into the bargain, the fashionable and accredited company of the place.
Ed. Chesterfield.

Do we not see their most considerable and accredited ministers active in spreading mischievous opinions?
Burke.

ACCREDITATION. n. s. [from accredit; a word of recent introduction into our language.] That which gives a title to credit.

Having received my instructions and letters of accreditation from the earl of Hillsborough, secretary of state, on the 17th day of April 1780, I took my departure for Portsmouth, &c.
Mem. of R. Cumberland, i. 417.

ACCRESCENT. part. adj. [Lat. acresco, old Fr. acrescer, and also the substantive acresce, i. e. increase. The Scottish writers use the verb acresce; but I know of no instance of it in our writers.] Increasing.

We may trace a gradual increase of the circulation of it, [vegetative life] from the more inert parts, as it were, of matter to the trees, and shrubs, and plants, and flowers, whose living growths are more and more conspicuous, daily ornamented with new appearances of acrescent variety and alteration.
Shuckford, Creation and Fall of Man, p. 93.

ACCRETION. n. s. [accretio, Lat.] The act of growing to another, so as to encrease it.

Plants do nourish; inanimate bodies do not: they have an accretion, but no alimentation. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 602.

The changes seem to be effected by the exhaling of the moisture, which may leave the tinging corpuscles more dense, and something augmented by the accretion of the oily and earthy parts of that moisture. Newton, Opticks.

Infants support abstinence worst, from the quantity of aliment consumed in accretion. Abathnot on Abstinence.

ACCRETIVE. adj. [from accretion.] Growing; that which by growth is added.

If the motion be very slow, we perceive it not: we have no sense of the accretive motion of plants and animals: and the sly shadow steals away upon the dial; and the quickest eye can discover no more but that it is gone. Glauville, Scipius.

To ACCROACH. v. a. [accrocher, Fr.] To draw to one as with a hook; to gripe, to draw away by degrees what is another's. This word is used anno 25 Ed. III. stat. 3. cap. 8. and signifies there as much as to encroach. See Cowel: where, under encroachment, the synonymous word given is accerachment. Blackstone explains it as a verb meaning to attempt at exercising authority. The older sense is that of encroachment, as in Gower.

The acceraching or attempting to exercise royal power (a very uncertain charge,) was in 21 Edw. III. held to be true on a knight of Hertfordshire, who forcibly assaulted and detained one of the king's subjects, till he paid him ninety pounds. Blackstone.

Fire, when it to towre approacheth,
To hym amonge the strength acceracheth,
Till with his hete it be devoured;
The towre he may not be succoured. Gower, Conf. Am. B. v.

ACCROACHMENT. n. s. [from aceroach.] The act of accroaching. Dict.

To ACCRUE. v. n. [from the participle accru, formed from accroître, Fr.]

1. To accede to, to be added to; as, a natural production or effect, without any particular respect to good or ill.

The Son of God, by his incarnation, hath changed the manner of that personal subsistence; no alteration, thereby accruing to the nature of God. Hooker, v. 54.

2. To be added, as an advantage or improvement, in a sense inclining to good rather than ill; in which meaning it is more frequently used by later authors.

From which compact there arising an obligation upon every one, so to convey his meaning, there accrues also a right to every one, by the same sign, to judge of the sense or meaning of the person so obliged to express himself. South, Sermon.

Let the evidence of such a particular miracle be never so bright and clear, yet it is still but particular; and must therefore want that kind of force, that degree of influence, which accrues to a standing general proof, from its having been tried or approved, and consented to, by men of all ranks and capacities, of all tempers and interests, of all ages and nations. Atterbury, Sermon.

3. To append to, or arise from; as, an ill consequence; this sense seems to be less proper.

His scholar Aristotle, as in many other particulars, so likewise in this, did justly oppose him, and became one of the authors; choosing a certain benefit, before the hazard that might accrue from the disrespect of ignorant persons. Walkers.

4. In a commercial sense, to be produced, or arise; as, profits.

The yearly benefit, that, out of those his works, *accrue*th, to her majesty, amounteth to one thousand pounds. Carew, Surv.

The great profits which have accrued to the duke of Florence from his free port, have set several of the states of Italy on the same project. Addison on Italy.

5. To follow, as loss; a vitious use.

The benefit or loss of such a trade accruing to the government, until it comes to take root in the nation. Temple, Misc.

ACCRUMENT.* n. s. [old Fr. noun, accruer, an encrease.] Addition; encrease.

The same persons, enlarged in their endowments or achievements, are likewise enhanced and ennobled in their accruments. Montagu, Appeal to Cæsar, p. 235.

That joy is charitable, which overflows our neighbour's fields, when ourselves are unconcerned in the personal accruments. Bp. Taylor, Great Exemplar, p. 48.

ACCUBATION.* n. s. [from accubo, to lie down to, Lat.]

The ancient posture of leaning at meals. It will appear, that accubation, or lying down at meals, was a gesture used by very many nations. Brown, Vulgar Er.

TO ACCUMB. v. a. [accumbo, Lat.] To lie at the table, according to the ancient manner. Dict.

ACCUMBENT.* adj. [accumbens, Lat.] Leaning.

The Roman recumbent, or, more properly, accumbent posture in eating, was introduced after the first Punic war. Arbuthnot on Coins.

ACCUMBENT.* n. s. One who is placed at a dinner-table, but without reference to the ancient mode of leaning.

What a penance must be done by every accumbent in sitting out the passage through all these dishes. Bp. Hall, Occas. Med. v.

TO ACCUMULATE.* v. a. [from accumulo, Lat.]

To heap one thing upon another; to pile up, to heap together. It is used either literally, as, to accumulate money, or figuratively, as, to accumulate merit or wickedness.

If thou dost slander her, and torture me, Never pray more; abandon all remorse; On horror's head horrors accumulate. Shakespeare, Othello.

Crusht by imaginary treasons weight, Which too much merit did accumulate. Sir John Denham.

TO ACCUMULATE.* v. n. To encrease.

The poor, by being prevented from making alliances with the rich, have left wealth to flow in its ancient channels, and thus to accumulate, contrary to the interests of the state. Goldsmith, Hist. Eng. George II.

ACCUMULATE.* adj. Heaped; collected.

Greatness of relief, accumulate in one place, doth rather invite a swarm and surcharge of poor, than relieve those that are naturally bred in that place. Bacon, on Sutton's Estate.

Christ promises not only heaven, but treasure in heaven, which imports a more accumulate degree of felicity. South, Sermon, viii. 147.

ACCUMULATION.* n. s. [from accumulate.]

1. The act of accumulating.

One of my place in Syria, his lieutenant, For quick accumulation of renown, Which he achiev'd by th' minute, lost his favour. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Some, perhaps, might otherwise wonder at such an accumulation of benefits, like a kind of embroidering, or listing of one favour upon another. Wolton.

2. The state of being accumulated.

By the regular returns of it in some people, and their freedom from it after the morbid matter is exhausted, it looks as there were regular accumulations and gatherings of it, as of other humours in the body. Arbuthnot on Diet.

ACCUMULATIVE.* adj. [from accumulate.]

1. That which accumulates.

2. That which is accumulated.

If the injury meet not with meekness, it then acquires another accumulative guilt, and stands answerable not only for its own positive ill, but for all the accidental, which it causes in the sufferer. Government of the Tongue.

ACCUMULATIVELY.* adv. In an accumulating manner; in heaps.

ACCUMULATOR.* n. s. [from accumulate.] He that accumulates; a gatherer or heaper together.

Injuries may fall upon the passive man, yet, without revenge, there would be no broils and quarrels, the great accumulators and multipliers of injuries. Decoy of Piety.

ACCURACY.* n. s. [accuratio, Lat.] Exactness, nicety.

This perfect artifice and accuracy might have been omitted, and yet they have made shift to move. Morc.

Quickness of imagination is seen in the invention, fertility in the fancy, and the accuracy in the expression. Dryden.

The man who hath the stupid ignorance, or hardened censure, to insult the revealed will of God; or the petulant conceit to turn it into ridicule; or the arrogance to make his own perfections the measure of the Divinity; or, at best, that can collate a text, or quote an authority, with an insipid accuracy; or demonstrate a plain proposition, in all formality; these now are the only men worth mentioning. Delany.

We consider the uniformity of the whole design, accuracy of the calculations, and skill in restoring and comparing passages of ancient authors. Arbuthnot on Coins.

ACCURATE.* adj. [accuratus, Lat.]

1. Exact, as opposed to negligence or ignorance, applied to persons.

It is often impossible in the nature of the thing to please all, or not offend some, however accurate and careful we be in our conduct. Waterland, Sermon, i. 16.

2. Exact, without defect or failure, applied to things.

No man living has made more accurate trials than Reaumur, that brightest ornament of France. Colson.

Rich and accurate dressings, or lovely adornings, such as were usual to the Persian delicacy, softness, and luxury. Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 19.

3. Determinate; precisely fixed.

Those conceive the celestial bodies have more accurate influences upon these things below, than indeed they have but in gross. Bacon.

ACCURATELY.* adv. [from accurate.] In an accurate manner; exactly, without error, nicely.

The sine of incidence is either accurately, or very nearly, in a given ratio to the sine of refraction. Newton.

That all these distances, motions, and quantities of matter, should be so accurately and harmoniously adjusted in this great variety of our system, is above the fortuitous hits of blind material causes, and must certainly flow from that eternal fountain of wisdom.

ACCURATENESS. † n. s. [from accurate.] Exactness, nicety.

But sometime after, suspecting that in making this observation I had not determined the diameter of the sphere with sufficient accurateness, I repeated the experiment.

It is a work of art, as Longinus observes, man admires the curiosity and accurateness; in a work of nature, the vastness and magnificence thereof.

To ACCURSE. v. a. See CURSE. To doom to misery; to invoke misery upon any one.

As if it were an unlucky comet, or as if God had so accursed it, that it should never shine to give light in things concerning our duty any way towards him.

When Hildebrand accursed and cast down from his throne Henry IV. there were none so hardy as to defend their lord.

ACCURSED. † part. adj.

1. That which is cursed or doomed to misery.

'Tis the most certain sign the world's accursed,
That the best things corrupted are and worst.

2. That which deserves the curse; execrable; hateful; detestable; and by consequence, wicked; malignant.

A swift blessing
May soon return to this our suffering country,
Under a hand accurs'd.

The chief part of the misery of wicked men, and those accursed spirits, the devils, is this, that they are of a disposition contrary to God.

They, like the seed from which they sprung, accurst,
Against the gods immortal hatred nurst.

ACCUSABLE. adj. [from the verb accuse.] That which may be censured; blameable; culpable.

There would be a manifest defect, and Nature's improvision were justly accusable; if animals, so subject unto diseases from bilious causes, should want a proper conveyance for choler.

ACCUSANT. * n. s. [Lat. accusans.] He who accuses.

Cotgrave notices this word also as an adjective.
We conceive the law hath ever been in the parliamentary proceedings, that if a man were impeached, as of treason, being the highest crime, the accusant must hold him to the proof of the charge, and may not fall to any meaner impeachment upon failing of the higher.

ACCUSATION. n. s. [from accuse.]

1. The act of accusing.

Thus they in mutual accusation spent
The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning,
And of their vain contest appear'd no end.

2. The charge brought against any one by the accuser.

You read
These accusations, and these grievous crimes
Committed by your person, and your followers.

All accusation, in the very nature of the thing, still supposing, and being founded upon some law: for where there is no law, there can be no transgression; and where there can be no transgression, I am sure there ought to be no accusation.

3. In the sense of the courts: A declaration of some crime preferred before a competent judge, in order to inflict some judgement on the guilty person.

ACCUSATIVE. † adj. [accusativus, Lat.]

1. A term of grammar, signifying the relation of the noun, on which the action, implied in the verb, terminates.

2. [From accuse.] Censuring, accusing.

This hath been a very accusative age: yet I have not heard any superstition (much less idolatry) charged (much less proved) upon the several bishops of London, Winchester, Chester, Carlisle, Chichester.

ACCUSATIVELY. * adv. [from accusative.]

1. In an accusative manner.

2. Relating to the accusative case, in grammar.

ACCUSATORY. † adj. [Fr. accusatoire, Lat. accusatorius.] That which produceth or containeth an accusation.

In a charge of adultery, the accuser ought to set forth, in the accusatory libel, some certain and definite time.

It was contrived to have petitions accusatory from many parts of the kingdom against episcopal government.

To ACCUSE. v. a. [accuso, Lat.]

1. To charge with a crime. It requires the particle of before the subject of accusation.

He stripp'd the bears-foot of its leafy growth;
And, calling western winds, accus'd the spring of sloth.

The professors are accused of all the ill practices which may seem to be the ill consequences of their principles.

2. It sometimes admits the particle for.

Never send up a leg of a fowl at supper, while there is a cat or dog in the house, that can be accused for running away with it: But, if there happen to be neither, you must lay it upon the rats, or a strange greyhound.

3. To blame or censure, in opposition to applause or justification.

Their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another.

Your valour would your sloth too much accuse,
And therefore, like themselves, they princes choose.

ACCUSER. n. s. [from accuse.] He that brings a charge against another.

There are some persons forbidden to be accusers, on the score of their sex, as women; others, of their age, as pupils and infants; others, upon the account of some crimes committed by them; and others, on the score of some filthy lucre to propose to gain thereby; others, on the score of their conditions, as libertines against their patrons; and others, through a suspicion of calumny, as having once already given false evidence; and, lastly, others on account of their poverty, as not being worth more than fifty aurei.

That good man, who drank the poisonous draught,
With mind serene, and could not wish to see
His vile accuser drink as deep as he.

If the person accused maketh his innocence plainly to appear upon his trial, the accuser is immediately put to an ignominious death; and, out of his goods and lands, the innocent person is quadruply recompensed.

ACCUSERESS. * n. s. [Lat. accusatrix.] She who accuses. This old substantive is found in Sherwood; but, like Shakspeare's poetical usage of accuse for accusation, and Spenser's of accusment for the same word, it is not now in use.

To ACCUSTOM. † v. a. [accoſtumer, Fr.]

1. To habituate, to enure, with the particle to. It is used chiefly of persons.

How shall we breathe in other air
Less pure, accustom'd to immortal fruits?

It has been some advantage to accustom one's self to books of the same edition.

2. Of things, with the particle with.

Such instructions as they had been accustomed with.

To ACCUSTOM. † v. n.

1. To be wont to do any thing. Obsolete.

A boat over-freighted sunk, and all drowned, saving one woman, that in her first popping up again, which most living things accustom, got hold of the boat.

2. To cohabit.

Much better do we Britons fulfil the work of nature than you Romans; we with the best men accustom openly; you with the basest commit private adulteries. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. II.

ACCUSTOM. * n. s. [from the verb.] Custom.
Justinian or Tribonian defines matrimony "a conjunction of man and woman containing individual accustom of life."
Milton, Tetrach.

ACCUSTOMABLE. adj. [from accustom.] Of long custom or habit; habitual; customary.

Animals even of the same original, extraction, and species, may be diversified by accustomable residence in one climate, from what they are in another. Hale, Orig. of Man.

ACCUSTOMABLY. adv. †

1. According to custom.

Touching the king's fines accustomably paid for the purchasing of writs original, I find no certain beginning of them, and do therefore think that they grew up with the chancery.

Bacon, Aliens.

Men, by a certain address and instinct of nature to declare their mutual love and amity one towards another, have accustomably used certain manners of outward actions, having some agreeableness with the same thing which they would witness to be within them, some after one fashion, others after another.

Harmar, Tr. of Beza, p. 17.

2. Habitually.

Whether any sister of this house hath any familiarity with religious men, secular priests, or lay men, being not near of kin unto them? Item: whether any sister of this house hath been taken and found with any such accustomably so communing, and could not shew any reasonable cause why they so did?

Visit. of Monasteries, Burnet i. Rec. B. iii. i.

ACCUSTOMANCE. n. s. [accoutumance, Fr.] Custom, habit, use.

Through accustomance and negligence, and perhaps some other causes, we neither feel it in our own bodies, nor take notice of it in others. Boyle.

ACCUSTOMARILY. adv. † In a customary manner; according to common or customary practice.

Go on, rhetorick, and expose the peculiar eminency which you accustomarily marshal before logick to publick view.

Cleveland.

ACCUSTOMARY. † adj. [from accustom.] Usual; practised; according to custom.

Christ, in the fifth of Matthew, forbiddeth not all kind of swearing, but the ordinary and accustomary swearing then in use among the Jews.

Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 160.

This office time hath now made accustomary.

Rycaut, Gr. Ch. p. 446.

ACCUSTOMED. adj. [from accustom.] According to custom; frequent; usual.

Look how she rubs her hands. — It is an accustomed action with her, to seem thus washing her hands: I have known her continue in this a quarter of an hour.

Shakspeare, Mac.

ACCUSTOMEDNESS. * n. s. [from accustom.]

Accustomedness to sin hardens the heart. Pierce, Sermon, p. 230.

ACE. † n. s. [As not only signified a piece of money, but any integer, from whence is derived the word ace, or unit. Thus As signified the whole inheritance.

Arbutnot on Coins. Gr. us. Fr. as. Ital. and Span. asso. Germ. ess.]

1. An unit; a single point on cards or dice.

When lots are shuffled together in a lap, urn, or pitcher; or if a man blindfold casts a die, what reason in the world can he have to presume, that he shall draw a white stone rather than a black, or throw an ace rather than a six.

South.

2. A small quantity; a particle; an atom.

He will not bate an ace of absolute certainty; but however doubtful or improbable the thing is, coming from him he must go for an indisputable truth.

Govern. of the Tongue.

I'll not wag an ace farther: the whole world shall not bribe me to it.

Dryden, Span. Friar.

ACELDAMA. n. s. [Heb. A field of blood. The word has long been figuratively used in our language.]

Such were his [Dominick's] anathemas and sentences, the effects whereof made that part of the world an aceldama, a field of blood.

Worthington, Miscell. p. 63.

No mystery — but that of love divine,
Which lifts us, on the seraph's flaming wing,
From earth's aceldama, this field of blood,
Of inward anguish, and of outward ill.

Young, Night Th. 6.

What an aceldama, what a field of blood, Sicily has been in ancient times.

Burke, Vind. of Nat. Society.

ACEPHALI. * n. s. [Gr. ἀκεφαλος.]

1. In the laws of Henry I. those are called acephali, who were the levellers of that age, who acknowledged no head or superiour.

Cowel.

2. A sect of Christian hereticks so called, inasmuch as they also acknowledged no head or superiour; who first appeared about the beginning of the sixth century.

ACEPHALOUS. adj. [ἀκεφαλῶς Gr.] Without a head.

Dict.

ACERB. adj. [acerbus, Lat.] Acid, with an addition of roughness, as most fruits are before they are ripe.

Quincy.

To ACERBATE. * v. a. [from acerb.] To make sour.

Dict.

ACERBITY. † n. s. [acerbitas, Lat.]

1. A rough sower taste.

2. Applied to men, sharpness of temper; severity.

True it is, that the talents for criticism, namely, smartness, quick censure, vivacity of remark, indeed all but acerbity, seem rather the gifts of youth than of old age.

Pope.

3. Dr. Johnson applies this word only to men; it is equally forcible when applied to things. And in the former sense it is of older authority than Pope.

Thus Zophar with acerbity reply'd:

Think'st thou by talking to be justify'd? Sandys's Job, p. 17.

It is ever a rule, that any over great penalty (besides the acerbity of it) dreads the execution of the law.

Bacon, touching the Laws of Eng.

We may easily imagine what acerbity of pain must be endured in his limbs being stretched forth, racked, and tendered.

Barrow, Expos. of the Creed.

The acerbity of this punishment [crucifixion] appears, in that those who were of any merciful disposition would first cause such as were adjudged to the cross to be slain, and then to be crucified.

Pearson on the Creed, iv.

The English seminaries of Romish priests abroad never harboured a more excellent scribe than was Mr. Parsons, whether we observe his elegancy in style, dexterity in invention, subtilty in contrivance, audacity in undertaking, or acerbity and scurrility in his invectives against his adversaries.

Bp. Morton, Discharge, p. 203.

To ACERVATE. v. a. [acervo, Lat.] To heap up.

Dict.

ACERVATION. † n. s. [from acervate.] The act of heaping together. The word is of Dr. Johnson's introduction, and he furnishes an example of it in his own definition of aggregate.

ACERVOSE. adj. Full of heaps.

Dict.

ACE'SCENCY. * n. s. [Lat. acesco.] Sourness; acidity.

Nurses should never give suck after fasting; the milk having an acescency very prejudicial to the constitution of the recipient.

Jones, Life of Bp. Horne, p. 350.

ACESCENT. † n. s. [acescens, Lat.] That which has a tendency to sourness or acidity.

The same persons, perhaps, had enjoyed their health as well with a mixture of animal diet, qualified with a sufficient quantity of acescents; as, bread, vinegar, and fermented liquors.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

ACETOSE. † adj. [Fr. aceteux.] That which has in it any thing sour; sharp.

Dict.

ACETO'SITY. n. s. [from acetose.] The state of being acetose, or of containing sourness. Dict.

ACETOUS. adj. [from acetum, vinegar, Lat.] Having the quality of vinegar; sour.

Raisins, which consist chiefly of the juice of grapes, inspissated in the skins or husks by the evolation of the superfluous moisture through their pores, being distilled in a retort, did not afford any vinous, but rather an acetous spirit. Boyle.

ACHE. n. s. [ace, Sax. æx, Gr., now generally written ake, and in the plural akes, of one syllable; the primitive manner being preserved chiefly in poetry, for the sake of the measure. If it were necessary, I could produce numerous examples of the dissyllabick pronunciation of áchés (the ch not being sounded as k,) which continued to be the plural of ache, certainly in verse, if not in prose, till the time of Swift; though there are not wanting editions of Johnson's Dictionary and of Swift's Works, in which the line, that is presently cited, is corrupted; and instead of "old áchés throb," we find "old akes will throb." Barret, one of our oldest lexicographers, distinguishes the verb and substantive, the former as ake; the latter, ache. I am not contending for a revival of the distinction and different pronunciation; but I am shewing correctly what was long established usage.] A continued pain. See AKE.

I'll rack thee with old cramps; •

Fill all thy bones with aches, make thee roar,
That beasts shall tremble at thy din. Shakspeare.

A coming shower your shooting corns presage,
Old aches throb, your hollow tooth will rage. Swift.

To ACHÉ. v. n. See ACHE. To be in pain.

Upon this account, our senses are dulled and spent by any extraordinary intention, and our very eyes will ache, if long fixed upon any difficultly discerned object. Glanville.

ACHIEVABLE.  adj.* [from achieve.] Possible to be done.

To raise a dead man to life—doth not involve contradiction, and is therefore an object of power, and at least achievable by Omnipotence. Barrow, Sermon, ii. 407.

ACHIEVANCE.  n. s.* [Fr. achever.] Performance.

Of what prowess he was in arms, and how valiant and good a captain in battle, it may sufficiently appear to them that will read his noble acts and achievements in the books before remembered. Sir T. Flyot, Gov. 195. b.

To ACHIEVE. v. a. [achever, Fr. to complete.]

1. To perform, to finish a design prosperously.

Our toils, my friends, are crown'd with sure success:
The greater part perform'd, achieve the less. Dryden.

2. To gain, to obtain.

Experience is by industry achiev'd,
And perfected by the swift course of time. Shakspeare.

Tranio, I burn, I pine, I perish, Tranio,
If I achieve not this young modest girl. Shakspeare.

Thou hast achiev'd our liberty, confin'd
Within hell-gates till now. Milton.

Show all the spoils by valiant kings achiev'd,
And groaning nations by their arms reliev'd. Prior.

ACHIEVER. n. s. He that performs: he that obtains what he endeavours after.

A victory is twice itself, when the achiever brings home full numbers. Shakspeare, Much ado about Nothing.

Those conquerors and achievers of mighty exploits (those Alexanders and Césars) who have been renowned for doing things which seemed great, rather than for performing what was truly good. Barrow, Works, i. 39.

ACHIEVEMENT. n. s. [achievement, Fr.]

1. The performance of an action.

From every coast that heaven walks about,
Have thither come the noble martial crew,
That famous hard achievements still pursue. Spenser, F. Q.

2. The escutcheon, or ensigns armorial, granted to any man for the performance of great actions.

Then shall the war, and stern debate, and strife
Immortal, be the bus'ness of my life;
And in thy lane, the dusty spoils among,
High on the burnish'd roof, my banner shall be hung;
Rank'd with my champion's bucklers, and below,
With arms revers'd, the achievements of the foe. Dryden.

Achievement, in the first sense, is derived from achieve, as it signifies to perform; in the second, from achieve, as it imports to gain.

A'CHING. n. s. [from ache.] Pain; uneasiness.

When old age comes to wait upon a great and worshipful sinner, it comes attended with many painful girds and achings, called the gout. South.

ACHOR. n. s. [achor, Lat. αχώρα, Gr. surfur.]

A species of the herpes; it appears with a crusty scab, which causes an itching on the surface of the head, occasioned by a salt sharp serum oozing through the skin. Quincy.

ACHROMATICK.  adj.* [Gr. α and χρῶμα, Fr. achromatique.] A term in opticks, applied to telescopes of an invention contrived to remedy aberrations and colours.

A'CID. adj. [acidus, Lat. acide, Fr.] Sour, sharp.

Wild trees last longer than garden trees; and in the same kind, those whose fruit is acid, more than those whose fruit is sweet. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Acid, or sour, proceeds from a salt of the same nature, without mixture of oil; in austere tastes the oily parts have not disentangled themselves from the salts and earthy parts; such is the taste of unripe fruits. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

A'CID.  n. s.* [Lat. acetum, Goth. accets, Sax. æcob.]

An acid substance; any thing sour; the generic chymical term for a large classe of words.

The chymist can draw subtil spirits, that will work upon one another at some distance, viz. spirits of alkalies and acids. Aubrey, Misc. p. 147.

Salts, sulphurs, and mercuries, acids, and alkalies, are principles which can smooth things to those only who live about the furnace. A. Smith, Hist. of Astron. § 2.

Liquors and substances are called acids, which being composed of pointed particles, affect the taste in a sharp and piercing manner. The common way of trying, whether any particular liquor hath in it any particles of this kind, is by mixing it with syrup of violets, when it will turn of a red colour; but if it contains alkaline or lixivial particles, it changes that syrup green. Quincy.

A'CIDIST.  n. s.* [from acid.] One who maintains the doctrine of acids.

I will at present instance only in brimstone, which is a mild soft body, and agreeable to what the acidists would call an alkali. Dr. Stare on Alk. and Acids, Hist. of the R. S. iv. 442.

ACIDITY. n. s. [from acid.] The quality of being acid; an acid taste; sharpness; sourness.

Fishes, by the help of a dissolvent liquor, corrode and reduce their meat, skin, bones, and all, into a chylus or cream; and yet this liquor manifests nothing of acidity to the taste. Ray.

When the taste of the mouth is bitter, it is a sign of a redundancy of a bilious alkali, and demands a quite different diet from the case of acidity or sourness. Arb. on Aliments.

A'CIDNESS. n. s. [from acid.] The quality of being acid; acidity. See ACIDITY.

ACIDULÆ. n. s. [that is, aqua acidulæ.]

Medicinal springs impregnated with sharp particles, as all the nitrous, chalybeate, and alum-springs are. Quincy.

The acidulæ, or medical springs, emit a greater quantity of their minerals than usual; and even the ordinary springs, which were before clear, fresh and limpid, become thick and turbid, and are impregnated with sulphur and other minerals, as long as the earthquake lasts. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To ACIDULATE. v. a. [aciduler, Fr.] To impregnate or tinge with acids in a slight degree.

A diet of fresh unsalted things, watery liquors acidulated, farinaceous emollient substances, sour milk, butter, and acid fruits.

Arbuthnot on Aliaments.

ACIDULOUS. * adj. [Lat.] Sourish.

Dulcified from acidulous tincture.

Burke.

TO ACKNOWLEDGE. * v. a. [Lat. agnosco, Sax. cnapan.] To acknowledge; to confess. Not now in use, except as a northern provincialism.

You will not be acknowled, sir; why, 'tis wise:
Thus do all gamesters, at all games, dissemble.

B. Jonson, For. v. 6.

Some say, he was married to her privilage, but durst not be acknowled of it.

Harington, Life of Ariosto, p. 418.

TO ACKNOWLEDGE. v. a. [a word formed, as it seems, between the Latin and English, from agnosco, and knowledge, which is deduced from the Saxon, cnapan, to know.]

1. To own the knowledge of; to own any thing or person in a particular character.

My people do already know my mind,
And will acknowledge you and Jessica,
In place of lord Bassanio and myself.

Shakspeare.

None that acknowledge God, or providence,
Their souls eternity did ever doubt.

Davies.

2. To confess; as, a fault.

For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me.

Psaln li. 1.

3. To own; as, a benefit; sometimes with the particle to before the person conferring the benefit.

His spirit

Taught them; but they his gifts acknowledg'd not.
In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty power the assistance he has given me in the beginning, and the prosecution of my present studies.

Dryden.

ACKNOWLEDGING. adj. [from acknowledge.] Grateful; ready to acknowledge benefits received. A Gallicism, reconnoissant.

He has shewn his hero acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted; but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested.

Dryden, Virgil.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT. * n. s. [from acknowledge.] Johnson writes acknowledgment. It was formerly, and more correctly, written acknowledgement. Several authors have revived this orthography; retaining the e to soften, as Lowth observes on judgement, the preceding g; and as Johnson himself analogically writes lodgement.]

1. Concession of any character in another; as, existence, superiority.

The due contemplation of the human nature doth, by a necessary connexion and chain of causes, carry us up to the unavoidable acknowledgement of the Deity; because it carries every thinking man to an original of every successive individual.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

2. Concession of the truth of any position.

Immediately upon the acknowledgement of the christian faith, the eukuch was baptized by Philip.

Hooker.

3. Confession of a fault.

4. Confession of a benefit received; gratitude.

5. Act of attestation to any concession; such as homage.

There be many wide countries Ireland, which the laws of England were never established in, nor any acknowledgement of subjection made.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

6. Something given or done in confession of a benefit received.

The second is an acknowledgement to his majesty for the leave of fishing upon his coasts; and though this may not be grounded upon any treaty, yet, if it appear to be an ancient right on our side, and custom on theirs, not determined or extinguished by any treaty between us, it may with justice be insisted on.

Temple, Miscell.

ACME. * n. s. [ἀκμή, Gr.] The height of any thing; more especially used to denote the height of a distemper, which is divided into four periods. 1. The arche, the beginning or first attack. 2. Anabasis, the growth. 3. Acme, the height. And, 4. Paracme, which is the declension of the distemper.

Quincy.

Its acmé of human prosperity and greatness.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

ACOLLE. * adv. [Properly a participle from the old verb kele, or akele, to cool. Dutch koelen.]

To the lovers Ovid wrote,

And taught, if love be too hote,

In what manner it should akele.

Gower, Conf. Am. b. 4.

Thus laic this poore in great distresse,

Acolde and hongred at his gate.

Ibid. b. 6.

Poor Tom's acold.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

ACOLUTHIST. n. s. [ἀκολυθιστής, Gr.] One of the lowest order in the Romish church, whose office is to prepare the elements for the offices, to light the church, &c.

It is duty, according to the papal law, when the bishop sings mass, to order all the inferior clergy to appear in their proper habits; and to see that all the offices of the church be rightly performed; to ordain the acolythist, to keep the sacred vessels.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

ACOLYTE. * } n. s. The same with ACOLUTHIST.

At the end of every station, an acolyte (an inferior kind of officer) dips this pitiful patch into the oil of a burning lamp; and having wiped it as clean as he can, comes to the pope for a blessing.

Brevint's Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 321.

ACONITE. * n. s. [Gr. ἀκόνιον. Fr. aconit.] Our elder writers use also the Latin aconitum instead of aconite.] Properly the herb wolfs-bane, but commonly used in poetical language for poison in general.

Our land is from the rage of tygers freed,

Nor nourishes the lion's angry seed;

Nor pois'nous aconite is here produc'd,

Or grows unknown, or is, when known, refus'd.

Dryden.

Despair, that achite does prove,

And certain death to others' love,

That poison never yet withstood,

Does nourish mine, and turns to blood.

Girardville.

As strong

As aconitum, or rash gunpowder. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. 2. iv. 4.

ACOP. * adv. [Sax. cop or coppe; Welsh, copa; a top, or point.] At the top; high up.

Marry, she is not in fashion yet; she wears

A hood, but it stands acop.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 6.

ACORN. * n. s. [Æcepn, Sax. from ac, an oak, and corn, corn or grain; that is, the grain or fruit of the oak.] The seed or fruit borne by the oak.

Errors, such as are but acorns in your younger brows, grow oaks in our older heads, and become inflexible.

Brown.

Content with food which nature freely bred,

On wildings and on strawberries they fed;

Cornels and bramble berries gave the rest,

And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast.

Dryden, Ovid.

He that is nourished by the acorns he picked up under an oak, or the apples he gathered from the trees in the wood, has certainly appropriated them to himself.

Locke.

ACORNED. * adj. [from acorn.]

1. Fed with acorns.

Like a full-acorn'd boar.

Shakspeare.

2. Acorned is the heraldick term for an oak tree with acorns on it.

ACOUSTICK. * adj. That which relates to hearing.

ACOUSTICKS. n. s. [ἀκουστικά, of ἀκούω, Gr. to hear.]

1. The doctrine or theory of sounds.

2. Medicines to help the hearing.

Quincy.

TO ACQUAINT. v. a. [acquaint, Fr.]

1. To make familiar with; applied either to persons or things. It has with before the object.

We that acquaint ourselves with every zone,

And pass the tropicks, and behold each pole;
When we come home, are to ourselves unknown,
And unacquainted still with our own soul.

Davies.

There with thee, new welcome saint,
Like fortunes may her soul acquaint.

Milton.

Before a man can speak on any subject, it is necessary to be acquainted with it.

Locke on Education.

Acquaint yourselves with things ancient and modern, natural, civil, and religious, domestick and national; things of your own and foreign countries; and, above all, be well acquainted with God and yourselves; learn animal nature, and the workings of your own spirits.

Watts, Logick.

2. To inform. With is more in use before the object than of.

But for some other reasons, my grave Sir,

Which is not fit you know, I not acquaint
My father of this business.

Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

A friend in the country acquaints me, that two of three men of the town are got among them, and have brought words and phrases, which were never before in those parts.

Tatler.

- ACQUAINTABLE.* adj. [Old Fr. accountable.] Easy to be acquainted with; accessible. This word is in our old lexicography, and it is also in the poetry of Chaucer. It is worthy of revival.

Wherefore be wise, and acquaintable,

Goodly of word, and reasonable.

Rom. of the Rose, 2213.

- ACQUAINTANCE. n. s. [accountance, Fr.]

1. The state of being acquainted with; familiarity, knowledge. It is applied as well to persons as things, with the particle with.

Nor was his acquaintance less with the famous poets of his age, than with the noblemen and ladies.

Dryden.

Our admiration of a famous man lessens upon our nearer acquaintance with him; and we seldom hear of a celebrated person, without a catalogue of some notorious weaknesses and infirmities.

Addison.

Would we be admitted into an acquaintance with God: let us study to resemble him. We must be partakers of a divine nature, in order to partake of this high privilege and alliance.

Atterbury.

2. Familiar knowledge, simply without a preposition.

Brave soldier, pardon me,

That any accent breaking from my tongue,
Should 'scape the true acquaintance of mine ear.

Shakspeare.

This keeps the understanding long in converse with an object, and long converse brings acquaintance.

South.

In what manner he lived with those who were of his neighbourhood and acquaintance, how obliging his carriage was to them, what kind offices he did, and was always ready to do them, I forbear particularly to say.

Atterbury.

3. A slight or initial knowledge, short of friendship, as applied to persons.

I hope I am pretty near seeing you, and therefore I would cultivate an acquaintance: because if you do not know me when we meet, you need only keep one of my letters, and compare it with my face; for my face and letters are counterpart of my heart.

Swift to Pope.

A long noviciate of acquaintance should precede the vows of friendship.

Bolingbroke.

4. The person with whom we are acquainted; him of whom we have some knowledge, without the intimacy of friendship. In this sense, the plural is, in some authors, acquaintance, in others, acquaintances.

But she, all vow'd unto the red-cross knight,

His wand'ring peril closely did lament,

Ne in this new acquaintance could delight,

But her dear heart with anguish did torment.

Spenser, F. Q.

That young men travel under some tutor, I allow well, so that he be such a one that may be able to tell them, what acquaintances they are to seek, what exercises or discipline the place yieldeth.

Bacon.

This, my lord, has justly acquired you as many friends, as there are persons who have the honour to be known to you: mere acquaintance you have none, you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have conversed with you, are for ever after inviolably yours.

Dryden.

We see he is ashamed of his nearest acquaintances.

Boyle against Bentley.

- ACQUAINTANT.* n. s. [Perhaps the original of the word ACQUAINTANCE in Johnson's fourth meaning of that word, which see.] The person with whom we are acquainted.

Thealma and Clearchus, a pastoral history in smooth and easy verse, written long since by John Chalkhill, Esq. an acquaintant and friend of Edmund Spenser.

Iz. Walton.

By the time that an author hath written out a book, he and his readers are become old acquaintants, and grow very loth to part.

Swift, Tale of a Tub.

- ACQUAINTED. adj. [from acquaint.] Familiar, well known; not new.

Now call we our high court of parliament;

That war or peace, or both at once, may be

As things acquainted and familiar to us.

Shakspeare.

- ACQUEST. n. s. [acquest, Fr. from acquérir, written by some acquist, with a view to the word acquire, or acquisito.] Attachment, acquisition; the thing gained.

New acquests are more burden than strength.

Bacon.

Mud, reposed near the ostia of rivers, makes continual additions to the land, thereby excluding the sea, and preserving these shells as trophies and signs of its new acquests and encroachments.

Woodward.

- To ACQUIESCE. v. n. [acquiescer, Fr. acquiescere, Lat.] To rest in, or remain satisfied with, without opposition or discontent. It has in before the object.

Others will, upon account of the receivedness of the proposed opinion, think it rather worthy to be examined than acquiesced in.

Boyle.

Neither a bare approbation of, nor a mere wishing, nor unactive complacency in; nor, lastly, a natural inclination to things virtuous and good, can pass before God for a man's willing of such things; and, consequently, if men, upon this account, will needs take up and acquiesce in an airy ungrounded persuasion, that they will those things which really they not will, they fall thereby into a gross and fatal delusion.

South.

He hath employed his transcendent wisdom and power, that by these he might make way for his benignity, as the end wherein they ultimately acquiesce.

Grew.

- ACQUIESCENCE. n. s. [from acquiesce.]

1. A silent appearance of content, distinguished on one side from avowed consent, on the other from opposition.

Neither from any of the nobility, nor of the clergy, who were thought most averse from it, there appeared any sign of contradiction to that; but an entire acquiescence in all the bishops thought fit to do.

Clarendon.

2. Satisfaction; rest; content.

Many indeed have given over their pursuits after fame, either from disappointment, or from experience of the little pleasure which attends it, or the better informations or natural coldness of old age; but seldom from a full satisfaction and acquiescence in their present enjoyments of it.

Addison.

3. Submission; confidence.

The greatest part of the world take up their persuasions concerning good and evil, by an implicit faith, and a full acquiescence in the word of those, who shall represent things to them under these characters.

South.

- ACQUIESCENT.* adj. Easy; submitting.

He that goes into the highlands with a mind naturally acquiescent, and a credulity eager for wonders, may come back with an opinion very different from mine.

Johnson, Journ. West. Islands.

- To ACQUIET.* v. a. [Low Lat. acquieto.] To render quiet; to compose.

Acquiesce his mind from stirring you against your own peace.

Sir A. Shirley's Travels.

ACQUIRABLE. adj. [from acquire.] *That which may be acquired or obtained; attainable.

Those rational instincts, the comate principles engraven in the human soul, though they are truths acquirable and deducible by rational consequence and argumentation, yet seem to be inscribed in the very crasis and texture of the soul, antecedent to any acquisition by industry or the exercise of the discursive faculty in man.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

If the powers of cogitation and volition, and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion or modification of it; it necessarily follows, that they proceed from some cogitative substance, some incorporeal inhabitant within us, which we call spirit and soul.

Bentley.

To ACQUIRE. † v. a. [old Fr. acquerrre; and acquerir. Lat. acquirō.]

r. To gain by one's own labour or power; to obtain what is not received from nature, or transmitted by inheritance.

Better to leave undone, than by our deed *

Acquire too high a fame, while he, we serve, 's away.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

2. To come to; to attain.

Motion cannot be perceived without the perception of its terms, viz. the parts of space which it immediately left, and those which it next acquires.

Glauville, Scipis.

ACQUIRED. participle adj. [from acquire.] Gained by one's self, in opposition to those things which are bestowed by nature.

We are seldom at ease, and free enough from the solicitation of our natural or adopted desires; but a constant succession of uneasinesses, out of that stock, which natural wants, or acquired habits, have heaped up, take the will in their turns.

Locke.

ACQUIRER. n. s. [from acquire.] The person that acquires; a gainer.

ACQUIREMENT. n. s. [from acquire.] That which is acquired; gain; attainment. The word may be properly used in opposition to the gifts of nature.

These his acquirements, by industry, were exceedingly both enriched and enlarged by many excellent endowments of nature.

Hayward on Edw. VI.

By a content and acquiescence in every species of truth, we embrace the shadow thereof; or so much as may palliate its just and substantial acquirements.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

It is very difficult to lay down rules for the acquisition of a taste. The faculty must, in some degree, be born with us.

Addison.

ACQUIRING. * n. s. Acquirement.

The king, in honour, could do no less than give back to his son the privilege of his blood, with the acquirings of his father's profession.

Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, Leicester.

ACQUIRY. * n. s. Acquirement; attainment.

No art requireth more hard study and pain toward the acquiry of it, than contentment; there being so many obstacles in the way to it.

Barrow, Sermon. iii. 62.*

ACQUISITE. * adj. [Lat. acquisitus.] That which is gained or acquired.

Three [notions] being innate, and five acquisite, the rest are improper.

Burton, Anal. Mel. p. 29.

Is there any supervenient or acquisite perfection, as skill, knowledge, wisdom, it is from God, who gave us the means, and blessed our industry.

Barrow, Sermon. iii. 337.

ACQUISITION. † n. s. [acquisitio, Lat.] This word, as we see by the examples which Dr. Johnson has given of it, is not of any great age in our language; Denham's being the oldest authority. In 1617, (long before Denham wrote,) the word is one of those objected to by Fulke, in his remarks on the Rhemish translators of the New Testament, as being not intelligible to the vulgar reader.

1. The act of acquiring or gaining

Each man has but a limited right to the good things of the world; and the natural allowed way, by which he is to compass the possession of these things, is by his own industrious acquisition of them.

South.

2. The thing gained; acquirement.

Great Sir, all acquisition

Of glory as of empire, here I lay before Your royal feet.

Denham, Sophy.

A state can never arrive to its period in a more deplorable crisis, than when some prince lies hovering like a vulture to dismember its dying carcass, by which means it becomes only an acquisition to some mighty monarchy, without hopes of a resurrection.

Swift.

ACQUISITIVE. adj. [acquisitivus, Lat.] That which is acquired or gained.

He [William I.] died not in his acquisitive but in his native soil; nature herself, as it were, claiming a final interest in his body, when fortune had done with him.

Walton, Rem. p. 106.

ACQUISITIVELY. * adv. [from acquisitive, a term in grammar.]

All manner of verbs put acquisitively, that is to say, with the tokens to and for after them, will have a dative case.

Lilly, Gram.

ACQUIST. † [Ital. acquistō. Barb. Lat. acquistum.]

Acquisition. The same as Acquest. Dr. Johnson cites the instance from Milton, whose orthography is also observed by Heath in his Chronicle of the Civil Wars, who writes "his unjust acquests," p. 402., and by South, in his Serm. vii. 89.

His servant he with new acquist

Of true experience from this great event,

With peace and consolation hath dismiss.

Milton, S. A.

To ACQUIT. v. a. [acquiter, Fr. See QUIT.]

1. To set free.

Ne do I wish (for wishing were but vain)

To be acquit from my continual smart;

But joy her thrall for ever to remain,

And yield for pledge my poor captived heart.

Spenser.

2. To clear from a charge of guilt; to absolve; opposed to condemn, either simply with an accusative, as, the jury acquitted him, or with the particles from or of, which is more common, before the crime.

If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

Job, x. 14.

By the suffrage of the most and best he is already acquitted, and, by the sentence of some, condemned.

Dryden.

He that judges, without informing himself to the utmost that he is capable, cannot acquit himself of judging amiss.

Locke.

Neither do I reflect upon the memory of his majesty, whom I entirely acquit of any imputation.

Swift.

3. To clear from any obligation.

Steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties; and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the publick, when I undertook this work.

Dryden.

4. In a similar sense, it is said, The man hath acquitted himself well; that is, he discharged his duty.

ACQUITMENT. † n. s. [old Fr. acquitement, décharge qu'un garant doit au garanti, Lacombe.] The state of being acquitted, or act of acquitting.

The word imports properly an acquittal or discharge of a man upon some precedent accusation, and a full trial and cognizance of his cause had thereupon.

South.

ACQUITTAI. n. s. in law, is a deliverance and setting free from the suspicion or guiltiness of an offence.

Cowel.

The constant design of both these orators was, to drive some one particular point, either the condemnation or acquittal of an accused person,

Swift.

To ACQUITANCE. v. n. To procure an acquittance;

* to acquit: a word not in present use.

But if black scandal and foul-fac'd reproach

Attend the sequel of your imposition,

Your mere enforcement shall acquittance me
From all the impure blots and stains thereof.

Shakspeare.

ACQUITTANCE.† n. s. [Ital. acquittanza, q. d. adquietantia, a quieting.]

1. The act of discharging from a debt.

But soon shall find

Forbearance no acquittance, ere day end.

Justice shall not return as bounty scorn'd. Milton, P. L. x. 53.

2. A writing testifying the receipt of a debt.

You can produce acquittances

For such a sum, from special officers

Of Charles his father. Shakspeare, Love's Labour Lost.

They quickly pay their debt, and then

Take no acquittances, but pay again. Donne.

The same man bought and sold to himself, paid the money, and gave the acquittance. Arbutnot.

TO ACRA'SE, OR ACRAZE.* v. a. [Fr. ecraser.] Obsolete. See CRAZE.

1. To impair the understanding; to infatuate.

These things did make me much that mourning to mislike,

And I acrazed was, and thought at home to stay;

But who is he can void death's dart when he doth strike?

Mir. for Mag. p. 138.

2. To impair, simply; to destroy.

My substance impaired, my credit acrazed, my talent hidden.

Gassaigne's Let. in the Hermit's Tale, p. 21.

ACRASYS.* n. s. [Gr. ἀκράσις.] Excess; irregularity.

He was neither presuming, nor overbold, nor yet timorous; a little prone to anger, but never excessive in it, either as to measure or time; which acrasies, whether you say of the body or mind, occasion great uneasiness. Cornish's Life of Firmin, p. 84.

'CRE.† n. s. [Æpe, Sax. Acre, Lye says, is common to all the European languages. Sax. Dict. He might have said further that it is an Eastern word; and that agr, akoro, and akkoran, denote in the Hebrew, Syriack, and Arabick, a field, and husbandman. So the Saxon accepm-on, an husbandman. Wachter, in his Glossary, gives ackerman, a day labourer.] A quantity of land containing in length forty perches, and four in breadth, or four thousand eight hundred and forty square yards.

Search every acre in the high-grown field,

And bring him to our eye. Shakspeare, King Lear.

A'CRED.* part. adj. [from acre.] Possessing acres; having property.

Heathcote himself, and such large-acred men.

Pope, Imit. of Hor. Ep. ii. 240.

A'CRID.† adj. [acer, Lat.]

1. Of a hot biting taste; bitter, so as to leave a painful heat upon the organs of taste.

Bitter and acid differ only by the sharp particles of the first, being involved in a greater quantity of oil than those of the last.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. Acrimonious.

Are the fibres gnawed and corroded by some acid humours?

Reid's Inquiry.

ACRIMO'NIOUS.† adj. [from acrimony.]

1. Abounding with acrimony; sharp; corrosive.

If gall cannot be rendered acrimonious, and bitter of itself, then whatever acrimony or amaritude redounds in it, must be from the admixture of melancholy. Harvey on Consumptions.

2. Severe.

Swift and Pope forbore to flatter him [Halifax] in his life, and after his death spoke of him, Swift with slight censure, and Pope in the character of Bufo with acrimonious contempt.

Johnson, Life of Lord Halifax.

ACRIMO'NIOUSNESS.* n. s. The act of being acrimonious.

ACRIMONIOUSLY.* adv. In an acrimonious manner; severely.

A'CRIMONY. n. s. [acrimonia, Lat.]

1. Sharpness, corrosiveness.

There be plants that have a milk in them when they are cut: as, figs, old lettuce, sow-thistles, spurge. The cause may be an inception of putrefaction: for those milks have all an acrimony, though one would think they should be nutritive.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fusible in the fire, congealable again by cold into brittle globes or crystals, soluble in water, so as to disappear, not unaltered, and having something in it which affects the organs of taste with a sensation of acrimony or sharpness. Arbutnot.

2. Sharpness of temper, severity, bitterness of thought or language.

John the Baptist set himself with much acrimony and indignation, to baffle this senseless arrogant conceit of theirs, which made them huff at the doctrine of repentance, as a thing below them, and not at all belonging to them. South.

A'CRITUDE. n. s. [from acid.] An acid taste; a biting heat on the palate.

In green vitriol, with its astringent and sweetish taste, is joined some acritude. Green's Museum.

ACROAMATICAL.† adj. [ἀκροαματικός, Gr. I bear.] Of ACROAMATICK. } or pertaining to deep learning; the opposite of exoterical.

Aristotle was wont to divide his lectures and readings into acroamatical and exoterical. Hales, Remains, p. 148.

We read no acroamatick lectures. Ibid.

ACROATICKS. n. s. [ἀκροατικά, Gr.] Aristotle's lectures on the more nice and principal parts of philosophy, to which none but friends and scholars were admitted by him.

ACROMION.* n. s. [Gr. ἄκρος ὤμος, Fr. acromion.] A term in anatomy for the upper process of the shoulder-blade.

The parts in man that may be called the porters, and which bear the burdens that are carried, can be no other than the scapula and its acromion, which is the part upon which the burden is pitched. Smith's Old Age, p. 178.

ACRONYCAL.† adj. [from ἀκρότης, summus, and ὥς, nae; importing the beginning of night.] A term of astronomy, applied to the stars, of which the rising or setting is called acronycal, when they either appear above or sink below the horizon at the time of sunset. It is opposed to cosmical.

Acronycal, that is, ἀκρονύκτιος vespertine, or at the beginning of night. So a star is said to rise or set acronycal, when it riseth or setteth at the sun-setting; for then is the beginning of night.

Mare, Song of the Soul, Interpr. General.

They had the exact light and magnitude of the stars, their heliacal, acronycal, matutine, and vespertine motions, rise and fall. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 227.

ACRONYCALLY. adv. [from acronycal.] At the acronycal time.

He is tempestuous in the summer, when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter, when he rises acronycally. Dryden.

A'CROSPIRE. n. s. [from ἀκρότης and σπείρα, Gr.] A shoot or sprout from the end of seeds before they are put in the ground.

Many corns will smelt, or have their pulp turned into a substance like thick cream; and will send forth their substance in an acrospire. Mortimer.

A'CROSPURED. part. adj. Having sprouts, or having shot out.

For want of turning, when the malt is spread on the floor, it comes and sprouts at both ends, which is called acrospired, and is fit only for swine. Mortimer.

ACROSS.† adv. [from a for at, or the French à, as it is used in à travers, and cross.]

1. Athwart, laid over something so as to cross it.

The harp hath the concave not along the strings, but across the strings: and no harp hath the sound so melting and prolonged as the Irish harp. Bacon.

ACT

This view'd, but not enjoy'd, with arms across,
He stood, reflecting on his country's loss. Dryden.
There is a set of artisans, who, by the help of several poles, which they lay across each others shoulders, build themselves up into a kind of pyramid; so that you see a pile of men in the air of four or five rows rising one above another. Addison.

2. Adversely; contrarily.

When king and queen saw things thus go across,
To quiet all, a parliament they called. Mir. for Mag. p. 344.

ACROSTICK. † n. s. [from ἀκρῶς and σῆξ, Gr.] A poem in which the first letter of every line being taken, makes up the name of the person or thing on which the poem is written.

He may apply his mind to heraldry, antiquity; — make epithalamiums, &c. anagrams, chronograms, acrosticks upon his friends' names. Ryton, Anat. Met. p. 282.

To judge whether she is absolutely cried up a beauty, we must consult the wooden registers, the benches in the publick walks, and the window-panes in coffee-houses and taverns;
where you'll be sure to see her name in acrosticks.

Student, ii. 257.

ACROSTICK. † adj.

1. That which relates to an acrostick.

On benches some scrawl out one leaden rhyme:
Or aiming at the shortest road to fame,
Cramp their vast genius in acrostick name! Student, i. 239.

2. That which contains acrosticks.

Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostick land:
There thou may'st wings display, and altars raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.

Dryden, Mac Flecknoe.

ACROSTICALLY. * adv. In the manner of an acrostick.

ACROTTERS, or ACROTTERIA. n. s. [from ἀκρότης, Gr.]
the extremity of any body. Little pedestals without bases, placed at the middle and the two extremes of pediments, sometimes serving to support statues.

To ACT. v. n. [ago, actum, Lat.]

1. To be in action, not to rest.

He hangs between in doubt to act or rest. Pope.

2. To perform the proper functions.

Albeit the will is not capable of being compelled to any of its actings, yet it is capable of being made to act with more or less difficulty, according to the different impressions it receives from motives or objects. South.

3. To practice arts or duties; to conduct one's self.

'Tis plain, that she who, for a kingdom now,
Would sacrifice her love, and break her vow,
Not out of love, but interest, acts alone,
And would, ev'n in my arms, lie thinking of a throne.

Dryden, Conquest of Granada.

The desire of happiness, and the constraint it puts upon us to act for it, no body accounts an abridgement of liberty. Locke.

The splendour of his office, is the token of that sacred character which he inwardly bears: and one of these ought constantly to put him in mind of the other, and excite him to act up to it, through the whole course of his administration.

Atterbury, Serm.

It is our part and duty to co-operate with this grace, vigorously to exert those powers, and act up to those advantages to which it restores us. He has given eyes to the blind, and set to the lame. Rogers, Serm.

4. To produce effects in some passive subject.

Hence 'tis we wait the wondrous cause to find
How body acts upon impassive mind. Garth, Dispens.

The stomach, the intestines, the muscles of the lower belly, all act upon the aliment; besides, the chyle is not sucked, but squeezed into the mouths of the lacteals, by the action of the fibres of the guts. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

To Act, v. a.

1. To bear a borrowed character; as, a stage-player.

Honour and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part, there all the honour lies. Pope.

ACT

2. To counterfeit; to feign by action.

His former trembling once again renew'd,
With acted fear the villain thus pursu'd. Dryden.

3. To actuate; to put in motion; to movements.

Most people in the world are actuated by levity and humour, by strange and irrational changes. South.

Perhaps they are as proud as Lucifer, as covetous as Demas, as false as Judas, and, in the whole course of their conversation, act, and are actuated, not by devotion, but design. South.

We suppose two distinct incommunicable consciousnesses acting the same body, the one constantly by day, the other by night; and, on the other side, the same consciousness acting by intervals two distinct bodies. Locke.

Act. † n. s. [actum, Lat.]

1. Something done; a deed; an exploit, whether good or ill.

A lower place, not well,
May make too great an act:
Better to leave undone than by our deed
Acquire too high a fame. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal;
Loth to confess, unable to conceal;
From the first moment of his vital breath,
To his last hour of unrepenting death. Dryden.

2. Agency; the power of producing an effect.

I will try the forces
Of these thy compounds on such creatures as
We count not worth the hanging; but none human;
To try the vigour of them, and apply
Alloysments to their act; and by them gather
Their several virtues and effects. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

3. Action; the performance of exploits; production of effects.

'Tis so much in your nature to do good, that your life is but one continued act of placing benefits on many, as the sun is always carrying his light to some part or other of the world.

Dryden, Fables.

Who forth from nothing call'd this comely frame,
His will and act, his word and work the same. Prior.

4. The doing of some particular thing; a step taken; a purpose executed.

This act persuades me,
That this remotion of the duke and her,
Is practice only. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

5. A state of reality; effect.

The seeds of herbs and plants at the first are not in act, but in possibility that which they afterwards grow to be. Hooker.
God alone excepted, who actually and everlastingly is whatsoever he may be, and which cannot hereafter be that which now he is not; all other things besides are somewhat in possibility, which as yet they are not in act. Hooker.

Sure they're conscious
Of some intended mischief, and are fled
To put it into act. Denham, Sophy.

6. Incipient agency; tendency to an effort.

Her legs were buskin'd, and the left before;
In act to shoot, a silver bow she bore. Dryden.

7. A part of a play, during which the action proceeds without interruption.

Many never doubt but the whole condition required by Christ, the repentance he came to preach, will, in that last scene of their last act, immediately before the exit, be as op-portunately and acceptably performed, as at any other point of their lives. Hammond, Fundamentals.

Five acts are the just measure of a play. Roscommon.

8. A decree of a court of justice, or edict of a legis- lature.

They make edicts for usury to support usurers, repeal daily any wholesome act established against the rich, and provide more piercing statutes daily to chain up and restrain the poor.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

You that are king, though he do wear the crown,
Have caus'd him, by new act of parliament,
To blot out me. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

9. Record of judicial proceedings.

Judicial acts are all those matters which relate to judicial proceedings, and being reduced into writing by a publick notary, are recorded by the authority of the judge. Ayliffe.

10. An academical expression. The act at both universities is holden in Trinity term. It also implies the exercise, or ceremony, observed in the publick schools, for a degree in the universities.

Voted in convocation, that no act should be celebrated this year, under pretence that there was no doctor of divinity proceeded. Life of A. Wood, p. 275.

Now the commencement drew on, and the senior proctor, either never having any polite learning, or having outgrown what he had; the junior was pitched upon to be the father of the act, as we call it. A. Philips, Life of Abp. Williams, p. 33.

At the university acts, in the collections of Oxford verses, and on every publick occasion, where the ingenious were invited to a rival display of their abilities, he appears to have been the principal and most popular performer.

Warton, Life of Bathurst, p. 46.

A'CTING.* n. s. [from to act.]

1. Action.

The divine compassion, wheresoever it fixes, removes all obstacles, answers all objections, and needs no other reason of its actings, but its own sovereign, absolute, unaccountable freedom. South, Sermon vi. 175.

Or that the resolute acting of your blood
Could have attain'd the effect of your own purpose.

Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

2. Performing an assumed or dramatick part.

The church of Rome hath been pleased to make her own publick prayers suitable to these three patterns, apparitions, actings, and images. Brevint, Saul and Sam. at Endor, p. 400.
Whose actings hard, affected and constrain'd.

Churchill, Rosciad.

A'CTLESS.* adj. [from act and less.] Without spirit; insipid.

Lose him to her, to her!

A poor, young, actless, indigested thing. Southerne, P. Pr. A. I.

A'CTION.* n. s. [action, Fr. actio, Lat.]

1. The quality or state of acting, opposite to rest.

O noble English that could entertain
With half their forces the full power of France;
And let another half stand laughing by,
All out of work, and cold for action. Shakspeare, Henry V.

2. An act or thing done; a deed.

This action, I now go on,
Is for my better grace. Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

God never accepts a good inclination instead of a good action, where that action may be done; nay, so much the contrary, that, if a good inclination be not seconded by a good action, the want of that action is made so much the more criminal and inexcusable. South.

3. Agency, operation.

It is better therefore, that the earth should move about its own centre, and make those useful vicissitudes of night and day, than expose always the same side to the action of the sun.

Bentley.

He has settled laws, and laid down rules, conformable to which natural bodies are governed in their actions upon one another. Cheyne.

4. The series of events represented in a fable.

This action should have three qualifications. First, it should be but one action; secondly, it should be an entire action; and, thirdly, it should be a great action. Addison.

5. Gesticulation; the accordance of the motions of the body with the words spoken; a part of oratory.

— He that speaks doth gripe the hearer's wrist,
While he that hears makes fearful action
With wrinkled brows. Shakspeare, King John.

Our orators are observed to make use of less gesture or action than those of other countries. Addison.

6. [In law.] It is used with the preposition against before the person, and for before the thing.

Actions are personal, real, and mixt: action personal belongs to a man against another, by reason of any contract, offence, or cause, of like force with a contract or offence made or done by him or some other, for whose fact he is to answer. Action real is given to any man against another, that possesses the thing required or sued for in his own name, and no other man's. Action mixt is that which lies as well against or for the thing which we seek, as against the person that hath it; called mixt, because it hath a mixt respect both to the thing and to the person.

Action is divided into civil, penal, and mixt. Action civil is that which tends only to the recovery of that which is due to us; as, a sum of money formerly lent. Action penal is that which aims at some penalty or punishment in the party sued, be it corporal or pecuniary; as, in common law, the next friends of a man feloniously slain shall pursue the law against the murderer. Action mixt is that which seeks both the thing whereof we are deprived, and a penalty also for the unjust detaining of the same.

Action upon the case, is an action given for redress of wrongs done without force against any man, by law not specially provided for.

Action upon the statute, is an action brought against a man upon breach of a statute. Cowel.

There was never man could have a juster action against filthy fortune than I, since all other things being granted me, her blindness is the only left. Sidney.

For our reward then,

First, all our debts are paid; dangers of law,
Actions, decrees, judgments, against us quitted. B. Jonson.

7. Dr. Johnson says, that the word in the plural is, in France, the same as stocks in England. It is also so employed by one of our own purest writers. In the Swedish language likewise, actie is stock; and actichandlare, a stock-jobber.

Stock-jobbers industriously spread such reports that actions may fall, and their friends buy to advantage. Swift, Exam. No 24.

A'CTIONABLE. adj. [from action.] That which admits an action in law to be brought against it; punishable.

His process was formed; whereby he was found guilty of nought else, that I could learn, which was actionable, but of ambition. Howel, Vocal Forest.

No man's face is actionable: these singularities are interpretable from more innocent causes. Collier.

A'CTIONABLY.* adv. In a manner subject to a process of law.

A'CTIONARY, or A'CTIONIST. n. s. [from action.] One that has a share in actions or stocks.

A'CTION-TAKING. adj. Accustomed to resent by means of law; litigious.

A knave, a rascal, a filthy worsted-stocking knave; a lily-liver'd action-taking knave. Shakspeare.

A'CTION-THREATENER.* n. s. One that is of a litigious or revengeful disposition, accustomed to threaten actions at law.

Ye envious and deadly malicious, ye impleaders and action-threateners, how long shall the Lord suffer you in his house, in which dwelleth nothing but peace and charity.

Harmer, Trans. of Bezu, p. 176.

ACTI'ATION. n. s. [from actio, Lat.] Action quick and frequent. Dict.

To A'CTIVATE.* v. a. [from active.] To make active. This word is thought to be used only by Bacon; according to Dr. Johnson. But it is to be found elsewhere, and well applied.

He disclaimeth the opinion of Caietan and Cameracensis concerning the ability of the mind in such acts collaterally, as not to be activated unless it also were active.

Moutagu, Ap. to Cæsar, p. 85.

The Holy Ghost activateth and enableth it [the will]. Ibid, p. 94.

As snow and ice, especially being holpen, and their cold activated by nitre or salt, will turn water into ice, and that is a few hours; so it may be, it will turn wood or stiff clay into stone in longer time. Bacon.

ACTIVE. adj. [activus, Lat.]

1. That which has the power or quality of acting.
These particles have not only a vis virtutis, accompanied with such passive laws of motion, as naturally result from that force, but also they are moved by certain active principles, such as is that of gravity, and that which causes fermentation, and the cohesion of bodies. Newton, Opticks.

2. That which acts, opposed to passive, or that which suffers.

— When an even flame two hearts did touch,

His office was indulgently to fit delives to passives, correspondency

Ally his subject was. Donne, Poems, p. 45.

3. Busy, engaged in action; opposed to idle or sedentary, or any state of which the duties are performed only by the mental powers.
This virtuous action that must praise bring forth,
Without which, slow advice is little worth;
Yet they who give good counsel, praise deserve,
Though in the active part they cannot serve. Denham.

4. Practical; not merely theoretical.
The world hath had in these men fresh experience, how dangerous such active errors are. Hooker.

5. Nimble; agile; quick.
Some bend the stubborn bow for victory;
And some with darts their active sinews try. Dryden.

6. In grammar.
A verb active is that which signifies action, as I teach.
Clarke, Latin Gram.

22. In grammar.
A verb active is that which signifies action, as I teach.
Clarke, Latin Gram.

23. In grammar.
A verb active is that which signifies action, as I teach.
Clarke, Latin Gram.

24. In grammar.
A verb active is that which signifies action, as I teach.
Clarke, Latin Gram.

The virtues of either age may correct the defects of both: and good for succession, that young men may be learners, while men in age are actors. Bacon.

He, who writes an Encomium Neronis, if he does it heartily, is himself but a transcript of Nero in his mind, and would gladly enough see such pranks, as he was famous for, acted again, though he dares not be the actor of them himself. South.

2. He that personates a character; a stage-player.

Would you have
Such an Herculean actor in the scene,
And not this hydra? They must sweat no less
To fit their properties, than t'express their parts. B. Jonson.

When a good actor doth his part present,
In every act he our attention draws,
That at the last he may find just applause. Denham.

These false beauties of the stage are no more lasting than a rainbow; when the actor ceases to shine upon them, they vanish in a twinkling. Dryden, Span. Fr.

ACTRESS. n. s. [actrice, Fr.]

1. She that performs any thing.
Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame as an actress in the Æneid; but the part she acts is very short, and none of the most admired circumstances of that divine work. Addison.

We sprites have just such natures
We had, for all the world, when human creatures;
And therefore I that was an actress here,
Play all my tricks in hell, a goblin there. Dryden.

2. A woman that plays on the stage.

ACTUAL. adj. [actuel, Fr.]

1. That which comprises action.
In this slumbry agitation, besides her walking and other actual performances, what, at any time, have you heard her say? Shakspeare, Macb.

2. Really in act; not purely potential.
Sin, there in pow'r before
Once actual; now in body, and to dwell
Habitual habitant. Milton.

3. In act; not purely in speculation.
For he that but conceives a crime in thought,
Contracts the danger of an actual fault:
Then what must he expect that still proceeds
To finish sin, and work up thoughts to deeds? Dryden.

ACTUALITY. n. s. [from actual.] The state of being actual.

The actuality of these spiritual qualities is thus imprisoned, though their potentiality be not quite destroyed; and thus a crass, extended, impenetrable, passive, divisible, unintelligent substance is generated, which we call matter. Chapman.

ACTUALLY. adv. [from actual.] In act; in effect; really.

All mankind acknowledge themselves able and sufficient to do many things which actually they never do. South.

Read one of the chronicles, and you will think you were reading a history of the kings of Israel or Judah, where the historians were actually inspired, and where, by a particular scheme of providence, the kings were distinguished by judgments or blessings, according as they promoted idolatry, or the worship of the true God. Addison.

Though our temporal prospects should be full of danger, or though the days of sorrow should actually overtake us, yet still we must repose ourselves on God. Rogers.

ACTUALNESS. n. s. [from actual.] The quality of being actual.

ACTUARY. n. s. [actuarius, Lat.] The register who compiles the minutes of the proceedings of a court; a term of the civil law. It is now assumed by the clerks of some societies in the metropolis.

Suppose the judge should say, that he would have the keeping of the acts of court remain with him, and the notary will have the custody of them with himself: certainly, in this case, the actuary or writer of them ought to be preferred. Ayliffe.

The time is a principal circumstance in all consecrations, and is evermore most punctually recorded by the actuaries, or public notaries. Bp. Bramhall, Ch. of Eng. defended, p. 35.

ACTUATE. adj. [from the verb to actuate.] Put into action; animated; brought into effect.

The active informations of the intellect filling the passive reception of the will, like form closing with matter, grew actuate into a third and distinct perfection of practice. South.

To ACTUATE. v. a. [from ago, actum, Lat.] To put into action; to invigorate or encrease the powers of motion.

The light made by this animal depends upon a living spirit, and securs, by some vital irradiation, to be actuated into this lustre. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Such is every man, who has not actuated the grace given him, to the subduing of every reigning sin. Dec. of Piety.

Men of the greatest abilities are most fired with ambition; and, on the contrary, mean and narrow minds are the least actuated by it. Addison.

Our passions are the springs which actuate the powers of our nature. Rogers.

ACTUATION.* n. s. [from actuate.] Operation; the quality of bringing into effect.

The soul, being an active nature, is always propending to the exercise of one faculty or other, and that to the utmost it is able; and yet, being of a limited capacity, it can employ but one in height of exercise at once; which when it loseth and abates of its strength and supreme vigour, some other, whose improvement was all this while hindered by this its engrossing rival, must by consequence begin now to display itself, and to awaken into a more vigorous actuation.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 110.

I have presupposed all things distinct from him to have been produced out of nothing by him, and consequently, to be posterior not only the motion, but the actuation of his will.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 4.

ACTUOSE. adj. [from act.] That which hath strong powers of action: a word little used.

To ACUATE. v. a. [acuo, Lat.] To sharpen, to invigorate with any powers of sharpness.

Immoderate feeding upon powdered beef, pickled meats, and debauching with strong wines, do inflame and acuate the blood, whereby it is capacitated to corrode the lungs.

Harvey on Consump.

ACUITY.* n. s. [Fr. acuité, which Cotgrave renders acutic, sharpness.]

[The] acuity or bluntness of the pin that bears the cord.

Perkins on the Magnet. Needle, Hist. R. Soc. iv. 18.

ACULEATE.† adj. [aculeatus, Lat.] That which has a point or sting; prickly: that which terminates in a sharp point. Used also metaphorically.

To contain anger from mischief, though it take hold of a man, there be two things whereof you must have special caution: the one, of extreme bitterness of words; especially if they be aculeate: for communia maledicta are nothing so much. And again, that in anger a man reveal no secrets. Bacon, Essays, lvi.

ACUMEN.† n. s. [Lat.] A sharp point; figuratively, quickness of intellects.

Look into his true and constant religion and piety, his justice, his learning, above all kings christened, his acumen, his judgement, his memory.

Coke of K. James, Proc. against Garnet, sign. G. 3. b.

The word was much affected by the learned Aristarchus in common conversation, to signify genius or natural acumen.

P. p.

To ACUMINATE.* v. n. [from acumen.] To rise like a cone. Cockeram's old dictionary notices this verb, and explains it, "to whet or sharpen."

They [the prelates] according to their hierarchies acuminating still higher and higher in a cone of prelacy, instead of healing up the gashes of the church, as it happens in such pointed bodies meeting, full to gore one another with their sharp spires, for upper place and precedence.

Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. i.

ACUMINATE.* adj. Figuratively, sharp.

In Bellosita — are rare, acuminale, quick, and phantastical blades of your employment. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iv. 5.

ACUMINATED. part. adj. Ending in a point; sharp-pointed.

This is not acuminated and pointed, as in the rest, but acemeth, as it were, cut off. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I appropriate this word, Noli me tangere, to a small round acuminated tubercle, which hath not much pain, unless touched or rubbed, or exasperated by topicks. Wiseman.

ACUMINATION.* n. s. [from the Lat. acuminatus.] A sharp point.

The coronary thorns did not only express the scorn of the imposers, by that figure into which they were contrived; but did also pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of pains, by their numerous acuminations. Pearson on the Creed, iv.

ACUTE.† adj. [acutus, Lat.]

1. Sharp, ending in a point; opposed to obtuse or blunt.

Having the ideas of an obtuse and an acute angled triangle, both drawn from equal bases and between parallels, I can, by intuitive knowledge, perceive the one not to be the other, but cannot that way know whether they be equal. Locke.

2. In a figurative sense applied to men; ingenious: penetrating: opposed to dull or stupid.

The acute and ingenious author, among many very fine thoughts, and uncommon reflections, has started the notion of seeing all things in God. Locke.

3. Spoken of the senses; vigorous: powerful in operation.

Were our senses altered and made much quicker and acute, the appearance and outward scheme of things would have quite another face to us. Locke.

4. Sharp, in taste.

Let us take a taste, and principally pierce these four vessels, sweet, acute, austere, and mild. Whitaker, Bl. of the Grape, p. 24.

5. Acute disease. Any disease which is attended with an increased velocity of blood, and terminates in a few days; opposed to chronical. Quincy.

6. Acute accent; that which raises or sharpens the voice.

To ACUTE.* v. a. To render the accent acute.

ACUTELY. adv. [from acute.] After an acute manner: sharply; it is used as well in the figurative as primitive sense.

He that will look into many parts of Asia and America, will find men reason there perhaps as acutely as himself, who yet never heard of a syllogism. Locke.

ACUTENESS.† n. s. [from acute, which see.]

1. Sharpness.

— Divers shapes, smoothness, asperity, straightness, acuteness, and roundness.

More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 35.

2. Force of intellects.

They would not be so apt to think, that there could be nothing added to the acuteness and penetration of their understandings. Locke.

3. Quickness and vigour of senses.

If eyes so framed could not view at once the hand and the hour-plate, their owner could not be benefited by that acuteness; which, whilst it discovers the secret contrivance of the machine, made him lose its use. Locke.

4. Violence and speedy crisis of a malady.

We apply pre-emptive remedies according to indications, respecting rather the acuteness of the disease, and precipitancy of the occasion, than the rising and setting of stars. Brown.

5. Sharpness of sound.

This acuteness of sound will shew, that whilst, to the eye, the bell seems to be at rest, yet the minute parts of it continue in a very brisk motion, without which they could not strike the air. Boyle.

To ADACET.* v. a. [Lat. adago.] To drive; to compel. We are told by Dr. Johnson, who barely notices adacted, as a part. adjective, that this word, as a verb is not used. The word, however, is in our old dictionaries, without such expulſion from our language; and it is thus used by an excellent writer, who deſerves to be better known.

God himſelf once compelled the wicked Egyptians, by flies, and frogs, and grashoppers, and other ſuch like contemptible worms, to confeſs the power of his divine majeſty; not vouchſafing to adapt them by any other of his creatures more worthy.

Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 15.

A'DAGE.† } n. s. [adagium, Lat.] A maxim handed A'DACY. } down from antiquity; a proverb.

Shallow unimproved intellects, are confident pretenſors to certainty; as if, contrary to the adage, ſcience had no friend but ignorance.

Glanville, Scep. Scient.

Fine fruits of learning! old ambitious fool,

Dar'st thou apply that adage of the ſchool,

As if 'tis nothing worth that lies conceal'd;

And ſcience is not ſcience till reveal'd? Dryden.

"Nubes poſt imbrem," is a known adagy, ſignifying the ſpeedy ſucceſſion of miſeries upon miſeries. Smith, Old Age, 51.

ADAGIAL.* adj. [Fr. adagial, which is rendered by Cotgrave, "proverbial, or full of adages." Lat. adagium. In old Fr. adagial is alſo a ſubſtantive, ſignifying un homme plaisant & facétieux. V. Roquefort Gloſs.] Proverbial.

That adagial verſe [No ſooner the courteſy born, than the reſentment thereof dead.] was highly oſprobrions to mankind.

Barrow, Works, i. 94.

ADAGIO.† n. s. [Italian, at leisure] A term uſed by muſicians, to mark a ſlow time.

He has no ear for muſick, and cannot diſtinguiſh a jig from an adagio. Dr. Warton, Works, i. 187.

ADAMANT. n. s. [allamas, Lat. from a and δάμνω, Gr. that is inſuperable, infrangible.]

1. A ſtone, imagined by writers, of impenetrable hardneſs.

So great a fear my name amongst them ſpread,
That they ſuppos'd I could rend bars of ſteel,
And ſpurn in pieces poſts of adamant. Shakſpeare.

Satan, with vaſt and haughty ſtrides advanc'd,
Came tow'ring, arm'd in adamant and gold. Milton.

Eternal Deities,
Who rul'd the world with abſolute decrees,
And write whatever time ſhall bring to paſs,
With pens of adamant, on plates of braſs. Dryden.

2. The diamond.

Hardneſs, wherein ſome ſtones exceed all other bodies, and among them the adamant all other ſtones, being exalted to that degree thereof, that art in vain endeavours to counterfeit it, the factitious ſtones of chymiſts, in imitation, being eaſily detected by an ordinary lapidiſt. Ray on the Creation.

3. Adamant is taken for the loadſtone.

You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant,
But yet you draw not iron; for my heart
Is true as ſteel. Shakſpeare.

Let him change his lodging from one part of the town to another, which is a great adamant of acquaintance. Bacon.

ADAMANTE'AN.† adj. [Lat. adamantæus, Ovid.] Hard as adamant.

[He] weaponleſs himſelf,
Made arms ridiculous, uſeleſs the forgery
Of brazen ſhield and ſpear, the hammer'd cuir-a.s.
Chalybean temper'd ſteel, and frock of mail.

This word occurs perhaps only in this paſſage.

ADAMANTINE. adj. [Adamantinus, Lat.]

1. Made of adamant.

Wide is the fronting gate, and rais'd on high
With adamantine columns threats the ſky. Dryden.

2. Having the qualities of adamant; as, hardneſs, indiffolubility.

Could Eve's weak hand, extended to the tree,
In ſunder rend that adamantine chain,

Whoſe golden links, effects and cauſes be,
And which to God's own chair doth fix'd remain? Davies.

An eternal ſterility muſt have poſſeſſed the world, where all things had been fixed and faſtened everlaſtingly with the adamantine chains of ſpecific gravity; if the Almighty had not ſpoken and ſaid, Let the earth bring forth graſs, the herb yielding ſeed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after its kind; and it was ſo.

Bentley.

In adamantine chains ſhall death be bound?

And hell's grim tyrant feel th' eternal wound.

Pope.

Tho' adamantine bonds the chief reſtrain,

The dire reſtraint his wiſdom will defeat,

And ſoon reſtore him to his regal ſeat.

Pope.

A'DAM'S-APPLE. n. s. [in anatomy.] A prominent part of the throat.

A'DAMITE.* n. s. [from Adam. The Adamites are an old heresy, of which St. Auguſtine maketh mention, but renewed by the Anabaptiſts. In the aſſembly of the Adamites, men and women pray naked, &c. Pagi's Heresiography, p. 89.

What though our fields preſent a naked ſight,

A paraſiſe ſhould be an Adamite! Cleveland, Poems, p. 15.

I had rather be an Adamite and bring fig-tree leaves into ſaſhion again. Beaum. and Fl., Pilgrim, ii. 1.

There were Adamites in former times, and rebaptizers.

Howell, Letters, iv. 29.

ADAMITICK.* adj. Like an Adamite.

Nor is it other than ruſtick or adamitick impudence to confine nature to itſelf, and to ſtrip our bodies of all the addita-ments of fair veſtments, or other ornaments of human art and invention.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handſom. p. 164.

To ADAPT. v. a. [adapto, Lat.] To fit one thing to another; to ſuit; to proportion.

'Tis true, but let it not be known,

My eyes are ſomewhat dimmiſh grown;

For nature, always in the right,

To your decays adapts my ſight.

Swift.

It is not enough that nothing offends the ear, but a good poet will adapt the very ſounds, as well as words, to the things he treats of. Pope's Letters.

ADAPTABLE.* adj. That which may be adapted.

ADAPTABILITY.* n. s. The capability of adaption.

ADAPTA'TION. n. s. [from adapt.] The act of fitting one thing to another; the fitness of one thing to another.

Some ſpecies there be of middle nature; that is, of bird and beaſt, as bats; yet are their parts ſo ſet together, that we cannot define the beginning or end of either, there being a commixtion of both, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Adheſion may be in part aſcribed, either to ſome elatiſcal motion in the preſſed glaſs, or to the exquisite adaptation of the almoſt numberleſs, though very ſmall, aſperities of the one, and the numerous little cavities of the other; whereby the ſurfaces do lock in with one another, or are, as it were, claped together. Boyle.

ADAPTION. n. s. [from adapt.] The act of fitting.

It were alone a ſufficient work to ſhew all the neceſſities, the wiſe contrivances, and prudent adaptions, of theſe admirable machines for the benefit of the whole. Cheyne.

ADAPTNESS. n. s. [for adaptedneſs, from adapt.]

Some notes are to diſplay the adaptneſs of the ſound to the ſenſe. Bp. Newton on Milton.

This word I have found no where elſe.

To ADAUNT.* v. a. [a and daunt.] To ſubdue.

With mighty corage,

[He] adaunted the rage

Of a Lyon ſavage.

Skelton, of Hercules, Poems, p. 51.

To ADAW.* v. a. [Mr. Maſon derives this word from the pretended Saxon adpinan, with the explanation of extinguere; which, as Mr. Boucher has obſerved, is a word not in exiſtence. Mr. Upton, obſerving that adaw is once uſed by Spenser for extinguish, (in the ſecond inſtance here cited,)] thinks that the poet might have had in view the Sax. þwærcan, abwærcan, extinguere. The word perhaps may be referred to the verb to awee, with the a prefixed, which is common, (as in the preceding word adaunt;) and the d inserted, to prevent an ill sound from the collision of two vowels. It is now obsolete.] To daunt; to keep under; to subject.

The sight thereof did greatly him adaw.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. vii. 13.

As the bright sun, what time his merie teme
Towards the westerne brim begins to draw,
Gins to abate the brightness of his beme,
And fervour of his flames somewhat adaw. Ibid. v. ix. 35.

To ADA'W.* v. n. To be daunted. Obsolete.

Therewith her wrathfull courage gan appall,
And haughtie spirits meekly to adaw. Spenser, F. Q. iv. vi. 26.

ADA'YS.* adv. [On days. Dr. Johnson admits anights, but not this word; which is of frequent occurrence in our language, though Johnson thinks the composition nowadays barbarous; of which the words were formerly written distinct.]

— Here I many a man compleine,

That nowe on daies thou shalt finde,

At nede, few frendes kinde.

Gower, Conf. Am. b. 5.

Myself will have a double eye,

Ylike to my flock and thine;

For alas! at home I have a sere,

A stepdame eke, as hot as fire,

That duly adays counts mine. Spenser, Shep. Cal. March.

They that will have men saved and damned by a Stoical necessity, now adays, may borrow this fancy of the Stoicks also.

Hammond's Works, iv. 612.

To ADCO'RPORATE.* v. a. [from ad and corpus.] To unite one body with another; more usually written accorporate; to which Dr. Johnson refers the reader, without, however, having noticed that word. In our old dictionaries, adcorporated is termed married.

To ADD. v. o. [addo, Lat.]

1. To join something to that which was before.

Mark if his birth makes any difference,

If to his words it adds one grain of sense.

Dryden.

They, whose muses have the highest flown,

Add not to his immortal memory,

But do an act of friendship to their own.

Dryden.

2. To perform the mental operation of adding one number or conception to another. To add to is proper, but to add together seems a solecism.

Whatsoever positive ideas a man has in his mind, of any quantity, he can repeat it, and add it to the former, as easily as he can add together the ideas of two days, or two years. Locke.

ADDABLE. adj. [from add.] That to which something may be added. Addible is more proper. It signifies more properly that which may be added.

The first number in every addition is called the addable number, the other, the number or numbers added, and the number invented by the addition, the aggregate or sum. Cocker.

To ADDE'CIMATE. v. a. [addecimo, Lat.] To take or ascertain tithes. Dict.

To ADDE'EM.* v. a. [from deem.]

1. To esteem; to account. This word is now out of use.

She scorns to be addem'd so worthless-base,

As to be mov'd to such an int'rey.

Daniel, Civ. Wars.

2. To award; to sentence.

So unto him they did addeme the prise

Of all that triumph.

Spenser, F. Q. v. iii. 15.

— The winged god, that woundeth hearts —

Addem'd me to endure this penance sore. Ibid. vi. viii. 22.

ADDE'NDUM.* n. s. [Lat.] An addition or appendix to a work; any addition, generally speaking. In the pl. addenda.

ADDER. n. s. [Ætæp, Ætæton, Nabbpe, as it seems from ætæp, Sax. poison. Moes-Goth. nadr, viper.] A serpent, a viper, a poisonous reptile; perhaps of any species. In common language adders and snakes are not the same.

Or is the adder better than the eel,

Because his painted skin contents the eye?

Shakspeare.

An adder did it; for with doubler tongue

Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung.

Shakspeare.

The adder teaches us where to strike, by her curious and fearful defending of her head. Taylor.

ADDER'S-GRASS. n. s. The name of a plant, imagined by Skinner to be so named because serpents lurk about it.

ADDERS-TONGUE. n. s. [ophioglossum, Lat.] The name of an herb.

It hath no visible flower; but the seeds are produced on a spike, which resembles a serpent's tongue; which seed is contained in many longitudinal cells. Miller.

The most common simples are comfrey, hogle, acrimony, sanicle, paul's-betony, fluellin, perriwinkle, adder's-tongue.

Wiseman, Surg.

ADDERS-WORT. n. s. An herb, so named on account of its virtue, real or supposed, of curing the bite of serpents.

ADDIBLE. adj. [from add.] Possible to be added. See ADDABLE.

The clearest idea it can get of infinity, is the confused, incomprehensible remainder of endless, addible numbers, which affords no prospect of stop or boundary. Locke.

ADDIBILITY. n. s. [from addible.] The possibility of being added.

This endless addition, or addibility (if any one like the word better) of numbers, so apparent to the mind, is that which gives us the clearest and most distinct idea of infinity. Locke.

ADDICE. n. s. [for which we corruptly speak and write adz, from adeye, Sax. an axe.]

The addice hath its blade made thin and somewhat arching.

As the axe hath its edge parallel to its handle, so the addice hath its edge athwart the handle, and is ground to a bawl on its inside to its outer edge. Moron, Mechan. Eacr.

ADDICT.* adj. Formerly used for addicted.

Neither would we at this day be so addict to superstition, were it not that we so much esteemed the filling of our bellies.

Hornikes, ii. 97.

If he be addict to vice,

Quickly him they will entice.

Shakspeare, Pass. Pilg. xviii.

To ADDICT.* v. a. [addico, Lat.]

1. To devote, to dedicate, in a good sense; which is rarely used.

Ye know the house of Stephanus, that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

2. Dr. Johnson says, this word is commonly taken in a bad sense; as, he addicted himself to vice. This is so far from being the case, that some of our best writers abundantly use it in a good sense. One of our earliest lexicographers thus illustrates the verb addict, "To addict himself to live uprightly;" Barret's Alvearie; and under the adjective addict says, "Addict and given to the study of learning."

They did either earnestly lament and bewail their sinful lives, or did addict themselves to more fervent prayer.

Hornikes, ii. Of Fasting.

My grandfather Jesus, when he had much given himself to the reading of the law and the prophets, and other books of our fathers, and had gotten therein good judgement, was drawn on also himself to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom, to the intent that those which are desirous to learn, and addicted to these things, might profit muchmore in living according to the law. Prologue to Ecclesiasticus.

All knowledge, arising from observation, must be either of those sciences which immediately conduce to the benefit of men's lives, or such whose end is to improve men's rational faculties in the knowledge of things. The former, necessity will put men upon the finding out; the latter require "secessum et otia," freedom from other employments, a mind addicted to them, and industry in the study of them.

Stillingfleet, Orig. Sac. ii. ii.

Many men, addicted rather to contemplation than action, in the infancy of Christianity, to avoid the heat of persecution, did withdraw themselves from the press of the people in populous cities to a more solitary life. Sir R. Twissden, Mon. Life, p. 3.

Whether if each of these towns were addicted to some peculiar manufacture, we should not find, that the employing many hands together on the same work was the way to perfect our workmen? Bp. Berkeley, Quærist. 415.

The people of Ireland were much more addicted to pasturage than agriculture. Burke, Abr. Eng. Hist. iii. 6.

3. To devote one's self to any person, party, or persuasion. A Latinism.

I am neither author or fautor of any sect: I will have no man addict himself to me; but if I have any thing right, defend it as truth's. R. Johnson.

ADDICTEDNESS. n. s. [from addicted.] The quality or state of being addicted.

Those know how little I have remitted of my former addictedness to make chymical experiments. Boyle.

ADDICTION. † n. s. [addictio, Lat.]

1. The act of devoting, or giving up.

Much is to be found, in men of all conditions, of that which is called pedantry in scholars; which is nothing else but an obstinate addiction to the forms of some private life, and not regarding general things enough. Sprat, Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 67.

2. The state of being devoted.

It is a wonder how his grace should glean it, Since his addiction was to courses vain; His companies unlabeled, rude and shallow; His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports. Shakspeare.

ADDITAMENT. n. s. [additamentum, Lat.] The addition, or thing added.

Iron will not incorporate with brass, nor other metals, of itself, by simple fire: so as the enquiry must be upon the calcination, and the additament, and the charge of them. Bacon.

In a palace there is first the case or fabrick, or moles of the structure itself; and, besides that, there are certain additaments that contribute to its ornament and use; as, various furniture, rare fountains and aqueducts, divers things appendicated to it. Hall, Orig. of Man.

ADDITION. n. s. [from add.]

1. The act of adding one thing to another; opposed to diminution.

The infinite distance between the Creator and the noblest of all creatures, can never be measured, nor exhausted by endless addition of finite degrees. Bentley.

2. Additament, or the thing added.

It will not be modestly done, if any of our own wisdom intrude or interpose, or be willing to make additions to what Christ and his Apostles have designed. Hammond.

Some such resemblances, methinks, I find Of our last evening's talk, in this thy dream, But with addition strange! Milton.

The abolishing of villanage, together with the custom permitted, among the nobles, of selling their lands, was a mighty addition to the power of the commons. Swift.

3. In Arithmetic.

Addition is the reduction of two or more numbers of like kind together into one sum or total. Cocker's Arith.

4. In law. A title given to a man over and above his Christian name and surname, shewing his estate, degree, occupation, trade, age, place of dwelling. Cowell.

Only retain

The name, and all th' addition to a king;

The sway, revenue, execution,

Beloved sons, be yours; which to confirm,

This coronet part between you.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

From this time,

For what he did before Corioli, call him,

With all th' applause and clamour of the host,

Caius Marcius Coriolanus. Bear th' addition nobly ever.

Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

There arose new disputes upon the persons named by the king, or rather against the additions and appellations of title, which were made to their names. Garendon.

ADDITIONAL. adj. [from addition.] That which is added.

Our calendar being reformed and set right, it may be kept so, without any considerable variation, for many ages, by omitting one leap-year; i. e. the additional day, at the end of every 134 years. Holder on Time.

The greatest wits, that ever were produced in one age, lived together in so good an understanding, and celebrated one another with so much generosity, that each of them receives an additional lustre from his contemporaries. Addison.

They include in them that very kind of evidence, which is supposed to be powerful; and do, withal, afford us several other additional proofs, of great force and clearness. Atterbury.

ADDITIONAL. † n. s. Additament; something added, which, however, Dr. Johnson says, is not in use; though good authors employ it.

May be, some little additional may further the incorporation.

Bacon.

They can tell us, that all the laws de feodis are but additional to the ancient civil law. Bacon.

Many thanks for the *additional*s you are pleased to communicate to me, in continuance of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia.

Howell, Letters, iv. 20.

How much she [the church of Rome] hath in her superfluous *additional*s built upon good foundations, gold, silver, hay, stubble, and the like, is no where better distinguished than in what our church of England hath rejected, and in what she hath retained. Puller's Mod. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 452.

ADDITIONALLY.  adv.* In addition.

Nor can any representation of God's proceedings be more harsh and incredible, than to suppose him, by his omnipotent will and power, eternally and miraculously preserving such creatures unto endless punishment, who never had in them either originally or additionally, any principle of immortality at all. Clerk, Letter to Dodwell.

ADDITIONARY.  adj.* That which may be added.

This liberty he compasseth by one distinction, and that is, of what is necessary, and what is additionary.

Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 31.

ADDITIONARY. adj. [from add.] That which has the power or quality of adding.

The additionary fiction gives to a great man a larger share of reputation than belongs to him, to enable him to serve some good end or purpose. Arbutnot.

ADDLE. † adj. [from adel, a disease, Sax. according to Skinner and Junius; perhaps from ybel, idle, barren, unfruitful. The latter of the preceding etymologies, which Dr. Johnson has given, may be rejected; but we may safely refer to the Sax. adel, morbus, a disease; or to the verb adlian, to be sick; or to the Brit. hadyl, corrupt, rotten; hadlu, to corrupt, to putrefy. Thus Verstegan says, "we yet call eggs addle, when they are corrupt." Our old lexicographers, Huloet and Minshew, call such an egg, ovum urinum; "quia aquam, habet urino in eo similem." Adda in the Suio-Goth. language is to make urine. Hence perhaps addle-pool. Addle in the Lancashire dialect is, unfruitful.] Originally applied to eggs, and signifying such as produce nothing, but grow rotten under the hen; thence transferred to brains that produce nothing.

There's one with truncheon, like a ladle.

That carries eggs too fresh or addle;

And still at random, as he goes,

Among the rabble rout betrays.

Hudibras.

A D D

After much solitariness, fasting, or long sickness, their brains were addle, and their bellies as empty of meat as their heads of wit.

Burton on Melancholy, p. 659.

Thus far the poet; but his brains grow addle:
And all the rest is purely from his noddle.

Dryden.

To ADDLE. v. a. [from addle, adj.] To make addle; to corrupt; to make barren.

This is also evidenced in eggs, whereof the sound ones sink, and such as are addled swim; as do also those that are termed hypanemias, or wind eggs.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

To ADDLE. v. n. To grow; to increase. Obsolete.

Where ivy embraceth the tree very sore,
Kill ivy, else tree will addle no more.

Tusser's Husbandry.

ADDLE-HEADED. * adj. [Sherwood, in his dictionary introduces addle-head, which he interprets, "qui n'a point de cerveau."]

Addle-headed students. Trans. of Rabelais, iv. 79.

ADDLE-PATED. adj. Having addled brains. See ADDLE.

Poor slaves in metre, dull and addl-pated,
Who rhyme below even David's psalms translated.

Dryden.

To ADDUOM. * v. a. [from ad and doom.] To adjudge.

Now judge then, O thou greatest goddess true,
According as thy selfe dost see and heare,
And unto me addoom that is my due.

Spenser, F. Q. vii. vii. 56.

ADDORSED. * part. adj. In heraldry, signifies beasts, &c. turned back to back.

To ADDRES. * v. a. [addresser, Fr. from dececar, Span. from dirigo, direction, Lat. or from the low Lat. addretiare, vel addressare, V. Du Cange.]

1. To prepare one's self to enter upon any action; as, he addressed himself to the work. It has to before the thing.

With him the Palmer eke, in habit sad,
Himself address to that adventure hard.

Spenser, F. Q.

It lifted up its head, and did address
Itself to motion, like as it would speak.
Then Turnus, from his chariot leaping light,
Address'd himself on foot to single fight.

Dryden.

For myself, addressing myself to Norwich, whither it was his majesty's pleasure to remove me, I was at the first received with more respect, than in such times I could have expected.

Bp. Hall, Hard Measure.

2. To get ready; to put in a state for immediate use.

They fell directly on the English battle; whereupon the earl of Warwick addressed his men to take the flank.

Hayward.

Duke Frederick hearing, how that every day
Men of great worth resorted to this forest,
Address'd a mighty power, which were on foot,
In his own conduct purposely to take
His brother here.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

To-night in Harfleur we will be your guest,
To-morrow for the march we are address.

Shakspeare.

3. To apply to another by words, with various forms of construction.

4. Sometimes without a preposition, Dr. Johnson says; and yet, in the two first instances, given by him, the preposition to is obvious.

To such I would address with this most affectionate petition.

Decay of Party.

Among the crowd, but far above the rest,
Young Turnus to theauteous maid address.
Are not your orders to address the senate?

Dryden.
Addison.

5. Sometimes with to.

Addressing to Pollio, his great patron, and himself no vulgar poet, he began to assert his native character, which is sublimity.

Dryden.

6. Sometimes with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he addressed himself to the general.

7. Sometimes with the accusative of the matter of the address, which may be the nominative to the passive.

A D D

The young hero had addressed his prayers to him for his assistance.

Dryden.

The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd,
His vows to great Apollo thus address.

Dryden.

His suit was common; but, above the rest,
To both the brother-princes thus address.

Dryden.

8. To address [in law] is to apply to the king in form.

The representatives of the nation in parliament, and the privy-council, address'd the king to have it recalled.

Swift.

ADDRES. * n. s. [addresse, Fr.]

1. Verbal application to any one, by way of persuasion, petition.

Henry, in knots involving Emma's name,
Had half confess'd and half conceal'd his flame
Upon this tree, and as the tender mark
Grew with the year, and widen'd with the bark,
Venus had heard the virgin's soft address,
That, as the wound, the passion might encrease.

Prior.

Most of the persons, to whom these addresses are made, are not wise and skilful judges, but are influenced by their own sinful appetites and passions.

Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

2. Courtship.

They often have reveal'd their passion to me:

But, tell me, whose address thou favour'st most;

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Addison.

A gentleman, whom, I am sure, you yourself would have approved, made his addresses to me.

Addison.

3. Manner of addressing another: as, we say, a man of an happy or a pleasing address; a man of an awkward address.

4. Skill, dexterity.

I could produce innumerable instances from my own observation, of events imputed to the profound skill and address of a minister, which, in reality, were either mere effects of negligence, weakness, humour, passion, or pride, or, at best, but the natural course of things, left to themselves.

Swift.

5. Manner of directing a letter; a sense chiefly mercantile, Dr. Johnson says; but it is now general, a person being desired to leave his address, who has called upon another without seeing him.

6. Written application to any one, generally complimentary: as a dedication of a work.

It is dedicated in a very elegant address to Sir Charles Sedley.

Johnson, Life of Dryden.

7. The complimentary reply of the House of Lords or Commons, to the King's speech from the throne, or any other formal application by Parliament to His Majesty.

One would think that the late address had given them the Jacobite party a mortal blow, by the desperate rage they are in.

Bentley, Letters, p. 259.

ADDRES. * n. s. [from address.] The person that addresses or petitions.

The addresses offer their own persons, and they are satisfied with hiring Germans.

Burke to the Sheriff of Bristol.

To ADDUCE. * v. a. [from adduco, Lat.] To bring forward: to urge: to allege.

Nothing could have been more unluckily adduced by Mr. Locke to support his aversion to first principles, than the example of Sir Isaac Newton.

Reid's Inquiry.

The learned and ingenious author of Hermes, with great strength of argument, shews, that language is founded in compact, and not in nature. His friend, Lord Monboddo, with great learning and ingenuity, supports the same opinion, and insists that language is not natural to man, but that it is acquired; and, in the course of his reflections, he adduces the opinions not only of heathen philosophers, poets, and historians, but of Christian divines, both ancient and modern.

Astle, Orig. and Progr. of Writing, ch. 1.

ADDUCENT. adj. [adducens, Lat.]

A word applied to those muscles that bring forward, close, or draw together the parts of the body to which they are annexed.

Quincy.

ADDU'CIBLE.* adj. That which may be brought forward.

ADDU'CTION.* n. s. [Lat. adductus.] The act of adducing or bringing forward.

They [the muscles] can stir the limb inward, outward; forward, backward; upward, downward; they can perform adduction, abduction; flexion, extension. Smith, Old Age, p. 62.

The chief purpose of the notes is to explain our author's allusions, to illustrate or vindicate his beauties, to point out his imitations both of others and of himself, to elucidate his obsolete diction, and by the adduction and juxta-position of parallels universally gleaned both from his poetry and prose, to ascertain his favourite words, and to shew the peculiarities of his phraseology. Warton, Pref. to his Edit. of Milton's Smaller Poems.

ADDU'CTIVE.* adj. [from adduct.] That which fetches, or brings down.

Here the gentleman falls foul on my folly for attributing these miracles to the priests' power, and not to God; which I do no more than themselves; and for bringing their imaginary Christ from heaven; which is the English of their adductive motion.

Brevint, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 411.

TO ADDU'CE. v. a. [adducere, Fr. dulcis, Lat.] To sweeten: a word not now in use.

Thus did the French ambassadors, with great shew of their king's affection, and many sugared words, seek to adduce all matters between the two kings. Baron, Henry VII.

ADELANTADO.* n. s. [Span. the king's lieutenant in a province, or any great place of charge. Minshou says, we use it for the lord admiral; the Spanish using adelantado de mar for general of an army or armada at sea.]

Open no door; if the adelantado of Spain were here, he should not enter. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, v. vi.

He thought himself as complete an adelantado as he that is known by wearing a cloak of tufft taffaty eighteen years.

Nash's Lenten Staff.

A'DELING.* n. s. [from ædel, Sax. illustrious; or, as Dr. Wilkins has observed, compounded of abela, noble, and ling, a representative. Brit. edling. The word ling was used by the Anglo-Saxons to denote progeny, or the younger. See Spelman. Thus we call a young duck, duckling; and, as Mr. Boucher has added, the Normans were formerly called Norðlings, i. e. children of the North.] A word of honour among the Angles, properly appertaining to the king's children: king Edward the Confessor, being without issue, and intending to make Edgar his heir, called him adeling. Coxvel.

ADENO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [from ἀδων and γράφω, Gr.] A treatise of the glands.

ADÉ'MPTION.* n. s. [adimo, ademptum, Lat.] Taking away; privation. Dict.

ADE'PT.* n. s. [from adeptus, Lat. that is, adeptus artem; so Dr. Johnson thinks; and Mr. Horne Tooke informs us, that adept is the past participle of the ancient verb apio, from which apiscor, and from that adipiscor. In old Fr. the participle adept also is to be found for obtained. But the etymology must be carried to the Arabick adab, "quod iis præcipue competit, qui res mirandas ac stupendas, quales, nimirum, præ se ferunt chymici, didicerunt." Hunt & Antiq. Ling. Arab. 4to. Oxon. 1739. p. 43.] He that is completely skilled in all the secrets of his art. It is, in its original signification, appropriated to the chymists, but is now extended to other artists.

They say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle spirits, upon a condition very easy to all true adepts, an inviolate preservation of chastity.

Pope, Letter prefixed to the Rape of the Lock.

With this trumpety they drew Julian off from christianity, and made him think himself as great an adept as any of his teachers.

Bentley on Free-Thinking, p. 164.

The Dominicans of Spain were accomplished adepts in the learning and language of the Arabians.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 292.

ADE'PT.* adj. Skilful; thoroughly versed.

If there be really such adept philosophers as we are told of, I am apt to think, that, among their arcana, they are masters of extremely potent menstruums.

Boyle.

TO ADEQUATE.* v. a. [Lat. adequo.] To resemble exactly.

Though it be an impossibility for any creature to adequate God in his eternity, yet he hath ordained all his sons in Christ to partake of it by living with him eternally.

Shelford, Discourses, p. 227.

Let me give you one instance more, of a truly intellectual object, exactly adequated and proportioned unto the intellectual appetite: and that is learning and knowledge.

Fotherby, Athcom, p. 208.

A'DEQUATE.* adj. [adequatus, Lat. Equal to; proportionate; correspondent to, so as to bear an exact resemblance or proportion. It is used generally in a figurative sense, and often with the particle to.

Contingent death seems to be the whole adequate object of popular courage; but a necessary and unavoidable coffin strikes paleness into the stoutest heart. Harvey on Consumptions.

The arguments were proper, adequate, and sufficient to compass their respective ends. South.

All our simple ideas are adequate; because, being nothing but the effects of certain powers in things, fitted and ordained by God to produce such sensations in us, they cannot but be correspondent and adequate to those powers. Locke.

Those are adequate ideas, which perfectly represent their archetypes or objects. Inadequate are but a partial, or incomplete, representation of those archetypes to which they are referred. Watts, Logick.

A'DEQUATELY.* adv. [from adequate.]

1. In an adequate manner; with justness of representation; with exactness of proportion.

Gratitude consists adequately in these two things: first, that it is a debt; and, secondly, that it is such a debt as is left to every man's ingenuity, whether he will pay or no. South.

2. It is used with the particle to.

Piety is the necessary Christian virtue, proportioned adequately to the omniscience and spirituality of that infinite Deity.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

A'DEQUATENESS.* n. s. [from adequate.] The state of being adequate; justness of representation; exactness of proportion.

A'DEQUATION.* n. s. Adequateness.

The principles of logick and natural reason tell us, that there must be a just proportion and adequation between the medium by which we prove, and the conclusion to be proved.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 123.

ADÉSPO'TICK.* adj. Not absolute; not despotick. Dict.

ADFI'Liated.* part. adj. Adopted for a son. See AFFILIATE. Dict.

TO ADHÉ'RE. v. n. [adhæreo, Lat.]

1. To stick to; as, wax to the finger; with to before the thing.

2. To stick, in a figurative sense; to be consistent; to hold together.

Why every thing adheres together, that no dram of a scruple, no scruple of a scruple, no incredulous or unsafe circumstance — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

3. To remain firmly fixed to a party, person, or opinion.

Good gentlemen, he hath much talk'd of you;

And sure I am, two men there are not living,

To whom he more adheres.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Every man of sense will agree with me, that singularity is laudable, when, in contradiction to a multitude, it adheres to the dictates of conscience, morality, and honour. Boyle.

ADHÉ'RENCE.* n. s. [from adhere.] See ADHESION.

A D H

1. The quality of adhering, or sticking; tenacity.
2. In a figurative sense, fixedness of mind; steadiness;

The firm adherence of the Jews to their religion is no less remarkable than their dispersion; considering it as persecuted or condemned over the whole earth. Addison.

A constant adherence to one sort of diet may have had effects on any constitution. Arbutnot on Aliments.

Plain good sense, and a firm adherence to the point, have proved more effectual than those arts, which are contemptuously called the spirit of negotiating. Swift.

ADHERENCY. † n. s. [The same with adherence.]

1. Steady attachment.

How are they swayed, even in their loves and hatreds, their persuasions and piques, their esteem or disesteem, most what by custom and prepossession, or by adherencies and admirations of men's persons! Rp. Taylor, Artif. Hand. p. 172.

2. That which adheres.

Vices have a native adherency of vexation. Decay of Piety.

ADHERENT. † adj. [from adhere.]

1. Sticking to.

Close to the cliff with both his hands he clung, And stuck adherent, and suspended hung. Pope.

2. United with.

There is no sin but is attended and surrounded with so many miseries, and adherent bitternesses, that it is at best but like a single drop of honey in a sea of gall. South, Sermon viii. 105.

Modes are said to be inherent or adherent, that is, proper or improper. Adherent or improper modes arise from the joining of some accidental substance to the chief subject, which yet may be separated from it; so when a bowl is wet, or a boy is clothed, these are adherent modes; for the water and the clothes are distinct substances which adhere to the bowl, or to the boy. Watts, Logick.

ADHERENT. n. s. [from adhere.]

1. The person that adheres; one that supports the cause, or follows the fortune of another; a follower, a partisan.

Princes must give protection to their subjects and adherents, when worthy occasion shall require it. Rutledge.

A new war must be undertaken upon the advice of those, who, with their partisans and adherents, were to be the sole gainers by it. Swift.

2. Any thing outwardly belonging to a person.

When they cannot shake the main fort, they must try if they can possess themselves of the outworks, raise some prejudice against his discretion, his honour, his carriage, and his extrinsic adherents. Government of the Tongue.

ADHERENTLY. * adv. In an adherent manner.

ADHERER. n. s. [from adhere.] He that adheres.

He ought to be indulgent to tender consciences; but, at the same time, a firm adherer to the established church. Swift.

ADHESION. † n. s. [adhesio, Lat.]

1. The act or state of sticking to something. Adhesion is generally used in the natural, and adherence in the metaphorical sense: as, the adhesion of iron to the magnet; and adherence of a client to his patron.

Why therefore may not the minute parts of other bodies, if they be conveniently shaped for adhesion, stick to one another, as well as stick to this spirit? Boyle.

The rest consisting wholly in the sensible configuration, as smooth and rough; or else more, or less, firm adhesion of the parts, as hard and soft, tough and brittle, are obvious. Locke.

—Prove that all things, on occasion, Love union, and desire adhesion. Prior.

2. Dr. Johnson says, that it is sometimes taken, like adherence, figuratively, for firmness in an opinion, or steadiness in a practice, and he cites a modern instance from Atterbury. This figurative application, I conceive, was formerly common. I will give an example from a work published more than a century and a half since.

A D I

- A fourth cause of this slavery of our understandings, is obstinate adhesion to false rules of belief, and topicks of probation; and that either taken from others or ourselves.

Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 216.

The same want of sincerity, the same adhesion to vice, and aversion from goodness, will be equally a reason for their rejecting any proof whatsoever. Atterbury.

ADHESIVE. † adj. [from adhesion.] Sticking; tenacious.

If slow, yet sure, adhesive to the tract, Hot steaming up. Thomson.

Those appetites to which every place affords their proper object, and which require no preparatory measures or gradual advances, are more tenaciously adhesive.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 135.

ADHESIVELY. * adv. In an adhesive manner.

ADHESIVENESS. * n. s. Tenacity; viscosity.

To ADHIBIT. † v. a. [adhibeo, Lat.] To apply; to make use of.

Salt, a necessary ingredient in all sacrifices, was adhibited and required in this view only as an emblem of purification.

President Forbes, Letter to a Bishop.

Wine also that is dilute may safely and profitably be adhibited in an apozemical form in fevers.

Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 33.

ADHIBITION. † n. s. [from adhibit.] Application; use.

The adhibition of dilute wine.

Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 55.

ADHORTATION. * n. s. [Lat. adhortatio. old Fr. anhortement, Lacombe. Formerly a figure of rhetorick.

“Adhortatio, when we do exhort our hearers to do that which is profitable for them.” Peacham’s Garden of Eloquence, sign. L. i.] Advice.

Can not the knowledge of the words of God, the sweet adhortations, the hyge and assured promises that God maketh unto us, kepe christen men from contempning the judgements and lawes of God, from undoinge theyr cuntry, from sythning against theyr prince? Remedy for Sedition, sign. E. i. b.

ADJACENCY. n. s. [from adjaceo, Lat.]

1. The state of lying close to another thing.

2. That which is adjacent. See ADJACENT.

Because the Cape hath sea on both sides near it, and other lands, remote as it were, equidistant from it; therefore, at that point, the needle is not distracted by the vicinity of adjacencies. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ADJACENT. adj. [adjacens, Lat.] Lying near or close; bordering upon something.

It may corrupt within itself, although no part of it issue into the body adjacent. Bacon.

Uniform pellucid mediums, such as water, have no sensible reflection but in their external superficies, where they are adjacent to other mediums of a different density. Newton.

ADJACENT. † n. s. That which lies next another.

The sense of the author goes visibly in its own train, and the words receiving a determined sense from their companions and adjacents, will not consent to give countenance and colour to what must be supported at any rate. Locke.

That which hath no bounds, nor borders, must be infinite: but Almighty God hath no bounds; because nothing bordereth upon him, and there is nothing above him to confine him: He hath no adjacent, no equal, no corival. Shelford, Discourses, p. 220.

ADIAPHORACY. * n. s. Indifferency. Dict.

ADIAPHOROUS. † adj. [adiaphoros, Gr.]

1. Neutral; particularly used of some spirits and salts, which are neither of an acid or alkaline nature.

Quincy.

Our adiaphorous spirit may be obtained, by distilling the liquor that is afforded by woods and divers other bodies. Boyle.

2. Indifferent.

They who were perpetually clamorous, that the severity of the laws should slacken as to their particular, and in matter adiaphorous (in which if the church have any authority, she hath power to make such laws), to indulge a leave to them to do as they list; yet were the most imperious among men.

Puller, Moderat. Ch. of Eng. p. 512.

ADIA'PHORY. n. s. [adiaφopia, Gr.]. Neutrality; indifference.

To ADJE'CT. † v. a. [adjicio, adjectum, Lat.]. To add to; to put to another thing.

Llanstufan castel and lordship by the new acte is removid from Cairmardinschire, and adjected to Pembrokechire.

Leland, Itin. iii. 26.

We distinguish between the substance of things and their goods: for substances are but empty vessels without their goods adjected.

Shelford, Learned Discourses, (1635) p. 181.

ADJECTION. n. s. [adjectio, Lat.].

1. The act of adjecting, or adding.

There are sentinels,

That every minute watch to give alarms

Of civil war, without adjection

Of your assistance or occasion.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 8.

This is added to complete our happiness, by the adjection of eternity.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 12.

2. The thing adjected, or added.

That unto every pound of sulphur, an adjection of one ounce of quicksilver; or unto every pound of petre, one ounce of sal-armoniac, will much intend the force, and consequently the report, I find no verity.

Broun, Vulg. Err.

ADJECTIVIOUS. † adj. [from adjection.] Added: throwy in upon the rest.

From this ruin you come to a large firm pile of building, which though very lofty, and composed of huge square stones, yet I take to be part of the adjectitious work; for one sees in the inside some fragments of images in the walls and stones, with Roman letters upon them, set the wrong way.

Maunder's Journey, p. 136.

ADJECTIVE. n. s. [adjectivum, Lat.].

A word added to a noun, to signify the addition or separation of some quality, circumstance, or manner of being; as, good, bad, are adjectives, because, in speech, they are applied to nouns, to modify their signification, or intimate the manner of existence in the things signified thereby.

Clarke's Latin Grammar.

All the versification of Claudian is included within the compass of four or five lines; perpetually closing his sense at the end of a verse, and that verse commonly which they call golden, or two substantives and two adjectives, with a verb betwixt them, to keep the peace.

Dryden.

ADJECTIVELY. † adv. In the manner of an adjective.

Adject. noteth a word adjectively taken.

Barrel's Alcearic, To the Reader.

Read which you will, either substantively or adjectively, it matters not, whilst all mean the same with the English.

Knatchbull, Tr. p. 6.

ADIEU. † adv. [from à Dieu, used elliptically for à Dieu je vous commende, used at the departure of friends; Fr. adieu, pl. adieux, Ital. adio, Span. adios, old Fr. à Dieu commande, gone to God, departed this life.] The form of parting, originally importing a commendation to the Divine care, but now used, in a popular sense, sometimes to things inanimate; farewell.

No gave him leave to bid that aged sire

Adieu, but nimbly ran her wonted course.

Fairy Queen.

Use a more spacious ceremony to the noble lords; you restrained yourself within the list of too cold an adieu; be more expressive to them.

Shakespeare, All's well that ends well.

While now I take my last adieu,

Heave thou no sigh nor shed a tear;

Lest yet my half-clos'd eye may view

On earth an object worth its care.

Prior.

It is obvious, in the preceding examples, that adieu is also a substantive, as well as an adverb; though Dr. Johnson has made no distinction. Like farewell, it is a parting compliment.

A D J

Write to him

(I will subscribe) gentle adieu and greetings.

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop. iv. v.

When all the friendships of the world shall bid him adieu.

South, Sermon. ii. 469.

To ADJO'IN. † v. a. [adjoindre, Fr. adjungo, Lat.].

1. To join to; to unite to; to put to.

As one who, long in populous city pent,
Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe

Among the pleasant villages and farms

Adjoin'd, from each thing met conceives delight.

Milton.

Thus for St. Ambrose: unto whom we may adjoin Gregory Nazianzen also.

Abp. Usher, Answer to a Jesuit, p. 138.

Wherewithal we are to adjoin the aforesaid epistles of Christ by St. John unto the seven churches in Asia.

Bp. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 135.

Corrections or improvements should be as remarks adjoined, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places, and superadded to a regular treatise.

Watts.

2. To fasten by a joint or juncture.

As a massy wheel

Fixt on the summit of the highest mount,

To whose huge spoke ten thousand lesser things

Are mortis'd and adjoin'd.

Shakespeare.

To ADJO'IN. v. n. To be contiguous to; to lie next so as to have nothing between.

Th' adjoining fane, th' assembled Greeks express'd,

And hunting of the Caledonian beast.

Dryden.

In learning any thing, as little should be proposed to the mind at once, as is possible; and, that being understood and fully mastered, proceed to the next adjoining, yet unknown, simple, unperplexed proposition, belonging to the matter in hand, and tending to the clearing what is principally designed.

Locke.

ADJO'INANT.  adj.* [Fr. particip. of adjoindre.] To be contiguous to; to lie next to.

To the town there is adjoinant in site, but sequestered in jurisdiction, an antient castle.

Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

To ADJO'URN. v. a. [adjourner, Fr.].

1. To put off to another day, naming the time: a term used in juridical proceedings; as, of parliaments, or courts of justice.

The queen being absent, 'tis a needful fitness,

That we adjourn this court to further day.

Shakespeare.

By the king's authority alone, and by his writs they are assembled, and by him alone are they prorogued and dissolved; but each house may adjourn itself.

Bacon.

2. To put off; to defer; to let stay to a future time.

Then, Jupiter, thou king of gods,

Why hast thou thus adjourn'd

The graces for his merits due,

Being all to dolours turn'd.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

Crown high the goblets with a cheerful draught;

Enjoy the present hour, adjourn the future thought.

Dryden.

The forination of animals being foreign to my purpose, I shall adjourn the consideration of it to another occasion.

Woodward, Natural History.

ADJO'URNMENT. n. s. [adjournement, Fr.].

1. An assignment of a day, or a putting off till another day. Adjournment in eyre, an appointment of a day, when the justices in eyre mean to sit again.

Covent.

2. Delay; procrastination; dismissal to a future time.

We will and we will not, and then we will not again, and we will. At this rate we run our lives out in adjournments from time to time, out of a fantastical levity that holds us off and on, betwixt hawk and buzzard.

L'Estrange.

ADIPOUS. adj. [adiposus, Lat.]. Fat.

Dict.

ADIT. n. s. [aditus, Lat.]. A passage for the conveyance of water under ground; a passage under ground in general: a term among the mine-men.

For conveying away the water, they stand in aid of sundry devices; as, adits, pumps, and wheels, driven by a stream, and interchangeably filling and emptying two buckets. Carew.

* The delfs would be so flown with water (it being impossible to make any adits or soughs to drain them) that no gins or machines could suffice to lay and keep them dry. Ray.

ADITION. n. s. [from adeo, aditum, Lat.] The act of going to another. Dict.

To ADJUDGE. v. a. [Fr. adjuer, Lat. adjudico.]

1. To give the thing controverted to one of the parties by a judicial sentence; with the particle to before the person.

The way of disputing in the schools is by insisting on one topical argument; by the success of which, victory is adjudged to the opponent, or defendant. Locke.

The great competitors for Rome, Caesar and Pompey on Pharsalian plains, Where stern Belloona, with one equal stroke, Adjudg'd the empire of this globe to one. Philips.

2. To decree judicially, without to.

The law, by this time, had been almost like a ship without ballast; for that the cases of modern experience are fled from those that are adjudged and ruled, in former time.

Bacon, Touching the Laws of England.

3. To sentence, or condemn to a punishment; with to before the thing.

But though thou art adjudged to the death; Yet I will favour thee in what I can. Shakspeare.
Souls that are for ever shut out from the presence of God, and adjudged to exquisite and everlasting darkness.

Bp. Hall, Occ. Meditations, xx.

4. Simply, to judge; to decree; to determine.

He adjudged him unworthy of his friendship, purposing sharply to revenge the wrong he had received. Knolles.

ADJUDGEMENT. n. s. [from adjudge.] Adjudication.

The matter of fact continued to be tried by twelve men; but the adjudgement of the punishment, and the sentence thereupon, came to be given by one or two or more persons chosen out of such as were best versed in the knowledge of what had been usual in former judgements upon like cases.

Temple, Intr. Hist. of England.

The right of presentation was adjudged for the king, "jure prerogative sue regie," and such adjudgement was afterwards confirmed by the house of lords. Le Neve, Lives of Abps. i. 242.

ADJUDICATION. n. s. [from adjudicatio, Lat.] The act of judging, or of granting something to a litigant, by a judicial sentence.

They possess all they can master, and run with it to any obscure place where they can sell it; and never attend the ceremony of an adjudication. Ld. Charendon, Life, ii. 462.

To ADJUDICATE. v. a. [from adjudico, Lat.] To adjudge; to give something controverted to one of the litigants, by a sentence or decision.

To ADJUGATE. v. a. [from adjuugo, Lat.] To yoke to; to join to another by a yoke. Dict.

ADJUMENT. n. s. [from adjumentum, Lat.] Help; support.

As nerves are adjuments to corporal activity, so are laws the hinges on which politique bodies act and move.

Waterhouse on Fortescue, p. 197.

ADJUNCT. n. s. [from adjunctum, Lat.]

1. Something adherent or united to another, though not essentially part of it.

Learning is but an adjunct to ourself, And where we are, our learning likewise is. Shakspeare.

* But I make haste to consider you as abstracted from a court, which (if you will give me leave to use a term of logick) is only an adjunct, not a propriety, of happiness. Dryden.

The talent of discretion, in its several adjuncts and circumstances, is no where so serviceable as to the clergy. Swift.

2. A person joined to another. This sense rarely occurs.

* He made him the associate of his heir-apparent, together with the Lord Cottington (as an adjunct of singular experience and trust) in foreign travels, and in a business of love. Wotton.

ADJUNCT. adj. • United with; immediately consequent.

So well, that what you bid me undertake, Though that my death were adjunct to my act, I'd do't. Shakspeare, K. John.

ADJUNCTION. n. s. [from adjunctio, Lat.]

1. The act of adjoining, or coupling together.

2. The thing joined.

ADJUNCTIVE. n. s. [from adjunctivus, Lat.]

1. He that joins.

2. That which is joined.

ADJUNCTIVE. adj. • That which joins.

ADJUNCTIVELY. adv. • In an adjunctive manner.

ADJUNCTLY. adv. • Consequently; in connection with.

ADJURATION. n. s. [from adjuratio, Lat.]

1. The act of adjuring, or charging another solemnly by word or oath.

To the adjuration of the high-priest, Art thou the Christ the son of the blessed God? our Saviour replies in St. Matthew, Thou hast said—'tis great truth; in St. Mark positively, I am.

Blackwall, Ser. Class. ii. 165.

Wo unto us, say the spirits, it is not in our power to resist this adjuration. Brerent, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 170.

Our pontifical writers retain many of these adjurations and forms of exorcisms still in the church. Burton, Anat. Med. p. 221.

The sacred mysteries begin:

My solemn night-born adjuration hear—

By silence, death's peculiar attribute!

By darkness, guilt's inevitable doom!

By darkness, and by silence, sisters dread!

Young, Night Th. 9.

2. The form of oath proposed to another.

When these learned men saw sickness and frenzy cured, the dead raised, the oracles put to silence, the demons and evil spirits forced to confess themselves no gods, by persons, who only made use of prayer and adjurations in the name of their crucified Saviour; how could they doubt of their Saviour's power on the like occasions? Addison on the Christian Religion.

To restrain the significance too much, or too much to enlarge it, would make the adjuration either not so weighty or not so pertinent. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. 1.

To ADJURE. v. a. [from adjuro, Lat.]

1. To impose an oath upon another, prescribing the form in which he shall swear.

Thou know'st, the magistrates

And princes of my country came in person,

Solicited, commanded, threaten'd, urg'd,

Adjur'd by all the bonds of civil duty,

And of religion, press'd how just it was,

How honourable.

Milton.

Ye lamps of heaven! he said, and lifted high

His hands now free, thou venerable sky!

Ye sacred altars! from whose flames I fled,

Be all of you adjur'd.

Dryden.

The woman, set before the sanctuary with her head uncovered, was adjured by the priest to swear whether she were false or no. Milton, Doct. and Div. of Div. B. 2.

2. To charge earnestly, or solemnly, by word or oath.

How many times shall I adjure thee, that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the Lord!

1 Kings, xxii. 16.

I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the son of God. Math. xxvi. 63.

And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho. Josh. vi. 26.

And as if all were not yet sure enough, he [St. Paul] closes up the epistle with an adjuring charge thus: I give thee charge in the sight of God who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, that thou keep this commandment.

A D J

Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. 1.

This will I try,

And add the power of some adjoining verse.

Milton, Comus, ver. 858.

ADJU'RER.* n. s. [from adjure, Fr. also adjurateur, from the Lat. part. adjuratus.] Cotgrave interprets the French word by "an adjuror, or earnest swearer; also one that exacts an oath."

To ADJU'ST.† v. a. [adjuster, Fr.]

1. To regulate; to put in order; to settle in the right form.

Your Lordship removes all our difficulties, and supplies all our wants, faster than the most visionary projector can adjust his schemes. Swift.

2. To reduce to the true state or standard; to make accurate.

The names of mixed modes, for the most part, want standards in nature, whereby men may rectify and adjust their signification; therefore they are very various and doubtful. Locke.

3. To make conformable. It requires the particle to before the thing to which the conformity is made; and has sometimes with.

As to the accomplishment of this remarkable prophecy, whoever reads the account given by Josephus, without knowing his character, and compares it with what our Saviour foretold, would think the historian had been a Christian, and that he had nothing else in view, but to adjust the event to the prediction. Addison.

Nothing is more difficult than to adjust the marvellous with the probable. Blair.

ADJU'STER.* n. s. [from adjust.] He who places in due order.

It is very easy, but very ungrateful, to laugh at collectors of various readings, and adjusters of texts.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, ii. 298.

ADJU'STMENT. n. s. [adjustement, Fr.]

1. Regulation; the act of putting in method; settlement.

The farther and clearer adjustment of this affair, I am constrained to adjourn to the larger treatise. Woodward.

1. The state of being put in method, or regulated.

It is a vulgar idea we have of a watch or clock, when we conceive of it as an instrument made to shew the hour: but it is a learned idea which the watch-maker has of it, who knows all the several parts of it, together with the various connexions and adjustments of each part. Watts, Logick.

A'DJUTANCY.* n. s. [from adjutant.]

1. The military office of an adjutant.

2. Skillful arrangement.

It was no doubt disposed with all the adjutancy of definition and division, in which the old marshals were as able as the modern martinets. Burke.

A'DJUTANT.† n. s. [Lat. adjuto.] An officer, whose duty is to assist the major of a regiment, and who was formerly called aid-major: And, generally speaking, an assistant.

To furnish cropt faces with artificial noses, to fill up the broken ranks and routed files of the teeth with ivory adjutants or lieutenants. Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 60.

We now behold ourselves to be as the brutes in the wilderness; and hoping our lions, who, by their power, and by the subtlety of their fox-like adjutants, have made themselves bestial kings over us, would indeed relieve and feed us according to their promises and our wants, do on the contrary find and feel that, instead of help, our hunger is increased.

Invitation to K. Ch. II. p. 3.

By advice just received from our adjutant, quartered at Oxford, we learn that there was an exceeding splendid shew of constellations at the last choral night. Student, ii. 110.

A D M

A fine violin must and ever will be the best adjutant to a fine voice. Mason, Ch. M. p. 74.

To ADJU'TE. v. a. [adjuro, adjutum, Lat.] To help; to concur: a word not now in use.

For there be

Six bachelors as bold as he,

Adjusting to his company;

And each one hath his livery. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

ADJU'TOR. n. s. [adjutor, Lat.] A helper. Dict.

ADJU'TORY. adj. [adjutorius, Lat.] That which helps. Dict.

ADJU'TRIX. n. s. [Lat.] She who helps. Dict.

A'DJUVANT.† adj. [adjuvans, Lat.] Helpful; useful.

They [minerals] have their seminaries in the womb of the earth, replenished with active spirits; which, meeting with apt matter and adjuvant causes, do proceed to the generation of several species. Howell, Letters, i. 6. 35.

A'DJUVANT.* n. s. An assistant.

I have only been a careful adjutant, and was sorry I could not be the efficient.

Sir H. Yelverton's Narr. 1609. Archæol. xv. 51.

Although wine may not be so convenient in the beginning of a convulsion, yet in the progress of the disease [it] must be a proper adjutant. Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 56.

These [plants] are adjuvants by reason of their cathartique quality. Ib. p. 2.

To A'DJUVATE. v. a. [adjuro, Lat.] To help; to further; to put forward. Dict.

ADME'SUREMENT. n. s. See MEASURE. The adjustment of proportions; the act or practice of measuring according to rule.

Admeasurement is a writ, which lieth for the bringing of those to a mediocrity, that usurp more than their part. It lieth in two cases: one is termed admeasurement of dower; where the widow of the deceased holdeth from the heir, or his guardian, more in the name of her dower, than belongeth to her. The other is admeasurement of pasture, which lieth between those that have common of pasture appendant to their freehold, or common by vicinage, in case of any one them, or more, do surcharge the common with more cattle than they ought. Cowel.

In some counties they are not much acquainted with admeasurement by acre; and thereby the writs contain twice or thrice so many acres more than the land hath. Bacon.

ADMENSURA'TION. n. s. [ad and mensura, Lat.] The act or practice of measuring out to each his part.

To ADME'TIATE.* v. a. [Lat. admetior.] To measure. Dict.

ADM'I'NICLE. n. s. [adminiculum, Lat.] Help; support; furtherance. Dict.

ADM'I'N'CLAR.† adj. [from adminiculum, Lat.] That which gives help. Dict.

He should never help, aid, supply, succour, or grant them any subventions furtherance, auxiliary suffrage, or adminiculary assistance. Transl. of Rabelais, iii. 34.

To ADM'NISTER. v. a. [administro, Lat.]

1. To give; to afford; to supply.

Let zephyrs bland

Administer their tepid genial airs;

Naught fear he from the west, whose gentle warmth

Discloses well the earth's all-teeming womb. Philips.

2. To act as the minister or agent in any employment or office; generally, but not always, with some hint of subordination; as, to administer the government.

For forms of government let fools contest,

Whate'er is best administer'd, is best.

Pope.

3. To administer justice; to distribute right.

4. To administer the sacraments; to dispense them.

A D M

Have not they the old popish custom of administering the blessed sacrament of the holy eucharist with wafer-cakes?

Hooker.

5. To administer an oath; to propose or require an oath authoritatively; to tender an oath.

Swear by the duty that you owe to heav'n.

To keep the oath that we administer.

Shakspeare.

6. To administer physick; to give physick as it is wanted.

I was carried on men's shoulders, administering physick and phlebotomy.

Wafers, Voyage.

7. To administer to; to contribute; to bring supplies.

I must not omit, that there is a fountain rising in the upper part of my garden, which forms a little wandering rill, and administers to the pleasure, as well as the plenty, of the place.

Spectator, No. 477.

8. To perform the office of an administrator, in law.

See ADMINISTRATOR.

Neal's order was never performed, because the executors durst not administer.

Arbutnot and Pope.

ADM'NISTRABLE.* adj. Capable of administration.

To ADM'NISTRATE. v. a. [administro, Lat.] To exhibit; to give as physick. Not in use.

They have the same effects in medicine, when inwardly administered to animal bodies.

Woodward.

ADMINISTRAT'ION.† n. s. [administratio, Lat.]

1. The act of administering or conducting any employment; as, the conducting the publick affairs; dispensing the laws.

I then did use the person of your father;

The image of his pow'r lay then in me;

And in th' administration of his law,

While I was busy for the commonwealth,

Your highness pleased to forget my place.

Shakspeare.

In the short time of his administration, he shone so powerfully upon me, that, like the heat of a Russian summer, he ripened the fruits of poetry in a cold climate.

Dryden.

2. The active or executive part of government.

Nor could the majesty of the English crown appear, upon any occasion, in a greater lustre, either to foreigners or subjects, than by an administration, which, producing such good effects, would discover so much power. And power being the natural appetite of princes, a limited monarch cannot so well gratify it in any point, as a strict execution of the laws.

Swift, Project for the Advanc. of Religion.

It may pass for a maxim in state, that the administration cannot be placed in too few hands, nor the legislature in too many.

Swift.

3. Collectively, those to whom the care of publick affairs is committed.

Did the administration in that reign [Queen Anne's] avail themselves of any one of those opportunities?

Burke, Tracts on the Popery Laws.

4. Distribution; exhibition; dispensation.

There is, in sacraments, to be observed their force, and their form of administration.

Hooker.

By the universal administration of grace, begun by our blessed Saviour, enlarged by his apostles, carried on by their immediate successors, and to be completed by the rest to the world's end; all types that darkened this faith are enlightened.

Sprat, Serm.

5. The rights and duties of an administrator to a person deceased.

If the administrator die, his executors are not administrators; but it behoves the ordinary to commit a new administration.

Cowel.

The former method of acquiring personal property we call a testament, the latter an administration.

Blackstone.

ADM'NISTRATIVE. adj. [from administrare.] That which administers; that by which any one administers.

ADMINISTRAT'OR.† n. s. [administrator, Lat.]

A D M

- f. Is properly taken for him that has the goods of a man dying intestate, committed to his charge by the ordinary, and is accountable for the same, whenever it shall please the ordinary to call upon him thereunto.

Cowel.

He was wonderfully diligent to enquire and observe what became of the king of Arragon, in holding the kingdom of Castille, and whether he did hold it in his own right, or as administrator to his daughter.

Bacon, Henry VII.

2. He that officiates in divine rites.

I feel my conscience bound to remember the death of Christ, with some society of christians or other, since it is a most plain command; whether the person, who distributes these elements, be only an occasional or a settled administrator.

Watts.

3. He that conducts the government.

The residence of the prince, or chief administrator, of the civil power.

Swift.

The half is paid already by the duke of Simmern, administrator to the young Palatine in his minority.

Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 464.

4. He who acts as minister or agent in any office or employment.

He [the Pope] partly accommodateth, and partly suffers to be accommodated, all professions and ages, though neither fit nor very capable of ecclesiastical order, what by dispensations or tolerations to be administrators to abbeyes, bishopricks, or other benefices, as is used in France.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

ADMINISTRAT'RIX.† n. s. Dr. Johnson's definition is,

"she who administers in consequence of a will;" which, as Mr. Mason has observed, ought to have been just the reverse. For it is generally in consequence of no will being made, that an administratrix is appointed to administer to the deceased. See also Cowel in V. Administratrix. The word is also used for her that has the supreme direction.

The princess Sophia was named in the Act of Settlement for a stock and root of inheritance to our kings, and not for her merits as a temporary administratrix of a power which she might not, and in fact did not, herself ever exercise.

Burke.

ADMINISTRAT'ORSHIP. n. s. [from administrator.] The office of administrator.

ADMIRAB'ILITY n. s. [admirabilis, Lat.] The quality or state of being admirable.

Dict.

ADMIRABLE. adj. [admirabilis, Lat.] To be admired; worthy of admiration; of power to excite wonder; always taken in a good sense, and applied either to persons or things.

The more power he hath to hurt, the more admirable is his praise, that he will not hurt.

Sidney.

God was with them in all their afflictions, and, at length, by working their admirable deliverance, did testify that they served him not in vain.

Hooker.

What admirable things occur in the remains of several other philosophers? Short, I confess, of the rules of christianity, but generally above the lives of christians.

South, Serm.

You can at most

To an indifferent lover's praise pretend:

But you would spoil an admirable friend.

Dryden.

ADMIRABLENESS.† n. s. [from admirable.] The quality of being admirable; the power of raising wonder.

The obligation of all religion, call it natural, moral, or revealed, must be deduced from the existence of God; and the admirableness of its precepts, from the divine nature and perfections.

Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 6.

Eternal wisdom appears in the admirableness of the contrivance of the gospel.

Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, p. 15.

ADMIRABLY. adv. [from admirable.] So as to raise wonder; in an admirable manner.

The theatre is the most spacious of any I ever saw, and so admirably well contrived, that, from the very depth of the stage, the lowest sound may be heard distinctly to the farthest part of the audience as in a whispering place; and yet, raise your voice as high as you please, there is nothing like an echo, to cause the least confusion. Addison.

ADMIRAL. † n. s. ["Fr. amiral, of uncertain etymology," Dr. Johnson says. It has been traced to the Arab. emir or amir, lord or commander, and the Gr. αλις, the sea, q. d. prince of the sea. The word is written both with and without the d, in other languages, as well as our own. Barb. Lat. admirallus and amirallus. V. Ducange. Barb. Græc. αμυραλιος. V. Meursii Gloss. Græco-Barbarum, edit. 1610. p. 29. Fr. admiral and amiral. Dan. the same. Germ. ammiral. Dutch, admirael or ammirael. Ital. ammiraglio. Sp. almirante. Minsheu, in his Spanish Dictionary, says "almirante is a king in the Arabian language." Amrayl is used by Robert of Gloucester, in the sense of a prince, or governour.]

1. An officer or magistrate that has the government of the king's navy, and the hearing and determining all causes, as well civil as criminal, belonging to the sea. Coxet.

2. The chief commander of a fleet.

He also, in battle at sea, overthrew Rodericus Rotundus, admiral of Spain; in which fight the admiral, with his son, were both slain, and seven of his gallees taken. Knoll's.

Make the sea shine with gallantry, and all
The English youth flock to their admiral. Waller.

3. Any great or capital ship; not always the ship which carries the admiral or commander of the fleet.

The admiral galley, wherein the emperor himself was, by great mischance, struck upon a rock. Knolles.

Of some great admiral. Milton, P. L. i. 293.

The admiral, in which I came, a ship of about five hundred tunnes. Sir R. Hawkins, Voyage, p. 87.

Our am'ral leads the way,
Though deepest laden, and the most distrest,
The greatest ship of burthen. Sylvester, Elegy, Works, p. 1170.

ADMIRALSHIP. † n. s. [from admiral.] Dr. Johnson defines this, the office or power of an admiral. Minsheu calls it also the place where the office is kept, the court of admiralty.

ADMIRALTY. † n. s. [amirauté, Fr.] The power, or officers, appointed for the administration of naval affairs.

For admiralty, or navy, I see no great question will arise. Bacon on the Union of Eng. and Scotland.

They requested liberty to cite John Piatto to appear by his proctor in the English court of admiralty. Milton, State-Lett.

Having consulted with Mr. Whitlock the lawyer about the validity of a commission drawn from a research into the office of the admiralty. Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 418.

ADMIRATION. † n. s. [admiratio, Lat.] "Wonder, surprise, and admiration, are words, which, though often confounded, denote in our language sentiments that are indeed allied, but that are in some respects different also, and distinct from one another. What is new and singular, excites that sentiment, which in strict propriety is called wonder; what is unexpected, surprise; and what is great or beautiful, admiration." A. Smith's Essays.]

1. Wonder; the act of admiring or wondering.

Indu'd with human voice, and human sense,

Reasoning to admiration. Milton.
The passions always move, and therefore, consequently, please; for, without motion, there can be no delight: which cannot be considered but as an active passion. When we view those elevated ideas of nature, the result of that view is admiration, which is always the cause of pleasure. Dryden.

There is a pleasure in admiration, and this is, that which properly causeth admiration, when we discover a great deal in an object, which we understand to be excellent; and yet we see, we know not how much more beyond that, which our understandings cannot fully reach and comprehend. Tillotson.

2. It is taken sometimes in a bad sense, though generally in a good.

Your boldness I with admiration see;
What hope had you to gain a queen like me?
Because a hero forc'd me once away,
Am I thought fit to be a second prey? Dryden.

ADMIRATIVE. * adj. [Fr. admiratif.] The admirative point, or point of admiration (and of detestation) marked, or made, thus! Cotgrave.

TO ADMIRE. v. a. [admiro, Lat. admirer, Fr.]

1. To regard with wonder: generally in a good sense.

'Tis here that knowledge wonders, and there is an admiration that is not the daughter of ignorance. This indeed stupidly gazeth at the unwonted effect; but the philosophick passion truly admires and adores the supreme efficient. Glanville.

2. It is sometimes used, in more familiar speech, for to regard with love.

3. It is used, but rarely, in an ill sense.

You have displac'd the mirth, broke the good meeting
With most admir'd disorder. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

TO ADMIRE. v. n. To wonder; sometimes with the particle at.

The eye is already so perfect, that I believe the reason of a man would easily have rested here, and admir'd at his own contrivance. Ray on the Creation.

ADMIRER. † n. s. [from admirer.]

1. The person that wonders, or regards with admiration.

Neither Virgil nor Horace would have gained so great reputation, had they not been the friends and admirers of each other. Addison.

Who most to shun or hate mankind pretend,
Seek an admirer, or would fix a friend. Pope.

2. In common speech, a lover.

For fear of Lucia's escape, the mother is forced to be constantly attended with a rival that explains her age, and draws off the eyes of her admirers. Taylor, No. 206.

ADMIRINGLY. adv. [from admire.] With admiration; in the manner of an admirer.

The king very lately spoke of him admiringly and mournfully. Shakspeare, All's well that ends well.

We may yet further admiringly observe, that men usually give freeliest where they have not given before. Boyle.

ADMISSIBLE. * adj. [admitto, admissum, Lat.] That which may be admitted.

Suppose that this supposition were admissible, yet this would not any way be inconsistent with the eternity of the divine nature and essence. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

ADMISSIBLY. * adv. In a manner which may be admitted.

ADMISSION. n. s. [admissio, Lat.]

1. The act or practice of admitting.

There was also enacted that charitable law, for the admission of poor suitors without fee; whereby poor men became rather able to vex, than unable to sue. Bacon, Henry VII.

By means of our solitary situation, and our rare admission of strangers, we know most part of the habitable world, and are ourselves unknown. Bacon's New Atlantis.

2. The state of being admitted.

My father saw you ill designs pursue;
And my admission show'd his fear of you. Dryden.
God did then exercise man's hopes with the expectations of a better paradise, or a more intimate admission to himself. South, Serm.

Our king descends from Jove:
And hither are we come, by his command,
To crave admission in your happy land. Dryden.

3. Admittance; the power of entering, or being admitted.

All springs have some degree of heat, none ever freezing, no not in the longest and severest frosts; especially those, where there is such a site and disposition of the strata as gives free and easy admission to this heat. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

4. In the ecclesiastical law.

It is, when the patron presents a clerk to a church that is vacant, and the bishop, upon examination, admits and allows of such clerk to be fitly qualified, by saying, Admitto te habilem. Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. The allowance of an argument; the grant of a position not fully proved.

ADMISSION-MONEY. * n. s. The money paid for admission to any place or meeting.

Of the stock, upon which their expence has been hitherto defrayed, I can say nothing that is very magnificent; seeing they have relied upon no more than some small admission-money and weekly contributions among themselves.

Sprat, Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 77.

To ADMIT. † v. a. [admitto, Lat.]

1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance.

Mirth admit me of thy crew.

Milton.

Does not our table Divins still admit?

Pope.

2. To suffer to enter upon an office; in which sense, the phrase of admission into a college, &c. is used.

The treasurer found it no hard matter so far to terrify him, that, for the king's service, as was pretended, he admitted, for a six-clerk, a person recommended by him.

Clarendon.

3. To allow an argument or position.

Suppose no weapon can thy valour's pride
Subdue, that by no force thou may'st be won,
Admit no steel can hurt or wound thy side,
And be it heav'n hath thee such favour done.

Fairfax.

This argument is like to have the less effect on me, seeing I cannot easily admit the inference.

Locke.

4. To allow, or grant in general; sometimes with the particle of.

If you once admit of a latitude, that thoughts may be exalted, and images raised above the life, that leads you insensibly from your own principles to mine.

Dryden.

5. To commit. A Latinism.

Take heed lest passion sway

Thy judgement to do aught, which else free will

Would not admit.

Milton, P. L. viii. 637.

ADMITTABLE. † a. j. [from admit.] The person or thing which may be admitted. This word should not be written in the manner which Dr. Johnson has given it, but admittible; as committible, &c., and indeed was so written in former days.

Many disputable opinions may be had of warre, without the praising of it as only admittible by enforcing necessity, and to be used only for peace sake.

Harrison, Descript. of Brit. 42. 2.

Because they have not a bladder like those we observe in others, they have no gall at all, is a paralogism not admittable, a fallacy that needs not the sun to scatter it.

Brown.

The clerk who is presented, ought to prove to the bishop, that he is a deacon, and that he has orders; otherwise, the bishop is not bound to admit him: for, as the law then stood, a deacon was admittable.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

ADMITTANCE. n. s. [from admit.]

1. The act of admitting; allowance or permission to enter.

It cannot enter any man's conceit to think it lawful, that every man which listeth should take upon him charge in the church; and therefore a solemn admittance is of such necessity, that, without it, there can be no church-polity.

Hooker.

As to the admittance of the weighty elastic parts of the air into the blood, through the coats of the vessels, it seems contrary to experiments upon dead bodies.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. The power or right of entering.

What

If I do line one of their hands? — 'tis gold

Which buys admittance.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Surely a daily expectation at the gate, is the readiest way to gain admittance into the house.

South, Serm.

There's news from Bertran; he desires

Admittance to the king, and cries aloud,

This day shall end our fears.

Dryden.

There are some ideas which have admittance only through one sense, which is peculiarly adapted to receive them.

Locke.

3. Custom, or prerogative, of being admitted to great persons; a sense now out of use.

Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance, authentick in your place and person, generally allowed for your many warlike, courtlike, and learned preparations.

Shakspeare.

4. Concession of a position.

Nor could the Pythagorean give easy admittance thereto, for, holding that separate souls successively supplied other bodies, they could hardly allow the raising of souls from other worlds.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ADMITTER. * n. s. [from admit.] He who admits to an office or situation.

Here is neither a direct exhibition of the body to this purpose in the offerer, nor a direct consecration to this end in the admitter.

Bp. Hall, M. Cler. p. 10.

To ADMIX. v. a. [admisce, Lat.] To mingle with something else.

ADMIXTION. n. s. [from admix.] The union of one body with another, by mingling them.

All metals may be calcined by strong waters, or by admixtion of salt, sulphur, and mercury.

Bacon.

The elements are no where pure in these lower regions; and if there is any free from the admixtion of another, sure it is above the concave of the moon.

Glaucille.

There is no way to make a strong and vigorous powder of saltpetre, without the admixtion of sulphur.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ADMIXTURE. n. s. [from admix.] The body mingled with another; perhaps sometimes the act of mingling.

Whatever acrimony, or amaritude, at any time redounds in it, must be derived from the admixture of another sharp bitter substance.

Harveus's Consump.

A mass which to the eye appears to be nothing but mere simple earth, shall, to the smell or taste, discover a plentiful admixture of sulphur, alum, or some other mineral.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To ADMONISH. † v. a. [admonere, Lat.]

1. To warn of a fault; to reprove gently; to counsel against wrong practices; to put in mind of a fault or a duty; with the particle of, or against, which is more rare; or the infinitive mood of a verb.

One of his cardinals, who better knew the intrigues of affairs, admonished him against that unskillful piece of incontinency.

Deau's Party.

He of their wicked ways

Shall them admonish, and before them set

The paths of righteousness.

Milton.

But when he was admonished by his subject to descend, he came down, gently circling in the air, and singing, to the ground.

Dryden.

2. In its Latin signification, to inform; to acquaint with; to give notice of.

He drew not nigh unheard, the angel bright,

E'er he drew nigh, his radiant viage turn'd,

Admonish'd by his ear.

Milton, P. L. iii. 647.

Her thoughts past actions trace,

And call to mind, admonish'd by the place.

Dryden, Ceyx and Alcione.

ADMONISHER. † n. s. [from admonish.] The person that admonishes, or puts another in mind of his faults or duty.

A D M

Be thou no sharp fault-finder, but an admonisher without upbraiding.

Transl. of Bullinger's Sermon. (1584.) p. 241.

Take heed, worthy Maximus: all ears

Hear not with that distinction mine do; few

You'll find admonishers, but urgers of your actions.

Beaum. and Fl. Valentinian, i. 3.

Horace was a mild admonisher; a court-satyrst fit for the gentle times of Augustus.

Dryden.

ADMONITION.† n. s. [from admonish.] Admonition; the notice by which one is put in mind of faults or duties: a word not often used.

But yet be wary in thy studious care.—

—Thy grave admonishments prevail with me.

Shakspeare, Henry V. p. i.

To the infinitely Good we owe

Immortal thanks, and his admonishment

Receive, with solemn purpose to observe

Immutably his sovereign will, the end

Of what we are.

Milton.

There is not one doctrinal point [in the epistles of St. Paul,] but contains a precept to our understanding to believe it; nor moral discourse, but effectually implies an admonishment to our wills to practise it.

Hammond, Sermon. p. 681.

It seeks to save the soul by humbling the body, not by imprisonment, or pecuniary mulct, much less by stripes, or bonds, or disinheritance, but by fatherly admonishment, and Christian rebuke.

Milton, of Reform. in Eng. b. 2.

ADMONITION, n. s. [admonitio, Lat.] The hint of a fault or duty; counsel; gentle reproof.

They must give our teachers leave, for the saving of souls, to intermingle sometimes, with other more necessary things, admonition concerning these not unnecessary.

Hooker.

From this admonition they took only occasion to redouble their fault, and to sleep again; so that, upon a second and third admonition, they had nothing to plead for their unseasonable drowsiness.

South, Sermon.

ADMONITIONER.† n. s. [from admonition.] A liberal dispenser of admonition; a general adviser. A ludicrous, or rather a satirical, term.

Albeit the admonitioners did seem at first to like no prescript form of prayer at all, but thought it the best that their minister should always be left at liberty to pray, as his own discretion did serve, their defender, and his associates, have since proposed to the world a form as themselves did like.

Hooker.

Ambition of great and famous auditories I leave to those, whose better gifts and inward endowments are admonitioners unto them of the great good they can do; or otherwise thirst after popular applause.

Hales, Remains, p. 24.

ADMONITIVE.* adj. That which admonishes.

This kind of suffering did seem to the fathers full of instructive and admonitive emblems.

Barrow, Sermon. ii. 370.

ADMONITOR.* n. s. Lat. admonitor.] The person who admonishes or reminds another of a fault or duty.

That saying [that old age is a return to childhood] meant only of the weakness of the body, was wrested for the weakness of mind, by froward children, weary of the controulment of their parents, masters, and other admonitors.

Hobbes, Answer to Davenant's Pref. to Gondibert.

Conscience is at most times a very faithful, and very prudent admonitor.

Shenstone.

ADMONITORY.† adj. [admonitorius, Lat.] That which admonishes.

The sentence of reason is either mandatory, shewing what must be done: or else permissive, declaring only what may be done; or, thirdly, admonitory, opening what is the most convenient for us to do.

Hooker.

Admonitory of duty, and excitative of devotion, to us.

Barrow's Works, i. 430.

ADMURMURATION. n. s. [admurmuro, Lat.] The act of murmuring, or whispering to another.

Dick.

To ADMOVE. [admoveo, Lat.] To bring one thing to another. A word not in use.

If, unto the powder of loadstone or iron, we admove the north-pole of the loadstone, the powders, or small divisions, will erect and conform themselves thereto.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

A D O

ADNASCENT.* part. adj. [Lat. adnascens.] Growing upon something else.

Moss, which is an adnascent plant, is to be rubbed and scraped off with some instrument of wood, which may not excorticate the tree.

Evelyn's Sylva, ii. 7. § 8.

ADNATE.* adj. [Lat. adnatus.] Growing upon.

Osteologists have very well observed, that the parts appertaining to the bones, which stand out at distance from their bodies, are either the adnate or the enate parts, either the epiphyses or the apophyses of the bones.

Smith's Old Age, p. 176.

ADO.† n. s. [Sax. adoa, to do. Dr Johnson derives this noun substantive from the verb to do with a before it; as the French affaire, from a and faire. But he has omitted to observe, that this word was anciently used as a verb; as, to have ado, by Chaucer, Romaunt of the Rose, ver. 5080. "And don all that they have ado," that is, all that they have to do. The substantive owes its rise to this verb.]

1. Trouble, difficulty.

He took Clitophon prisoner, whom, with much ado, he keepeth alive; the Helots being villainously cruel.

Sidney.

They moved, and in the end persuaded, with much ado, the people to bind themselves by solemn oath.

Hooker.

He kept the borders and marches of the pale with much ado; he held many parliaments, wherein sundry laws were made.

Sir John Davies.

With much ado, he partly kept awake;

Not suff'ring all his eyes repose to take.

Dryden.

2. Bustle; tumult; business; sometimes with the particle about.

Let's follow, to see the end of this ado.

Shakspeare.

All this ado about Adam's fatherhood, and the greatness of its power, helps nothing to establish the power of those that govern.

Locke.

3. It has a light and ludicrous sense, implying more tumult and shew of business, than the affair is worth: in this sense it is of late generally used.

I made no more ado, but took all their seven points in my target, thus.

Shakspeare, Henry IV.

We'll keep no great ado—a friend or two—

It may be thought we held him carelessly,

Being our kinsman, if we revel much.

Shakspeare.

Come, says Puss, without any more ado, 'tis time to go to breakfast; cats don't live upon dialogues.

L'Estrange.

ADOLESCENCE. } n. s. [adolescencia, Lat.] The age
ADOLESCENCY. } succeeding childhood, and succeeded by puberty; more largely, that part of life in which the body has not yet reached its full perfection.

He was so far from a boy, that he was a man born, and at his full stature, if we believe Josephus, who places him in the last adolescence, and makes him twenty-five years old.

Brown.

The sons must have a tedious time of childhood and adolescence, before they can either themselves assist their parents, or encourage them with new hopes of posterity.

Bentley.

ADORS.* adv. At doors; at the door.

But what, Sir, I beseech ye, was that paper,

Your lordship was so studiously employ'd in,

When you came out adors.

Beaum. and Fl. Women pleased, iv. 1.

If I get in adors, not the power o'th' countess,
Nor all my aunt's curses shall disembody me.

Ibid. Little Thief, v. 1.

The other of them came to another of like condition in like manner, as desiring her company, but so as she would go out at doors.

Gutaker's Spiritual Watch, p. 79.

To ADOPT.† v. a. [adopto, Lat.]

1. To take a son by choice; to make him a son, who was not so by birth.

We will adopt us sons;

Then virtue shall inherit, and not blood.

Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy, ii. 1.

Were none of all my father's sisters left;

Nay, were I of my mother's kin bereft;

None by an uncle's or a grandam's side,
Yet I could some adopted heir provide.

Dryden.

2. To place any person or thing in a nearer relation, than they have by nature, to something else.

Whether adopted to some neighb'ring star,
Thou roll'st above us, in thy wand'ring race,
Or, in procession fix'd and regular,
Mov'st with the heav'n's majestic pace;
Or call'd to more celestial bliss,
Thou tread'st, with seraphims, the vast abyss.

Dryden.

We are seldom at ease from the solicitation of our natural or adopted desires; but a constant succession of uneasinesses, out of that stock, which natural wants, or acquired habits, have heaped up, take the will in their turns.

Locke.

ADOPTEDLY. adv. [from adopted.] After the manner of something adopted.

Adoptedly, as school-maids change their names,

By vain, though apt, affection.

Shakspeare.

ADOPTER. n. s. [from adopt.] He that gives some one by choice the rights of a son; or, as our old glossaries expound it, "he that makes the adoption."

Huot.

ADOPTION. n. s. [adoptio, Lat.]

1. The act of adopting, or taking to one's self what is not native.

The adoption of vice has ruined ten times more young men than natural inclinations.

Ld. Chesterfield.

2. The state of being adopted.

My bed shall be abused, my reputation gnawn at; and I shall not only receive this villainous wrong, but stand under the adoption of abominable terms, and by him that does me the wrong.

Shakspeare.

She purpos'd,

When she had fitted you with her craft, to work

Her son into the adoption of the crown.

Shakspeare.

In every act of our Christian worship, we are taught to call upon him under the endearing character of our Father, to remind us of our adoption, that we are made heirs of God, and joint heirs of Christ.

Rogers, Sermons.

ADOPTIVE. adj. [adoptivus, Lat.]

1. He that is adopted by another, and made his son.

It is impossible an elective monarch should be so free and absolute as an hereditary; no more than it is possible for a father to have so full power and interest in an adoptive son, as in a natural.

Bacon.

2. He that adopts another, and makes him his son.

An adopted son cannot cite his adoptive father into court, without his leave.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

3. He who is not native.

There cannot be an admission of the adoptive, without a diminution of the fortunes and conditions of those that are not native subjects of this realm.

Bacon, Speech in Parl. Jac. 5.

4. It is also applied to things.

To all the duties of evangelical grace, instead of the adoptive and cheerful boldness which our new alliance with God requires, came servile and thrall-like fear.

Milton of Ref. in Eng. b. i.

ADORABLE. adj. [adorable, Fr.] That which ought to be adored; that which is worthy of divine honours.

On these two, the love of God, and our neighbour, hang both the law, and the prophets, says the adorable Author of Christianity; and the Apostle says, the end of the law is charity.

Cheyne.

ADORABLENESS. n. s. [from adorable.] The quality of being adorable; worthiness of divine honours.

ADORABLY. adv. [from adorable.] In a manner worthy of adoration.

ADORATION. n. s. [adoratio, Lat.]

1. The external homage paid to the Divinity, distinct from mental reverence.

Solemn and serviceable worship we name, for distinction sake, whatsoever belongeth to the church, or public society, of God, by way of external adoration.

Hooker.

1. It is possible to suppose, that those who believe a supreme excellent Being, may yet give him no external adoration at all.

Stillingfleet.

2. Homage paid to persons in high place or esteem.

O ceremony, shew me but thy worth;

What is thy soul, O adoration!

Art thou nought else but place, degree, and form,

Creating awe and fear in other men?

Wherein thou art less happy, being fear'd,

Than they in fearing.

What drink'st thou oft, instead of homage sweet,

But poison'd flattery?

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Two third parts of their voices that are present are requisite to him, that either by adoration or scrutiny shall carry it [the popedom] away.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

To ADORE. v. a. [adoro, Lat.]

1. To worship with external homage; to pay divine honours.

The mountain nymphs and Themis they adore,

And from her oracles relief implore.

Dryden.

2. It is used, popularly, to denote a high degree of reverence or regard; to reverence; to honour; to love.

The people appear adoring their prince, and their prince adoring God.

Tatler, No. 57.

Make future times thy equal act adore,

And be what brave Orestes was before.

Pope, Odys.

ADOREMENT. n. s. [from adore.] Adoration; worship: a word scarcely used.

The priests of elder times deluded their apprehensions with sooth-saying, and such oblique idolatries, and won their credulities to the literal and downright adoration of cats, lizzards, and beetles.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ADORER. n. s. [from adore.]

1. He that adores; a worshipper: a term generally used in a low sense; as, by lovers, or admirers.

Being so far provoked as I was in France, I would abate her nothing; though I profess myself her adorer, not her friend.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Whilst as th' approaching pageant does appear,

And echoing crowds speak mighty Venus near;

I, her adorer, too devoutly stand

Fast on the utmost margin of the land.

Prior.

2. In the serious, but not the highest sense of a worshipper, Dr. Johnson cites a solitary example from Clarendon. Milton and others afford instances sufficient to vindicate it from the charge of being generally used in a low sense.

the throng

Of his [the Almighty's] adorners.

Milton, P. L. ix. 145.

What to the smallest tittle thou shalt say

To thy adorners.

Christ to the Templer, Par. R. i. 451.

Your subjects yet remain,

Adorers of that drowsy deity [Cupid.]

Beaum. and Fl. Cupid's Revenge, i. 1.

Ye sellers with false weights and measures, adorners of your god Mammon, and worse than idolaters, will ye never leave to content yourselves with honest and lawful gain?

Hartmar, Transl. of Beza, p. 176.

He was so severe an adorer of truth, as not to dissemble; or to suffer any man to think that he would do any thing, which he resolved not to do.

Clarendon.

To ADORN. v. a. [adorno, Lat.]

1. To dress; to deck the person with ornaments.

He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

Isaiah, lxi. 10.

Yet 'tis not to adorn and gild each part,

That shews more cost than art;

Jewels at nose and lips, but ill appear.

Cowley.

2. To set out any place or thing with decorations.

A gallery adorned with the pictures or statutes of the invention of things useful to human life.

Cowley.

3. To embellish with oratory or elegance of language.

A D O

This will supply men's tongues with many new things, to be named, adorned, and described, in their discourse. Sprat.

Thousands there are in darker fame that dwell,
Whose names some nobler poem shall adorn;
For, though unknown to me, they sure fought well. Dryden.

ADORN.* n. s. [Span. adorno.] Ornament.

Her brest all naked as nett yvory
Without adorn of gold or silver bright.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. xii. 20.

ADORN.† adj. Adorned. A word, Dr. Johnson says, peculiar to Milton; which, however, the preceding article disproves, though it is there a substantive. Milton is believed, in his description of Eve, to have used adorn for adorned, in imitation of the Italians, who write adorno for adornato.

Made so adorn for thy delight the more,
So awful, that with honour thou may'st love
Thy mate.

Milton, P. L. viii. 576.

ADORNING.* n. s. [from adorn.] Ornament.

That her [the church of Rome's] softness and luxury was more than ordinarily increased in this interval is not to be doubted, as certainly her covetousness, as also her prankings and adorning's in the splendour of their altars, and churches, and copes, and the like. More, Seven Churches, ch. 6.

This, as other usual ways of comely, curious, or stately adornings, are there mentioned as the practices of wanton and imperious women. Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 15.

She applied to her advantage all the attractives of sweet unguents and perfumes, of costly raiment and beautiful colours, of rich and accurate dressings, or lovely adornings. Ibid. p. 19.

ADORNMENT.† n. s. [old Fr. adornement, aornement, Lat. adornamentum. Dr. Johnson says, it is not now in use; but it certainly is.] Ornament; embellishment; elegance.

This attribute was not given to the earth, while it was confused; nor to the heavens, before they had motion and adornment. Raleigh's Hist. of the World.

She held the very garment of Posthumus in more respect than my noble and natural person, together with the adornment of my qualities. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

What was naked, was painted with blue. This was universal among them, [the Britons,] whether esteemed an adornment, or of terror to their adversaries, or to distinguish them from all their neighbours that came among them, as friends or enemies. Temple, Intr. Hist. of England.

ADOWN.† adv. [Sax. adane, dorsum, old Eng. adoun.]

1. Down; on the ground.

Thrice did she sink adown in deadly sound,
And thrice he her reviv'd with busy pain. Spenser, F. Q.

With that the shepherd gan to frown,

He threw his pretty pipes adown,

And on the ground him laid. Dryden's Dowsabell, st. 16.

There could no tempest tear my sails adown.
Mirror for Mag. p. 163.

2. Anciently used for below.

When Phebus dwelled here in earth adown.

Chaucer, Muncip. Tale, v. 1.

3. From a higher to a lower point.

Charms able are from heaven to fetch the moon adown.

Fleming's Virgil, Bucol.

ADOWN.† prep.

1. Down; towards the ground; from a higher situation towards a lower.

In this remembrance Emily ere day
Arose, and dress'd herself in rich array;
Fresh as the month, and as the morning fair,
Adown her shoulders fell her length of hair.

Dryden.

If from adown the hopeful chops

The fat upon the cinder drops,

To stinking smoke it turns the flame,

Poisoning the flesh from whence it came.

Swift, Lady's Dressing Room.

2. Throughout.

A D V

Full well 'tis known adown the dale,
Though passing strange indeed the tale.

Percy's Reliques, i. iii. 15.

ADRE'AD.† adv. [Sax. adraeb, adreb, old Eng. adrad, adred.] In a state of fear; frightened; terrified: now obsolete.

And thinking to make all men adread to such a one an enemy, who would not spare, nor fear to kill so great a prince. Sidney.

ADRI'ET.† adv. [Sax. adripan, part. past, adripeb.] Floating at random; as any impulse may drive.

They shall this mount

Of paradise, by night of waves, be mov'd
Out of his place, push'd by the horned flood;

With all his verdure spoil'd, and trees adript

Down the great river, to the opening gulf,

And there take root.

Milton.

It seem'd a corps adript to distant sight;

But at a distance who could judge aright?

Dryden.

The custom of frequent reflection will keep their minds from running adript, and call their thoughts home from useless un-attentive roving. Locke on Education.

ADROIT.† adj. [French.] Dextrous; active; skilful.

He would say that he did not care to give, neither was he adroit at, a present answer to a serious query.

Letters, Aubrey's Life of Hobbes, ii. 611.

An adroit stout fellow would sometimes destroy a whole family, with justice apparently against him the whole time.

Jervas's Don Quix.

ADROITLY.* adv. [from adroit.] Dextrously.

Use yourself to carve adroitly and genteelly. Ld. Chesterfield.

ADROITNESS.† n. s. [from adroit.] Dexterity; readiness; activity. Neither this word, nor adroit, seem yet completely naturalized, Dr. Johnson says; and yet adroit, as I have shewn, was in use nearly two centuries since.

May there not be a great deal in possessing the "ingenium versatile," in the skill and adroitness of the artist, acquired, as your's has been, by repeated acts and continual practice?

Horne to Priestly, p. 5.

ADRY.† adv. [Sax. adripan.] Athirst; thirsty; in want of drink.

Doth a man that is adry desire to drink in gold?

Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 329.

He never told any of them, that he was his humble servant, but his well-wisher; and would rather be thought a malecontent, than drink the king's health when he was not adry. Spectator.

ADSCITIOUS.† adj. [adscitius, Lat.] That which is taken in to complete something else, though originally extrinsic; supplemental; additional.

When you apply to your hypothesis of an adscitious spirit what he [Philo] says concerning this πνεῦμα θεῶν, divine spirit, or soul, infused into man by God's breathing, Gen. ii. 7.; you again directly contradict yourself, by confounding the spirit, πνεῦμα, which you suppose immortal, with the σῶμα, breath, or soul, which you make to be mortal. Clarke's Letter to Dodwell.

This fourth epistle on happiness may be thought to be adscitious, and out of its proper place. Dr. Warton on Pope.

ADSTRICTIO. n. s. [adstrictio, Lat.] The act of binding together; and applied, generally, to medicaments and applications, which have the power of making the part contract.

To ADVA'NCE.† v. a. [avancer, Fr.]

1. To bring forward, in the local sense.

Now morn, her rosy steps in th' eastern flime
Advancing, sow'd the earth with orient pearl.

Milton.

2. To raise to preferment; to aggrandize.

He hath been ever constant in his course of advancing me; from a private gentlewoman he made me a marchioness, and from a marchioness a queen; and now he intends to crown my innocency with the glory of martyrdom. Bacon.

The declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him. Ester, x. 2.

3. To improve.

What laws can be advised more proper and effectual to advance the nature of man to its highest perfection, than these precepts of Christianity? Tillotson.

4. To heighten; to grace; to give lustre to.

As the calling dignifies the man, so the man much more advances his calling. As a garment, though it warms the body, has a return with an advantage, being much more warmed by it. South, Sermon.

5. To forward; to accelerate.

These three last were slower than the ordinary Indian wheat of itself; and this culture did rather retard than advance. Bacon.

6. To propose; to offer to the publick; to bring to view or notice.

Phedon I hight, quoth he, and do advance
My ancestry from famous Coradin. Spenser, F. Q.
I dare not advance my opinion against the judgment of so great an author; but I think it fair to leave the decision to the publick. Dryden.

• Some ne'er advance a judgment of their own,
But catch the spreading notion of the town. Pope.

7. To pay before-hand; to lay down money before it is due.

8. In an ancient sense, to lift up; to advance or display the standard. Barret, in Advance.

To ADVANCE. v. n.

1. To come forward.

At this the youth, whose vent'rous soul
No fears of magick art controul,
Advanc'd in open sight. • • Parnel.

2. To make improvement.

They who would advance in knowledge, and not deceive and swell themselves with a little articulated air, should not take words for real entities in nature, till they can frame clear and distinct ideas of those entities. Locke.

ADVANCE.† n. s. [from to advance.]

1. The act of coming forward.

All the foot were put into Abington, with a resolution to quit, or defend, the town, according to the manner of the enemy's advance towards it. Clarendon.
So, like the sun's advance, your titles show;
Which, as he rises, does the warmer grow. Waller.

2. A tendency to come forward to meet a lover; an act of invitation.

In vain are all the practis'd wiles,
In vain those eyes would love impart;
Not all th' advances, all the smiles,
Can move one unrelenting heart. Walsh.

His genius was below
The skill of ev'ry common beav;
Who, tho' he cannot spell, is wise
Enough to read a lady's eyes;
And will each accidental glance
Interpret for a kind advance. Swift.

He has described the unworthy passion of the goddess Calypso, and the indecent advances she made to detain him from his own country. Pope.

That prince applied himself first to the church of England, and upon their refusal to fall in with his measures, made the like advances to the Dissenters. Swift.

3. Gradual progression; rise from one point to another.

Our Saviour raised the ruler's daughter, the widow's son, and Lazarus; the first of these, when she had just expired; the second, as he was carried to the grave on his bier; and the third, after he had been some time buried. And having, by these gradual advances, manifested his divine power, he at last exerted the highest and most glorious degree of it; and raised himself also by his own all-quickenng virtue, and according to his own express prediction. Atterbury.

Men of study and thought, that reason right, and are lovers of truth, do make no great advances in their discoveries of it. Locke.

4. Improvement; progress towards perfection.

The principle and object of the greatest importance in the world to the good of mankind, and for the advance and perfecting of human nature. Hal.

5. Advance-money; money given before-hand, or in part of a greater sum. Colgrave in Advance. See also Lacombe in Avant, vol. 2.

They did not wait to examine your conduct, nor to be determined by experience, but gave you a generous credit for the future blessings of your reign, and paid you in advance the dearest tribute of their affection. Junius to the King, Dec. 1769.

ADVANCEMENT. n. s. [advancement, Fr.]

1. The act of coming forward.

This refinement makes daily advancements, and, I hope, in time, will raise our language to the utmost perfection. Swift.

2. The state of being advanced; preferment.

The Percies of the North
Finding his usurpation most unjust,
Endeavour'd my advancement to the throne. Shakspeare.

3. The act of advancing another.

In his own grace he doth exalt himself
More than in your advancement. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

4. Improvement; promotion to a higher state of excellence.

Nor can we conceive it unwelcome unto those worthies, who endeavour the advancement of learning. Brown, Fulg. Err.

5. Settlement on a wife. This sense is now disused.

The jointure or advancement of the lady, was the third part of the principality of Wales. Bacon.

ADVANCER.† n. s. [Fr. avanceur.] He that advances any thing; a promoter; forwarder.

Soon after the death of a great officer, who was judged no advancer of the king's matters, the king said to his solicitor, Tell me truly, what say you of your cousin that is gone? Bacon.

The reporters are greater advancers of defamatory designs, than the very first contrivers. Government of the Tongue.

ADVANTAGE. n. s. [avantage, Fr.]

1. Superiority; often with of or over before a person.

In the practical prudence of managing such gifts, the laity may have some advantage over the clergy; whose experience is, and ought to be, less of this world than the others. Sprat.
All other sorts and sects of men would evidently have the advantage of us, and a much surer title to happiness than we. Atterbury.

2. Superiority gained by stratagem, or unlawful means.

The common law hath left them this benefit, whereof they make advantage, and wrest it to their bad purposes. Spenser, State of Ireland.

But specially he took advantage of the night for such privy attempts, insomuch that the bruit of his manliness was spread every where. 2 Macc. viii. 7.

Great malice, backed with a great interest; yet can have no advantage of a man, but from his own expectations of something that is without him. South, Sermon.

As soon as he was got to Sicily, they sent for him back; designing to take advantage, and prosecute him in the absence of his friends. Swift.

3. Opportunity; convenience.

Give me advantage of some brief discourse
With Desdemona alone. Shakspeare.

4. Favourable circumstances.

Like jewels to advantage set,
Her beauty by the shade does get. Waller.
A face, which is over-flushed, appears to advantage in the deepest scarlet, and the darkest complexion is not a little alleviated by a black hood. Addison.

True wit is nature to advantage dress'd,
What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express'd. Pope.

5. Superior excellence.

A man born with such advantage of constitution, that it adulterates not the images of his mind. Glanville.

6. Gain; profit.

For thou saidst, what advantage will it be unto thee, and what profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin? Job.

Certain it is, that advantage now sits in the room of conscience, and steers all. South, Sermon.

7. Overplus; something more than the mere lawful gain.

We owe thee much; within this wall of flesh
There is a soul counts thee her creditor,
And with advantage means to pay thy love. Shakespeare.

You said, you neither lend nor borrow
Upon advantage. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice.

8. Preponderation on one side of the comparison.

Much more should the consideration of this pattern arm us with patience against ordinary calamities; especially if we consider his example with this advantage, that though his sufferings were wholly undeserved, and not for himself but for us, yet he bore them patiently. Tillotson.

To ADVANTAGE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To benefit.

Convey what I set down to my lady: it shall advantage more than ever the hearing of letter did. Shakespeare.

The trial hath enlangu'd thee no way,
Rather more honour left, and more esteem;
Me naught advantag'd, missing what I aim'd. Milton.

The great business of the senses being to make us take notice of what hurts or advantages the body, it is wisely ordered by nature, that pain should accompany the reception of several ideas. Locke.

We should have pursued some other way, more effectual, for distressing the common enemy, and advantaging ourselves. Swift.

2. To promote; to bring forward; to gain ground to.

The stoics that opinioned the souls of wise men dwelt about the moon, and those of fools wandered about the earth, advan- taged the conceit of this effect. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To ennoble it with the spirit that inspires the Royal Society, were to advantage it in one of the best capacities in which it is improveable. Glauville, Sceptus Scientificus.

ADVANTAGEABLE. adj. [from advantage.] Profitable; convenient; gainful.

As it is advantageable to a physician to be called to the cure of declining disease, so it is for a commander to suppress a sedition which has pass'd the height. Sir J. Hayward.

ADVANTAGED. adj. [from to advantage.] Possessed of advantages; commodiously situated or disposed.

In the most advantaged tempers, this disposition is but comparative; whereas the most of men labour under disadvantages, which nothing can rid them off. Glauville.

ADVANTAGE-GROUND. n. s. Ground that gives superiority, and opportunities of annoyance or resistance.

This excellent man, who stood not upon the advantage- ground before, from the time of his promotion to the archbishop-rick, provoked, or underwent the envy, and reproach, and malice of men of all qualities and conditions; who agreed in nothing else. Clarendon.

ADVANTAGEOUS. adj. [avantageux, Fr.]

1. Of advantage; profitable; useful; opportune; convenient.

The time of sickness, or affliction, is, like the cool of the day to Adam, a season of peculiar propriety for the voice of God to be heard; and may be improved into a very advantageous opportunity of begetting or increasing spiritual life. Hammond.

Here perhaps
Some advantageous act may be achiev'd

When sudden onset, either with hell-fire

2. Throughout. Arbutnot.

ADVANTAGEOUSNESS. n. s. [from advantageous.]
Quality of being advantageous; profitableness; usefulness; convenience.

The last property, which qualifies God for the fittest object of our love, is the advantageousness of his to us, both in the present and the future life. Boyle's Seraphic Love.

To ADVE'NE. v. n. [advenio, Lat.] To accede to something; to become part of something else, without being essential; to be superadded.

A cause considered in judicature, is stiled an accidental cause; and the accidental of any act, is said to be whatever advences to the act itself already substantiated. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ADVE'NIENT. adj. [adveniens, Lat.] Advancing; coming from outward causes; superadded.

Being thus divided from truth in themselves, they are yet farther removed by advenient deception; for they are daily mocked into error by subtler devisers. Brown, Vulg. Err.

If to suppose the soul a distinct substance from the body, and extrinsically advenient, be a great error in philosophy, plain at all the world hath been mistaken. Glauville, Vanity of Dogmatism.

ADVENT. n. s. [from adventus; that is, adventus
Redemptoris.] This is an anglicised word, which Fulke, in his remarks on the Rhemish Testament, 1617, disapproves. It is the name of one of the holy seasons, signifying the coming; that is, the coming of our Saviour; which is made the subject of our devotion during the four weeks before Christmas.

Common Prayer.

ADVE'NTIVE. adj. [from advenio, adventum.] Adventitious; that which is extrinsically added; that which comes from outward causes: a word scarcely in use.

As for the peregrine heat, it is thus far true, that, if the proportion of the adventive heat be greatly predominant to the natural heat and spirits of the body, it tendeth to dissolution or notable alteration. Bacon.

ADVENTITIOUS. adj. [adventitius, Lat.] That which advences; accidental; supervenient; extrinsically added, not essentially inherent.

Diseases of continuance get an adventitious strength from custom, besides their material cause from the humours. Bacon.

Though we may call the obvious colours natural, and the others adventitious; yet such changes of colours, from what over cause they proceed, may be properly taken in. Boyle.

It his blood boil, and th' adventitious fire
Rais'd by high meats, and higher wines, require
To temper and allay the burning heat;
Waters are brought, which by decoction get
New coolness.

Dryden.

In the gem kind, of all the many sorts reckoned up by lapi-daries, there are not above three or four that are original; their diversities, as to lustre, colour, and hardness, arising from the different admixture of other adventitious mineral matter.

Woodward.

ADVENTITIOUSLY.* adv. Accidentally.

ADVE'NTIVE. n. s. [from advenio, Lat.] The thing or person that comes from without: a word not now
in use.

That the natives be not so many, but that there may be elbow-room enough for them, and for the adventives also. Bacon.

ADVE'NTIVE.* adj. [from advenio.] Adventitious.

I have assigned to summary philosophy — the inquiry touching the operation of the relative and adventive characters of offences. Bacon on Learning, b. 2.

ADVENTRY.* n. s. [from adventure.] An enterprise;
an undertaking.

Act a brave work, call it thy last adventry. B. Johnson, Epig.

ADVE'NTUAL. adj. [from advent.] Relating to the season of advent.

They do also daily use one other collect; as, namely, the collects adventual, quadragesimal, paschal, or pentecostal, for their proper seasons. Bp. Sanderson.

ADVENTURE.† n. s. [French. But Wächter has abenteuer, a manly, daring deed, from aba, (accus. aban), a man, and dürren, to dare. In old Eng. adventure is aunter.]

1. An accident; a chance; a hazard; an event of which we have no direction.

The general summoned three castles: one desperate of succour, and not desirous to dispute the defence, presently yielded; but two stood upon their adventure. Hayward.

2. In this sense is used the phrase, at all adventures, [à l'aventure, Fr.] By chance; without any rational scheme.

Blows flew at all adventures, wounds and deaths given and taken unexpected; many scarce knowing their enemies from their friends. Hayward.

Where the mind does not perceive probable connection, there men's opinions are the effects of chance and hazard, of a mind floating at all adventures, without choice and without direction. Locke.

3. The occasion of casual events; an enterprise in which something must be left to hazard.

For I must love, and am resolv'd, to try
My fate, or, failing in the adventure, die. Dryden.

4. This noun, with all its derivatives, are frequently written without ad, as venture, venturous.

To ADVENTURE. v. n. [adventurer, Fr.]

1. To try the chance; to dare.

Be not angry,
Most mighty princess, that I have adventur'd
To try your taking of a false report. Shakspeare.

The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground, for delicateness and tenderness. Deuter. xxviii. 26.

To ADVENTURE. v. a. To put into the power of chance.

For my father fought for you, and adventured his life for, and delivered you out of the hand of Melian. Judges, ix. 17.

It is often used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he adventured himself.

ADVENTURER.† n. s. [adventurier, Fr.] He that seeks occasions of hazard; he that puts himself in the hands of chance.

He is a great adventurer, said he,
That hath his sword through hard assay forgone. Spenser.

The kings of England did not make the conquest of Ireland; it was begun by particular adventurers, and other volunteers, who came to seek their fortunes. Sir J. Davies.

He intended to hazard his own action, that so the more easily he might win adventures, who else were like to be less forward. Halcyon.

Had it not been for the British, which the late wars drew over, and adventures or soldiers seated here, Ireland had, by the last war, and plague, been left destitute. Temple.

Their wealthy trade from pirate's rapine free,
Our merchants shall no more adventurers be. Dryden.

The preceding citation from Dryden, points to the company of merchant adventurers, as they were called, in the 16th and 17th centuries.

What think you then of an adventurer?
I mean some wealthy merchant. Beaumont and Fl., Captain, i. 2.

The merchant-adventurers cannot perfect their accounts before the dangerous adventures be returned in safety to their wished and desired port. Knight, Tryall of Truth, fol. 43. b.

ADVENTURESOME. adj. [from adventure.] The same with adventurous: a low word, scarcely used in writing.

ADVENTURESOMENESS. n. s. [from adventuresome.]
The quality of being adventuresome. Dict.

ADVENTUROUS. adj. [adventurous, Fr.]

1. He that is inclined to adventures; and, consequently, bold, daring, courageous.

- At land and sea, in many a doubtful fight,
Was never known a more adventurous knight;
Who oftner drew his sword, and always for the right. Dryden.

2. Applied to things; that which is full of hazard; which requires courage; dangerous.

But I've already troubled you too long,
Nor dare attempt a more adventurous song.
My humble verse demands a softer theme,
A painted meadow, or a purling stream. Addison.

ADVENTUROUSLY. adv. [from adventurous.] After an adventurous manner; boldly; daringly.

The are both hanged; and so would this be, if he darst steal any thing adventurously. Shakspeare, Henry V.

ADVENTUROUSNESS. n. s. The act of being adventurous.

ADVERB. n. s. [adverbium, Lat.]

A word joined to a verb or adjective, and solely applied to the use of qualifying and restraining the latitude of their signification, by the intimation of some circumstance thereof; as of quality, manner, degree. Clarke, Lat. Gram.

Thus we say, he runs swiftly; the bird flies aloft; he lives virtuously.

ADVERBIAL.† adj. [adverbialis, Lat.]

1. That which has the quality or structure of an adverb.

The words "when," "where," and all other of the same nature, such as "whence, whither, whenever, wherever, &c." may be called adverbial conjunctions, because they participate the nature both of adverbs and conjunctions. Harris, Herm. ii.

Supposing "lively" adverbial, as was now common, "displayed" will connect with "portraiture," that is, portraiture lively displayed. Bacon, Note, II Pens. v. 149.

2. Making use of adverbs.

He is wonderfully adverbial in his professions. Tatler, No. 191.

ADVERBIALY. adv. [adverbialiter, Lat.] Like an adverb; in the manner of an adverb.

I should think ultra was joined adverbially with tremet, did Virgil make use of so equivocal a syntax. Addison.

ADVERSABLE. adj. [from adverse.] Contrary to; opposite to. Dict.

ADVERSARIA. n. s. [Lat. A book, as it should seem, in which Debtor and Creditor were set in opposition.] A common-place; a book to note in.

These parchments are supposed to have been St. Paul's adversaria. Bull, Sermon.

ADVERSARY. a. s. [adversaire, Fr. adversarius, Lat.]

An opponent; antagonist; enemy; generally applied to those that have verbal or judicial quarrels; as controvertists or litigants: sometimes to an opponent in single combat. It may sometimes imply an open profession of enmity; as we say, a secret enemy is worse than an open adversary.

Yet am I noble, as the adversary
I come to cope. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Those rites and ceremonies of the church, therefore, which were the self-same now that they were, when holy and virtuous men maintained them against profane and deriding adversaries, her own children have in derision. Hooker.

Meanwhile, th' adversary of God and man,
Sat on, with thoughts inflam'd, of highest design,
Puts on swift wings. Milton.

An adversary makes a stricter search into us, and discovers every flaw and imperfection in our tempers. A friend exaggerates a man's virtues; an enemy inflames his crimes. Addison.

ADVERSATIVE.† adj. [adversativus, Lat.] A term of grammar, applied to a word which makes some opposition or variety; as, in this sentence; This diamond is orient, but it is rough. But is an adversative conjunction.

Two members of one and the same sentence, connected with the adversative particle, But. Wrightington, Miscell. p. 4.

Of these disjunctives some are simple, some adversative; simple, as when we say, "either it is day, or it is night;" adversative, as when we say, "it is not day, but it is night." The difference between these is, that the simple do no more than merely disjoin; the adversative disjoin, with an opposition concomitant.

Harris, Hermes, b. ii.

ADVERSE. adj. [adversus, Lat.] In prose it has now the accent on the first syllable; in verse it is accented on the first by Shakspeare; on either indifferently, by Milton; on the last by Dryden; on the first, by Roscommon.

1. Acting with contrary directions; as, two bodies in collision.

Was I for this nigh wreckt upon the sea,
And twice, by adverse winds, from England's bank
Drove back again unto my native clime. Shakspeare.

As when two polar winds blowing adverse,
Upon the Cronian sea, together drive
Mountains of ice. Milton.

With adverse blast up-turns them from the south,
Notus and Afer. Milton.

A cloud of smoke envelopes either host,
And all at once the combatants are lost;
Darkling they join adverse and shock unseen;
Coursers with coursers justling, men with men. Dryden.

2. Figuratively, contrary to the wish or desire; thence, calamitous; afflictive; pernicious. It is opposed to prosperous.

What if he hath decreed, that I shall first
Be try'd in humble state, and things adverse;
By tribulations, injuries, insults,
Contempts, and scorns, and snares, and violence. Milton.

Some the prevailing malice of the great,
Unhappy men, or adverse fate,
Sunk deep into the gulphs of an afflicted state. Roscommon.

3. Personally opponent; the person that counteracts another, or contests any thing.

Well she saw her father was grown her adverse party; and yet her fortune such, as she must favour her rivals. Sidney.

TO ADVERSE. * v. a. This is an old English verb; to oppose.

That was a presage,
Touch'd to that other Perse
Of that fortune him should adverse. Gower, Conf. Am. b. ii.

ADVERSENESS. * n. s. Opposition.

Against which allegations, M. Parsons himself, a man known unto you for his malignity and adverseness, could take no exceptions. Bp. Morton, Discharge, p. 259.

ADVERSITY. n. s. [adversité, Fr.] Affliction; calamity; that is, opposition to our wishes.

1. The cause of our sorrow; affliction; misfortune. In this sense it may have a plural.

Let me embrace these sour adversities,
For wise men say, it is the wisest course. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

2. The state of unhappiness; misery.

Concerning deliverance itself from all adversity, we use not to say men are in adversity, whensoever they feel any small hinderance of their welfare in this world, but when some notable affliction or cross, some great calamity or trouble, befalleth them. Hooker.

Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head. Shakspeare.

A remembrance of the good use he had made of prosperity, contributed to support his mind under the heavy weight of adversity which then lay upon him. Atterbury.

ADVERSELY. adv. [from adverse.] In an adverse manner; oppositely; unfortunately.

What I think, I utter, and spend my malice in my breath. If the drink you give me touch my palate adversely, I make a crook'd face at it. Shakspeare.

TO ADVERT. † v. n. [adverto, Lat.] To attend to; to regard; to observe: with the particle to before the object of regard.

The mind of man being not capable at once to advert to more than one thing, a particular view and examination of such an innumerable number of vast bodies, will afford matter of admiration.

Now to the universal whole advert; Ray on the Creation.

The earth regard as of that whole a part;
In which wide frame more noble worlds abound;
Witness, ye glorious orbs, which hang around. Blackmore.

We sometimes say, To advert the mind to an object. But Dryden uses it with upon before the object.

While they pretend to advert upon one libel, they set up another. Vindic. of the D. of Guise, 1683.

TO ADVERT. * v. a. To regard; to advise; to consider attentively.

So though the soul, the time she doth advert
The body's passions, takes herself to die;
Yet, death now finish'd, she can well convert
Herself to other thoughts. Morse, Song of the Soul, iv. 39.

I can no more but, in my name, advert
All earthly powers beware of tyrant's heart.

Mir. for Mag. p. 442.

ADVERTENCE. † n. s. [from advert.] Attention to; regard to; consideration.

Christianity may make Archimedes his challenge; give it but where it may set its foot; allow it lift a sober advertence to its proposals, and it will move the whole world. Decay of Piety.

Anciently used without the particle to.

Although the body sat among 'hem there,
Her advertence is alwaie ellis where;
For Troilus full fast her soule sought,
Withoutin worde, on him alwaie she thought.

Chaucer, Tr. and Crs. iv. 698.

ADVERTENCY. n. s. [from advert.] The same with advertence. Attention; regard; heedfulness.

Too much advertency is not your talent, or else you had fled from that text, as from a rock. Swift.

ADVERTENT. adj. [from advert.] Attentive; vigilant; heedful.

This requires choice parts, great attention of mind, sequestration from the importunity of secular employments, and a long advertent and deliberate connexing of consequents.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

TO ADVERTISE. v. a. [advertir, Fr.] It is now spoken with the accent upon the last syllable; but appears to have been anciently accented on the second.]

1. To inform another; to give intelligence; with an accusative of the person informed.

The bishop did require a respite,
Wherein he might the king his lord advertise,
Whether her daughter were legitimate. Shakspeare.

As I by friends am well advertis'd,
Sir Edmund Courtney, and the haughty prelate,
With many more confederates, are in arms. Shakspeare.

The king was not so shallow, nor so ill advertised, as not to perceive the intention of the French king. Bacon.

I hope ye will advertise me fairly of what they dislike. Digby.

2. To inform; to give notice; with of before the subject of information.

Ferhates, understanding that Solyman expected more assured advertisement, unto the other Basas declared the death of the emperor, of which they advertised Solyman; firming those letters with all their hands and seals. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

They were to advertise the chief hero of the distresses of his subjects, occasioned by his absence. Dryden.

3. To give notice of any thing, by means of an advertisement in the public prints; as, He advertised his loss.

ADVERTISEMENT, OR ADVERTISEMENT. † n. s. [advertisement, Fr.]

1. Instruction; admonition.

A D V

'Tis all men's office to speak patience
To those, that wring under the load of sorrow;
But no man's virtue nor sufficiency,
To be so moral, when he shall endure
The like himself: therefore give me no counsel;
My griefs are louder than advertisement.

Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing.

Cyrus was once minded to have put Cræsus to death, but hearing him report the advertisement of Solon, he spared his life. Abbot, Description of the World.

2. Intelligence; information.

Then, as a cunning prince that catch spies,
If they return no news, doth nothing know;
But if they make advertisement of lies,
The prince's counsel all awry do go. Sir John Davies.

He had received advertisement, that the party, which was sent for his relief, had received some brush, which would much retard their march. Clarendon.

The drum and trumpet, by their several sounds, serve for many kinds of advertisements, in military affairs: the bells serve to proclaim a scare-fire; and, in some places, water-breaches; the departure of a man, woman, or child; time of divine service; the hour of the day; day of the month. Holder.

3. Notice of any thing published in a paper of intel- ligence, Dr. Johnson says; but it is not confined to a paper, or, as we say, a news-paper. It means also legal notification.

The principal minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the gospeller and epistler agreeably, according to the advertisement published anno 7 Eliz.

Const. and Canon Eccl. 24.

It is my custom, in a dearth of news, to entertain myself with those collections of advertisements that appear at the end of all our publick prints. Tatler, No. 224.

ADVERTISER.† n. s. [advertiscor, Fr. It is in Cot- grave under annonceur.]

1. He that gives intelligence or information.

The great skill in an advertiser is chiefly seen in the style which he makes use of. He is to mention the universal esteem, or general reputation, of things that were never heard of.

Tatler, No. 224.

2. The paper in which advertisements are published.

They have drawled through columns of gazettes and advertisers for a century together. Burke's Works, ii. 13.

ADVERTISING, or ADVERTISING. part. adj. [from advertise.] Active in getting intelligence; monitory: a word not now in use.

As I was then
Advertising, and holy to your business,
Not changing heart with habit, I am still Attorned at your service. Shakespeare, Meas. for Meas.

To ADVERTISE. v. n. [advēspiro, Lat.]

To draw towards evening. Dict.

ADVICE. n. s. [avis, advis, Fr. from adviseo, low Latin.]

1. Counsel; instruction: except that instruction im- plies superiority, and advice may be given by equals or inferiors.

Break we our match up, and by my advice,
Let us impart what we have seen to-night
Unto young Hamlet. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

O troubled, weak, and coward, as thou art!
Without thy poor advice, the lab'ring heart
To worse extremes with swifter steps would run;
Not sav'd by virtue, yet by vice undone. Prior.

2. Reflection; prudent consideration: as, he always acts with good advice.

What he hath won: that he hath fortified:
So hot a speed, with such advice dispos'd,
Such temperate order, in so fierce a course,
Doth want example. Shakespeare, K. John.

3. Consultation; deliberation: with the particle with. Great princes, taking advice with workmen, with no less cost, set their things together. Bacon, Essays.

A D V

4. Intelligence: as, the merchants received advice of their loss. This sense is somewhat low, and chiefly commercial.

ADVICE-BOAT. n. s. A vessel employed to bring intel- ligence.

To ADVIGILATE.* v. a. [Lat. advigilo.] To watch diligently. Dict.

ADVISABLE.† adj. [from advise.]

1. Prudent; fit to be advised.

Some judge it advisable for a man to account with his heart every day; and this, no doubt, is the best and surest course;
for till the oftner, the better. South, Sermons.

It is not advisable to reward, where men have the tenderness not to punish. L'Estrange, Fables.

2. Open to advice.

He was so strangely advisable, that he would advert unto the judgement of the meanest person. Fell, Life of Hammond.

ADVISABLENESS. n. s. [from advisable.] The quality of being advisable, or fit; fitness; propriety.

To ADVISE. v. a. [adviser, Fr.]

1. To counsel: with the particle to before the thing advised.

If you do stir abroad, go arm'd. —

— Arm'd, brother! —

— Brother, I advise you to the best. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

I would advise all gentlemen to learn merchants' accounts, and not to think it a skill that belongs not to them. Locke.

When I consider the scruples and cautions I here lay in your way, methinks it looks as if I advised you to something which I would have offered at, but in effect not done. Locke.

2. To give information; to inform; to make acquainted with any thing: often with the particle of before the thing told.

You were advic'd, his flesh was capable
Of wound and scars; and that his forward spirit
Would lift him, where most trade or danger rang'd. Shakespeare.

Such discourse brings on,

As may advise him of his happy state;

Happiness in his pow'r, left free to will. Milton, P. L.

A posting messenger dispatch'd from hence,

Of this fair troop advic'd their aged prince. Dryden, Æneid.

To ADVISE. v. n.

1. To consult: with the particle with before the per- son consulted; as, he advised with his companions.

2. To consider; to deliberate.

Advise if this be worth

Attempting, or to sit in darkness here,

Hatching vain empires. Milton, P. L. v.

ADVISED. participial adj. [from advise.]

1. Acting with deliberation and design: prudent; wise.

Let his travel appear rather in his discourse, than in his apparel or gesture; and, in his discourse, let him be rather advised in his answers, than forward to tell stories. Bacon, Ess.

The Almighty Father, where he sits

Shrin'd in his sanctuary of heav'n secure,

Consulting on the sum of things foreseen,

This tumult, and permitted all, advic'd. Milton, P. L. vi.

2. Performed with deliberation; done on purpose; acted with design.

By that which we work naturally, as, when we breathe, sleep, and move, we set forth the glory of God, as natural agents do; albeit we have no express purpose to make that our end, nor any advised determination therein to follow a law. Hooker, i. 49.

In my school-days, when I had lost one shaft,

I shot his fellow of the self-same flight,

The self-same way, with more advised watch,

To find the other forth; by vent'ring both,

I oft found both. Shakespeare, Merch. of Venice.

ADVISEDLY. adv. [from advised.] Soberly; heedfully; deliberately; purposely; by design; prudently.

- This book advisedly read and diligently followed but one year at home, would do more good than three years travel abroad. Ascham.

Surprize may be made by moving things, when the party is in haste, and cannot stay to consider advisedly of that which is moved. Bacon, Essay xliii.

Thou stillest second thoughts (by all allowed the best) a relapse, and accusest constancy of mischief in what is natural, and advisedly undertaken. Sir John Suckling.

ADVISEDNESS. n. s. [from advised.] Deliberation; cool and prudent procedure.

While things are in agitation, private men may modestly tender their thoughts to the consideration of those that are in authority; to whose care it belongeth, in prescribing concerning indifferent things, to proceed with all just advisedness and moderation. Sanderson's Judgment in one View.

ADVISEMENT. † n. s. [advisement, Fr.]

1. Counsel; information.

Mote I wote,

What strange adventure do ye now pursue?

Perhaps my succour, or advisement meet,

Mote stead you much.

Spenser, P. Q.

I will, according to your advisement, declare the evils, which seem most hurtful. Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. It is taken likewise, in old writers, for prudence and circumspection. It is now, in both senses, antiquated. But it stands in our translation of the Bible, 1 Chron. xii. 19.

ADV'ISER. n. s. [from advise.] The person that advises, or gives counsel; a counsellor.

Here, free from court-compliances, he walks,

And with himself, his best adviser, talks.

Waller.

They never fail of their most artful and indefatigable address, to silence this impertinent adviser, whose severity awes their excesses. Rogers's Sermons.

ADVISING.* n. s. [from advise.] Counsel; advice.

Fasten your ear on my advisings; to the love I have in doing good, a remedy prescutes itself. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

ADVISO.* n. s. [Low Lat. adviso, Ital. aviso, advice, consideration; which Howell, in his letters, has literally adopted. The use of this word seems to be as justifiable as that of proviso.]

An imparity of examples they meet with in history, may somewhat wrest their counsels and advisos, at first, to a difformity from the present necessity.

Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 176.

The letters of the Roman bishops were not only charitable advisos, but dictatorial mandates. Wagstaffe, Hist. Ref. p. 4.

From the assize sermon most commonly your Spanish judges take most of their charge, and are as much beholding to Mr. Curate's advisos from the pulpit, as he was before to Fonseca's postils. Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iv. 15.

ADULATION. n. s. [adulation, Fr. adulatio, Lat.]

Flattery: high compliment.

O be sick, great Greatness!

And bid thy ceremony give thee cure.

Think'st thou the fry fever will go out,

With titles blown from adulation?

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

They who flattered him most before, mentioned him now with the greatest bitterness, without imputing the least crime to him, committed since the time of that exalted adulation, or that was not then as much known to them, as it could be now. Clarendon.

ADULA'TOR. n. s. [adulator, Lat.] A flatterer. Dict.

ADULATORY. † adj. [Fr. adulatoire, which is interpreted by Cotgrave, two centuries since, adulatory. Dr. Johnson introduced the word without a reference to any dictionary, and without an example. The word, in modern times, has been revived by one who well understood its application, and is now common.] Flattering; full of compliments.

You are not lavish of your words, especially in that species of eloquence called the adulatory. Lord Chesterfield.

Adulatory verses of this kind, however well written, deserve not to be transmitted to posterity. Mason, Note on Gray's Lett.

Spenser in compliance with a disgraceful custom, or rather in obedience to the established tyranny of patronage, prefixed to the Fairy Queen fifteen of these adulatory pieces [Sonnets].

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iii. 445.

ADULA'TRESS.* n. s. [Lat. adulatrix. Dr. Johnson introduces adulator from the old dictionaries, which would also have furnished him with this word.] She that flattereth. Induct.

ADU'LT adj. [adultus, Lat.] Grown up; past the age of infancy and weakness.

They would appear less able to approve themselves, not only to the confessor, but even to the catechist, in their adult age, than they were in their minority; as having scarce ever thought of the principles of their religion, since they conated them to avoid correction. Decay of Piety.

The earth, by these applauded schools, 'tis said,

This single crop of men and women bred;

Who grown adult, so chance, it seems, enjoin'd,

Did, male and female, propagate their kind. Blackmore.

ADU'LT. † n. s. A person above the age of infancy, or grown to some degree of strength; sometimes full grown: a word used chiefly by medicinal writers, Dr. Johnson says, and he cites the authority only of a surgeon.

The depression of the cranium, without a fracture, can but seldom occur; and then it happens to children, whose bones are more pliable and soft than those of adults. Sharp's Surgery.

It is acknowledged by the most considerable authors of the reformation, as well as others, that the laying on of hands, (Heb. vi. 2.) does refer to the rite of confirmation. Some practice like this was used amongst the Jews, when they admitted adults into their synagogues.

Bp. Compton's Episc. Letters, p. 34.

A'DULTED.* part adj. [Lat. adultus.] Completely grown.

And now that we are not only adulted but ancient Christians, I believe the most acceptable sacrifice we can send up to heaven, is prayer and praise. Howell's Letters, i. 6. 32.

ADU'LTNESS. n. s. [from adult.] The state of being adult. See ADOLESCENCE. Dict.

To ADU'LT. † v. n. [adulterer, Fr. adultero, Lat.]

Dr. Johnson has improperly given this word as a verb active; which may be owing to the misapprehension of the passage by the person who made the citation from Ben Jonson, which in Johnson's dictionary is printed inaccurately, and of which (rightly given) the construction is, "Though Beast knows no more than his own wife, yet he is still committing adultery in thought." To commit adultery with another: a word not classical.

Than his chaste wife though Beast now know no more,
He *adulter*s still; his thoughts lie with a whore.

B. Jonson, Epigram xxvi.

2. To stain; to pollute.

Shall cock-horse, fat-paunch'd Milo stain whole stocks
Of well-born souls, with his *adulter*ing spots?

Marston's Scourge, 2.

ADU'LT ANT. n. s. [adulterans, Lat.] The person or thing which adulterates.

To ADU'LT ERATE. † v. n. This verb has been hastily classed, by Dr. Johnson, with the active verb, which bears another sense.

To commit adultery.

But fortune, Oh!

She adulterates hourly with thine uncle John. Shakspeare.

Thou shalt not kill, steal, and commit adultery: These have no object, viz. none named whom, from whom, and with whom, we must not kill, steal, nor adulterate; because we must make ourselves also the object here, and reflect the commandments upon ourselves; as thus: Thou shalt not kill; first, not thyself; and secondly, not thy neighbour; and so of the rest. Lightfoot, Miscell. p. 201.

To ADULTERATE.† v. a.

1. To corrupt by some foreign admixture; to contaminate.

Common pot-ashes, bought of them that sell it in shops, who are not so foolishly knavish, as to adulterate them with saltpetre, which is much dearer than pot-ashes. Boyle.

Could a man be composed to such an advantage of constitution, that it should not at all adulterate the images of his mind; yet this second nature would alter the crisis of his understanding. Glanville, Scæpsis Scientifica, c. xvi.

The present war has so adulterated our tongue with strange words, that it would be impossible for one of our great grandfathers to know what his posterity have been doing. Spectator.

2. To change the quality of a thing by admixture with another, without injuring or corrupting.

I have observed many excellent forms of grafting and adulterating plants and flowers with infinite such devices. Peachment's Experience of his own Times.

ADULTERATE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Tainted with the guilt of adultery.

I am possess'd with an adulterate blot;
My blood is mingled with the grime of lust;
Being strumpeted by thy contagion. Shakspeare, Com. of Err.
—That incestuous, that adulterate beast. Shakspeare.

2. Corrupted with some foreign mixture.

It does indeed differ no more, than the maker of adulterate wares does from the vender of them. Governm. of the Tongue.

They will have all their gold and silver, and may keep their adulterate copper at home. Swift, Miscellanes.

ADULTERATELY.* adv. In an adulterate manner.

ADULTERATENESS. n. s. [from adulterate.] The quality or state of being adulterate, or counterfeit.

ADULTERATION. n. s. [from adulterate.]

1. The act of adulterating or corrupting by foreign mixture; contamination.

To make the compound pass for the rich metal simple, is an adulteration; or counterfeiting; but if it be done avowedly, and without disguising, it may be a great saving of the richer metal. Bacon, Natural History, No. 498.

2. The state of being adulterated, or contaminated.

Such translations are like the adulteration of the noblest wines, where something of the colour, spirit, and flavour, will remain. Felton on the Glass.

ADULTERER. n. s. [adulter, Lat.] The person guilty of adultery.

With what impatience must the muse behold,
The wife by her procuring husband sold;
For tho' the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed. Dryden, Juvenal.

ADULTERESS. n. s. [from adulterer.] A woman that commits adultery.

The Spartan lady replied, when she was asked, What was the punishment for adulteresses? There are no such things here. Government of the Tongue, § 3.

Helen's rich attire;
From Argos by the fam'd adulteress brought;
With golden flow'rs and winding foliage wrought. Dryden, Virgil.

ADULTERINE. n. s. [adulterine, Fr. adulterinus, Lat.]

A child born of an adulteress: a term of canon-law.

ADULTERINE.* adj. Spurious.

Where is the man that even now upbraided us with the lawless rejection of ancient records; and by name would undertake to justify those whom my epistle taxed for adulterine, whereof these canons of the apostles were a part? Bp. Hall, Mart. Cler. p. 152.

ADULTEROUS.† adj. [adulter, Lat.]

1. Guilty of adultery.

The adulterous Antony, most large

In his abominations, turns you off,
And gives his potent regiment to a trull,
That noses it against us. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

An adulterous person is tied to restitution of the injury, so far as it is repairable; and to make provision for the children, that they may not injure the legitimate. Taylor.

Think on whose faith th' adulterous youth rely'd;
Who promis'd, who procur'd the Spartan bride? Dryden, Æn.

2. Spurious; corrupt.

Though the genuine writings of that incomparable prince, (but indeed so adulterated by false copies, that little of them was to be understood,) were published not long after; yet did that forged and adulterous stuff, translated into most languages of Europe, &c. pass currently. Mer. Casaubon of Credulity, p. 297.

Some of our kings have made adulterous connections abroad, and trucked away, for foreign gold, the interests and glory of their crown. Burke, on a Regicide Peace.

Religion itself should ever be carefully distinguished from the conduct of particular religionists; and not reproached, as it too often happens, with those adulterous and foreign mixtures which have so large a share in many supposed religious characters. Cocentry's Phil. Conv. 1.

ADULTEROUSLY.* adv. [This adverb is in Sherwood's old dictionary, who translates it, en adultere.]

Upon this principle all must abstain from marrying, because some husbands and wives have adulterously profaned that holy covenant! Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 22.

Abundant reason there is—that no man should be allowed adulterously to take to wife her, that is at the same time the wife of another. Prideaux, Life of Mahomet, p. 152.

ADULTERY.† n. s. [adulterium, Lat.]

1. The act of violating the bed of a married person.

All thy domestick griefs at home be left,
The wife's adultry, with the servant's theft;
And, (the most racking thought which can intrude)
Forget false friends, and their ingratitude. Dryden, Juvenal.

2. Adulteration; corruption.

Give me a look, give me a fage,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
*Such sweet neglect more taketh me,
Than all the adulteries of art;
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart. B. Jonson, Epicer. i.

ADUMBRANT. adj. [from adumbrate.] That which gives a slight resemblance.

To ADUMBRATE. v. a. [adumbro, Lat.]

To shadow out; to give a slight likeness; to exhibit a faint resemblance, like that which shadows afford to the bodies which they represent.

Heaven is designed for our reward, as well as reproof; and therefore is adumbrated by all those positive excellencies, which can endear or recommend. De us y Pety.

ADUMBRATION.† n. s. [from adumbrate.]

1. The act of adumbrating, or giving a slight and imperfect representation. See ADUMBRATE.

To make some adumbration of that we mean, it is rather an impulsion or confusion of the air, than an elision or section of the same. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 187.

2. The slight and imperfect representation of a thing; a faint sketch.*

The observers view but the backside of the hangings; the right one is on the other side the grave: and our knowledge is but like those broken ends; at best a most confused adumbration. Glanville, Scæpsis Scientifica.

Those of the first sort have some adumbration of the rational nature, as vegetables have of the sensible. Hale, Origin.

3. In heraldry.

Adumbration, is the shadow only of any figure outlined and painted of a colour darker than the field.

ADUNA'TION.† n. s. [Old Fr. aduner, réunir. Lat. adunare. V. Roquefort Gloss.] The state of being united; union: a word of little use.

Before the adunation, in the Virgin's womb, the godhead and manhood were two natures.

Abp. Crammer's Answer to Gardiner, p. 352.

You say that Gelasius directeth his arguments of the two natures in man, and of the two natures in the sacrament, chiefly against the Eutychians, to prove the nature of man to remain in Christ after the adunation: whosoever readeth Gelasius, shall find otherwise. Ibid. p. 353.

When, by glaciation, wood, straw, dust, and water, are supposed to be united into one lump, the cold does not cause any real union or adunation, but only hardening the aqueous parts of the liquor into ice; the other bodies, being accidentally present in that liquor, are frozen up in it, but not really united. Boyle.

ADUN'CEITY. n. s. [aduncitas, Lat.] Crookedness: flexure inwards: hookedness.

There can be no question, but the aduncity of the pounces and beaks of the hawks, is the cause of the great and habitual immorality of those animals. Arbuthnot and Pope, Mart. Scrib.

ADUN'QUE.† adj. [aduncus, Lat.] Crooked; bending inwards; hooked.

The birds that are speakers, are parrots, pies, jays, daws, and ravens; of which parrots have an adunque bill, but the rest not. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 238.

Her face was flat, and very much like an owl's; and her nose adunck, like an overgrown eagle's beak.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iii. 2.

ADVOCACY.† n. s. [Fr. avocassie.]

1. The act of pleading; vindication; defence; apology: a word in little use.

If any there are who are of opinion, that there are no antipodes, or that the stars do fall, they shall not want herein the applause or advocacy of Satan. Brown, Vulgar Errors, b. i.

2. Judicial pleading; law-suit, or process. This was its ancient meaning.

Be ye not ware how that false Poliphete
Is now about effusions for to plete,
And bringin on you advocacies new?

Chaucer, Tr. and Cris. ii. 1469.

TO ADVOCATE.* v. a. [Lat. advoco, Fr. avocasser.]
To plead; to support; to defend.

Mr. Boucher has remarked, that though this verb has been said to be an improvement on the English language, which has been discovered by the United States of North America, since their separation from Great Britain, it is a very common and old Scottish word; which indeed it is both as an active and neuter verb. But Mr. Boucher has been misled in this literary concession which he has made to the Americans; for it is also an old English word, employed by one of our finest and most manly writers; and if the Americans affect to plume themselves on this pretended improvement of our language, let them as well as their abettors withdraw the unfounded claim to discovery, in turning to the prose-writings of Milton. In the dictionaries of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, as in the Latin of Thomas, the Spanish of Mipsheu, the Italian of Florio, and the French of Cotgrave, advoco, advogar, avocare, and advocasser, are rendered not to advocate, but "to play the advocate."

Whether this reflect not with a contumely upon the parliament itself, which thought this petition worthy not only of receiving, but of voting to a commitment, after it had been advocated, and moved for by some honourable and learned gentlemen of the house, to be called a combination of libelling separatists, and the advocates thereof to be branded for incendiaries; whether this approach not the judgement and approbation of the parliament, I leave to equal arbiters.

Milton, Animadversions, § 1.

This is the only thing distinct and sensible that has been advocated. Burke, Speech on the Reform of Representation.

ADVOCATE.† n. s. [advocatus, Lat.]

1. He that pleads the cause of another in a court of judicature.

An advocate, in the general import of the word, is that person who has the pleading and management of a judicial cause. In a strict way of speaking, only that person is stiled advocate, who is the patron of the cause, and is often, in Latin, termed togatus, and, in English, a person of the long robe. Ayl. Par.

Learn what thou ow'st thy country and thy friend;

What's requisite to spare, and what to spend;

Learn this; and, after, envy not the store

Of the greas'd advocate that grind the poor. Dryden, Perseus.

2. He that pleads any cause, in whatever manner, as a controvertist or vindicator.

If she dares trust me with her little babe,

I'll shew't the king, and undertake to be

Her advocate to th' loud'st. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Of the several forms of government that have been, or are, in the world, that cause seems commonly the better, that has the better advocate, or is advantaged by fresher experience.

Temple's Miscellanies.

3. It is used with the particle for before the person or thing, in whose favour the plea is offered.

Foes to all living worth except your own,

And advocates for folly dead and gone. Pope, Epistles

4. In the scriptural and sacred sense, it stands for one of the offices of our Redeemer.

Me his advocate,

And propitiation; all his works on me,

Good, or not good, ingraft.

Milton, P. L.

5. Formerly the patron of the presentation and avowson of a church. See ADVOWSON. Corvel.

ADVOCATESHIP.* n. s. [This old substantive is rendered by Cotgrave advocatie. So likewise the old Fr. avocassie is used for the office of an advocate.]

1. The duty or place of an advocate.

Leave your advocateship,

Except that we shall call you Orator Fly.

B. Jonson, New Inn, ii. 6.

2. The assistance or support of a great person in a suit, as Cotgrave further explains advocatie: and thus, in a higher sense.

This redargution of the world was made a part of the advocateship of the Holy Spirit by our Lord, "When he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, because they believe not on me."

Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, p. 71.

ADVOCATES.* n. s. A female advocate. The French have the feminine avocate, a mediatrix; and the Portuguese, avogada. Our elder synonymous but obsolete substantive is advocatrice, which is found in Sir T. Elyot's Governour.

He [the Archbishop of Florence] answers, That Christ is not our advocate alone, but a judge; and since the just is scarce secure, how shall a sinner go to him, as to an advocate? Therefore God hath provided us of an advocatess, [the Virgin Mary,] who is gentle and sweet, &c. — and many other such dangerous propositions. Bp. Taylor, Dismantling from Popery, § 8.

ADVOCATION.† n. s. [from advocate.]

1. The office or act of pleading; plea; apology.

My advocation is not now in tune;

My lord is not my lord; nor should I know him,

Were he in favour, as in humour, alter'd. Shakespeare, Othello.

2. Like advocate, this word has also a scriptural and sacred sense.

God comforts us by their sermons, and reproveth us by their discipline, [that of the clergy,] — and heals our sicknesses by their intercession, presented to God, and united to Christ's advocation.

Bp. Taylor, Visit. of the Sick, i. 5.

For the advocation of angels, that is, that they may be our advocates, we pray not; neither are you able to prove that the ministerie of defence or protection is all one with advocation.

Fulke, Consult. of the Rhem. Test. p. 826.

ADVOL'ATION. n. s. [advolo, advolutum, Lat.] The act of flying to something. Dict.

ADVOL'UTION. n. s. [advolutio, Lat.] The act of rolling to something.

ADVO'UTRER.  n. s.* [Fr. advoultrer.] An adulterer. God wyl condempne advouterers and whore-keepers.

Bale, Yet a Course at the Romyshe Foze, fol. 70. c.

ADVO'UTRESS.  n. s.* An adulteress.

This kind of danger is then to be feared chiefly, when the wives have plots for the raising of their owne children; or else that they be advoutresses. Bacon, Essays, xix.

ADVO'UTROUS.  adj.* Adulterous.

The fall of the advoutrous, cursed, and malignant church of hypocrites. Bale on the Revelat. ii. G. 5.

ADVO'UTRY. † n. s. [advoutrie, Fr.] Adultery.

He was the most perfidious man upon the earth, and he had made a marriage compounded between an advoutrie and a rape.

Bacon, Henry VII.

It [adultery] being styled alone advoutrie, as contrary to that sacred vow [made at marriage] attested by such evidence.

Feltham, Letters, p. 636.

ADVOWE. n. s. He that has the right of advowson. See ADVOWSON.

ADVO'WSON, or, ADVO'WZEN. n. s. [In common law.] A right to present to a benefice, and signifies as much as Jus Patronatus. In the canon law, it is so termed, because they that originally obtained the right of presenting to any church, were great benefactors thereto; and are therefore termed sometimes Patroni, sometimes Advocati. Covent.

TO ADU'RE. v. n. [aduro, Lat.] To burn up: not in use.

Such a degree of heat, which doth neither melt nor scorch, doth mellow, and not adure. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 319.

ADU'ST. adj. [adustus, Lat.]

1. Burnt up; hot as with fire, scorched.

By this means, the virtual heat of the water will enter; and such a heat as will not make the body adust, or fragile. Bacon.

Which with torrid heat,
And vapours as the Libyan air adust,
Began to parch that temperate clime.

Milton, P. L.

2. It is generally now applied, in a medicinal or philosophical sense, to the complexion and humours of the body.

Such humours are adust, as, by long heat, become of a hot and fiery nature, as choler, and the like. Quincy.

To ease the soul of one oppressive weight,

This quits an empire, that embroils a state.

The same adust complexion has impell'd
Charles to the convent, Philip to the field.

Pope.

ADU'STED. adj. [See ADUST.]

1. Burnt; scorched; dried with fire.

Sulphurous and nitrous foam
They found, they mingled, and with subtle art,
Concocted, and adusted, they reduc'd
To blackest grain, and into store convey'd.

Milton, P. L.

2. Hot, as the complexion.

They are but the fruits of adusted choler, and the evaporations of a vindictive spirit. Howell.

ADU'STIBLE. adj. [from adust.] That which may be adusted, or burnt up. Dict.

ADU'STION. † n. s. [from adust.] The act of burning up, or drying, as by fire.

Others will have them [the symptoms of melancholy] come from the diverse adustion of the four humours.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 191.

This is ordinarily a consequent of a burning colliquative fever the softer parts being melted away, the heat continuing it adustion, upon the drier and fleshy parts, changes into a marcid fever. Harvey on Consumptions.

ADZ. n. s. See ADDICE.

Æ, or Æ. A diphthong of very frequent use in the Latin language, which seems not properly to have any place in the English; since the æ of the Saxons has been long out of use, being changed to e simple, to which, in words frequently occurring, the æ of the Romans is, in the same manner, altered, as in equator, equinoctial, and even in Æneas.

ÆGIS.  n. s.* [Lat. ægis.] A shield.

ÆGLOGUE. † n. s. [written instead of eclogue, from a mistaken etymology.] A pastoral: a dialogue in verse between goat-herds.

Which moved him rather in æglogues otherwise to write, doubting, perhaps, his ability, which he little needed, or minding to furnish our tongue with this kind wherein it faulteth.

Pref. to Spenser's Pastorals.

Petrarch entertained the learned men of his age with the novelty of modern pastorals, in Latin. Being not ignorant of Greek, and finding nothing in the word "Eclogue" of rural meaning, he supposed it to be corrupted by the copiers, and therefore called his own productions Æglogues, by which he meant to express the talk of goat-herds, though it will mean only the talk of goats. This new name was adopted by subsequent writers, and amongst others, by our Spenser.

Johnson, Life of A. Philips.

ÆGLOPS. n. s. [αἰγῶψ, Gr. signifying goat-eyed, the goat being subject to this ailment.] A tumour or swelling in the great corner of the eye, by the root of the nose, either with or without an inflammation: also a plant so called, for its supposed virtues against such a distemper. Quincy.

Æglops is a tubercle in the inner canthus of the eye.

Wiscam, Surgery.

ÆLYPE'ACUM. n. s. An ointment consisting only of honey, verdigrease and vinegar. Quincy.

ÆL, or ÆAL or AL, in compound names, as πᾶν in the Greek compounds, signifies all, or altogether. So Ælwin is a complete conqueror: Albert, all illustrious: Adred, altogether reverend: Alfred, altogether peaceful. To these Pammachius, Pancratius, Pamphilus, &c. do in some measure answer.

Gibson's Camden.

ÆL, (which, according to various dialects, is pronounced elf, ælph, hulph, hilp, helfe, and, at this day, helpe.) implies assistance. So Ælfric is victorious, and Ælfricold, an auxiliary governor; Ælfgife, a lender of assistance: with which Beetius, Summachus, Epicturus, &c. bear a plain analogy.

Gibson's Camden.

ÆNIGMA. See ENIGMA.

TO ÆNIGMATIZE.  See ENIGMATIZE.*

ÆNIGMATIC.  See ENIGMATIC.*

ÆOLIPILE. See EOLIPILE.

ÆRIAL. adj. [ærius, Lat.]

1. Belonging to the air, as consisting of it.

The thunder, when to roll

With terrour through the dark ærial hall.

Milton, P. L.

From all that can with fins or feathers fly,

Thro' the ærial or the wat'ry sky.

Prior.

I gathered the thickness of the air, or ærial interval, of the glasses at that ring

Newton, Opticks.

Vegetables abound more with ærial particles, than animal substances.

Arbuthnot on Accidents.

2. Produced by the air.

The gifts of heav'n my following song pursues,

Ærial honey, and ambrosial dews.

Dryden, Virg. Georg.

3. Inhabiting the air.

A E T

Where those immortal shapes
Of bright aerial spirits live insph'rd,
In regions mild, of calm and serene air. Milton, P. R.
Aerial animals may be subdivided into birds and flies. Locke.

4. Placed in the air.

Here subterranean works and cities see,
There towns aerial on the waving tree. Pope, Essay on Man.

5. High; elevated in situation, and therefore in the air.

A spacious city stood, with firmest walls,
Sure mounted, and with numerous turrets crown'd,
Aerial spires, and citadels, the seat
Of kings and heroes: resolute in war. Philips.

AERIE. n. s. [Fr. arie. Sometimes written airy or cynie, as derived from the Teutonic ey, ovum.]
Dr. Johnson has given only the imperfect definition of Cowel, viz. the proper word, 'in hawks and other birds of prey, for that which we call a nest in other birds.' It means also a young brood of hawks, as well as the nest in which they are produced.

Your airy buildeth in our airy's nest.
Shakespeare, K. Richard III.

You, M. Garnet, out of your appointed influence of super-abundant grace, endeavour'd your best and uttermost to bruise the very nest-egg of this royal and high-flying aire, in it had been possible.

Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Garnet, &c. Sign. Dd. 3.
One airy, with proportion, ne'er discloses
The earth and the wren. Massinger, Maid of Honour.

AERIFORM.  adj.* [Fr. aeriforme, Gr. αἰρ, and
Lat. forma.] That which resembles air.

An elastic aeriform fluid, or gas, is a peculiar combination of fire with a given substance. Adams.

AEROGRAPHY.  n. s.* [Fr. aerographie, Gr. αἰρ and γραφ.] The description of the air.

AEROLOGY. n. s. [αἰρ and λογ, Gr.] The doctrine of the air.

AEROMANCY. n. s. [Fr. aeromancie, Gr. αἰρ and μαντε.] The art of divining by the air. This is an old English substantive, being found in Cotgrave, who renders it, from the French, aeromantie.

AEROMETER.  n. s.* [Fr. aeromètre, Gr. αἰρ and μετρον.] A machine for weighing the density or rarity of the air.

AEROMETRY. n. s. [αἰρ and μετρεω, Gr.] The art of measuring the air. Dict.

AERONAUT.  n. s.* [Fr. aéronaute, Gr. αἰρ and ναυτης.]
This is a word of modern adoption both by us and the French. It belongs to those who have sailed through the air in balloons.

Let us be satisfied to admire, rather than attempt to follow, the aeronautes of France. Burke.

AEROSCOPY. n. s. [αἰρ and σκοπεω, Gr.] The observation of the air. Dict.

AEROSTATION.  n. s.* [Fr. aerostation, with a different meaning; Gr. αἰρ and σταται, or σταται, which, however it accords with the meaning of the word, shews, as Mr. Mason has observed, that it is not rightly formed in its termination. It should have been aerostatics, as hydrostatics. The French, I may have the adjective aerostatique.] The science of weighing air.

General principles of aerostation are so little different from hydrostatics, that it may seem superfluous to insist on them. Adams.

PS-MINERAL. n. s. A medicine so called, its dark colour, prepared of quicksilver and libellur, ground together in a marble mortar to a black powder. Such as have used it most, think its virtues not very great. Quincy.

A F F

ÆTITES. n. s. [αἰτ, an eagle.] Eagle-stone. It is about the bigness of a chesnut, and hollow, with somewhat in it that rattles upon shaking. Quincy.

ÆTHER. † adv. [Sax. æpeppan, æpeppan, to lengthen.]
See FAR.

1. At a great distance.

So shaken as we are, so wan with care,
Find we a time for frighted peace to pant,
And breathe short-winded accents of new broils,
To be commenc'd in stronds afar remote? Shakespeare, Henry IV.

We hear better when we hold our breath than contrary; in-much as in listening to attain a sound afar off, men hold their breath. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 284.

2. To or from a great distance.

Hector hastened to relieve his boy;
Dismiss'd his burnish'd helm that shone afar,
The pride of warriors, and the pomp of war. Dryden.

3. From afar; from a distant place.

The rough Vulturinus, furious in its course,
With rapid streams divides the fruitful grounds,
And from afar in hollow murmur sounds. Addison on Italy.

4. Afar off; remotely distant.

Much suspecting his secret ends, he entertained a treaty of peace with France, but secretly and afar off, and to be governed as occasions should vary. Sir John Hayward.

ÆF'FED. † part. adj. [Sax. apayed, terrified. See APPEAR.]

1. Frighted; terrified; afraid.

He loudly bray'd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake of fire, that flashing in his beard,
Him all amaz'd, and almost made afard. Spencer, F. Q.
But tell me, Hal, art thou not horribly afear'd? Thou being heir apparent, could the world pick thee out three such enemies again. Shakespeare, Henry IV.

Till he cherish too much beard,
And make Love, or me afard. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

2. It has the particle of before the object of fear.

Fear is described by Spenser to ride in armour, at the clashing whereof he looks afard of himself. Peckham.

It is now obsolete; the last author whom I have found using it, is Sedley. Dr. Johnson says. It is, however, still used by the vulgar.

ÆFFER. n. s. [Lat.] The southwest wind.

With adverse blast upturns them from the south
Notus, and Æff black with thunderous clouds.
Milton, P. L. x. 721.

AFFABILITY. n. s. [affabilité, Fr. affabilitas, Lat.]
See AFFABLE.

The quality of being affable; easiness of manners; courteousness; civility; condescension. It is commonly used of superiours.

Hearing of her beauty and her wit,
Her affability and bashful modesty,
Her wondrous qualities, and mild behaviour. Shakespeare.

He was of a most flowing courtesy and affability to all men, and so desirous to oblige them, that he did not enough consider the value of the obligation, or the merit of the person.

All instances of charity, sweetness of conversation, affability, admiration, all significations of tenderness, care and watchful-ness, must be expressed towards children. Taylor.

It is impossible for a publick minister to be so open and easy to all his old friends, as he was in his private condition; but this may be helped out by an affability of address. L'Esrange.

AFFABLE. adj. [affable, Fr. affabilis, Lat.]

1. Easy of manners; accostable; courteous; complai- sant. It is used of superiours.

He was affable, and both well and fair spoken, and would use strange sweetness and blandishment of words, where he desired to affect or persuade any thing that he took to heart. Bacon.

Her father is

An affable and courteous gentleman. Shakspeare, Tam. Shrew.
Gentle to me, and affable hath been Thy condescension, and shall be honour'd ever
With grateful memory. Milton, P. L. viii. 648.

2. It is applied to the external appearance; benign; mild; favourable.

Augustus appeared, looking round him with a serene and affable countenance upon all the writers of his age. Tatler.

AFFABLENESS. n. s. [from affable.] Courtesy; affability.

AFFABLY. adv. [from affable, and Fr. affablement.] In an affable manner; courteously; civilly.

She'll take ill words o' the steward and the servant,
Yet answer affably and modestly.

Beaumont and Fl. Martial's Mâle, iii. 4.

AFFABROUS. adj. [affabre, Fr.] Skillfully made; complete; finished in a workman-like manner.

Dict.

AFFABULATION. n. s. [affabulatio, Lat.] The moral of a fable. Dict.

AFFAIR. n. s. [Fr. affaire; low Lat. affari, horses or cattle used in husbandry; affaria, goods and possessions, and also matters of business, aver, and Fr. avoir; and hence affaire.]

1. Business; something to be managed or transacted. It is used for both private and publick matters.

I was not born for courts or great affairs;

I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers. Pope.

A good acquaintance with method will greatly assist every one in ranging, disposing, and managing all human affairs.

Walke, Logic.

What St. John's skill in state affairs,
What Ormond's valour, Oxford's cares,
To aid their sinking country lent,
Was all destroy'd by one event.

Swift.

2. In military language, a partial engagement; a rencounter; also a duel, an affair of honour, as it is called.

To AFFAMISH. v. a. [Fr. affamer.] To starve.

With light thereof I do myself sustain,

And thereon feed my love-affamish'd heart. Spenser, Son. 88.

What can be more unjust than for a man to endeavour to raise himself by the affamishing of others?

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, i. 5.

I tell thee of the hard usages of the antient eremitical Christians; of their rigorous abstinencies; their affamishing meals; their nightly watchings.

Bp. Hall, Balan of Gilead.

AFFAMISHMENT. n. s. [from the verb.] Starving.

Carried into the wilderness by the same power that unbound him, for the opportunity of his tyranny, for the horror of the place, for the affamishment of his body, for the avoidance of all means of resistance.

Bp. Hall, Contemplations.

To AFFEAR. v. a. [Sax. afapanan, terrere.] To frighten. As, in the first edition of Spenser; for in the second, the reading is altered. Spenser had found the word in Chaucer. See To FEAR.

Each trembling leaf and whistling wind they heare,
As ghastly bug, does greatly them affear.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. iii. 20.

To AFFEAR, or rather To AFFEER. v. n. [from affir, Fr.] To confirm; to give a sanction to; to establish: an old term of law.

Bleed, bleed, poor country!

Great tyranny, lay thou thy basis sure;

For goodness dures not check thee! wear thou thy wrongs,

Thy title is affear'd.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

AFFECT. n. s. [from the verb affect.]

1. Affection; passion; sensation.

It seemeth that as the feet have a sympathy with the head so the wrists have a sympathy with the heart; we see the affects and passions of the heart and spirits are notably disclosed by the pulse. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 97.

2. Quality; circumstance.

I find it difficult to make out one single ulcer, as authors describe it, without other symptoms or affects joined to it.

Wiseman.

This is only the antiquated word for affectation.

To AFFECT. v. a. [afficere, Fr. afficio, affectum, Lat.].

1. To act upon; to produce effects in any other thing.

The sun

Had first his precept so to move, so shine

As might affect the earth with cold, and heat,

Scarce tolerable.

Milton, P. L. b. x.

The generality of men are wholly governed by names, in matters of good and evil; so far as these qualities relate to, and affect, the actions of men.

South, Sermon.

Yet even those two particles do reciprocally affect each other with the same force and vigour, as they would do at the same distance in any other situation imaginable.

Bentley, Sermon.

2. To move the passions.

As a thinking man cannot but be very much affected with the idea of his appearing in the presence of that Being, whom none can see and fire; he must be much more affected, when he considers, that this Being whom he appears before, will examine the actions of his life, and reward or punish him accordingly.

Addison, Spectator, No. 513.

3. To aim at; to endeavour after: spoken of persons.

Atrides broke

His silence next, but ponder'd ere he spoke:

Wise are thy words, and glad I would obey,

But this proud man affects imperial way.

Dryden, Hud.

4. To tend to: to endeavour after: spoken of things.

The drops of every fluid affect a round figure, by the mutual attraction of their parts; as, the globe of the earth and sea affects a round figure, by the mutual attraction of its parts by gravity.

Newton, Opticks.

5. To be fond of; to be pleas'd with; to love; to regard with fondness.

That little which some of the heathen did chance to hear, concerning such matter as the sacred Scripture plentifully containeth, they did in wonderful sort affect.

Hecker, b. i.

There is your crown;

And he that wears the crown immortally,

Long guard it yours; If I affect it more,

Than as your honour, and as your renown,

Let me no more from this obedience rise. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Think not that wars we love, and strife affect;

Or that we hate sweet peace.

Fairfax, b. ii.

None but a woman could a man direct

To tell us women what we most affect.

Dryden, Wife of Bath.

6. To make a shew of something; to study the appearance of any thing; with some degree of hypocrisy.

Another nymph, amongst the many fair,

Before the rest affected still to stand.

And watch'd her eye preventiv' by command.

Prior.

These often carry the humour so far, till their affected coldness and indifference quite kills all the fondness of a lover.

Addison, Spectator, No. 171.

Coquet and coy at once her air,

Both studied, though both seem neglected,

Careless she is with artful care,

Affecting to seem unaffected.

Congreve.

The conscious husband, whom like symptoms seize,

Charges on her the guilt of their disease;

Affecting fury, nets a madman's part,

He'll rip the fatal secret from her heart.

Granville.

7. To imitate in an unnatural and constrained manner.

Spenser, in affecting the ancients, writ no language; yet I would have him read for his matter, but as Virgil read Ennius.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

8. To convict of some crime; to attain with guilt: a phrase merely juridical.

By the civil law, if a dowry with a wife be promised and not paid, the husband is not obliged to allow her alimony. But if her parents shall become insolvent by some misfortune, she shall have alimony, unless you can affect them with fraud, in promising what they knew they were not able to perform.

And. J. P. Parergon.

AFFECT'ATED.* adj. [Lat. affectatus. Our old word for affected.] Far-fetched. A style or oration too much affect'ated with strange words: a little curious or affect'ated: with too much affectation or curiosity.

Barret.

AFFECTATION.* n. s. [affectatio, Lat.]

1. Fondness: high degree of liking; commonly with some degree of culpability.

In things of their own nature indifferent, if either counsels or particular men have at any time, with sound judgment, mistaken conformity between the church of God and infidels, the cause then of hath been somewhat else than only affectation of dissimilitude.

Lecker, iv. 7.

2. An artificial shew: an elaborate appearance; a false pretence.

It has been, from age to age, an affectation to love the pleasure of flattery, among those who cannot possibly be supposed guilty of passing life in that manner.

Spectator, No. 254.

3. Affection or liking simply, without any degree of culpability.

There are even bonds of affectation, bonds of mutual respect, and reciprocal duties, between man and wife.

Ep. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

4. The act of desiring, or aiming at.

It was not any opposition to the law of Moses, not any danger threatened to the temple, but pretended sedition, and affectation of the crown objected, which moved Pilate to condemn him.

Peter, in the Creed, Act. 4.

AFFECTED. particip. adj. [from affect.]

1. Moved; touched with affection; internally disposed or inclined.

No marvel then if he were ill affected.

The model they seemed affected to in their directory, was not like to any of the foreign reformed churches now in the world.

Clarendon.

2. Studied with over-much care, or with hypocritical appearance.

These antic, lying, affected phantasies, these new taners of accents.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

3. In a personal sense, full of affection; as, an affected lady.

AFFECTEDLY.* adv. [from affected.]

1. In an affected manner; hypocritically; with more appearance than reality.

Perhaps they are affectedly ignorant; they are so willing it should be true, that they have not attempted to examine it.

Government of the Tongue, 35.

Some indeed have been so affectedly vain, as to counterfeit immortality, and have stolen their death, in hopes to be esteemed immortal.

Brown, Vulg. Err. vii. 10.

By talking so familiarly of one hundred and ten thousand pounds, by a tax upon a few commodities, it is plain, you are either naturally or affectedly ignorant of our condition.

Swift.

2. Studiously; with laboured intention.

Some mispersuasions concerning the divine attributes, tend to the corrupting men's manners, as if they were designed and affectedly chosen for that purpose.

Decay of Piety.

Nothing in beauty, in habit, in action, in motion, can please, that is affectedly laboured and over-adorned.

Sprat, Sermon, before the King.

AFFECTEDNESS. n. s. [from affected.] The quality of being affected, or of making false appearances.

AFFECTER.* n. s. See AFFECTOR.

AFFECTINGLY.* adv. In an affecting manner.

AFFECTION.* n. s. [affection, Fr. affectio, Lat.]

1. The state of being affected by any cause, or agent.

This general sense is little in use.

Some men there are love not a gaping pig;
Some that are mad if they behold a cat;
And others, when the bag-pipe sings i' th' nose,
Cannot contain their urine, for affection.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

Affection is here used in the sense of sympathy, which formerly was technical: and, as Dr. Farmer has observed, has been so employed by Bacon, Sir Kenelm Digby, and many other writers.

2. Passion of any kind.

Then gan the Palmer thus: most wretched man,
That to affections does the bridle lend;

In their be inning they are weak and wan,

But soon through sutturance grow to fearful end.

Spenser, F. Q.

Exhorte it to my late solitary life, which is prone to affections.

Sidney, M. 1.

Affections, as joy, grief, fear, and anger, with such like, being, as it were, the sundry fashions and forms of appetite, can neither rise at the conceit of a thing indifferent, nor yet choose but rise at the sight of some things.

Hooker, b. 1.

To speak truth of Caesar,

I have not known when his affections way'd

More than his reason.

Shakspeare, Jul. Caesar.

Zeal ought to be composed of the highest degrees of pious affections; of which some are milder and gentler, some sharper and more vehement.

Sprat, Sermon.

I can present nothing beyond this, to your affections to excite your love and desire.

Tillotson.

3. Love; kindness; good-will to some persons; often with to or towards, before the person.

I have acquainted you

With the dear love I bear to fair Anne Page,

Who mutually hath answer'd my affection.

Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

My king i' tangle'd in affection to

A creature of the queen's, lady Anne Bullen.

Shakspeare.

What warmth is there in your affections towards any of these princely suitors?

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

Make his interest depend upon mutual affection and good correspondence with others.

Collier on General Kindness.

Nor at first sight, like most, admire the fair;

For you he lives, and you alone shall share

His last affection, as his early care.

Pope.

4. Good-will to any object; zeal; passionate regard.

I have reason to distrust mine own judgment, as that which may be overborn by my zeal and affection to this cause.

Bacon.

Set your affection upon my words; desire them, and ye shall be instructed.

Wadsworth, vi. 11.

His integrity to the king was without blemish, and his affection to the church so notorious, that he never deserted it.

Clarendon.

All the precepts of christianity command us to moderate our passions, to temper our affections towards all things below.

Temple.

Let not the mind of a student be under the influence of warm affection to things of sense, when he comes to the search of truth.

Watts, Imp. of the Mind.

5. State of the mind, in general.

There grows,

In my most ill compos'd affection, such

A stomachless avarice, that, were I king,

I should cut off the nobles for their lands.

Shakspeare, Macb.

The man that hath no music in himself,

Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,

Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils;

The motions of his spirit are dull as night,

And his affections dark as Erebus:

Let no such man be trusted.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

6. Quality; property.

The certainty and accurateness which is attributed to what mathematicians deliver, must be restrained to what they teach, concerning those purely mathematical disciplines, arithmetic and geometry, where the affections of quantity are abstractedly considered.

The mouth being necessary to conduct the voice to the shape of its cavity, necessarily gives the voice some particular affection of sound in its passage before it come to the lips.

Holder, Elements of Speech.

God may have joined immaterial souls to other kinds of bodies, and in other laws of union; and, from those different laws of union, there will arise quite different affections, and natures, and species of the compound beings.

Bentley, Scru.

7. State of the body, as acted upon by any cause.

It seemed to me a venereal gonorrhoea, and others thought it arose from some scorbulous affection.

Wiermann's Surgery.

8. Lively representation in painting.

Affection is the lively representation of any passion whatsoever, as if the figures stood not upon a cloth or board, but as if they were acting upon a stage.

Wotton's Architecture.

9. It is used by Shakspeare sometimes for affection.

There was nothing in it that could indict the author of affection.

Shakspeare.

AFFECTIONATE. adj. [affectionné, Fr. from affection.]

1. Full of affection; strongly moved; warm; zealous.

In their love of God, and desire to please him, men can never be too affectionate; and it is as true, that in their hatred of sin, men may be sometimes too passionate.

Spratt's Sermon.

2. Strongly inclined to; disposed to; with the particle to.

As for the parliament, it presently took fire, being affectionate, of old, to the war of France.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

3. Fond; tender.

He found me sitting, beholding this picture, I know not with how affectionate countenance, but, I am sure, with a most affectionate mind.

Sidney.

Away they fly
Affectionate, and undesiring bear
The most delicious morsel to their young.

Thomson, Spring.

4. Benevolent; tender.

When we reflect on all this affectionate care of Providence for our happiness, with what wonder must we observe the little effect it has on men.

Rogers, Sermon.

AFFECTIONATELY. adv. [from affectionate.] In an affectionate manner; fondly; tenderly; benevolently; zealously.

Being affectionately desirous of you.

1 Thess. ii. 8.

He so affectionately loved her.

Hakewill, Apology, p. 341.

To pray by the spirit, signifies neither more nor less, but to pray knowingly, heartily, and affectionately, for such things, and in such a manner, as the Holy Ghost in Scripture either commands or allows of.

South, Sermon, ii. 110.

What can be more perfective of the light of nature than to have those great motives of religion, the rewards and punishments of a future state, which nature only obscurely points at, described to us most plainly, affectionately, and lively?

Clarke on Nat. and Revel. Religion.

AFFECTIONATENESS. n. s. [from affectionate.] The quality or state of being affectionate; fondness; tenderness; good-will; benevolence.

AFFECTIONED. adj. [from affection.]

1. Affected; conceited. This sense is now obsolete.

An affected ass that cons state without book, and utter it by great swaths.

Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

2. Inclined; mentally disposed.

Be kindly affectioned one to another.

Rom. xii. 10.

In this example from the New Testament, the word is, in some copies, affectionated.

"Be kindly affectionated one to another."

New Test. Cambridge, 4to. 1683.

In your last, which might have been your best piece of service to the state, affectioned to follow that old rule which giveth justice leaden heels and iron hands, you used too many delays, till the delinquent's hands were loosed and your's bound.

Bacon to Coke, Cobham.

AFFECTUOUSLY. adv. [from affect.] In an affecting manner.

Dict.

AFFECTIVE. adj. [from affect.] That which affects; that which strongly touches. It is generally used for painful.

He was a judicious and grave preacher, more instructive than affective.

Burnet, Hist. of his own Times, 1686.

By affective meditations to view, as re-acted, the tragedy of this day [Good Friday.]

Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 525.

Make use of these affective devotions, daily, diligently, and perseverantly; and you shall soon perceive a happy and heavenly change in your souls.

Spiritual Conquest, 2d part, (1651,) Pref.

Pain is so uneasy a sentiment, that very little of it is enough to corrupt every enjoyment: and the effect God intends this variety of ungrateful and affecting sentiments should have on us, is to reclaim our affections from this valley of tears.

Rogers.

AFFECTIVELY. adv. In an impressive manner.

AFFECTOR. n. s. [Fr. affectateur, an affector.] One

AFFECTER. n. s. that (curiously) imitates a fashion, or takes on him a habit, which either becomes or befits him not.

Chapman.

The people are valiant and reasonably civil, affectors of novelties.

Sir T. Herbert's Tracts, p. 373.

The Jesuits, affectors of superiority, and disgracers of all that refuse to depend upon them.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

I beheld your danger like a lover,

A just affecter of thy faith.

Ben Jonson, and Fl. Bonduca, iii. 2.

These [expressions], weak persons are apt to mistake, and put disputants to pervert, and unlearned or unfair affectors of wit and free thought, to ridicule.

Abp. Secker, Sermon, iv. 321.

In a former scene, Malvolio was said to be an affecter of puritanism.

Steevens, on Twelfth Night.

AFFECTUOSITY. n. s. [Low Lat. affectuositas.]

Passionateness.

AFFECTUOUS. adj. [affectuarius, old Fr. desirous of, full of, affection; hearty; in which sense of heartily or earnestly the obsolete adverb affectuously is used in Fabian's Chronicle.] Full of passion; as, an affectuous speech; a word little used.

To locke up the gates of true knowledge from them that affectuously seeketh it to the glory of God, is a property belonging only to the hypocritical Pharisees and false lawyers.

Calverley, New Year's Gift, sign. E. 2. b.

To AFFERE. v. a. [affere, Fr.] A law term, signifying to confirm. See To AFFEAR. It was also used, like the substantive affior, "to affere a fine or amercement in a court."

Induct.

AFFEORS. n. s. [from affior.] Such as are appointed in court-leet, &c. upon oath, to mulct such as have committed faults arbitrarily punishable, and have no express penalty set down by statute.

Cox's.

AFFETUOSO. n. s. [Ital. affetto.] A term in musick, denoting the strain to be sung or played tenderly: used by us adverbially.

AFFIANCE. n. s. [affiance, from affier, Fr.]

1. A marriage-contract.

At last such grace I found, and thus I wrought,
That I that only to my spouse had sworn,
Accord of friends, consent of parents sought,
Affiance made, my happiness began.

Spenser, F. Q. b. ii.

2. Trust in general; confidence; secure reliance.

The duke is virtuous, mild, and too well given
To dream on evil, or to work my downfall.—
— Ah! what's more dangerous than this fond affiance?
Seems he a dove? his feathers are but borrowed.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

3. Trust in the divine promises and protection. To this sense it is now almost confined.

Religion receives a man into a covenant of grace, where there is pardon reached out to all truly penitent sinners, and assistance promised, and engaged, and bestowed upon very easy conditions, viz. humility, prayer, and affiance in him.

Hammond, Fund.

There can be no surer way to success, than by disclaiming all confidence in ourselves, and referring the events of things to God with an implicit affiance.

Atterbury, Sermon.

TO AFFIANCE, v. a. [from the noun affiance.]

1. To betroth; to bind any one by promise to marriage.

To me, sad maid, or rather widow sad,

He was affianced long time before,

And sacred pledges he both gave and had;

False, errant knight, infamous, and foreswore. Spenser, F. Q.

Her should Angelo have married; was affianced to her by oath, and the nuptial appointed; between which time of the contract, and limit of the solemnity, his brother was wrecked, having, in that vessel, the dowry of his sister.

Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

2. To give confidence.

Stranger! whoe'er thou art, securely rest,

Affianced in my faith, a friendly guest.

Pope, Odys.

AFFIANCER, n. s. [from affiance.] He that makes a contract of marriage between two parties. Dict.

AFFIDA'TION. { n. s. [from affido, Lat. See AFFIED.]
AFFIDA'TURE. { Mutual contract; mutual oath of fidelity. Dict.

AFFIDA'VIT. † n. s. [affidavit signifies, in the language of the common law, he made oath. It is the low Lat. affidavit, pret. of affido, ad fidem dare.] A declaration upon oath.

You said, if I return'd next 'size in Lent,

I should be in remitter of your grace;

In th' interim my letters should take place

Of affidavits.

Donne.

Count Rechteren should have made affidavit, that his servants had been affronted, and then Monsieur Mesnager would have done him justice.

Spectator, No. 481.

AFFIED. part. adj. [from the verb affij, derived from affido, Lat. Bracton using the phrase affidare mulieres.] Joined by contract; affianced.

Be we affied, and such assurance ta'en,

As shall with either part's agreement stand.

Shakspeare.

TO AFFI'LE. * v. a. [Fr. and Dan. affiler.] To polish.

A word of frequent occurrence in Gower and Chaucer, for which we now use file.

He must preche and well afile his tongue.

Prol. Canterb. Tales, 714.

AFFILIA'TION. † n. s. [Fr. affiliation, Lat. ad and filius.] Adoption; the act of taking a son. Cotgrave.

AFFINAGE. n. s. [affinage, Fr.] The act of refining metals by the cupel. Dict.

AFFI'NED. † adj. [from affinis, Lat.] Joined by affinity to another; related to another.

If partially affin'd, or leagu'd in office,

Thou dost deliver more or less than truth,

Thou art no soldier.

Shakspeare, Othello.

In the preceding instance, Mr. Steevens contends that affined means "related by nearness of office;" but that, in another part of the same play, it is used agreeably to Dr. Johnson's definition.

Whether I, in any just term, am affin'd

To love the Moor.

Othello, i. 1.

AFFINITY. n. s. [affinite, Fr. from affinis, Lat.]

1. Relation by marriage; relation contracted by the husband to the kindred of the wife, and by the wife to those of the husband. It is opposed to consanguinity, or relation by birth. In this sense it has sometimes the particle with, and sometimes to, before the person to whom the relation is contracted.

They had left none alive, by the blindness of rage killing many guiltless persons, either for affinity to the tyrant, or enmity to the tyrant-killers.

Sidney, b. ii.

And Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter.

1 Kings, iii. i.

A breach was made with France itself, notwithstanding so strait an affinity, so lately accomplished; as if indeed (according to that pleasant maxim of state) kingdoms were never married.

Wotton.

2. Relation to; connexion with; resemblance to: spoken of things.

The British tongue, Welsh, was in use only in this island, having great affinity with the old Gallick.

Camden.

All things that have affinity with the heavens, move upon the centre of another, which they benefit.

Bacon, Ess. xxiv.

The art of painting hath wonderful affinity with that of poetry.

Dryden, Dufres. Pref.

Man is more distinguished by devotion than by reason, as several brute creatures discover something like reason, though they betray not any thing that bears the least affinity to devotion.

Addison, Spect. No. 201.

TO AFFIRM. v. n. [affirmo, Lat.] To declare; to tell confidently; opposed to the word deny.

Yet their own authors faithfully affirm,

That the land Salike lies in Germany,

Between the floods of Sala and of Elbe. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

TO AFFIRM. † v. a.

1. To declare positively; as, to affirm a fact.

Whom Paul affirmed to be alive.

Acts, xxv. 19.

2. To ratify or approve a former law, or judgement: opposed to reverse or repeal.

The house of peers hath a power of judicature in some cases, properly to examine, and then to affirm; or, if there be cause, to reverse the judgments which have been given in the court of king's bench.

Bacon, Advice to Sir George Villiers.

In this sense we say, to affirm the truth.

AFFIRMABLE. adj. [from affirm.] That which may be affirmed.

Those attributes and conceptions that were applicable and affirmable of him when present, are now affirmable and applicable to him though past.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

AFFIRMABLY. * adv. In a way capable of affirmation.

AFFIRMANCE. † n. s. [from affirm.]

1. Confirmation; opposed to repeal.

This statute did but restore an ancient statute, which was itself also made but in affirmance of the common law.

Bacon.

2. Confirmation, simply; declaration.

This exactly continues all fitness with what is before affirmed of that kind of music; twixt which (and all other by authentication) and the mind's affections there are certain imitations.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. 6.

AFFIRMANT. n. s. [from affirm.] The person that affirms; a declarer. Dict.

AFFIRMA'TION. n. s. [affirmatio, Lat.]

1. The act of affirming or declaring: opposed to negation or denial.

This gentleman vouches, upon warrant of bloody affirmation, his to be more virtuous, and less attemptable, than any of our ladies.

Shakspeare, Cymb.

2. The position affirmed.

That he shall receive no benefit from Christ, is the affirmation, whereon his despair is founded; and one way of removing this dismal apprehension, is, to convince him, that Christ's death, if he perform the condition required, shall certainly belong to him.

Hammond, Fund.

3. Confirmation: opposed to repeal.

The learned in the laws of our land observe, that our statutes sometimes, are only the affirmation, or ratification, of that which, by common law, was held before.

Hooker

AFFIRMATIVE. adj. [from affirm.]

1. That which affirms, opposed to negative; in which sense we use the affirmative, absolutely, that is, the affirmative position.

For the affirmative, we are now to answer such proofs of theirs as have been before alleged. Hooker.

Whether there are such beings or not, 'tis sufficient for my purpose, that many have believed the affirmative. Dryden.

That which can or may be affirmed: a sense chiefly used in science.

As in algebra, where affirmative quantities vanish or cease, there negative ones begin: so in mechanicks, where attraction ceases, there a repulsive virtue ought to succeed. Newton, Opt.

3. Applied to persons; he who has the habit of affirming with vehemence; positive; dogmatical.

Be not confident and affirmative in an uncertain matter, but report things modestly and temperately, according to the degree of that persuasion, which is, or ought to be, begotten by the efficacy of the authority, or the reason, inducing thee. Taylor.

AFFIRMATIVE.* n. s. That which contains an affirmation.

The affirmatives are indemonstrable.

This is such a bold affirmative of the church of Rome, that nothing can suffice to rescue us from an amazement in the consideration of it. Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, § 6.

AFFIRMATIVELY.† adv. [from affirmative.] In an affirmative manner; on the positive side; not negatively.

The reason of man hath no such restraint: concluding not only affirmatively, but negatively; not only affirming there is no magnitude beyond the last heavens, but also denying, there is any vacuity within them. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I believe in God. First, in God affirmatively, I believe he is; against atheism. Secondly, in God exclusively, not in gods; against polytheism and idolatry. Pearson on the Creed, Art. I.

AFFIRMER.† n. s. [from affirm.] The person that affirms. A word of excellent authority more than a century before Watts's time, from which author alone Johnson has cited an example.

The burthen of the proof in law resteth upon the affirmer.

Bp. Bramhall, Schism guarded, p. 285.

If by the word virtue, the affirmer intends our whole duty to God and man, and the denier, by the word virtue, means only courage, or at most, our duty toward our neighbour, without including, in the idea of it, the duty which we owe to God. Watts, Logick.

To AFFIX. v. a. [affigo, affixum, Lat.]

1. To unite to the end, or à posteriori; to subjoin.

He that has settled in his mind determined ideas, with names affixed to them, will be able to discern their differences one from another. Locke.

If men constantly affixed applause and disgrace where they ought, the principle of shame would have a very good influence on public conduct; though on secret villainies it lays no restraint. Rogers, Sermon.

2. To connect consequentially.

The doctrine of irresistibility of grace, in working whatever it works, if it be acknowledged, there is nothing to be affixed to gratitude. Hammond, Fund.

3. Simply to fasten or fix. Obsolete.

Her modest eyes, abashed to behold
So many gazers as on her do stare,
Upon the lowly ground affixed are. Spenser.

AFFIX.† n. s. [affixum, Lat.] A term of grammar. Something united to the end of a word.

In the Hebrew language, the noun has its affix, to denote the pronouns possessive or relative. Clarke, Lat. Gram.

The vulgar sort of Jews, neglecting their own maternal tongue the Hebrew, began to speak the Chaldee; but not having the right accent of it, and fashioning that new learned language to their own innovation of points, affixes, and conjugations, out of that intermixture of Hebrew and Chaldee resulted a third language, called to this day the Syriack. Howell, Letters, ii. 60.

AFFIXION.† n. s. [from affix.]

1. The act of affixing.

2. The state of being affixed.

Six several times do we find that Christ shed his blood; in his circumcision, in his agony, in his crowning, in his scourging, in his affixion, in his transfixion. Bp. Hall, Works, ii. 329.

AFFLATION. n. s. [afflo afflatus, Lat.] The act of breathing upon any thing. Dict.

AFFLATUS.† n. s. [Lat.] Communication of the power of prophecy.

The prophets and teachers, in those times, are reckoned as men who exercised those offices by a spiritual afflatus, and were enabled to perform them by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit then vouchsafed to them.

Whitby on the N. Test. Gen. Pref.

The poet writing against his genius will be like a prophet without his afflatus. Spence on the Odyssey.

To AFFLICT.† v. a. [afflicto, afflictum, Lat.]

1. To put to pain; to grieve; to torment.

It teacheth us, how God thought fit to plague and afflict them, it doth not appoint in what form and manner we ought to punish the sin of idolatry in others. Hooker, v. 17.

O coward conscience! how dost thou afflict me?

The lights burn blue—Is it not dead midnight?

Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Give not over thy mind to heaviness, and afflict not thyself in thine own counsel. Eccles. xxx. 21.

A father afflicted with untimely mourning, when he hath made an image of his child soon taken away, now honoured him as a god, which was then a dead man, and delivered to those that where under him, ceremonies and sacrifices. Wisdom.

A melancholy tear afflicts my eye,
And my heart labours with a sudden sigh.

Prior.

2. The passive to be afflicted, has often at before the causal noun; by is likewise proper.

The mother was so afflicted at the loss of a fine boy, who was her only son, that she died for grief of it. Addison, Spect.

3. To break; to overthrow. [Lat. affligo.]

There rest, if any rest can harbour there;

And, re-assembling our afflicted Powers,

Consult how we may henceforth most offend

Our enemy.

Milton, P. L. i. 186.

AFFLICTEDNESS. n. s. [from afflicted.] The state of affliction, or of being afflicted; sorrowfulness; grief.

AFFLICTER.† n. s. [from afflict.] The person that afflicts; a tormentor. Huloet.

AFFLICINGLY.* adv. In an oppressive, afflicting, manner.

AFFLICTION. n. s. [afflictio, Lat.]

1. The cause of pain or sorrow; calamity.

To the flesh, as the Apostle himself granteth, all affliction is naturally grievous: therefore nature, which causeth fear, teacheth to pray against all adversity. Hooker, v. 48.

We'll bring you to one that you have cozened of money;
I think to repay that money will be a biting affliction.

Shakespeare.

2. The state of sorrowfulness; misery: opposed to joy, prosperity.

Besides you know,
Prosperity's the very bond of love,
Whose fresh complexion, and whose heart together
Affliction alters.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale.

Where shall we find the man that bears affliction,

Great and majestic in his griefs, like Cato? Addison, Cato.

Some virtues are only seen in affliction, and some in prosperity. Addison, Spect. No. 257.

AFFLICTIVE.† adj. [from afflict.] That which causes affliction; painful; tormenting.

Another is led, by the spirit of bondage, to slavish fears, and afflictive horrors. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 148.

A F F

They found martyrdom a duty, dressed up indeed with all that was terrible and afflictive to human nature, yet not at all the less a duty. South.

Not can they find
Where to retire themselves, or where appease
Th' afflictive keen desire of food, expos'd
To winds, and storms, and jaws of savage death. Philips.

Restless Proserpine —
— On the spacious land and liquid main,
Spreads slow disease and darts afflictive pain. Prior.

AFFLICTIVELY.* adv. Painfully; in a state of torment.

This the fallen angels understand; who, having acted their first part in heaven, are made sharply miserable by transition, and more afflictively feel the contrary state of hell.

Brown, Christ. Mor. x. 2.

AFFLUENCE. n. s. [affluence, Fr. affluentia, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to any place; concourse. It is almost always used figuratively.

I shall not relate the affluence of young nobles from hence into Spain, after the voice of our prince being there had been noised. Wotton.

2. Exuberance of riches; stream of wealth; plenty.
Those degrees of fortune which give fulness and affluence to one station, may be want and penury in another. Rogers.

Let joy or ease, let affluence or content,
And the gay conscience of a life well spent,
Calm ev'ry thought, inspirit every grace. Pope.

AFFLUENCY. n. s. The same with affluence.

AFFLUENT. adj. [affluent, Fr. affluens, Lat.]

1. Flowing to any part.

These parts are no more than foundation-piles of the ensuing body, which are afterwards to be increased and raised to a greater bulk by the affluent blood, that is transmitted out of the mother's body. Harvey on Consump.

2. Abundant; exuberant; wealthy.
I see thee, Lord and end of my desire,
Loaded and blest with all the affluent store,
Which human vows at smoking shrines implore. Prior.

AFFLUENTLY.* adv. In an affluent manner.

AFFLUENTNESS. n. s. [from affluent.] The quality of being affluent. Dict.

AFFLUX. n. s. [affluxus, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to some place; affluence.

2. That which flows to another place.

The cause hereof cannot be a supply by procreations; ergo it must be by new affluxes to London out of the country. Graunt.

The infant grows bigger out of the womb by agglutinating one afflux of blood to another. Harvey on Consump.

An animal that must lie still, receives the afflux of colder or warmer, clean or foul water, as it happens to come to it. Locke.

AFFLUXION. n. s. [affluxio, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to a particular place.

2. That which flows from one place to another.

An inflammation either simple, consisting of an hot and sanguineous affluxion, or else denominable from other humours, according unto the predominancy of melancholy, phlegm, or choler. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To AFFORD.* v. a. [Fr. afforer, affewer. Low Lat. afforare, from forum.]

1. To yield or produce; as, the soil affords grain; the trees afford fruits. This seems to be the primitive signification.

2. To grant, or confer any thing; generally in a good sense, and sometimes in a bad; but less properly.

So soon as Maurmon there arrived, the door To him did open, and afforded way. Spenser, F. Q.

This is the consolation of all good men, unto whom his ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security; and this is the affliction of hell, to whom it affordeth despair and remediless calamity. Brown, Vulgar Err.

A F F

3. To be able to sell. It is used always with reference to some certain price; as, I can afford this for less than the other.

They fill their magazines in times of the greatest plenty, that so they may afford cheaper, and increase the public revenue at a small expense of its members. Addison on Italy.

4. To be able to bear expences; as, traders can afford more finery in peace than war.

The same errors run through all families, where there is wealth enough to afford that their sons may be good for nothing. Swift on Mod. Edu.

To AFFOREST. v. a. [afforestare, Lat.] To turn ground into forest.

It appeareth, by Charla de Foresta, that he afforested many woods and wastes, to the grievance of the subject, which by that law were disafforested. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

AFFORESTATION. n. s. [from afforest.]

The chafter de Foresta was to reform the encroachments made in the time of Richard I. and Henry II. who had made new afforestations, and much extended the rigour of the forest laws. Hale, Common Law of England.

To AFFRANCHISE. v. a. [affrancher, Fr.] To make free.

AFFRANCHISEMENT.* n. s. Fr. The act of making free.

To AFFRAP.* v. n. [Ital. affrappare, Fr. frapper.] To strike; to make a blow. Not in use now.

They been ymet, both ready to affrap,
When suddenly that warrior gan abase
His threatned speare. Spenser, F. Q. ii. l. 26.

To AFFRA'P.* v. a. To strike down.

I have been trained up in warlike stowre,
To tossen spear and shield, and to affrap
The warlike rider, &c. Ib. iii. ii. 6.

To AFFRAY.* v. a. [effrayer, or effriger, Fr. which Menage derives from fragor; perhaps it comes from frigus.]

1. To fright; to terrify; to strike with fear. This word is not now in use.

The same to wight he never would disclose,
But when as monsters huge he would dismay,
Or daunt unequal armies of his foes,
Or when the flying heavens he would affray. Fairy Queen.

2. To put one in doubt; which sense obtained in the age of queen Elizabeth, as we find in Huloet's Dict. "To affraye one, or put one in doubt: scrupulum homini injicere, incertum facere." This sense might be adopted from Chaucer's substantive:

But yet I am in great affraic
Lest thou shouldest not doe as I saie. Rom. of the Rose, v. 4397.

AFFRAY, or AFFRAYMENT.* n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A tumultuous assault of one or more persons upon others; a law term. A battle: in this sense it is written fray.

2. Tumult, confusion: out of use, Dr. Johnson says; but is certainly used, with good effect, by a great master of our language, nearly a century after Spenser.

Let the night be calm and quiet some,
Without tempestuous storms or sad affray. Spenser.

The unquiet thoughts of the heart arising from ambition, from malice and envy, and desire of revenge, are those which are guilty of the general affrays and bloodsheds of the world.

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 57.

AFFRET.* n. s. [Ital. fretta, speed; affrettare, to hasten. "E comincia a ferir con tanta fretta," Berni. This etymology therefore agrees with the action which the word describes; whereas what Mr. Boucher gives, the Fr. participle fraite, fractus; and what Mr. Mason proposes, "fraitte, old Fr. i. e.

breche;" seem less apposite, and are at least unsatisfactory.] Furious onset; immediate attack.

A trumpet blew; they both together met
• With dreadful force and furious intent,
Careless of peril in their fierce affret. Spenser, F. Q. iv. iii. 6.

AFFRICTION.† n. s. [affriccio, Lat.] The act of rubbing one thing upon another.

I have divers times observed, in wearing silver hilted swords, that, if they rubbed upon my cloaths, if they were of a light-coloured cloth, the affriccio would quickly blacken them; and, congruously hereunto, I have found pens blacked almost all over, when I had a while carried them about me in a silver case.

Boyle.

Every pitiful vice seeks the enlargement of itself by a contagious affriccio of all capable subjects.

Hallywell's Melamp. p. 115.

AFFRI'ENDED.* part. adj. Reconciled; made friends.
A word, which I have met with only in the Fairy Queen.

When she saw that cruell war so ended,
And deadly foes so faithfully affrended,
In lovely wise she gan the lady greet. Spenser, F. Q. iv. iii. 50.

To AFFRI'GHT.† v. a. [Sax. aphyhtan, apoyhtan, to frighten. See also Fright.]

1. To affect with fear; to terrify: it generally implies a sudden impression of fear.

Thy name affrights me, in whose sound is death.
Shakspeare, Henry 1 I.

God-like his courage seem'd, whom nor delight
Could soften, nor the face of death affright. • • Waller.

He, when his country (threaten'd with alarm)
Requires his courage and his conqu'ring Arm,
Shall, more than once, the Punic hands affright. Dryden, Æn.

2. It is used in the passive, sometimes with at before the thing feared.

Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the Lord thy God is among you. Deut. vii. 21.

3. Sometimes with the particle with before the thing feared.

As one affright
With hellish fiends, or furies mad uproar,
He then arose. Fairy Queen, ii. 5.

AFFRI'GHT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Terror; fear. This word is chiefly poetical, Dr. Johnson says; but it is common in our prose-writers also.

As the moon, cloathed with cloudy night,
Does shew to him, that walks in fear and sad affright. F. Q.

Wide was his parish, not contracted close
In streets, but here and there a straggling house;
Yet still he was at hand, without request,
To serve the sick; to succour the distress'd:
Tempting, on foot, alone, without affright,
The dangers of a dark tempestuous night. Dryden, Fob.

The quarrel, which was but the accidental cause, hastened on the discovery of it, in occasioning her affright.

B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

2. The cause of fear; a terrible object; dreadful appearance.

I see the gods
Uphraid our sufferings, and would humble them,
By sending these affrights, while we are here,
That we might laugh at their ridiculous fear. B. Jonson, Catil.

The war at hand appears with more affright,
And rises ev'ry moment to the sight. Dryden, Æneid.

The manner how, as I say, is by rewards, promises, terrors, affrights, punishments. Barton, Anat. Mel. p. 647.

This affright and amazement of the Jews was foreseen by St. Peter and St. Paul. Dr. Harris on Isaiah, liii. p. 178.

Oh the dismal affrights, which the darkness of the night presents to an impious adulterer! Rowley, Hon. of Chastity, p. 25.

AFFRI'GHTEDLY.* adv. Under the impression of fear.

The thunder of their rage, and boisterous struggling, make
The neighbouring forests round affrightedly to quake.

Drayton's Polyolb. S. 12.

AFFRI'GHTER.* n. s. [from affright.] He who frightens.
The famous Don Quixote of the Mancha, the righter of wrongs, the redresser of injuries, the protector of damsels, the affrighter of giants. Shelton's Tr. of D. Quix. i. ii. 25.

AFFRI'GHTFUL.† adj. [from affright.] Full of affright or terror; terrible; dreadful.

These colder climates are rarely infested with such affrightful accidents. Bp. Hall, Sermon. 33.

There is an absence of all that is destructive or affrightful to human nature. The way of Pulp.

AFFRI'GHTMENT.† n. s. [from affright.]

1. The impression of fear; terror.

She awaked with the affrightment of a dream. Wolton.
Passionate words or blows from the tutor, fill the child's mind with terror and affrightment; which immediately takes it wholly up, and leaves no room for other impression. Locke.

2. The state of fearfulness.

Whether those that, under any anguish of mind, return to affrightments or doubtings, have not been hypocrites. Hammond.
A freedom from all superstitious fears and affrightments.

Barrow, Expos. of the Creed.

To AFFRONT. v. a. [affronter, Fr. that is, adfrontem stare; adfrontem contumeliam allidere, to insult a man to his face.]

1. To meet face to face; to encounter. This seems the genuine and original sense of the word, which was formerly indifferent to good or ill.

We have closely sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here affront Ophelia. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

The seditious, the next day, affronted the king's forces at the entrance of a highway; whom when they found both ready and resolute to fight, they desired entertainment. Sir John Hayward.

2. To meet, in an hostile manner, front-to-front.

His holy rites and solemn feasts profan'd,
And with their darkness durst affront his light. Paradise Lost.

3. To offer an open insult; to offend avowedly. With respect to this sense, it is observed by Cervantes, that, if a man strikes another on the back, and then runs away, the person so struck is injured, but not affronted; an affront always implying a justification of the act.

Did not this fatal war affront thy coast,
Yet satterest thou an idle looker on. Fairfax, i. 51.

But harm precedes not sin only our foe,
Tempting affronts us with his foul esteem
Of our integrity. Milton, P. L. b. ix.

I would learn the cause why Tormismond,
Within my palace walls, within my hearing,
Almost within my sight, affronts a prince,
Who shortly shall command him. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

This brings to mind Faustina's fondness for the gladiator, and is interpreted as satire. But how can one imagine, that the Fathers would have dared to affront the wife of Aurelius. Addison.

AFFRONT. n. s. [from the verb affront.]

1. Insult offered to the face; contemptuous or rude treatment: contumely.

He would often maintain Plantianus, in doing affronts to his son. Bacon, Essays.

You've done enough; for you design'd my chains:
The grace is vanish'd, but th' affront remains. Dryden, Aurengzebe.

He that is found reasonable in one thing, is concluded to be so in all; and to think or say otherwise, is thought so unjust an affront, and so senseless a censure, that no body ventures to do it. Locke.

There is nothing which we receive with so much reluctance as advice: we look upon the man who gives it us, as offering an affront to our understanding, and treating us like children or idiots. Addison, Spectator, No. 512.

2. Outrage; act of contempt, in a more general sense.

A F I

- Often have they violated
The temple, oft the law with foul affronts, Abominations rather. Milton, P. R.
3. Open opposition; encounter: a sense not frequent, though regularly deducible from the derivation.
Fearless of danger, like a petty god
I walk'd about admir'd of all, and dreaded
On hostile ground, none daring my affront. Milton, S. A.
4. Disgrace; shame. This sense is rather peculiar to the Scottish dialect.
Antonius attacked the pirates of Crete, and, by his too great presumption, was defeated; upon the sense of which affront he died with grief. Arbuthnot on Coins.
- AFFRO'NTER. † n. s. [old Fr. affronteur.] The person that affronts.
- AFFRO'NTING. part. adj. [from affront.] That which has the quality of affronting; contumelious.
Among words which signify the same principal ideas, some are clean and decent, others unclean; some are kind, others are affronting and reproachful, because of the secondary idea which custom has affixed to them. Watts, Logick.
- AFFR'ONTIVE. * adj. [from affront.] Causing affront.
Ash.
- AFFR'ONTIVENESS. * n. s. The quality that gives affront.
Ash.
- To AFFU'SE. v. a. [affundo, affusum, Lat.] To pour one thing upon another.
I poured acid liquors, to try if they contained any volatile salt or spirit, which would probably have discovered itself, by making an ebullition with the affused liquor. Boyle.
- AFFU'SION. † n. s. [affusio, Lat.] The act of pouring
one thing upon another.
Upon the affusion of a tincture of galls, it immediately became as black as ink. Grew's Museum.
When the Jews baptized their children, in order to circumcision, it seems to have been indifferent with them, whether it was done by immersion or affusion.
Whalley on the Com. Prayer, p. 362.
- To AFFY. † v. a. [affier, Fr. affidare mulierem, Bracton.]
1. To betroth in order to marriage.
Wedded be thou to the hags of hell,
For daring to affy a mighty lord
Unto the daughter of a worthless king. Shakspeare, Henry VI.
2. To bind; to join.
I derogate nothing from that Synod, [of Dort,] nor any particular man in that Synod. For those divines that were there, of our church, the principal of them sometime was my worthy friend and acquaintance; the major part of them were my ancient acquaintance likewise, and one of them brought up with me of a child; so that personal respects rather seem to affie me unto that Synod. Mountagu, Appeal to Caesar, p. 69.
- To AFFY. † v. n. To put confidence in; to put trust in; to confide. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says; and he cites only the example from Titus Andronicus.
Marcus Andronicus, so I do affy
In thy uprightness and integrity,
That I will here dismiss my loving friends. Tit. Andronicus.
It is used, however, both with in and upon.
We affie in your loves and understandings. B. Jonson, Sejanus.
Without which [the divine grace] if any man dispose himself to reading, affying only upon his own wit and understanding, it will be the next way to frustrate and make void both all my pains and his. Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 5.
- AFF'ELD. † adv. [from a and field. See FIELD.]
1. To the field.
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grey fly winds her sultry horn,
Batt'ring our flocks with the fresh dews of night. Milton.
Afield I went, amid the morning dew,
To milk my kine, for so should housewives do. Gay.
2. In the field.

A F O

- In pascod-time, when hound to horn
Gives ear till buck be kill'd,
And little lads with pipes of corn
Sat keeping beasts afeld. Old Ballads, i. 332.
- AFF'RE. * adv. [from a and fire.] On fire; in a state of inflammation.
Ha! treason, wo thee be!
That thus hast sold the privy
Which all wemen most desire:
I woulde that thou were afire! Gower, Conf. Am. b. 1.
This Jason young, the more she gan desire
To look on him; so was she set afire
With his beauty, and his semelnyss.
Lydgate, Fall of Princes, ch. 5.
Powder is ready, and enough to work it,
The match is left afire. Beaumont and Fl. Island Princess, ii. i.
- AFLA'T. adv. [from a and flat. See FLAT.] Level with the ground.
When you would have many new roots of fruit-trees, take a low tree, and bow it, and lay all his branches aflat upon the ground, and cast earth upon them; and every twig will take root. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
- AFLO'AT. † adv. [from a and float. Fr. a-flot. See FLOAT.] Floating; borne up in the water; not sinking: in a figurative sense, with in view; in motion;
not fainting or sinking.
There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures. Shakspeare, Julius Caesar.
Take any passion of the soul of man, while it is predominant and afloat, and, just in the critical height of it, nick it with some lucky or unlucky word, and you may as certainly overrule it to your own purpose, as a spark of fire, falling upon gunpowder, will infallibly blow it up. South, Sermon, ii. 333.
There are generally several hundred loads of timber afloat, for they cut above twenty-five leagues up the river; and other rivers bring in their contributions. Addison, Italy.
My heart, I thank God, is still afloat; my spirits shall not sink with the ship, nor go an inch lower. Howell's Letters, iv. 39.
- AFO'OT. † adv. [from a and foot, or rather of on and foot; and the word is often also written o'foot.]
1. On foot; not on horseback.
He thought it best to return, for that day, to a village not far off; and dispatching his horse in some sort, the next day early, to come afoot thither. Shakspeare.
2. In action; as, a design is afoot.
I pr'ythee, when thou seest that act afoot,
Ev'n with the very comment of thy soul
Observe mine uncle. Shakspeare.
3. In motion.
Of Albany's and Cornwall's pow'rs you heard not—
'Tis said they are afoot. Shakspeare, K. L.
- AFO'RE. † prep. [Sax. at-foran. See BEFORE.]
1. Not behind; as, he held the shield afore: not in use.
2. Before; nearer in place to any thing; as, he stood afore him.
3. Sooner in time.
If your diligence be not speedy, I shall be there afore you.
Shakspeare, K. L.
4. Prior or superiour to.
In this Trinity, none is afore or after another. Athan. Creed.
5. Under the notice of.
Afore God, I speak simply.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, ii. 3.
Should he forswear 't, make all the affidavits
Against it, that he could, afore the bench
And twenty juries, he would be convinc'd.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, v. 4.

A F R

6. In the power of; noting the right of choice.

I commend your resolution, that (notwithstanding all the dangers I laid afore you, in the voice of a night-crow) would yet go on, and be yourself. B. Jonson, Silent Woman, iii. 5.

AFO'RE. † adv. [Sax. æt-foþan, before.]

1. In time foregone or past.

Whoever should make light of any thing afore spoken or written, out of his own house a tree should be taken, and he thereon be hanged. Esdras, vi. 22.

If he never drank wine afore, it will go near to remove his fit. Shakspeare, Tempest.

2. First in the way.

Æmilia, run you to the citadel,
And tell my lord and lady what hath hap'd;
Will you go on afore? Shakspeare, Othello.

3. In front; in the fore-part.

Approaching nigh, he reared high afore
His body monstrous, horrible and vast. Spenser, F. Q.

4. Rather than.

KEEP. Afore I'll
Endure the tyranny of such a tongue,
And such a pride. POL. What will you do?
KEEP. Tell truth. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

AFO'REGOING. † part. adj. [from afore and going.]
Going before.

All other nouns ending in lis do follow the general rule aforegoing. Lilly's Grammar.

AFO'REHAND. adv. [from afore and hand.]

1. By a previous provision.

Many of the particular subjects of discourse are occasional, and such as cannot aforehand be reduced to any certain account. Government of the Tongue.

2. Provided; prepared; previously fitted.

For it will be said, that in the former times, whereof we have spoken, Spain was not so mighty, as now it is; and England, on the other side, was more aforehand in all matters of power.

Bacon, Considerations on War with Spain.

AFO'REMENTIONED. adj. [from afore and mentioned.]
Mentioned before.

Among the nine other parts, five are not in a condition to give alms or relief to those aforementioned; being very near reduced themselves to the same miserable condition. Addison.

AFO'RENAMED. adj. [from afore and named.] Named before.

Imitate something of circular form, in which, as in all other aforenamed proportions, you shall help yourself by the diameter. Peacham on Drawing.

AFO'RESAID. adj. [from afore and said.] Said before.
It need not go for repetition, if we resume again that which we said in the aforesaid experiment. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 771.

AFO'RETIME. adv. [from afore and time.] In time past.
O thou that art waxen old in wickedness, now thy sins which thou hast committed aforetime, are come to light. Susanna.

AFRA'ID. † part. adj. [from the verb affray; it should therefore properly be written with ff. In our old language it is written afreyed. Sax. afryht, afopht.]

1. Struck with fear; terrified; fearful.

So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Psalms lxxxiii. 15.

2. It has the particle of before the object of fear.

There, loathing life, and yet of death afraid,
In anguish of her spirit, thus she pray'd. Dryden, Fables.
If, while this wearied flesh draws fleeting breath,
Not satisfy'd with life, afraid of death,
It haply be thy will, that I should know
Glimpse of delight, or pause from anxious woe;
From now, from instant now, great Sire, dispel
The clouds that press my soul. Prior.

AFRESH. † adv. [from Sax. afreþean, to freshen.
See also FRESH.] Anew; after intermission.

A F T

The Germans serving upon great horses, and charged with heavy armour, received great hurt by light skirmishes; the Turks, with their light horses, easily shunning their charge and again, at their pleasure, charging them afresh, when they saw the heavy horses almost weary. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.
When once we have attained these ideas, they may be excited afresh by the use of words. Watts, Logick.

A'FRICAN. * adj. Belonging to Africa.

Though their hair, after the African mode, be woolly and crisp; nevertheless, by way of dress, some shave all their skull, some half, other some leave a tuft a-top.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 16.

A'FRICAN. † n. s.

1. A native of Africa.

Sir, you may thank yourself for this great loss;
That would not bless our Europe with your daughter,
But rather lose her to an African. Shakspeare, Tempest, ii. 1.

2. A kind of marigold.

A'FRICK. * adj. Belonging to Africa.

Or whom Biserta sent from Africk shore.

Milton, P. L. i. 585.

A'FRICK. * n. s. The country of Africa.

Methinks, our garments are now as fresh as when we put them on first in Africk. Shakspeare, Tempest, ii. 1.
Cato's march through the desert of Africk. Bentley on Free-Thinking, p. 258.

AFRO'NT. † adv. [from a and front.]

1. In front; in direct opposition to the face.

These four came all afront, and mainly thrust at me. Shakspeare, Henry IV. p. i.

2. Simply, in front.

We repos'd us on a green wood-side,
Afront the which a silver stream did glide. Mir. for Mag. p. 651.

AFT. * adv. [Goth. astana, Sax. aftran.] Abaft; astern.
A sea-term: "fore and aft."

AFTER. † prep. [Goth. astaro, Sax. after, after, Su-Goth. after, Iceland. aptur.]

1. Following in place. After is commonly applied to words of motion; as, he came after, and stood behind him. It is opposed to before.

What says lord Warwick, shall we after them? —
— After them! nay, before them, if we can.

Shakspeare, Henry VI.

2. In pursuit of.

After whom is the king of Israel come out? After whom dost thou pursue? After a dead dog, after a flea. 1 Sam. xxiv. 14.

3. Behind. This is not a common use.

Sometimes I placed a third prism after a second, and sometimes also a fourth after a third, by all which the image might be often refracted sideways. Newton, Opticks.

4. Posterjourn in time.

Good after ill, and after pain delight;
Alternate, like the scenes of day and night. Dryden, Fables.
We shall examine the ways of conveyance of the sovereignty of Adam to princes that were to reign after him. Locke.

5. According to.

He that thinketh Spain our over-match, is no good mintman, but takes greatness of kingdoms according to bulk and currency, and not after their intrinsic value. Bacon.

6. In imitation of.

There are, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus, in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design. Addison, Italy.

This allusion is after the oriental manner: thus in the psalms, how frequently, are persons compared to cedars. Pope, Od. notes.

A'FTER. adv.

1. In succeeding time. It is used of time mentioned as succeeding some other. So we cannot say, I shall be happy after, but hereafter; but we say, I was first made miserable by the loss, but was after happier.

A F T

Far be it from me, to justify the cruelties which were at first used towards them, which had their reward soon after. Bacon.

Those who, from the pit of hell
Roaming to seek their prey on earth, dust fix
Their seats long after next the seat of God. Milton, P. L.

2. Following another.

Let go thy hold, when a great wheel runs down a hill, lest it break thy neck with following it; but the great one that goes upward, let him draw thee after. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

AFTER.* n. s. [This is a figurative noun, used perhaps only in poetry.] Succeeding time.
Religion, Providence! an after's tale!

Young, Night Th. 4.

AFTER is compounded with many words, but almost always in its genuine and primitive signification; some, which occurred, will follow, by which others may be explained.

AFTERACCEPTATION. [from after and acceptation.] A sense afterwards, not at first admitted.

'Tis true, some doctors in a scantier space,
I mean, in each apart, contract the place:
Some, who to greater length extend the line,
The church's afteracceptation join.

Dryden, Hind. and Panther.

AFTERACCO'UNT.* n. s. [from after and account.] Future reckoning.

The slavish fears, which the dread of an after-account raises in the minds of those they [the Atheists] call credulous and believing men. Killingbeck, Serm. p. 165.

AFTERACT.* n. s. [from after and act.] An act subsequent to another; an act caused by a prior act.

Afteracts of sobriety. Ld. Berkeley, Hist. Applications, p. 76.

His death is easy, now his guards are gone,
And I can sin but once to seize the throne;
All afteracts are sanctified by power. Dryden, Don Sebastian.

AFTERAGE.* n. s. Posterity. See the next article.

AFTERAGES. n. s. [from after and ages.] Successive times; posterity. "Of this word I have found no singular; but see not why it might not be said, 'This will be done in some afterage.'" Such is Dr. Johnson's reasoning and statement. He had forgotten the first master of the English language.

To afterage thou shalt be writ the man,
That with smooth air could'st humour best our tongue.

Milton, Sonnet to Lawyers.

To take the world in a lower epocha, what afterage could exceed the lust of the Sodomites, the idolatry and tyranny of the Egyptians, the fickle levity of the Grecians?

South, Serm. vii. 294.

For all succeeding time and afterage.

Oldham, Ode on B. Jonson.

Not the whole land, which the Chusites should, or might in future time, conquer; seeing, in afterages, they became lords of many nations. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Nor to philosophers is praise deny'd,
Whose wise instructions afterages guide. Sir J. Denham.

What an opinion will afterages entertain of their religion, who bid fair for a gibbet, to bring in a superstition which their forefathers perished in flames to keep out. Addison.

AFTER ALL. When all has been taken into the view; when there remains nothing more to be added; at last; in fine; in conclusion; upon the whole; at the most.

They have given no good proof in asserting this extravagant principle; for which, after all, they have no ground or colour, but a passage or two of scripture, miserably perverted, in opposition to many express texts. Atterbury, Sermons.

But, after all, if they have any merit, it is to be attributed to some good old authors, whose works I study.

Pope on Pastoral Poetry.

A F T

AFTERAPPLICA'TION.* n. s. An application not made immediately.

From the afterapplication we meet with both of the symbol and character of Pan in the mythologick ages, I have been sometimes tempted to suspect, that the goat, in his case, had, even from the first use of it, a quite other attendant than is here represented. Coventry's Phil. Conv. 4.

AFTERATTACK.* n. s. An attack not made immediately.

Locke afforded no ground for the afterattacks of envy and folly by any fanciful hypothesis. Warburton to Hurd, p. 283.

AFTERBAND.* n. s. [from after and band.] A future band or chain.

If death

Bind us with afterbands, what profits then
Our inward freedom?

Milton, P. L. ix. 671.

AFTERBEARING.* n. s. [from after and bear.] Usual or ordinary product.

The fig-tree denoteth the synagogue and rulers of the Jews, whom God having peculiarly cultivated, singularly blessed, and cherished, he expected from them no ordinary, slow, or customary fructification, but an earliness in good works, a precocious or continued fructification, and was not content with common afterbearing. Sir T. Browne's Tracts, p. 75.

AFTERBIRTH. n. s. [from after and birth.] The membrane in which the birth was involved, which is brought away after; the secundine.

The exorbitances or degenerations, whether from a hurt in labour, or from part of the after-birth left behind, produce such virulent distempers of the blood, as make it cast out a tumour. Wise's Surgery.

AFTERCLAP.† n. s. [from after and clap.] Unexpected events happening after an affair is supposed to be at an end.

For the next morrow's need they closely went,
For fear of afterclaps to prevent. Spenser, Hub. Tale.
It is commonly taken in an ill sense.

Let that man, who can be so far taken and transported with the present pleasing offers of a temptation, as to overlook those dreadful afterclaps which usually bring up the rear of it; let him, I say, take heed, that vengeance does not begin with him in this life, and mark him in the forehead with some fearful unlooked-for disaster. South, Serm. vi. 227.

AFTERCOMER.* n. s. [from after and come.] A successor; one who comes after us.

As neither predecessors nor ourselves can keepe, ywis; nor aftercomers shall observe the same. Turberville's Mantuan.

AFTERCOMFORT.* n. s. [from after and comfort.] Future comfort.

Which may their aftercomforts breed.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

AFTERCONDUCT.* n. s. [from after and conduct.] Subsequent behaviour.

Not to insist here upon the plain fact, which was, that the guards were hired to tell this lie by the chief priests, it will appear from the afterconduct of the chief priests themselves, that they were conscious that the story was false.

Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses of the Res. p. 49.

AFTERCONVICTION.* n. s. [from after and conviction.] Future conviction.

Those first and early aversions to the government, which these shall infuse into the minds of children, will be too strong for the clearest afterconvictions, which can pass upon them when they are men. South, Sermons, v. 46.

AFTERCOST. n. s. [from after and cost.] The latter charges; the expence incurred after the original plan is executed.

You must take care to carry off the land-floods and streams, before you attempt draining; lest your aftercost and labour prove unsuccessful. Mortimer's Husbandry.

AFTERCOURSE.* n. s. [from after and course.] Future course.

A F T

Who would imagine that Diogenes, who in his younger days was a falsifier of money, should in the aftercourse of his life be so great a container of metal. Brown, Christ. Mor. vi. 2.

And if she should, which Heaven forbid,
O'erthrow me, as the siddler did;
What aftercourse have I to take
Gaining losing all I have at stake? Butler, Hudib. iii. 3.

A'FTERCROP. n. s. [from after and crop.] The second crop or harvest of the same year.

Aftercrops I think neither good for the land, nor yet the hay good for the cattle. Mortimer's Husbandry.

A'FTERDAYS. * n. s. [from after and days.] Future days; posterity.

But afterdays, my friend, must do thee right,
And set thy virtues in unenvy'd light.
Congreve to Sir Godfrey Kneller.

A'FTERDINNER. n. s. [from after and dinner.] The hour passing just after dinner, which is generally allowed to indulgence and amusement.

Thou hast nor youth nor age,
But, as it were, an afterdinner's sleep,
Dreaming on both. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

A'FTEREATAGE. * n. s. [from after and eatage.] The afternooth, or aftereatage, are undoubtedly part of the increase of that same year. Burn, Eccl. Law.

A'FTERENDEAVOUR. n. s. [from after and endeavour.] An endeavour made after the first effort or endeavour. There is no reason why the sound of a pipe should leave traces in their brains, which, not first, but by their afterendeavours, should produce the like sounds. Locke.

A'FTERENQUIRY. n. s. [from after and enquiry.] Enquiry made after the fact committed, or after life.

You must either be directed by some that take upon them to know, or to take upon yourself that, which, I am sure, you do not know, or lump the afterenquiry on your peril.

To A'FTEREYE. v. a. [from after and eye.] To keep one in view; to follow in view. This is not in use.

Thou shouldst have made him
As little as a crow, or less, ere left
To aftereye him. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

A'FERGAME. n. s. [from after and game.] The scheme which may be laid, or the expedients which are practised after the original design has miscarried; methods taken after the first turn of affairs.

This earl, like certain vegetables, did bud and open slowly; nature sometimes delighting to play an aftergame, as well as fortune, which had both their turns and tides in course. Walton.

The fables of the ax-handle and the wedge, serve to precaution us not to put ourselves needlessly upon an aftergame, but to weigh before hand what we say and do. L'Estrange's Lib.

Our first design, my friend, has proved abortive;
Still there remains an aftergame to play. Addison, Cato.

A'FERGATHERING. * n. s. [from after and gather.] I have not reaped so great a harvest, nor gathered so plentiful a vintage out of their works and writings, but that many gleanings and aftergatherings remain behind for such as have more idle hours than myself. World of Wonders, i. 9.

A'FERHELP. * n. s. [from after and help.] For other afterhelps, the want of intention in the priest may frustrate the mass of the prerogative of virtue. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

A'FERHOPE. * n. s. [from after and hope.] Future hope.

A splendid sun shall never set,
But here shine fixed, to affright
All afterhopes of following night. B. Jonson, Entertainment.

A'FERHOURS. n. s. [from after and hours.] The hours that succeed.

A F T

So smile the heav'ns upon this holy act,
That afterhours with sorrow chide us not.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.
A'FERIGNORANCE. * n. s. [from after and ignorance.] Subsequent ignorance.

She bade my soul consider, how many rude souls there were, whose afterignorance makes them almost unworthy of their first infusion. Stafford's Niobe, ii. 3.

A'FERKINGS. * n. s. [from after and kings.] Succeeding kings.

The glory of Nineveh, and the increase of the empire, was the work of afterkings. Shuckford's Sac. and Prof. Hist. i. 199.

A'FERLIFE. * n. s. [from after and life.] 1. The remainder of life.

All of a tenor was their afterlife,
No day discolour'd with domestick strife.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc. ver. 2424.

Fairly, in full maturity of time,
And we two be reserv'd to afterlife,
Will you confer your widowhood on me?
Heywood's Eng. Traveller.

2. A life after this. — Like the Tartars, give them wives
• With settlements for afterlives. Butler's Remains.

A'FERLIVER. n. s. [from after and live.] He that lives in succeeding times.

By thee my promise sent Unto myself, let afterlivers know. Sidney, b. ii.

A'FERLIVING. * n. s. [from after and living.] Future days.

I have some speech with you,
That may concern your afterliving well.
Beaumont and Fl. Mait's Tragedy, iii. 1.

A'FERLOVE. n. s. [from after and love.] The second or later love.

Intended, or committed, was this fault?
If but the first, how heinous ere it be,
To win thee after-love, I pardon thee. Shakspeare, Rich. II.

A'FERMALICE. * n. s. [from after and malice.] That bloody statute chiefly was design'd
For chauncleer the white, of clergy kind;
But aftermalice did not long forget
The lay that wore the robe and coronet.
Dryden, Hind. and Panther.

A'FERMATH. † n. s. [from after and math, from mow.] The latter math; the second crop of grass mown in autumn. See A'FERCROP.

After one crop of corn is taken off the ground in harvest before seed-time is come, for winter-grain, the grass will be so high grown, that a man may cut it down, and have a plentiful aftermath for hay. Holland's Transl. of Pliny, i. 506.

A'FERMEETING. * n. s. [from after and meet.] A meeting subsequent to business that had been proposed.

Having determin'd of the Volces, and
To send for Titus Lartius, it remains
As the main point of this our aftermeeting,
To gratify his noble service, that
Hath thus stood for his country. Shakspeare, Coriol. ii. 2.

A'FERMOST. * adj. [This word is noticed by Mr. Mason as being in no vocabulary, and therefore perhaps only nautical. This is probable; astward being also a nautical term for the hinder part of a ship.] Hindmost.

I ordered the two foremost and two aftermost guns to be thrown overboard. Hawkesworth's Voyages.

A'FERNOON. * n. s. [from after and noon.] The time from the meridian to the evening.

A beauty-waning and distressed widow,
Even in the afternoon of her best days,
Made prize and purchase of his wanton eye.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

A F T

However, keep the lively taste you hold
Of God; and love him now, but fear him more;
And, in your afternoons, thing what you told
And promis'd him at morning-prayer before.

Donne.

Such, all the morning, to the pleadings run;
But when the business of the day is done,
On dice, and drink, and drabs, they spend the afternoon.

Dryden, Persius, Sat. 1.

A'FTERNOURISHMENT.* n. s. [from after and nourish.] Future nourishment.

The passions of the mind,
That have their first conception by misread,
Have afternourishment and life by care.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre, i. ii.

A'FTERPAINS. n. s. [from after and pain.] The pains after birth, by which women are delivered of the secundine.

A'FTERTPART. n. s. [from after and part.] The latter part.

The flexibility of the former part of a man's age, not yet grown up to be headstrong, make it more governable and safe; and, in the afterpart, reason and foresight begin a little to take place, and mind a man of his safety and improvement. Locke.

A'FTERPIECE.* n. s. [from after and piece.] A farce, or any smaller entertainment, after the play; as we say, "such a play of five acts should be reduced to an after-piece."

Eight and twenty nights it [the West Indian] went without the buttress of an afterpiece. Mem. of R. Cumberland, i. 296.

A'FTERPROOF. n. s. [from after and proof.]

1. Evidence posterior to the thing in question.

2. Qualities known by subsequent experience.

All know, that he likewise at first was much under the expectation of his afterproof: such a solar influence there is in the solar aspect. Wotton.

A'FTERRECKONING.* n. s. [from after and reckoning.]

An account to be given hereafter.

In intellectual delights and entertainments, wherein a man may be merry and wise together, and so have no fear of an afterreckoning to pall the present enjoyment, and especially in such pleasures as come in upon the account of religion, they afford a still and sedate delight. Goodman, Wint. Ev. Com. iii.

He that will set himself out of the power of his own actions, and prevent all afterreckonings, had need be very cautious how he makes a compliment of his conscience.

Ambrose Philips's Life of Abp. Williams, p. 33.

In parliament the power of obtaining their object is absolute; and the safety of the proceeding perfect; no rules to confine, no afterreckonings to tergify. Burke, Works, ii. 291.

A'FTERREPENTANCE.* n. s. [from after and repentance.] Future repentance.

Presuming upon impunity, through the interposals of an afterrepentance. South, Sermon ix. 163.

A'FTERREPORT.* n. s. [from after and report.] Subsequent information or report.

Is it of any moment, whether the soul of man comes into the world with carnal notions, or whether it comes bare, and receives all from the afterreports of sense?

South, Sermon ix. 269.

A'FTERROTTENNESS.* n. s. Future rottenness.

Palliated remedies, such as, by skinning over her [the church of England's] wounds for the present, (though probably not so much as that neither,) will be sure to cure them into an afterrottenness and suppuration. South, Sermon vi. 39.

A'FTERSTATE.* n. s. [from after and state.] The future state.

To give an account of the afterstate of the more degenerate and yet descending souls, some fancy a very odd hypothesis.

Glanville, Pre-existence of Souls, ch. 14.

A'FTERTING.* n. s. [from after and sting.] Subsequent sting.

A F T

Mix'd are our joys, and transient are their date;
Nor can reflection bring them back again,
Yet brings an aftersting to every pain.

Ld. Hervey's Epistles.

A'FTERSTORM.* n. s. [from after and storm.] Future storm; unexpected storm.

Your calmness does not afterstorms provide,
Nor seeming patience mortal anger hide.

Dryden, Cor. of K. Ch. 91.

A'FTERSUPPER.* n. s. The time between supper and going to bed.

To wear away this long age of three hours
Between our aftersupper and bed-time.

Shakespeare, Midw. N. Dr. v. i.

A'FTERTASTE. n. s. [from after and taste.] A taste remaining upon the tongue after the draught, which was not perceived in the act of drinking.

A'FTERTHOUGHT. n. s. [from after and thought.] Reflections after the act; expedients formed too late. It is not properly to be used for second-thought.

Expence, and afterthought, and idle care.
And doubts of motley hue, and dark despair;
Suspicious, and fantastical surmise,
And jealousy suffus'd with jaundice in her eyes,
Discolouring all she view'd, in tawny dress'd,
Downlook'd, and with a cuckow on her fist. Dryden, Fables.

A'FTERTIME.* n. s. [from after and time.] Of this noun in the singular number, Dr. Johnson has given no example.] Succeeding time.

His first schooling was at the Charter-house for two or three years, when his greatest recreation was in such sports as brought on fighting among the boys; in his aftertime a very great courage remained.

Hill's Life of Barrow, prefixed to Barrow's Works.

You promis'd once, a progeny divine
Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
In after-times should hold the world in awe,
And to the land and ocean give the law. Dryden, Virgil.

A'FTERTOSSING. n. s. [from after and toss.] The motion of the sea after a storm.

Confusions and tumults are only the impotent remains of an unnatural rebellion, and are no more than the aftertossings of a sea, when the storm is laid. Addison, Freeholder.

A'FTERUNDERTAKER.* n. s. [from after and undertake.] Succeeding undertaker.

According to their model, all after-undertakers are to build.

Dryden, Pref. to Alb.

A'FTERWARD.* adv. [Sax. æfterweard.] In succeeding time; sometimes written afterwards, but less properly.

Uses not thought upon before, may afterward spring up and be reasonable causes of retaining that, which former considerations did formerly procure to be instituted. Hooker.

An anxious distrust of the divine goodness, makes a man more and more unworthy of it; and miserable beforehand, for fear of being so afterward. L'Estrange.

A'FTERWISE.* adj. Wise too late; wise, after the event.

These are such as we may call the afterwise, who, when any project fails, foresaw all the inconveniences that would arise from it, though they kept their thoughts to themselves. Addison.

A'FTERWIT. n. s. [from after and wit.] The contrivance of expedients after the occasion of using them is past. See AFTERTHOUGHT.

There is no recalling of what's gone and past; so that after-wit comes too late, when the mischief is done. L'Estrange.

A'FTERWITNESS.* n. s. [from after and witness.] Future witness.

Of't have I writ, and often to the flame,
Condemn'd this after-witness of my shame.

Ld. Hervey's Epistles.

AFTERWRATH. n. s. [from after and wrath.] Anger when the provocation seems past.

I hear him mock

The luck of Cæsar, which the gods give men

T' excuse their afterwrath.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

AFTERWRITERS.* n. s. Successive writers.

Afterwriters have taken the word from the fathers.

Life of Mede prefixed to his Works, xlix.

Lives, at first, or at least short memoirs of them had been written in a plain and simple manner; but after-writers embellished the account given of them, by adding to them various fictions.

Shuckford's Sac. and Prof. Hist. i. 213.

AFTWARD.* See AFTERMOST.

AGA. n. s. The title of a Turkish military officer in chief.

AGA'IN. adv. [Sax. agen, on-gean.]

1. A second time; once more; marking the repetition of the same thing.

The poor remnant of human seed, which remained in their mountains, peopled their country again slowly, by little and little.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

Should Nature's self invade the world again,

And o'er the centre spread the liquid main,

The pow'r were safe.

Waller.

Go now, deluded man, and seek again

New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.

Dryden, An.

Some are already retired into foreign countries; and the rest, who possess lands, are determined never to hazard them again, for the sake of establishing their superstition.

Swift.

2. On the other hand; marking some opposition or contrariety.

His wit increased upon the occasion; and so much the more, if the occasion were sharpened with danger. Again, whether it were the shortness of his foresight, or the strength of his will, certain it is, that the perpetual trouble of his fortunes could not have been without defects in his nature.

Bacon.

Those things that we know not what to do withal, if we had them, and those things, again, which another cannot part with, but to his own loss and shame.

L'Estrange, Fab.

3. On another part; marking a transition to some new consideration.

Behold yon mountain's hoary height,

Made higher with new mounts of snow;

Again, behold the winter's weight

Oppress the lab'ring woods below.

Dryden.

4. In return, noting re-action, or reciprocal action; as, His fortune worked upon his nature, and his nature again upon his fortune.

5. Back; in restitution.

When your head did but ache,

I knit my handkerchief about your brows;

The best I had, a princess wrought it me,

And I did never ask it you again.

Shakspeare, K. John.

6. In return for any thing; in recompence.

That he hath given will he pay again.

Prov. xix. 27.

7. In order of rank or succession; marking distribution.

Question was asked of Demosthenes, What was the chief part of an orator? He answered, Action. What next? Action. What next, again? Action.

Bacon, Essays.

The cause of the holding green, is the close and compact substance of their leaves, and the pedicles of them; and the cause of that again is either the tough and viscid juice of the plant, or the strength and heat thereof.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

8. Besides; in any other time or place.

They have the Walloons, who are tall soldiers; yet that is but a spot of ground. But, on the other side, there is not in the world again such a spring and seminary of brave military people, as in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Bacon.

9. Twice as much; marking the same quantity once repeated.

There are whom heav'n has blest with store of wit,

Yet want as much again to manage it;

For wit and judgment ever are at strife,

Tho' meant each other's aid like man and wife.

Pope.

I should not be sorry to see a chorus on a theatre, more than as large and as deep again as ours, built and adorned at a king's charges.

Dryden, Duffresnoy.

10. Again and again; with frequent repetition; often.

This is not to be obtained by one or two hasty readings; it must be repeated again and again, with a close attention to the tenour of the discourse.

Locke.

11. In opposition; by way of resistance.

Who art thou that answerest again?

Rom. ix. 20.

12. Back; as, returning from some message.

Bring us word again which way we shall go.

Deut. i. 22.

The third day he rose again from the dead.

The Apostles' Creed.

13. In answer.

All Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang again.

1 Sam. iv. 5.

AGA'INST. prep. [ængeon, ongeond, Sax.]

1. In opposition to any person.

And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him.

Gen. xvi. 12.

2. Contrary; opposite in general.

That authority of men should prevail with men either against or above reason, is no part of our belief.

Hobbes.

He is melancholy without cause, and merry against the hair.

Shakspeare, Troilus and Cressida.

We might work any effect without and against matter; and this not helped by the co-operation of angels or spirits, but only by the unity and harmony of nature.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The preventing goodness of God does even wrest him from himself, and save him, as it were, against his will.

South.

The god, uneasy till he slept again,

Resolv'd, at once, to rid himself of pain;

And, tho' against his custom, call'd aloud.

Dryden.

Men often say a thing is against their conscience, when really it is not.

Swift, Miscell.

3. In contradiction to any opinion.

After all that can be said against a thing, this will still be true, that many things possibly are, which we know not of; and that many more things may be than are; and also, after all our arguments against a thing, it will be uncertain whether it be or not.

Tillotson.

The church-clergy have written the best collection of tracts against popery, that ever appeared in England.

Swift.

4. With contrary motion or tendency; used of material action.

Boils and plagues

Plaister you o'er, that one infect another

Against the wind a mile.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

The kite being a bird of prey, and therefore hot, delighteth in the fresh air; and many times flieth against the wind, as trouts and salmon swim against the stream.

Bacon.

5. Contrary to rule or law.

I fought against my life

Thy country sought of thee, it sought unjustly,

Against the law of nature, law of nations.

Milton.

Against the public sanctions of the peace.

Against all omens of their ill success;

With fates averse, the rout in arms resort,

To force their monarch, and beset the court.

Dryden.

6. Opposite to, in place.

Against the Tiber's mouth, but far away.

Dryden.

7. To the hurt of another. See sense 5.

And when thou think'st of her eternity,

Think not that death against her nature is;

Think it a birth: and when thou go'st to die,

Sing like a swan, as if thou went'st to bliss.

Sir J. Davies.

8. In provision for; in expectation of.

This mode of speaking probably had its original from the idea of making provision against, or in opposition to a time of misfortune, but by degrees acquired a neutral sense. It sometimes has the case elliptically suppressed, as, against he comes, that is, against the time when he comes.

Thence she them brought into a stately hall,
Wherein were many tables fair, dispo'd,
And ready dishes with drapers' festival,
Against the viands should be ministred. Spenser, F. Q.
The like charge was given them against the time they should come to settle themselves in the land promised unto their fathers. Hooker.

Some say, that ever 'gainst that season comes,
Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
The bird of dawning singeth all night long:
And then they say no spirit walks abroad;
The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,
No fairy tales, no witch hath power to charm;
So hallowed and so gracious is the time. Shakespeare, Haml.

To that purpose, he made haste to Bristol, that all things might be ready against the prince came thither. Clarendon.

Against the promis'd time provides with care,
And hastens in the woof, the robes he was to wear. Dryden.
All which I grant to be reasonably and truly said, and only desire they may be remembered against another day. Stillingfleet.

A'GAINWARD.* adv. [The old expression for again this way, as hitherward.]

And pray'd, as he was turned fro,
He help'd him turn againward tho. Gower, Conf. Am. b. i.

A'GALAXY. n. s. [from α and γᾱλᾱ, Gr.] Want of milk. Dict.

AGA'PE. adv. [from a and gape.] Staring with eagerness; as, a bird gapes for meat.

In himself was all his state;
More solemn than the tedious pomp that waits
On princes, when their rich retinue long
Of horse-led, and grooms besnear'd with gold,
Dazzles the crowd, and sets them all agape. Milton, P. L.
Dazzle the crowd, and set them all agape. Philips.
The whole crowd stood agape, and ready to take the doctor at his word. Spectator, No. 572.

A'GARICK. n. s. [agaricum, Lat.] A drug of use in physick, and the dying trade. It is divided into male and female; the male is used only in dying, the female in medicine: the male grows on oaks,
the female on larches.

There are two excrescences which grow upon trees; both of them in the nature of mushrooms; the one the Romans call boletus, which groweth upon the roots of oaks, and was one of the dainties of their table; the other is medicinal, that is called agarick, which groweth upon the tops of oaks; though it be affirmed by some, that it groweth also at the roots. Bacon.

AGA'ST. † adj. [This word, which is usually, by later authors, written aghost, is, not improbably, the true word derived from agaze, which has been written aghost, from a mistaken etymology. See AGHAST. We have also, in our old language, agasted.] Struck with terour; amazed; frighted to astonishment.

Thus roving on
In confus'd march forlorn, th' advent'rous bands,
With shudd'ring horror pale, and eyes agast,
View'd first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest. Milton, P. L.

My limbs do quake, my thought agasted is.
Mirour for Magistrates, p. 454.

AGA'TE.* adv. [from gail.] A provincialism. On the way; going. See GAIT.

Is it his "motus trepidationis" that makes him stammer?
I pray you, Memory, set him agate again. Brewer's Lingua, iii. 6.

A'GATE. † n. s. [agat, gemma, Goth. agate, Fr.
achates, Lat.] A precious stone of the lowest class, often clouded with beautiful variegations.

In shape no bigger than an agate stone,
On the forefinger of an alderman. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.
Agates are only varieties of the flint kind; they have a grey horny ground, clouded, lineated, or spotted with different colours, chiefly dusky, black, brown, red, and sometimes blue.
Woodward.

AGATY', adj. [from agate.] Partaking of the nature of agate.

An agaty flint was above two inches in diameter; the whole covered over with a friable cretaceous crust. Woodward.

To AGA'ZE. † v. a. [from a and gaze, to set a gazing;
as, amaze, amuse, and others.] To strike with amazement; to stupify with sudden terour. The verb is now out of use, Dr. Johnson says; but he has omitted to notice that the verb agast occurs in Chaucer, who also uses the preter agast as Spenser here does aghost, (for he spells it with the h.) for agasted.

So as they travell'd, so they gan espy
An armed knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemed from some feared foe to fly,
Or other griesly thing, that him agast. Spenser, F. Q.

AGA'ZED. particip. adj. [from agaze.]
Struck with amazement; terrified to stupidity.

Hundreds he sent to hell, and none durst stand him;
Here, there, and every where, enrag'd he flew;
The French exclaim'd; "The devil was in arms!"
All the whole army stood agazed on him. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

AGE, n. s. [age, Fr. antiently cage, or aage; it is deduced by Menage, from atatum, of etate; by Junius, from aa, which, in the Teutonic dialects, signified long duration.

1. Any period of time attributed to something as the whole, or part, of its duration; in this sense, we say, the age of man, the several ages of the world, the golden or iron age.

One man in his time plays many parts,
His life being seven ages. Shakespeare.

And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years; so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years.
Gen. xlvii. 28.

2. A succession or generation of men.

Hence, lastly, springs care of posterities,
For things their kind would everlasting make.
Hence is it, that old men do plant young trees,
The fruit whereof another age shall take. Sir J. Davies.

Next, to the Son,
Destin'd Restorer of mankind, by whom
New heav'n, and earth, shall to the ages rise,
Or down from heav'n descend. Milton, P. L.

• No declining age
E'er felt the raptures of poetic rage. Roscommon.

3. The time in which any particular man, or race of men, lived, or shall live; as, the age of heroes.

No longer now the golden age appears
When patriarch wits surviv'd a thousand years. Pope.

4. The space of a hundred years; a secular period; a century.

5. The latter part of life; old-age; oldness.

You see how full of change his age is: the observation we have made of it hath not been little; he always loved our sister most, and with what poor judgment he hath now cast her off.
Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Boys must not have th' ambitious care of men,
Nor men the weak anxieties of age. Roscommon.

And on this forehead, where your verse has said,
The loves delighted, and the graces play'd;
Insulting age will trace his cruel way,
And leave sad marks of his destructive sway. Prior.

6. Maturity; ripeness; years of discretion; full strength of life.

A solemn admission of proselytes, all that either, being of age, desire that admission for themselves, or that, in infancy, are by others presented to that charity of the church. Hammond.

• We thought our sires, not with their own content, Had, ere we came to age, our portion spent. Dryden.

7. In law.

In a man, the age of fourteen years is the age of discretion; and twenty-one years is the full age: In a woman, at seven years of age, the lord her father may distrain his tenants for aid to marry her; at the age of nine years, she is dowable; at twelve years, she is able finally to ratify and confirm her former consent given to matrimony; at fourteen, she is enabled to receive her land into her own hands, and shall be out of ward at the death of her ancestor: at sixteen, she shall be out of ward, though, at the death of her ancestor, she was within the age of fourteen years; at twenty-one, she is able to alienate her lands and tenements. At the age of fourteen, a stripling is enabled to choose his own guardian; at the age of fourteen, a man may consent to marriage. Cowell.

A'GED. adj. [from age.] It makes two syllables in 'poetry.]

1. Old; stricken in years; applied generally to animate beings.

If the comparison do stand between man and man, the aged, for the most part, are best experienced, least subject to rash and unadvised passion. Hooker.

Novelty is only in request; and it is as dangerous to be aged in any kind of course, as it is virtuous to be constant in any undertaking. Shakespeare, Meas. for Meas.

Kindness itself too weak a charm will prove,
To raise the feeble fires of aged love. Prior.

2. Old; applied to inanimate things. This use is rare, and commonly with some tendency to the prosopopœia.

The people did not more worship the images of gold and ivory, than they did the groves; and the same Quintilian faith of the aged oaks. Stillingfleet's Defence of Disc. on Rom. Idol.

A'GEDLY. adv. [from aged.] After the manner of an aged person. Dr. Johnson has thus given the adverb, without reference to any dictionary. It occurs in the early one of Huloet, where it is also defined vetuste, anciently.

AGEN. adv. [Sax. agen.] Again; in return. See AGAIN. Dr. Johnson asserts that this word is written agen only for the sake of the rhyme, (though it be in reality the true orthography,) which is a great mistake; for it is repeatedly used by Milton without any such necessity; as, in Comus: "Heaven keep my sister! Agen, agen, and near!" C. Boyle, in his Dissertation on Phalaris, writes the word agen, as in pages 21. and 289. And so Bishop Smalridge, in his Sermons, p. 67. This indeed is conforming to the true etymology. Mr. Nares, in his Elements of Orthoepey, says that Dryden always writes again. I believe not: for in his Palamon and Arcite we read:

Borne far asunder by the tiles of men,
Like adamant and steel they meet agen.

And, in his translation of Ovid:

He [Polyphemus] weary sought agen
The cool retirement of his gloomy den. Pol. and Gal. ver. 46.

A'GENCY. n. s. [from agent.]

1. The quality of acting; the state of being in action; action.

A few advances there are in the following papers, tending to assert the superintendence and agency of Providence in the natural world. Woodward, Pref. to Nat. Hist.

2. The office of an agent or factor for another; business performed by an agent.

Some of the purchasers themselves may be content to live cheap in a worse country, rather than be at the charge of exchange and agencies. Swift.

A'GEND. n. s. [Lat. agendum.] Matter relating to A'GENDUM, } the service of the church.

For the matter of our worship, our credents, our agends, are all according to the rule.

Wilcocks's Eng. Protestant Apology, (1642,) p. 34.

For their agenda, matters of fact and discipline, their sacred and civil rites and ceremonies, we may have them authentically set down in such books as these. Bp. Barlow, Rem.

A'GENT. adj. [agens, Lat.] That which acts; opposed to patient, or that which is acted upon.

This success is oft truly ascribed unto the force of imagination upon the body agent; and then, by a secondary means, it may upon a diverse body; as, for example, if a man carry a ring, or some part of a beast, believing strongly that it will help him to obtain his love, it may make him more industrious, and again more confident and persisting than otherwise he would be. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A'GENT. n. s.

1. An actor; he that acts; he that possesses the faculty of action.

Where there is no doubt, deliberation is not excluded as impertinent unto the thing, but as needless in regard of the agent, which seeth already what to resolve upon. Hooker.

To whom nor agent, from the instrument,
Nor pow'r of working, from the work is known. Davies.

Heav'n made us agents free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not, tho' he foresaw the will.
Freedom was first bestow'd on human race,
And prescience only held the second place. Dryden.

A miracle is a work exceeding the power of any created agent, consequently being an effect of the divine omnipotence. South, Serm.

2. A substitute; a deputy; a factor; a person employed to transact the business of another.

— All hearts in love, use your own tongues;
Let every eye negotiate for itself,
And trust no agent. Shakespeare.

They had not the wit to send to them, in any orderly fashion, agents or chosen men, to tempt them, and to treat with them. Bacon, Henry VII.

Remember, Sir, your fury of a wife,
Who, not content to be reveng'd on you,
The agents of your passion will pursue. Dryden, Aureng.

3. That which has the power of operating, or producing effects upon another thing.

They produced wonderful effects, by the proper application of agents to patients. Temple.

AGENTSHIP. n. s. [from agent.] The office of an agent.

No goody agent! And you think there is No punishment due for your agentship? Beauv. and Fl. Lover's Progress.

AGGELA'TION. n. s. [Lat. gelu.] Concretion of ice.

It is round in hail and figured in its guttulous descent from the air, growing greater or lesser according to the accretion or pluvius agglatation about the fundamental atoms thereof. Brown, Vulg. Err.

AGGENERA'TION. n. s. [from ad and generatio, Lat.]

The state of growing or uniting to another body.

To make a perfect nutrition, there is required a transmutation of nutriment; now where this conversion or aggeneration is made, there is also required, in the aliment, a similarity of matter. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A'GGER. n. s. [Lat.] A military word; a fortress, or trench.

Before the west gate, there is at a considerable distance an agger, or raised work, that was made for the defence of the city, when it was besieged on that side.

• Letters, Hecate's Journey to Reading, ii. 188.
To A'GGERATE. v. a. [from agger, Lat.] To heap up. Dict.

AGGERO'SE. adj. [from agger, Lat.] Full of heaps. Dict.

To AGGLO'MERATE. v. a. [agglomerio, Lat.]

1. To gather up in a ball, as thread.
2. To gather together,

Creations.

In one agglomerated cluster, hanging,
Great Vine! on Thee.

Young, Night Th ix.

To AGGLOMERATE. v. n.

Besides, the hard agglomerating salts,
The spoil of ages, would impervious choke
Their secret channels.

Thomson, Autumn.

AGGLOMERATION. n. s. [from agglomerate.] Heap.

An excessive agglomeration of turrets, with their fans, is one of the characteristic marks of the florid mode of architecture, which was now almost at its height.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 223.

AGGLUTINANTS. n. s. [from agglutinate.] Those medicines or applications which have the power of uniting parts together.

AGGLUTINANT. n. adj. [from agglutinate.] Uniting parts together.

I shall beg you to prescribe to me something strengthening and agglutinant.

Gray's Letters.

To AGGLUTINATE. v. n. [from ad and gluten, glue, Lat. Fr. agglutiner.] To unite one part to another; to join together, so as not to fall asunder.

It is a word almost appropriated to medicine;
Dr. Johnson says; but it was not so in elder times;
for Cotgrave renders the French verb, "to fasten together with glew."

The body has got room enough to grow into its full dimensions, which is performed by the daily ingestion of food that is digested into blood; which being diffused through the body, is agglutinated to those parts that were immediately agglutinated to the foetal parts of the womb. Harvey on Consumptions.

AGGLUTINATION. n. s. [from agglutinate.] Union; cohesion: the act of agglutinating: the state of being agglutinated.

To the nutrition of the body there are two essentials required, assumption and retention; then there follow two more, concoction and agglutination, or adhesion. Howell, Letters, i. 5.

The occasion of its not healing by agglutination, as the other did, was from the alteration the ichor had begun to make in the bottom of the wound. Wiseman, Surgery.

AGGLUTINATIVE. n. adj. [Fr. agglutinatif.] That which has the power of procuring agglutination.

Rowl up the member with the agglutinative rowler. Wiseman.

To AGGRAVE. n. v. a. [Ital. aggravare.] To favour.

She painted; and that knight so much aggraved, [aggraced.]

That she him taught celestial discipline. Spenser, F. Q. i. x. 18.

AGGRAVE. n. s. [from the verb.] Kindness; favour.

So goodly purpose they together fond [found]

Of kindness and of courteous aggrave. Ib. ii. viii. 56.

AGGRANDIZATION. n. s. [from aggrandize.] The act of aggrandizing.

There will be a pleasing and orderly circulation, no part of the body will consume by the aggrandization of the other, but all motions will be orderly, and a just distribution be to all parts. Waterhouse on Fortescue, p. 197.

To AGGRANDIZE. n. v. a. [from aggrandiser, Fr.] To make great; to enlarge; to exalt; to improve in power, honour, or rank. It is applied to persons generally, sometimes to things.

If the King should get no better than the pope did, only to aggrandize covetous churemen, it cannot be called a jewel in his crown. Ayliffe, Paragon.

To furnish us with glorious earrings and crowns, to raise and aggrandize our conceptions, to warm our souls, to awaken the better passions, and to elevate them even to a divine pitch, and that for devotional purposes. Watts, Improv. of the Mind.

2. To increase.

The devil has infused prodigious idolatry into their hearts, enough to relish his palate and aggrandize their tortures, &c.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 7.

To AGGRANDIZE. n. v. n. To become greater, to increase.

I have seen the neuter verb aggrand used for this, about the close of the 17th century. But that is a word not to be maintained.

Such sins as these are venial in youth, especially if expiated with timely abjurement; for follies continued till old age do ag-grandize and become horrid. John Hall, Pref. to his Poems.

This is aggrandizing. Boswell, Tour to the Hebrides, p. 133.

AGGRANDIZEMENT. n. s. [from aggrandissement, Fr.]

The state of being aggrandized; the act of aggrandizing. The accent seems to fall, with greater propriety, on the second syllable of this word, as in ag-grandization; though Dr. Johnson has chosen to adopt the first.

We may date from the treaty of Munster, the decline of the House of Austria, the great power of the House of Bourbon, and the aggrandizement of the house of Brandenburg.

Ld. Chesterfield.

In the midst of this chaos there were principles at work, which reduced things to a certain form, and gradually unfolded a system in which the chief movers and main springs were the papal and the imperial powers; the aggrandizement or diminution of which have been the drift of almost all the politics, intrigues, and wars, which have employed and distracted Europe to this day. Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. iii. 1.

AGGRANDIZER. n. s. [from aggrandize.] The person that aggrandizes or makes great another.

To AGGRATE. v. a. [from aggrare, Ital.] To please; to treat with civilities: a word not now in use.

And in the midst thereof, upon the floor,

A lovely bevy of fair ladies sate,

Courted of many a jolly paramour;

The which them did in modest wise amate,

And each one sought his lady to aggrate.

Spenser, F. Q.

To AGGRAVATE. n. v. a. [from aggravare, Lat.]

1. To make heavy; used only in a metaphorical sense;
as, to aggravate an accusation, or a punishment.

A grove hard by, sprung up with this their change,

His will who reigns above! to aggravate

Their penance, laden with fruit, like that

Which grew in paradise, the bait of Eve

Us'd by the tempter.

Milton, P. I.

Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,

And aggravating crimes augments their fears. Dryden, Aeneid.

2. To make any thing worse, by the addition of some particular circumstance, not essential.

This offence, in itself so heinous, was yet in him aggravated by the motive thereof, which was not malice or discontent, but an aspiring mind to the papacy. Bacon, Hen. VII.

I have commission to assure your majesty, that their meaning is not to aggravate your charge, for he shall have yearly a competent provision allowed to maintain him in good fashion.

Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 443.

Follows the loosen'd aggravated roar,

Enlarging, deepening, mingling; peal on peal

Crush'd horrible, convulsing heaven and earth.

Thompson, Summer.

3. In the following instance, it may be thought a verb neuter, unless we understand it after it.

————— had you heard him first

Draw it to certain heads, then aggravate,

Then use his vehement figures.

B. Jonson, Fox, v. 2.

AGGRAVATION. n. s. [from aggravare.]

1. The act of aggravating, or making heavy.

This was indeed very foul in itself, though but once done, even without the orator's rhetorical aggravation.

Hakewill's Apology, p. 368.

In a letter to her majesty, I conclude with a supplication, that she will be pleased to receive a page, at the joint suit of the House of Bacon's; a boy of singular spirits, without aggravation of her charge; for he shall want no means to entertain himself in good fashion about so royal a mistress.

Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 560.

2. The act of enlarging to enormity.

A painter added a pair of whiskers to the face, and by a little aggravation of the features changed it into the Saracen's head.

Addison.

3. The extrinsecal circumstances or accidents, which encrease the guilt of a crime, or the misery of a calamity.

He, to the sins which he commits, hath the aggravation super-added of committing them against knowledge, against conscience, against sight of the contrary law.

Hammond.

If it be weigh'd

By itself, with aggravations not surcharg'd,
Or else with just allowance counterpois'd,
I may, if possible, thy pardon find
The easier towards me, or thy hatred less.

Milton.

AGGREGATE. adj. [aggregatus, Lat.] Framed by the collection of any particular parts into one mass, body, or system.

The solid reason of one man with unprejudicate apprehensions, begets as firm a belief as the authority or aggregate testimony of many hundreds.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

They had, for a long time together, produced many other inept combinations, or aggregate forms of particular things, and nonsensical systems of the whole.

Ray on the Creation.

AGGREGATE. n. s. [from the verb.] The complex, or collective result of the conjunction or acervation of many particulars.

The reason of the far greatest part of mankind, is but an aggregate of mistaken phantasms, and, in things not sensible, a constant delusion.

Glanville, Scæpris Scientificæ.

A great number of living and thinking particles could not possibly, by their mutual contract, and pressing, and striking, compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body; any more than a swarm of bees, or a crowd of men and women, can be conceived to make up one particular living creature, compounded and constituted of the aggregate of them all.

Bentley.

AGGREGATE. † v. a. [aggrego, Lat.] To collect together; to accumulate; to heap many particulars into one mass.

The aggregated soil

Death, with his mace petrifick, cold, and dry,

As with a trident, smote.

Milton, P. L.

Now touching the offences themselves, they are so exorbitant and transcendent, and aggregated of so many bloody and fearful crimes, as they cannot be aggravated by any inference, argument, or circumstance whatsoever.

Sir E. Coke, Proceed. against Garnet, &c. sign. D. iii.

AGGREGATELY.  adv.* [from aggregate.] Collectively.

Many little things, though separately they seem too insignificant to mention, yet aggregately are too material for me to omit.

Ld. Chesterfield.

AGGREGATION. † n. s. [from aggregate.]

1. Collection, or state of being collected.

Their individual imperfections being great, they are moreover enlarged by their aggregation; and being erroneous in their single numbers, once huddled together, they will be error itself.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. The collection, or act of collecting many particulars into one whole.

The water resident in the abyss is, in all parts of it, stored with a considerable quantity of heat, and more especially in those where these extraordinary aggregations of this fire happen.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

3. The whole composed by the conservation of many particulars; an aggregate.

The latter part of the term was called the aggregation, or joining of one's self to the worship and service of the only true God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

Bp. Bull's Works, ii. p. 555.

Thus must we conceive of the Catholic church, as of one entire body, made up by the collection and aggregation of all the faithful into the unity thereof.

Abp. Usher, Sermon before the King at Wanstead, p. 6.

AGGREGATIVE.  adj.* [from aggregate.] Taken together.

In the disjunctive, and not the aggregative sense. Spelman.

AGGREGATOR.  n. s.* Lat. He who collects materials.

Jacobus de Dondis, the aggregator, repeats ambergrease, nutmegs, and allspice amongst the rest. Barton, Anat. Mel. p. 375.

AGGRESS. v. n. [aggredior, aggression, Lat.] To commit the first act of violence; to begin the quarrel.

The glorious pair advance

With mingl'd anger, and collected might,

To turn the war, and tell aggressing France,

How Britain's sons, and Britain's friends can fight.

Prior.

AGGRESS.  n. s.* [old Fr. agresse, low Lat. aggressus.]

Aggression.

Leagues offensive, and defensive, which oblige the princes not only to mutual defence, but also to be assisting to each other in their military aggresses upon others.

Hale, H. P. C. ch. 15.

AGGRESSION. n. s. [aggressio, Lat.] This word is noticed by Heylin, in 1656, as uncouth and unusual. The first act of injury; commencement of a quarrel by some act of iniquity.

There is no resting of a common enemy, without an union for a mutual defence; and there may be also, on the other hand, a conspiracy of common enmity and aggression.

L'Estrange.

Beside this, you have, in your English, yet three attempts more; and much ado there is with long and perplexed figures to no purpose. They are, by your own confession, but aggressions; and you do not yourself believe them to be exact.

Wallis, Correction of Hobbes, § 12.

AGGRESSOR. n. s. [aggressor.] The person that first commences hostility; the assaulter or invader, opposed to the defendant.

Fly in nature's face?

But how, if nature fly in my face first?

Then nature's the aggressor: Let her look to't.

Dryden.

It is a very unlucky circumstance, to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of such authors, whose works are so soon forgotten, that we are in danger already of appearing the first aggressors.

Pope and Swift.

AGGRIEVANCE. † n. s. [See GRIEVANCE.] Injury; hardship inflicted; wrong endured.

We are desirous to redress such abuses, and aggravances as are said to grow by sommers or apparitors.

Constitutions and Can. Eccl. 138.

By which notorious aggravances the sex of women being so much wronged, were forced to repair to the clear fountain of true justice.

Translation of Boccaccio, (1626) p. 204.

Deliver those aggravances, which lately

Your importunity possess our council

Were fit for audience.

Beaumont and Fl. Fair Maid of the Inn, iii. 1.

Their religion remained under great discouragements, their rites being suppressed in all the isles of that sea for want of protection and redress of their aggravances.

Rycaut, Gr. Ch. p. 340.

AGGRIEVE. † v. a. [old Fr. agrevier.]1. To give sorrow; to cause grief; to vex. It is not improbable, that to grieve was originally neuter, and aggrieve the active, Dr. Johnson says; but aggrieve is also neuter.

But while therein I took my chief delight,

I saw, alas! the gaping earth devour

The spring, the place, and all clean out of sight;

Which yet aggrieves my heart even to this hour.

Spenser.

Those pains that afflict the body, which are afflictive just so long as they actually possess the part which they aggrieve; but their influence lasts no longer than their presence.

South, Serm. viii. 11.

2. To impose some hardships upon; to harass; to hurt in one's right. This is a kind of juridical sense; and whenever it is used now, it seems to bear some allusion to forms of law.

Sewall, archbishop of York, much aggrieved with some practices of the pope's collectors, took all patiently. Camden.

The landed man finds himself aggrieved, by the falling of his rents, and the strengthening of his fortune; whilst the married man keeps up his gain, and the merchant thrives and grows rich by trade. Locke.

Of injur'd fame, and mighty wrongs receiv'd,
Chloe complains, and wondrously's aggrieved. Granville.

To AGGRIEVE. * v. n. To mourn; to lament.

My heart aggrieved, that such a wretch should reign.

Mir. for Mag. p. 442.

To AGGROU'P. v. a. [aggropare, Ital.] To bring together into one figure; to crowd together: a term of painting.

Bodies of divers natures, which are aggregated (or combined) together, are agreeable and pleasant to the sight. Dryden.

AGHA'ST. adj. [either the participle of agaze, (see AGAZE), and then to be written agazed, or agast, or from a and gast, a ghost, which the present orthography favours; perhaps they were originally different words.] Struck with horror, as at the sight of a spectre; stupified with terror. It is generally applied to the external appearance.

She sighing sore, as if her heart in twaine
Had riven been, and all her heart-strings brast,
With dreary drooping cyne look'd up like one aghaſt. Spenser.

The aged earth aghaſt,
With terror of that blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake. Milton.

Aghaſt he wak'd, and starting from his bed,
Cold sweat in clammy drops his limbs o'erſpread.

Dryden, Æneid.

I laugh to think how your unshaken Cato
Will look aghaſt, while unforeſeen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from every ſide. Addison, Cato.

A'GILE. adj. [agile, Fr. agilis, Lat.] Nimble; ready; having the quality of being speedily put in motion; active.

With that he gave his able horse the head,
And bending forward struck his agile heels
Against the panting ſides of his poor jade,
Up to the rowl-head. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

The immediate and agile ſubſervience of the ſpirits to the empire of the mind or ſoul. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To guide its actions with informing care,
In peace to judge, to conquer in the war,
Render it agile, witty, valiant, ſage,
As fits the various courſe of human age. Prior.

A'GILENESS. n. s. [from agile.] The quality of being agile; nimbleness; readiness for motion; quickness; activity; agility.

AGILITY. n. s. [agilitas, Lat. from agilis, agile.] Nimbleness; readiness to move; quickness; activity.

A limb over-strained by lifting a weight above its power, may never recover its former agility and vigour. Watts.

AGILOCHUM. n. s. Aloes-wood. A tree in the East-Indies, brought to us in small bits, of a very fragrant ſcent. It is hot, drying, and accounted a ſtrengthener of the nerves in general. The beſt is of a blackiſh purple colour, and ſo light as to ſwim upon water. Quincy.

A'GIO. † n. s. [An Italian word, ſignifying eaſe or convenience. The Daniſh agio is rendered by Wolff, advance-money.] A mercantile term, uſed chiefly in Holland and Venice, for the difference between the value of bank notes, and the current money. Chambers.

To AGIST. v. a. [from giſte, Fr. a bed or reſting-place, or from giſter, i. e. ſtabulari.]

Take in and feed the cattle of ſtrangers in the king's foreſt, & gather the money. The officers that do this, are called ors, in Engliſh guel or giſt-takers. Their function is termed agiſtment; as, agiſtment upon the ſea banks. This word agiſt is alſo uſed, for the taking in of other men's cattle into any man's ground, at a certain rate per week. Blount.

AGISTMENT. † n. s. [See AGIST. It is taken by the canon lawyers in another ſenſe than is mentioned under agiſt. They ſeem to intend by it, a modus or compoſition, or mean rate, at which ſome right or due may be reckoned: perhaps it is corrupted from addouciſſement, or adjustment.]

1. The feeding of cattle in a common paſture, for a ſtipulated price.

If a man takes in a horſe or other cattle to graze and depaſture his grounds, which the law calls agiſtment, he takes them upon an implied contract to return them ſafe to the owner. Blackſtone.

2. Tithe due for the profit made by agiſting or feeding of unprofitable cattle, as neither the ground nor the cattle can in any other way pay any thing for an acknowledged receipt of profit from titheable articles.

3. An embankment; earth heaped up. Such fences the inhabitants of marſhy countries are bound to keep up, as Mr. Boncher has ſhewn from the charter of Romney-marſh. This leads him to propoſe the etymology of agger and aggerſtus, eſpecially alſo as in old writings agiſtment is written aggerſtamentum or aggerſtamentum.

AGISTOR. † n. s. [from agiſt.] An officer of the king's foreſt. See AGIST.

A foreſt hath laws of her own, to take cognizance of all treſpaſſes; ſhe hath alſo her peculiar officers, as foreſters, verderers, regarders, agiſters, &c. whereas a chaſe or park hath only keepers and woodwards. Howell, Letters, iv. 16.

A'GITABLE. † n. s. [from agitate; agibilis, Lat.] That which may be agitated, or put in motion; perhaps that which may be diſputed. In our old dictionaries defined moveable. See AGITATE, and AGITATION.

To A'GITATE. v. a. [agito, Lat.]

1. To put in motion; to ſhake; to move nimbly; as, the ſurface of the waters is agitated by the wind; the veſſel was broken by agitating the liquour.

2. To be the cauſe of motion; to actuate; to move.

Where dwells this ſov'reign arbitrary ſoul,
Which does the human animal controul,
Inform each part, and agitate the whole? Blackmore.

3. To affect with perturbation; as, the mind of man is agitated by various paſſions.

4. To ſtir; to bandy from one to another; to diſcuſs; to controvert; as, to agitate a queſtion.

Though this controversy be revived, and hotly agitated among the moderns; yet I doubt whether it be not, in a great part, a nominal diſpute. Boyle on Colours.

5. To contrive; to revolve; to form by laborious thought.

Formalities of extraordinary zeal and piety are never more ſtudied and elaborate, than when politicians moſt agitate deſperate deſigns. K. Charles.

AGITATION. n. s. [from agitate, agitatio, Lat.]

1. The act of moving or ſhaking any thing.

Putrefaction asketh reſt; for the ſubtle motion which putrefaction requireth, is diſturbed by any agitation. Bacon.

2. The ſtate of being moved or agitated; as the waters, after a ſtorm, are ſome time in a violent agitation.

3. Diſcuſſion; controversial examination.

A kind of a ſchool queſtion is ſtarted in this fable, upon reaſon and inſtinct: this deliberative ſucceeding of the crow, was rather a logical agitation of the matter. L' Eſtrange, Fable.

4. Violent motion of the mind; perturbation; disturbance of the thoughts.

A great perturbation in nature ! to receive at once the benefit of sleep, and do the effects of watching. In this slumbry agitation, besides her walking, and other actual performances, what have you heard her say? Shakspeare, Macbeth.

His mother could no longer bear the agitations of so many passions as thronged upon her. Tatler, No. 55.

5. Deliberation; contrivance; the state of being consulted upon.

The project now in agitation for repealing of the test act, and yet leaving the name of an establishment to the present national church, is inconsistent. Swift, Miscell.

AGITA'TOR.† n. s. [Fr. agitateur, Lat. agitator.]

1. He who regulates affairs of the army. This is a Gallicism; though it became a kind of ludicrous expression, in this country, after the great rebellion. "Agitateur, solliciteur d'un régiment." • Lacombe. "Commandant d'un régiment." Roquefort.

The fairest day is seldom without a cloud, for at this time some active and malevolent persons of the army, disguised under the specious name of agitators, being two selected out of every regiment to meet and debate the concerns of the army, met frequently at Putney. Sir T. Herbert's Memoirs.

Some for the Rump, and some more crafty
For agitators, and the safety. Butler, Hudibras, iii. 2.

2. He who manages affairs.

He must be very ignorant of the state of every popular interest, who does not know that in all the corporations, all the open boroughs, indeed in every district in the kingdom, there is some leading man, some agitator, some wealthy merchant, or considerable manufacturer, some active attorney, some popular preacher, some money-lender, &c. who is followed by the whole flock. Burke's Speech on the Duration of Parliaments.

AGLET.† n. s. [Some derive it from αἴγλη, splendour; but it is apparently to be deduced from aiguillette, Fr. a tag to a point, and that from aigu, sharp.] See AIGLET.

1. A tag of a point curved into the shape of little images, or having a head cut at their ends; the tag of a lace to women's stays.

He thereupon gave for the garter a chain worth 200l. and his gown addressed with aglets, esteemed worth 25l. Hayward.

Why, give him gold enough, and marry him to a puppet, or an aglet baby, or an old trot, and ne'er a tooth in her head. Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

2. The pendants at the ends of the chieftes of flowers, as in tulips. The herb, or grass, ladies laces, is called in French "aiguillettes d'armes."

AGMINAL. adj. [from agmen, Lat.] Belonging to a troop. Dict.

AGNAIL.† n. s. [from ange, grieved, and nagle, a nail, according to Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boucher; but it may be from the Sax. agga, torquere, to writhe with pain, and nagel, a nail.] A discase of the nails; a whitlow; an inflammation round the nails.

AGNA'TE.* adj. [Lat. agnatus.] In our old dictionaries it is a substantive, and called "a kinsman by the father's side;" and is an authorized substantive in Scotland. In modern times, it has been applied as an adjective, in the sense of "allied to; akin." See AGNATION.

AGNA'TICK.* adj. [from agnate.] Relating to kindred by descent from the father.

This I take to be the true reason of the constant preference of the agnatick succession, or issue derived from the male ancestors, through all the stages of collateral inheritance; as the ability for personal service was the reason for preferring the males at first in the direct lineal succession. Blackstone, Law of Descents.

AGNA'TION.† n. s. [from agnatus, Lat.]

1. Descent from the same father, in a direct male line, distinct from cognition, or consanguinity, which includes descendants from females.

2. Alliance; connection.

By an attentive examination of the peculiarities in enunciation which each people have, in the one way or the other, by a fair reciprocal analysis of the agnate words they reciprocally use, I think a much greater agnation may be found amongst all the languages in the northern hemisphere of our globe. Pownall on the Study of Antiquities, p. 168.

AGNI'TION.† n. s. [from agnitio, Lat.] Acknowledgement.

It must needs be proper to begin the confession of our faith with the agnition of our God. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

To AGNIZE.† v. a. [Fr. agnisr.] To acknowledge; to own; to avow. This word is now obsolete, Dr. Johnson says; but it was not out of use, when his dictionary was published.

I do agnize

A natural and prompt alacrity
I find in hardness. Shakspeare, Othello.

An elicit act of worship, is an act which hath God for its immediate object, and solely is designed to do him honour, or to agnize some divine excellency or perfection. Whitby on the New Test. p. 267.

— such who own
In evil times, undaunted, though alone,

His glorious truth, such He will crown with praise,
And glad agnize before his Father's throne. Edwards, Can. Crit. p. 291.

To AGNOMINATE.* v. a. [Lat. agnomino.] To name.

— the flowing current's silver streams,
Which, in memorial of victory,
Shall be agnominated by our name. Loerinc, iii. 2.

AGNOMINA'TION.† n. s. [agnominatio, Lat.] Allusion of one word to another, by resemblance of sound.

The British continueth yet in Wales, and some villages of Cornwall, intermingled with provincial Latin, being very significative, copious, and pleasantly running upon agnominations, although harsh in aspirations. Camden.

White is there usurpt for her brow; her forehead; and then sleek, as the parallel to smooth, that went before. A kind of paronomastic, or agnomination: do you conceive, Sir?

B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

Our bards hold agnominations, and enforcing of consonant words or syllables one upon the other, to be the greatest elegance: As for example, in Welsh, Truogais, todgyris, ty'r derryrn, gwyllt, &c. So have I seen divers old rhymes in Italian running so: Donne, O damo, che Felo affronto affronta: In selva salvo a me: Più caro cuore, &c. Hobart's Letters, i. 1. 40.

AGNUS.* n. s. [Lat.] In the Romish church, a little image, representing our Saviour in the figure of a lamb.

They will kiss a crucifix, salute a cross, carry most devoutly a scapulary, an agnus, or a set of beads about them. Brevint's Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 331.

We all know how far it is easier for men and women of loose lives to amuse themselves with scapularies, beads, ropes, agnusses, and sprinkling their bodies with holy water, than to lift up pure hearts to God. Ibid. p. 322.

AGNUS CASTUS. n. s. [Lat.] The name of the tree commonly called the Chaste Tree, from an imaginary virtue of preserving chastity.

Of laurel some, of woodbine many more,
And wreathes of agnus castus others bore. Dryden, Flower and Leaf.

AGO'. adv. [agan, Sax. past or gone; whence writers formerly used, and in some provinces the people still use, agone for ago.] Past; as long ago; that is, long time has past since. Reckoning time towards the present, we use since; as, it is a year since it happened: reckoning from the present, we use ago; as, it happened a year ago. This is not, perhaps, always observed.

The great supply,
Are wrack'd three nights ago on Godwin sands. Shakespeare.

This both by others and myself I know,
For I have serv'd their sovereign long ago;
Oft have been caught within the winding train. Dryden, Fab.

I shall set down an account of a discourse I chanced to have with one of them some time ago. Addison, Freeholder.

AGO'G. † adv. [a word of uncertain etymology; the French have the term à gogo, in low language; as ils vivent à gogo, they live to their wish: from this phrase our word may be, perhaps, derived. This is Dr. Johnson's etymological description; which is unsatisfactory. Mr. Boucher has bestowed much pains in attempting to trace the word, in the sense of elate, to the Hebrew gag, signifying the roof or most eminent part of a building; and to gok, used by the Norwegians to look high; and to gove, meaning in the north of Scotland to look about one; not forgetting also goggles, a species of spectacles, and goggle eyes; and finally to the Bas Bret. gaug, (pronounced like gog.) a hill. This last he would resolve into a-gaug, i. e. on high, and thence elicit the figurative agog, i. e. elate. But the word perhaps is nothing more than a corruption of the Goth. gaga, the road, the way, from gaggan, to go; whence the Saxon gangan, to go. Mr. Tooke, in the margin of his Johnson, has marked the Saxon word. I think therefore that agog means no more than agoing, in a hurry to seize an object, or accomplish a design. In the Yorkshire dialect "to set one agog," is, to make one long or desire. So in this sense we have, in our elder language, the substantive gag for haste or desire. "You have put me into such a gag of going, I would not stay for all the world." Beaum. and Fl. Wit without Money, iii. 1.]

1. In a state of desire; in a state of warm imagination; heated with the notion of some enjoyment; longing; strongly excited.

As for the sense and reason of it, that has little or nothing to do here; only let it sound full and round, and chime right to the humour, which is at present agog, (just as a big, long, rattling name is said to command even adoration from a Spaniard,) and, no doubt, with this powerful, senseless engine, the rabble-driver, shall be able to carry all before him. South, Sermon.

2. It is used with the verbs to be, or to set; as, he is agog, or you may set him agog.

The gawdy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels drest, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,
Thinks all she says or does, is justify'd. Dryden, Jun. Sat. 6.

This maggot has no sooner set him agog, but he gets him a ship, freights her, builds castles in the air, and conceits both the Indies in his coffers. L'Estrange.

3. It has the particles on, or for, before the object of desire.

On which the saints are all agog,
And all this for a bear and dog. Hudibras, cant. ii.
Gypsies generally straggle into these parts, and set the heads of our servant-maids so agog for husbands, that we do not expect to have any business done as it should be, whilst they are in the country. Addison, Spectator.

AGO'ING. particip. adj. [from a and going.] In action; into action.

Let his clack be set agoing, and he shall tongue it as impetuously as the arrantest hog of the play.

Dryden, Grounds of Criticism.

Their first movement, and impressed motions, demanded the impulse of an Almighty hand to set them first agoing. Tatler.

A'GON. † n. s. [Gr.] The contest for the prize.

They must do their exercises too — be anointed to the agon, and to the combat, as the champions of old.

Fit for combats and wrestlings, and so [they] came out to practise in these agones. Abp. Sanger's Sermons, p. 106.
Hammond's Sermons.

AGO'NE. adv. [agan, Sax.] Ago; past. See AGO.

Is he such a princely one,
As ydu speak him long agone? B. Jonson, Fairy Prince.

A'GONISM. n. s. [ἀγωνισμός, Gr.] Contention for a prize. Dict.

A'GONIST. n. s. [ἀγωνιστής, Gr.] A contender for prizes. Dict.

AGONISTES. n. s. [ἀγωνιστής, Gr.] A prize-fighter; one that contends at any publick solemnity for a prize. Milton has so styled his tragedy, because Samson was called out to divert the Philistines with feats of strength.

AGONISTICAL. † adj. [from agonistes.] Relating to prize-fighting. Dict.

Indeed as are all the expressions in the foregoing verse, so is this apparently agonistical, and alludes to the prize set before, propounded and offered to them that run in a race, for their encouragement.

To say nothing of the beautiful metaphors and noble agonistical terms, which we find in the six first verses of the twelfth chapter to the Hebrews, &c. Bp. Hall's Works, ii. 607.
Blackwall's Sac. Cl. i. 335.

ἀγωνισμός in the agonistical notion we have formerly explained. Hammond on the N. Test.

AGONISTICALLY.* adv. In the agonistical manner.

AGONISTICK.* adj. Agonistical; relating to the contention for the prize at a race.

The prophetick writings were not, saith St. Peter, ἀγωνιστικαί, (I conceive in an agonistick sense,) of their own starting, or incitation, as they were moved or prompted by themselves, but, as it follows, as they were carried by the Holy Ghost.

Industry is stiled exercise, agonistick and ascetick exercise. Hammond's Sermons, p. 589.
Barrow's Sermons, iii. 237.

The practice of anointing being essential to their agonistick trials. Dr. Warton on Pope.

To A'GONIZE. † v. n. [from agonizo, low Lat. ἀγωνίζω, Gr. agoniser, Fr.] To feel agonies; to be in excessive pain.

He is an object of much pity, that over-affects any temporal things whatsoever. For it agonizes his mind perpetually, and throws him on a double mischief.

Felham, Sermon on St. Luke, xiv. 20.

Dost thou behold my poor distracted heart,
Thus rent with agonizing love and rage,
And ask me what it means? Art thou not false?

Rowe's Jane Shore.

Or touch, if, tremblingly alive all o'er,
To smart and agonize at every pore? Pope, Ep. on Man.

AGONIZINGLY.* adv. [from agonize.] In the most painfully feeling manner. This adverb is quite modern, but seems getting into use.

AGONOTHETE.* n. s. [Gr. ἀγωνοθέτης, Fr. agonothète.] The old English dictionaries, which warrant Dr. Johnson in giving agonothetick, give also this substantive; and define it, "a judge of masteries in activity."

AGONOTHE'TICK. adj. [ἀγων and τίθημι, Gr.] Proposing publick contentions for prizes; giving prizes; presiding at public games. Dict.

A'GONY. † n. s. [ἀγών, Gr. agon, low Lat. agonic, Fr.]

1. The pangs of death; properly the last contest between life and death.

Never was there more pity in saving any than in ending me, because therein my agony shall end. Sidney.

Thou who for me did'st feel such pain,
Whose precious blood the cross did stain,
Let not those agonies be vain. Roscommon.

2. Any violent or excessive pain of body or mind.

Between them both, they have me done to dy,
Through wounds and strokes, and stubborn handeling,
That death were better than such agony,
As grief and fury unto me did bring. Spenser, F. Q.

Thee I have miss'd, and thought it long, depriv'd
Thy presence; agony of love till now
Not felt, nor shall be twice. Milton, P. L.

3. It is particularly used in devotions for our Redeemer's conflict in the garden.

To propose our desires, which cannot take such effect as we specify, shall, notwithstanding, otherwise procure us his heavenly grace, even as this very prayer of Christ obtained angels to be sent him as comforters in his agony. Hooker.

4. Violent contest or striving.

She sees such things as would low life confound,
Enrage with a tumultuous agony,
Burst this pent spright for want of fit capacity.

More, Song of the Soul, p. 2. b. 3. c. 2. st. 57.
Till he have thus denuded himself of all these encumbrances,
he is utterly unqualified for these agonies.
Decay of Chr. Piety, p. 408.

AGG'ON. † adv. [from a and good.] In earnest; not fictitiously. Not in use, or rarely so, now; though very common in our old songs and poetry.

At that time I made her weep agood,
For I did play a lamentable part. Shakespeare, Two Gent. of Ver.

AGOUTY. n. s. An animal of the Antilles, of the big-ness of a rabbit, with bright red hair, and a little tail without hair. He has but two teeth in each jaw, holds his meat in his forepaws like a squirrel, and has a very remarkable cry. When he is angry, his hair stands on end, and he strikes the earth with his hindfeet, and, when chased, he flies to a hollow tree, whence he is expelled by smoke. Trevoux.

TO AGRA'CE. † v. a. See TO AGGRACE.

AGRA'MMATIST. n. s. [α, priv. and γραμμα, Gr.] An illiterate man. Dict.

AGRA'RIAN. † adj. [agrarius, Lat.] Relating to fields or grounds; a word seldom used but in the Roman history, where there is mention of the agrarian law.

It appears that the jubilee could not be intended for an agrarian law. Wren's Monarchy Asserted, p. 137.

In later times, it has been used in allusion to the original meaning.

His grace's landed possessions are irresistibly inviting to an agrarian experiment. Burke.

TO AGREASE. † [What has been said respecting this pretended verb, is an oversight of Dr. Johnson, occasioned by his slight attention both to Spenser's own reading, and to the sense of the passage. See AGRISE. There is no such verb in Spenser as agrease; which, however, Dr. Johnson has asserted; defining it, from a and grease, to daub, &c. Dr.
Ash has adopted the error. But this is not the only example, as I shall have occasion to shew, of non-existent words produced with the venerable air of authority, and consequently of etymology and definition, however ingenious, misapplied.]

TO AGRE'E. † [agreer, Fr. from gré, liking or good-will; gratia, gratus, Lat.]

1. To be in concord; to live without contention; not to differ.

The more you agree together, the less hurt can your enemies do you. Broome's View of Epick Poetry.

2. To grant; to yield to; to admit; with the particles to or upon.

And persuaded them to agree to all reasonable conditions.
2 Maccabees, xi. 14.

We do not prove the origin of the earth from a chaos: seeing that it is agreed on by all that give it any origin. Burnet.

3. To settle amicably.

A form of words was quickly agreed on between them for a perfect combination. Clarendon.

4. To settle terms by stipulation; to accord; followed by with.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Matt. v. 25.

5. To settle a price between buyer and seller.

Friend, I do thee no wrong, didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Matt. xx. 13.

6. To be of the same mind or opinion.

He exceedingly provoked, or underwent the envy, and reproach, and malice of men of all qualities and conditions, who agreed in nothing else. Clarendon.

Milton is a noble genius, and the world agrees to confess it.

Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

7. To concur; to co-operate.

Must the whole man, amazing thought! return
To the cold marble and contracted urn?
And never shall those particles agree,
That were in life this individual he? Prior

8. To settle some point among many, with upon before a noun.

Strifes and troubles would be endless, except they gave their common consent all to be ordered by some whom they should agree upon. Hooker.

If men, skilled in chymical affairs, shall agree to write clearly, and keep men from being stunned by dark or empty words, they will be reduced either to write nothing, or books that may teach us something. Boyle.

9. To be consistent; not to contradict; with to or with.

For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not together. Mark, xiv. 56.

They that stood by said again to Peter, surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto. Mark, xiv. 70.

Which testimony I the less scruple to alledge, because it agrees very well with what has been affirmed to me. Boyle.

10. To suit with; to be accommodated to: with to or with.

Thou feedest thine own people with angels food, and didst send them from heaven bread agreeing to every taste. Wisdom.

His principles could not be made to agree with that constitution and order, which God had settled in the world; and, therefore, must needs clash with common sense and experience.
Locke.

11. To cause no disturbance in the body.

I have often thought, that our prescribing asses milk in such small quantities, is injudicious: for, undoubtedly, with such as it agrees with, it would perform much greater and quicker effects in greater quantities. Arbutnot on Coins.

TO AGRE'E. v. a.

1. To put an end to a variance.

He saw from far, or seemed for to see,
Some troublous uproar, or contentious fray,
Whereto he drew in haste it to agree. Spenser, F. Q. ii.

2. To make friends; to reconcile.

The mighty rivals, whose destructive rage
Did the whole world in civil arms engage,
Are now agreed. Roscommon.

AGREEABILITY.* n. s. [Fr. agreeableté.] Easiness of disposition.

All fortune is blissful to a man by the agreeability, or by the egalitie of him that suffreth it. Chaucer, Boeth. ii. 369.

AGRE'EABLE. adj. [agreeable, Fr.]

- r. Suitable to; consistent with; conformable to. It has the particle to, or with.

This paucity of blood is agreeable to many other animals, as frogs, lizards, and other fishes. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The delight which men have in popularity, fame, submission, and subjection of other men's minds, seemeth to be a thing, in itself, without contemplation of consequence, agreeable and grateful to the nature of man. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

What you do, is not at all agreeable either with so good a christian, or so reasonable and so great a person. Temple.

That which is agreeable to the nature of one thing, is many times contrary to the nature of another. L'Estrange.

As the practice of all piety and virtue is agreeable to our reason, so is it likewise the interest both of private persons and of publick societies. Tillotson.

2. In the following passage the adjective is used by a familiar corruption for the adverb agreeably.

Agreeable herewith, perhaps it might not be amiss, to make children, as soon as they are capable of it, often to tell a story. Locke on Education.

3. Pleasing; that is suitable to the inclination, faculties, or temper. It is used in this sense both of persons and things.

And while the face of outward things we find

Pleasing and fair, agreeable and sweet,

These things transport. Sir J. Davies.

I recollect in my mind the discourses which have passed between us, and call to mind a thousand agreeable remarks, which he has made on these occasions. Addison, Spect. No. 241.

AGREEABLENESS.† n. s. [from agreeable.]

1. Consistency with; suitableness to: with the particle to.

Pleasant tastes depend not on the things themselves, but their agreeableness to this or that particular palate, wherein there is great variety. Locke.

2. With the particle with.

It is not the incompatibility or agreeableness of incidents, characters, or sentiments, with the probable in fact, but with propriety in design, that admits or excludes them from a place in any composition. Burke on the Dravna.

3. The quality of pleasing. It is used in an inferior sense, to mark the production of satisfaction, calm and lasting, but below rapture or admiration, Dr. Johnson says: yet Jeremy Taylor uses it in a stronger manner than either Collier or Pope.

The greatest sweetness, honour, and agreeableness, as to human society, are (as waters in the sea or light in the sun) gathered together by nature, and bestowed on the face of mankind. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hand. p. 94.

There will be occasion for largeness of mind and agreeableness of temper. Collier of Friendship.

It is very much an image of that author's writing, who has an agreeableness that charms us, without correctness; like a mistress, whose faults we see, but love her with them all. Pope.

4. Resemblance; likeness; sometimes with the particle between.

This relation is likewise seen in the agreeableness between man and the other parts of the universe. Grew, Cosmol. Sac.

AGREEABLY.† adv. [from agreeable.]

1. Consistently with; in a manner suitable to.

They may look into the affairs of Judaea and Jerusalem, agreeably to that which is in the law of the Lord. 1 Esd. xviii. 12.

2. Pleasingly.

I did never imagine that so many excellent rules could be produced so advantageously and agreeably. Swift.

3. Alike; in a corresponding manner.

So forth they goe together (God before)

Both clad in shepherds weeds agreeably

And both with shepherds hooks. Spenser, B. Q. vi. 36.

AGREED. part. adj. [from agree.] Settled by consent.

When they had got known and agreed names, to signify those internal operations of their own minds, they were sufficiently furnished to make known by words all their ideas. Locke.

AGRE'INGLY.* adv. [from agree.] In conformity to. Agreeing to which, St. Austin, disputing against the Docetists, contendeth most earnestly. Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 32.

AGRE'INGNESS. n. s. [from agree.] Consistence; suitableness.

AGRE'EMENT. n. s. [agrement, Fr. in law Latin agreementum, which Coke would willingly derive from aggregatio mentium.]

1. Concord.

What agreement is there between the hyena and the dog? and what peace between the rich and the poor. Becket, xiii. 18.

2. Resemblance of one thing to another.

The division and quavering which please so much in music, have an agreement with the glittering of light, as the moonbeams playing upon a wave. Bacon.

Expansion and duration have this further agreement, that though they are both considered by us as having parts, yet their parts are not separable one from another. Locke.

3. Compact; bargain; conclusion of controversy; stipulation.

And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. Isaiah, xxviii. 18.

Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me, and then eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-tree. 2 Kings, xviii. 31.

Frog had given his word that he would meet the company, to talk of this agreement. Arbuthnot, Hist. of John Bull.

AGRE'STICK, or AGRE'STICAL.† adj. [from agrestis, Lat.] Having relation to the country; rude; rustick.

He [Nimrod] was called a hunter, because he was so indeed; but not so only, but an oppressor too; his continual conversation with brute beasts changed his humane disposition into a barbarous and agrestick behaviour. Gregory, Posthuma, p. 222.

AGRICOLA'TION. n. s. [from agricola, Lat.] Culture of the ground, Diet.

AGRICU'LTOR.* n. s. [Lat.] A husbandman. The word, in our language, is modern; but is getting into common use. See AGRICULTURIST.

AGRICU'LURAL.* adj. [from agriculture.] Relating to agriculture.

The agricultural systems of political œconomy will not require so long an explanation as that which I have thought it necessary to bestow upon the mercantile or commercial system. Smith, Wealth of Nations, iv. 9.

AGRICULTURE. n. s. [agricultura, Lat.] The art of cultivating the ground; tillage; husbandry, as distinct from pasturage.

He strictly adviseth not to begin to sow before the setting of the stars; which notwithstanding, without injury to agriculture, cannot be observed in England. Brown, Vulg. Err.

That there was tillage bestowed upon the antediluvian ground, Moses does indeed intimate in general; what sort of tillage that was, is not expressed: I hope to shew, that their agriculture was nothing near so laborious and troublesome, nor did it take up so much time as ours doth. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The disposition of Ulysses inclined him to war, rather than the more lucrative, but more secure, method of life, by agriculture and husbandry. Broom, Notes on the Odyssey.

AGRICU'LURIST.* n. s. One who is skilled in the art of cultivating the ground; one who studies agriculture in any of its branches. This word is of recent introduction into our language; but for centuries perhaps, are now without their Society of Agriculturists.

AGRICU'LTURN.* n. s. The science of agriculture. Modern.

AGRO'NY.* n. s. [agronia, Lat.] The name of a plant. The leaves are rough, hairy, pinnated, and grow alternately on the branches; the flower-cup consists of one leaf, which is divided into five segments; the flowers have five or six leaves, and are formed into a long spike, which expand in form of a rose; the fruit is oblong, dry, and prickly, like the burdock; in each of which are contained two kernels. Miller.

To AGRISE. † v. n. [agujan, Sax.] To look terrible, Dr. Johnson says; and adds that it is out of use, citing only the name of Spenser. Neither as a verb neuter, nor in such sense, is the word found in that poet. In Chaucer, however, this verb occurs, but not in that sense. It is there equivalent to the Latin horresco, to begin to shiver for fear, or through pity or abhorrence; as we now say, "it made one shudder to hear it."

The kinges herte of pitee gan agrie,

When he saw so benigne a creature

Fall in disese and in misaventure. Chaucer, Man of Lawes Tale.

To AGRISE. † v. a.

1. To affright; to terrify. Hence our adjective grisly.
And pourcing forth their bloud in brutish wize,
That any iron eyes, to see, it would agrise.

Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 28.

To hide the terror of her uncouth hew
From mortall eyes that should be sore agrized. Ib. vii. vii. 6.

2. To disfigure; to make frightful. The word in the following example is that which Dr. Johnson converted into agreeze, and explained accordingly.

The waves thereof so slow and sluggish were,
Engrost with mud, which did them fowle agrise,
That every weighty thing they did upheare.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. vi. 46.

Yet not the colour of the troubled deep,
Those spots supposed, nor the fogs that rise
From the dull earth, me any whit agrise.

Drayton, Man in the Moon.

AGRO'UND. adv. [from a and ground.]

1. Stranded; hindered by the ground from passing farther.

With our great ships we durst not approach the coast, we having been all of us aground. Sir Walter Raleigh, Essays.
Say what you seek, and whither were you bound?

Were you, by stress of weather, cast aground. Dryden, F. n.

2. It is likewise figuratively used, for being hindered in the progress of affairs; as, the negotiators were aground at that objection.

AGUE. † n. s. [Goth. agis, terror. This etymology is given by Mr. Horne Tooke, to use his own words, as, "the long-sought etymology of our English word ague," and is highly commended, on account of the reasons by which Mr. Tooke ingeniously supports it, by Mr. Boucher; viz. 1. Because the Anglo-Saxons and English, in their adoption of the Gothic substantives, (most of which terminate in s), always drop the terminating s. 2. Because, though the English word is written ague, the common people and the country people always pronounce it aghy, or aguy. 3. Because the distinguishing mark of this complaint is the trembling or shuddering; and from that distinguishing circumstance it would naturally take its name. 4. Because the French, from whom the term ague is supposed to have been borrowed, never called the complaint by that name. Diversions of Purley, vol. i. p. 462: Ague, Fr. ague is the etymology adopted by Johnson; but the Gothic word, denoting fear or trembling, had been considered the parent of our English expression long before the existence of Mr. Tooke's remarks on our language. See the Eng. and Swedisch Dict. of Serenius, 2d edit. 1757. under the word AGUE, viz. "M. Goth. Agis, terror, &c." An intermitting fever, with cold fits succeeded by hot. The cold fit is, in popular language, more particularly called the ague, and the hot the fever.

Our castle's strength
Will laugh a siege to scorn. Here let them lie,
Till famine and the ague eat them up. Shakspeare.
Though.

He feels the heats of youth, and colds of age,
Yet neither tempers nor corrects the other;
As if there were an ague in his nature,
That still inclines to one extreme. Denham, Sophy.

To A'GUE. * v. a. To strike as with an ague.

Name a danger,
Whose very face would fright all womanhood,
And manhood put in trance; nay, whose aspect
Would ague such as should but hear it told.

Heywood, Challenge for Beauty.

A'GUED. adj. [from ague.] Struck with an ague;
shivering; chill; cold: a word in little use.

All hurt behind, backs red, and faces pale,
With flight and agued fear! Shakspeare, Coriol.

A'GUEFIT. n. s. [from ague and fit.] The paroxysm of the ague.

This aguefit of fear is overblown. Shakspeare, Richard II.

A'GUEPROOF. adj. [from ague and proof.] Proof against agues; able to resist the causes which produce agues, without being affected.

When the rain came to wet me once, and the wind to make me chatter; when the thunder would not peace at my bidding; there I found 'em, there I smelt 'em out. They told me I was every thing: 'tis a lie: I am not agueproof.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

To AGUE'RRY. * v. a. [Fr. aguerrier.] To enure to the hardships of war; to instruct in the art of war. An army the best aguerried of any troops in Europe that have never seen an enemy. Lyttellon.

AGUE-SPELL. * n. s. [from ague and spell.] A charm for the ague.

The mountebank now treads the stage, and sells
His pills, his balsams, and his ague-spells. Gay, Pastoral 6.

AGUE-STRUCK. * adj. [from ague and struck.] Stricken as with an ague.

As the signs of heaven, and the earthquake, he was ague-struck with fear. Henry, Sermon p. 72.

A'GUE-TREE. n. s. [from ague and tree.] A name sometimes given to sassafras. Dict.

To AGUISE. v. a. [from a and guise. See GUISE.] To dress; to adorn; to deck; a word not now in use.

As her fantastick wit did most delight,
Sometimes her heed she fondly would aguisse
With gaudy garlands, or fresh flowers dight
About her neck, or rings of rushes plight. Spenser, F. Q.

AGUISE. * n. s. [from the verb.] Dress; ornament. Obsolete.

The glory of the court, their fashions,
And brave aguisse, with all their princely state. More, Song of the Soul, p. 7.

A'GUISE. † adj. [from ague.] Having the qualities of an ague.

This Alastor hath left nothing unsearched by his impudent and licentious lying; he was in his cold quaking fit all the while, but so calm and so serene, but now the change of his ague has come, and his ague love now glows and burns, then chills and shakes, and the cold fit returns. Granville.

A'GUISHNESS. n. s. [from ague.] The quality of resembling an ague.

AH. interjection.

1. A word noting sometimes dislike and censure.

Ah! sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters, they have forsaken the Lord. Isaiah, i. 4.

2. Sometimes contempt and exultation.

Let them not say in their hearts, Ah! so we would have it: let them not say, we have swallowed him up. Psalms xxxv. 25.

3. Sometimes, and most frequently, compassion and complaint.

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;
But ah! the mighty bliss is fugitive:
Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,
And age and death's inexorable doom. Dryden, Virg. Georg.

Ah me! the blooming pride of May,
And that of beauty, are but one:
At morn both flourish bright and gay,
Both fade at evening, pale, and gone. Prior.

1. When it is followed by that, it expresses vehement desire.

In goodness, as in greatness, they excell;
Ah! that we lov'd ourselves but half so well. Dryden, Juv.

AHA', AHA'! interj. A word intimating triumph and contempt.

They opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha! our eye hath seen it. Psalms xxxv. 21.

AHEAD. adv. [from a and head.]

1. Farther onward than another; a sea-term.

And now the mighty Centaur seems to lead,
And now the speedy Dolphin gets ahead. Dryden, Æn.

2. Headlong; precipitantly: used of animals, and figuratively of men.

It is mightily the fault of parents, guardians, tutors, and governors, that so many men miscarry. They suffer them at first to run ahead, and, when perverse inclinations are advanced into habits, there is no dealing with them. I. Estrange, Fab.

AHEIGHT. adv. [from a and height.] Aloft; on high.

But have I fall'n or no? —

— From the dread summit of this chalky bourn!

Look up ahight, the shrill-gorg'd lark so far

Cannot be seen or heard. Shakspeare, King Lear.

AHIGH.* adv. On high.

One heav'd ahigh to be hurl'd down below.

Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

AHOLD.* adv. A sea-term. [To lay a ship ahold,

Mr. Steevens says, is to bring her to lie as near the wind as she can, in order to keep clear of the land, and get her out to sea.]

Lay her [the ship] a-hold, a-holds set her two courses; off to sea again, lay her off. Shakspeare, Tempest.

AHOUI. n. s. The name of a poisonous plant.

AHOY.* interj. [from hoy.] A sea-term; an exclamation of much the same import as holla. We have hoy in our elder language.

Ahoy! you Bumboat, bring yourself this way.

Cumberland, Com. of The Walloons.

AHUNGRY.* adj. [from a and hungry.] Thus the expletive an is prefixed to the verb hunger; as, he was an-hungred.] Hungry; in want of meat.

I am not ahungry, I thank you, forsooth.

Shakspeare, Merry W. of Wind.

AJA'R.* adv. Half opened. See JAR, n. s.

TO AID. v. a. [aid, Fr. adjutare, Lat.] To help; to support; to succour.

Into the lake he leapt, his lord to aid,
And of him catching hold, him strongly staid
From drowning. Spenser, F. Q.

Neither shall they give any thing unto them that make war — on them, or aid them with victuals, weapons, money, or — ps. Maccabees, viii. 26.

By the loud trumpet, which our courage aid,
We learn that sound as well as sense persuades. Roscommon.

AID. n. s. [Sax. aibe.]

1. Help; support.

The memory of useful things may receive considerable aid, if they are thrown into verse. Watts, Imp. of the Mind.

Your patrimonial stores in peace possess;

Undoubted all your filial claims confess:

Your private right should impious power invade;

The peers of Ithaca would arm in aid. Pope, Odys.

2. The person that gives help or support; a helper auxiliary.

Thou hast said, it is not good that man should be alone; let us make unto him an aid, like unto himself. Tobit, viii. 6.

Great aids came in to him partly upon missives and partly voluntaries from many parts. Bacon, Hen. VII.

3. In law. [low Lat. aidæ.]

A subsidy. Aid is also particularly used in matter of pleading, for a petition made in court, for the calling in of help from another, that hath an interest in the cause in question; and is likewise both to give strength to the party that prays in aid of him, and also to avoid a prejudice accruing toward his own right, except it be prevented: as, when a tenant for term of life, courtesy, &c. being impleaded touching his estate, 'ne may pray in aid of him in the reversion; that is, entreat the court that he may be called in by writ, to allege what he thinks good for the maintenance both of his right and his own. Corvel.

The actions of war, — which her majesty, either in her own defence, or in just and honourable aids, hath undertaken.

Bacon, Observ. upon a Libel, 1592.

'Tis thought that the last breach of the match with Spain, which for many years he [K. James I.] had so vehemently desired, took too deep an impression in him; and that he was forced to rush into a war now in his declining age, having lived in a continual uninterrupted peace his whole life, except some collateral aids he had sent his son-in-law. Howell, Letters, i. iv. 7.

AIDANCE. n. s. [old Fr. aidance.] Help; support; a word little used.

Oft I have seen a timely parted ghost,
Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless,
Being all descended to the lab'ring heart,
Who, in the conflict that it holds with death,
Attracts the same for aidance 'gainst the enemy.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

AIDANT. adj. [aidant, Fr.] Helping; helpful; not in use.

All you unpublish'd virtues of the earth,
Spring with my tears, be aidant and remediate
In the good man's distress. Shakspeare, King Lear.

AIDE-DE-CAMP.* n. s. [Fr.] A military officer, employed under a general to convey his orders. A lieutenant-general has two of these assistants; a major-general, one. The word has been in use, among us, more than a century; as our elder dictionaries shew.

AIDER. n. s. [old Fr. aidew, aideour.] He that brings aid or help; an helper; an ally.

All along as he went, were punished the adherents and aiders of the late rebels. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Had he more aiders then?

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

AIDLESS. adj. [from aid and less, an inseparable particle.] Helpless; unsupported; undefended.

Alone he entered
The mortal gate o' the city, which he painted
With shunless destiny: aidless came off,
And, with a sudden re-enforcement, struck
Coriol. like a planet. Shakspeare, Coriol.

He had met,
Already, ere my best speed could prevent;
The aidless innocent lady, his wish'd prey.

Milton, Comus.

A'IGRE.* n. s. The impetuous flowing of the sea; the same as eagre, which sec. In Lincolnshire it is called the aigre, or aker; which latter word is found in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, and rendered impetus.

A'IGNET.* n. s. [Fr. aigrette.] The egret, or heron. See EGRET.

A'IGULET. n. s. [aigulet, Fr.] A point with tags; points of gold at the end of fringes. See AGLET.

It all above besprinkled was throughout
With golden aigulets that glistered bright,
Like twinkling stars, and all the skirt about
Was hemm'd with golden fringes.

Spenser, F. Q.

To AIL.† v. a. [Goth. aglo, tribulation. Sax. eglan, to be troublesome.]

1. To pain; to trouble; to give pain.

And the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, what aileth thee, Hagar? fear not: for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. Gen. xxi. 17.

2. It is used, in a sense less determinate, for to affect in any manner; as, something ails me that I cannot sit still; what ails the man that he laughs without reason?

Love smil'd, and thus said, Want join'd to desire is unhappy; but if he nought do desire, what can Heraclitus ail? Sidney.

What ails me, that I cannot lose thy thought!

Command the empress hither to be brought,

I in her death shall some diversion find,

And rid my thoughts at once of woman-kind.

Dryden, Tyrant. Love.

3. To feel pain; to be incommoded.

4. It is remarkable, that this word is never used but with some indefinite term, or the word nothing; as, What ails him? What does he ail? He ails something; he ails nothing. Something ails him; nothing ails him. Thus we never say, a fever ails him, or he ails a fever, or use definite terms with this verb.

AIL.† n. s. [Goth. aglo, Sax. egle.] A disease.

Or heal, O Narses, thy obscener ail.

Pope.

A'ILMENT. n. s. [from ail.] Pain; disease.

Little ailments oft attend the fair,

Not decent for a husband's eye or ear.

Granville.

I am never ill but I think of your ailments, and repine that they mutually hinder our being together.

Swift, Let.

A'ILING. part. adj. [from To ail.] Sickly; full of complaints.

To AIM.† v. n. [It is derived by Skinner from esmer, to point at; a word which I have not found, Dr. Johnson says. But esmer may be found in Cotgrave, with the interpretation of to aim, to level at. See also aymer; Carpentier's Suppl. Ducange and Roquesfort's Gloss. "presenter, dresser."]

1. To endeavour to strike with a missile weapon; to direct towards; with the particle at.

Aim'st thou at princes, all amaz'd they said,
The last of games?

Pope, Odys.

2. To point the view, or direct the steps towards any thing; to tend towards; to endeavour to reach or obtain: with to formerly, now only with at.

Lo, here the world is bliss; so here the end

To which all men do aim, rich to be made,

Such grace now to be happy is before thee laid.

Spenser, F. Q.

Another kind there is, which although we desire for itself, as health, and virtue, and knowledge, nevertheless they are not the last mark whereat we aim, but have their further end whereunto they are referred.

Hooker.

Sworn with applause, and aiming still at more,

He now provokes the sea gods from the shore.

Dryden, Æn.

Religion tends to the ease and pleasure, the peace and tranquillity of our minds, which all the wisdom of the world did always aim at, as the utmost felicity of this life. Tillotson.

3. To guess.

To AIM. v. a. To direct the missile weapon; more particularly taken for the act of pointing the weapon by the eye, before its dismissal from the hand.

And proud Idæus, Priam's charioteer,

Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy spear. Dryden.

AIM. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The direction of a missile weapon.

Ascanius, young and eager of his game,

Soon bent his bow, uncertain of his aim;

But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,

Which pierc'd his bowels through his panting sides.

Dryden, Æn. vii. 691

2. The point to which the thing thrown is directed.

Arrows fled not swifter toward their aim.

Than did our soldiers, aiming at their safety,

Fly from the field.

Shakspeare, Henry IV. P. II.

3. In a figurative sense, a purpose; a scheme; an intention; a design.

He trusted to have equal'd the Most High,

If he oppos'd: and, with ambitious aim

Against the throne, and monarchy of God,

Rais'd impious war.

Milton, P. L. i. 41.

But see, how oft ambitious aims are crost,

And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost.

Pope.

4. The object of a design; the thing after which any one endeavours.

The safest way is to suppose, that the epistle has but one aim, till, by a frequent perusal of it, you are forced to see there are distinct independent parts.

Locke, Essay on St. Paul's Epistles.

5. Conjecture; guess.

It is impossible, by aim, to tell it; and, for experience and knowledge thereof, I do not think that there was ever any of the particulars thereof.

Spencer on Ireland.

There is a history in all men's lives,

Figuring the nature of the times deceas'd;

The which observ'd, a man may prophesy,

With a near aim, of the main chance of things,

As yet not come to life, which, in their seeds

And weak beginnings, lie intreasur'd.

Shakspeare, Henry IV.

A'IMLESS.* adj. [from aim and less.] Without aim.

In his blind aimless hand a pile he shook,

And threw it not in vain.

Mary's Lament, b. 3.

The Turks, half asleep, ran about in aimless confusion.

Dryden, Don Sebastian.

AIR. n. s. [air, Fr. air, Lat.]

1. The element encompassing the terraqueous globe.

If I were to tell what I mean by the word air, I may say.

it is that fine matter which we breathe in and breathe out continually; or it is that thin fluid body, in which the birds fly, a little above the earth; or it is that invisible matter, which fills all places near the earth, or which immediately encompasses the globe of earth and water.

Watts, Logick.

2. The state of the air; or the air considered with regard to health.

There be many good and healthful airs, that do appear by habitation and other proofs, that differ not in smell from other airs.

Bacon, Natural History, No. 904.

3. Air in motion; a small gentle wind.

Fresh gales, and gentle airs,

Whisper'd it to the woods, and from their wings

Flung rose, thung odours from the spicy shrub

Disporting!

Milton, P. L. viii. 513

But safe repose, without an air of breath,

Dwells here, and a dumb quiet next to death.

Dryden.

Let vernal airs through trembling osiers play.

And Albion's cliffs resound the rural lay.

Pope, Pastoral.

4. Scent; vapour.

AIR

Stinks which the nostrils straight abhor are not the most pernicious; but such airs as have some similitude with man's body; and so insinuate themselves and betray the spirits. Bacon.

5. Blast; pestilential vapour.

All the stor'd vengeance of heaven fall
On her ingrateful top! strike her young bones,
You taking airs, with lameness. Shakspeare, King Lear.

6. Any thing light or uncertain; that is as light as air.

O momentary grace of mortal men,
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God!
Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks,
Lives like a drunken sailor on a mast,
Ready with every nod to tumble down. Shakspeare, Rich. III

7. The open weather; air unconfined.

The garden was inclos'd within the square,
Where young Emilia took the morning air. Dryden, Fables.

8. Vent; utterance; emission into the air.

I would have ask'd you, if I durst for shame,
If still you lov'd? you gave it air before me.
But ah! why were we not both of a sex?
For then we might have lov'd without a crime. Dryden.

9. Publication; exposure to the publick view and knowledge.

I am sorry to find it has taken air, that I have some hand in these papers. Pope, Letters.

10. Intelligence; information. This is not now in use.

It grew from the airs, which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here. Bacon, Henry VII.

11. Musick, whether light or serious; sound; air modulated.

This musick crept by me upon the waters,
Allaying both their fury, and my passion,
With its sweet air. Shakspeare, Tempest.

Call in some musick; I have heard, soft airs
Can charm our senses, and expel our cares. Denham, Sophy.
The same airs, which some entertain with most delightful transports, to others are importune. Glauville, Scopsia Sciant.

Since we have such a treasury of words, so proper for the airs of musick, I wonder that persons should give so little attention. Addison, Spectator, No. 406.

Rome on the swelling notes, our souls aspire,
While solemn airs improve the sacred fire;
And angels lean from heaven to hear!
—When the soul is sunk with cares,

Exalts her in enlivening airs. Pope, St. Cecilia.

12. Poetry; a song.

The repeated air
Of sad Electra's poet, had the power
To save the Athenian walls from ruin bare. Milton, P. R.

13. The mien, or manner, of the person; the look.

Her graceful innocence, her every air,
Of gesture, or least action, over-aw'd
His malice. Milton, P. L.

For the air of youth
Hopeful and cheerful, in thy blood shall reign
A melancholy damp of cold and dry,
To weigh thy spirits down; and last consume
The balm of life. Milton, P. L.

But, having the life before us, beside the experience of all they knew, it is no wonder to hit some airs and features, which they have missed. Dryden, on Dramatick Poetry.

There is something wonderfully divine in the airs of this picture. Addison, Remarks on Italy.

And should the Graces all thy figures place,
And breathe an air divine on every face. Pope.

14. An affected or laboured manner or gesture; as, a lofty air, a gay air.

Whom Ancus follows, with a fawning air;
Bee-vain within, and proudly popular. Dryden, Æn. vi.

There are of these sort of beauties, which last but for a moment; as, the different airs of an assembly, upon the sight of an unexpected and uncommon object, some particularity of a violent passion, some graceful action, a smile, a glance of an eye, a disdainful look, a look of gravity, and a thousand other such like things. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

Their whole lives were employed in intrigues of state, and they naturally gave themselves airs of kings and princes, of which the ministers of other nations are only the representatives. Addison, Remarks on Italy.

To curl their waving hairs,
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs. Pope.

He assumes and affects an entire set of very different airs; he conceives himself a being of a superiour nature. Swift.

15. Appearance.

As it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world. Pope, Ded. to Rape of the Lock.

16. [In horsemanship.] Airs denote the artificial or practised motion of a managed horse.

Chambers.

To AIR, v. a. [from the noun air.]

1. To expose to the air; to open to the air.

The others make it a matter of small commendation in itself, if they, who wear it, do nothing else but air the robes, which their place requireth. Hooker, v. 29.

Fleas breed principally of straw or mats, where there hath been a little moisture, or the chamber and bed-straw kept close, and not aired. Bacon, Natural History, No. 694.

We have had, in our time, experience twice or thrice, when both the judges that sat upon the jail, and numbers of those that attended the business, or were present, sickened upon it, and died. Therefore, it were good wisdom, that, in such cases, the jail were aired, before they were brought forth. Bacon, Natural History, No. 914.

As the ants were airing their provisions one winter, up comes a hungry grasshopper to them, and begs a charity. L'Estrange, Fables.

Or wicker-baskets weave, or air the corn. Dryden, Virgil.

2. To gratify, by enjoying the open air; with the reciprocal pronoun.

Nay, stay a little —
Were you but riding forth to air yourself,
Such parting were too petty. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

I ascended the highest hills of Bagdat, in order to pass the rest of the day in meditation and prayers. As I was here airing myself on the tops of the mountains, I fell into a profound contemplation on the vanity of human life. Addison, Spect.

3. To air liquors; to warm them by the fire: a term used in conversation.

4. To breed in nests. In this sense it is derived from airy, a nest. It is now out of use.

You may add their busy, dangerous, discourteous, yes, and sometimes despicable stealing, one from another, of the eggs and young ones; who, if they were allowed to air naturally and quietly, there would be store sufficient, to kill not only the partridges, but even all the good housewives chickens in a country. Carver's Survey of Cornwall.

AIRBALL'OOD. * n. s. [from air and balloon.] A machine, filled with air, which mounts to a considerable height. See BALLOON.

AIRBLADDER. n. s. [from air and bladder.]

1. Any cuticle or vesicle filled with air.

The pulmonary artery and vein pass along the surfaces of these airbladders, in an infinite number of ramifications. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. The bladder in fishes, by the contraction and dilatation of which, they vary the properties of their weight to that of their bulk, and rise or fall.

Though the airbladder in fishes seems necessary for swimming, yet some are so formed as to swim without it. Cuvier.

AIR-BORN. * adj. Born of the air.

And see! the air-born racers start. Shakspeare, As You Like It.

Impudent of the town. Shakspeare, As You Like It.

AIR-BRAVING. * a part. adj. [from air and brave.]

Defying the winds, Shakspeare, As You Like It.

Your stately and airbraving towers. Shakspeare, As You Like It.

AIRBUILT. adj. [from air and build.] Built in the air, without any solid foundation.

Hence the fool's paradise, the statesman's scheme,
The airbuilt castle, and the golden dream,
The maid's romantick wish, the chymist's flame,
And poet's vision of eternal fame. Pope, Dunciad. iii.

AIR-DRAWN. adj. [from air and drawn.] Drawn or painted in air: a word not used.

This is the very painting of your fear,
This is the air-drawn dagger, which, you said,
Led you to Duncan. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

AIR EMBRACED. * adj. [from air and embraced.]

He, like an all-unfolding canopy,
Fram'd the vast concave of the spangled sky;
And in the air-embraced waters set
The basis of his hanging cabinet. Sandys, Ps. 104.

A'IRER. n. s. [from To air.] He that exposes to the air.

A'IRHOLE. n. s. [from air and hole.] A hole to admit the air.

A'IRINESS. n. s. [from airy.]

1. Openness; exposure to the air.

2. Lightness; gaiety; levity.

The French have indeed taken worthy pains to make classic learning speak their language; if they have not succeeded, it must be imputed to a certain talkativeness and airiness represented in their tongue, which will never agree with the sedateness of the Romans, or the solemnity of the Greeks. Felton.

A'IRING. n. s. [from air.] A short journey or ramble to enjoy the free air.

This little fleet serves only to fetch them wine and corn, and to give their ladies an airing in the summer-season. Addison.

A'IRLESS. adj. [from air.] Wanting communication with the free air.

Nor stony tower, nor walls of beaten brass,
Nor airless dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shakspeare, J. Caesar.

A'IRLING. n. s. [from air, for gayety.] A young, light, thoughtless, gay person.

Some more there be, slight airlings, will be won
With dogs, and horses, and perhaps a whore. B. Jonson.

A'IRGUN. * n. s. A gun so contrived as to be charged with air, instead of powder. Dich.

A'IRPOISE. * n. s. An instrument to measure the weight of the air.

Mr. Hooke had read in the minutes of the last meeting, that he had contrived a barometer, by which an infinite number of small mutations of the air might be discovered, which would be wholly invisible and insensible by the more common airpoises. Hist. Royal Soc. iii. 363.

A'IRPUMP. n. s. [from air and pump.]

A machine by whose means the air is exhausted out of proper vessels. The principle on which it is built, is the elasticity of the air; as that on which the waterpump is founded, is on the gravity of the air. The invention of this curious instrument is ascribed to Otto de Guericke, consul of Magdebourg, in 1654. But his machine laboured under several defects, the force necessary to work it was very great, and the progress very slow; it was to be kept under water, and allowed of no change of subjects for experiments. Mr. Boyle, with the assistance of Dr. Hooke, removed several inconveniences; though, still, the working was laborious, by reason of the pressure of the atmosphere at every exsuction. This labour has been since removed by Mr. Hawksbee, who, by adding a second barrel and piston, to rise as the other fell, and fall as it rose, made the pressure of the atmosphere on the descending one, of as much service as it was of disservice in the ascending one. Wren made a further improvement, by reducing the alternate motion of the hand and winch to a circular one. Chambers.

The air that, in exhausted receivers of airpumps, is exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as true and genuine as to elasticity and density, or rarefaction, as that we respire in; and yet this factitious air is so far from being fit to be breathed in, that it kills animals in a moment, even sooner than the absence of air, or a vacuum itself. Bentley.

A'IRSHAFT. n. s. [from air and shaft.] A passage for the air into mines and subterraneous places.

By the sinking of an airshaft, the air hath liberty to circulate, and carry out the steams both of the miners breath and the damps, which would otherwise stagnate there. Ray.

A'IR-STIRRING. * adj. [from air and stirring.] That which puts the air in motion.

—This plague was staid at last
By blasts of strong air-stirring Northern wind. May's Lucan, v. 6.

A'IR-THREATENING. * adj. [from air and threaten.]

A fine compound, and well adapted in the following ancient description.] Threatening the air.

As from air-threatening tops of cedars tall,
The leaves, that whilom were so fresh and green,
In healthless autumn to the ground do fall,
And others in their rooms at spring are seen:
So proudest states, amongst the states of men,
Now mount the lofty top of fortune's wheel,
Now fall again, now firmly stand, now reel. Mir. for Mag. p. 563.

A'IRY. adj. [from air; aëreus, Lat.]

1. Composed of air.

The first is the transmission, or emission, of the thinner and more airy parts of bodies; as, in odours and infections: and this is, of all the rest, the most corporeal. Bacon.

2. Relating to the air; belonging to the air.

There are fishes that have wings, that are no strangers to the airy region. Boyle.

3. High in air.

Whole rivers here forsake the fields below,
And, wondering at their height, through airy channels flow. Addison.

4. Open to the free air.

Joy'd to range abroad in fresh attire
Through the wide compass of the airy coast. Spenser.

5. Light as air; thin; unsubstantial; without solidity.

I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality, that it is but a shadow's shadow. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Still may the dog the wandering troops constrain
Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train. Dryden.

6. Wanting reality; having no steady foundation in truth or nature; vain; trifling.

Nor think with wind
Of airy threats to awe whom yet with deeds
Thou can'st not. Milton, P. L.

Nor (to avoid such meanness) soaring high,
With empty sound, and airy notions, fly. Roscommon.

I have found a complaint concerning the scarcity of money, which occasioned many airy propositions for the remedy of it, Temple, Miscellanies.

7. Fluttering; loose; as if to catch the air; full of levity.

The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits; but the weight of gold, and of embroideries is reserved for queens and goddesses. Dryden.

* By this name of ladies, he means all young persons, slender, finely shaped, airy, and delicate: such as are nymphs and Naiads. Dryden.

A K I

3. Gay; sprightly; full of mirth; vivacious; lively; spirited; light of heart.

He that is merry and airy at shore, when he sees a sad tempest on the sea, or dances when God thunders from heaven, regards not when God speaks to all the world. Bp. Taylor.

AIRY-FLYING. * adj. [from air and fly.] Flying like air.

Behoves no more

But sidelong to the gently-waving wind,
To lay the well-tun'd instrument reclin'd,
From which with airy flying fingers light,
Beyond each mortal touch the most refin'd,
The god of winds drew sounds of deep delight,
Whence with just cause the harp of Evans it light.

Thompson, Cast. of Ind. c. 1.

AIRY-LIGHT. * adj. Light as air. Milton, in his accustomed manner, writes it airy.

His sleep

Was airy-light, from pure digestion bred. Milton, P. L. v. 4.
AISLE. † n. s. [Thus the word is written by Addison, but perhaps improperly; since it seems deducible only from either aile, a wing, or allee, a path, and is therefore to be written aile, Dr. Johnson says; but perhaps Addison had in mind the Latin ascellæ, used for alæ. V. Du Cange.] The walks in a church, or wings of a quire.

The abbey is by no means so magnificent as one would expect from its endowments. The church is one huge nef, with a double aisle to it; and, at each end, is a large quire.

Addison.

There are also alæ ecclesiarum, which we meet with in Church-writers; as we corruptly call them the isles of churches, &c. Abp. Sancroft, Sermon, p. 152.

The Latin Church called them alæ, wings; thence the French, les ailes; and we more corruptly, iles; from their resemblance of the church to a dove.

Sir G. Wheeler's Descript. of Anc. Churches, p. 82.

AIT, or EYGHIT. n. s. [supposed, by Skinner, to be corrupted from islet.] A small island in a river.

AJUTAGE. n. s. [Fr.] An additional pipe to water-works. Dict.

TO AKE. † v. n. [from αἶμα, Gr. and therefore more grammatically written ache. Sax. ace, Germ. ach.]

1. To feel a lasting pain, generally of the internal parts; distinguished from smart, which is commonly used of uneasiness in the external parts; but this is no accurate account.

To sue, and be deny'd, such common grace,
My wounds ake at you!

Shakespeare.

Let our fingers ake, and it endues
Our other healthful members with a sense
Of pain.

Shakespeare.

Were the pleasure of drinking accompanied, the very moment, with that sick stomach and aking head, which, in some men, are sure to follow, I think, no body would ever let wine touch his lips. Locke.

His limbs must ake, with daily toils oppress,
Ere long-wish'd night brings necessary rest.

Prior.

2. It is frequently applied, in an improper sense, to the heart; as, the heart akes; to imply grief or fear. Shakespeare has used it, still more licentiously, of the soul.

My soul akes

To know when two authorities are up,
Neither supreme, how soon confusion
May enter.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

Here shame dissuades him, there his fear prevails,
And each, by turns, his aking heart assails.

Addison.

However men may put the best face upon things, yet certainly there is no such pain as an aking angry conscience under a merry aspect.

South, Sermon, viii. 178.

AIRY. † adj. [from a and kin, perhaps corrupted from of, i. e. of kin.]

1. Related to; allied by blood: used of persons.

A L A

I do not envy thee, Pamela; only I wish, that, being thy sister in nature, I were not so far off akin in fortune. Sidney.

2. Allied to by nature; partaking of the same properties: used of things.

The cankered passion of envy is nothing akin to the silly envy of the ass. L'Estrange, Fables.

Some limbs again in bulk or stature

Unlike, and not akin by nature,
In concert act, like modern friends,
Because one serves the other's ends.

Prior.

He separates it from questions with which it may have been complicated, and distinguishes it from questions which may be akin to it. Watts, Imp. of the Mind.

AL, ATTLE, ADALE, † do all seem to be corruptions of the Saxon Æpel, noble, famous; as also, Alling and Adling, are corruptions of Æpelung, noble, splendid, famous.

AL, Ald, being initials, are derived from the Saxon Ealh, ancient; and so, oftentimes, the initial all, being melted by the Normans, from the Saxon ealh. Gibson's Camden.

AL is also the Arabick prefix to many of our words; as, al-coran, al-cove, al-chymy, al-embick, al-manuck, &c.

ALABASTER. n. s. [ἀλάβαστρον.] A kind of soft marble, easier to cut, and less durable, than the other kinds; some is white, which is most common; some of the colour of horn, and transparent; some yellow, like honey, marked with veins. The ancients used it to make boxes for perfumes. Savary.

Yet I'll not shed her blood,

Nor scar that whiter skin of hers than snow,
And smooth as monumental alabaster.

Shakespeare.

ALABASTER. adj. Made of alabaster.

I cannot forbear mentioning part of an alabaster column, found in the ruins of Livia's portico. It is of the colour of fire, and may be seen over the high altar of St. Maria in Campitello; for they have cut it into two pieces, and fixed it, in the shape of a cross, in a hole of the wall; so that the light passing through it, makes it look to those in the church, like a huge transparent cross of amber. Addison on Italy.

ALACK. interject. [This word seems only the corruption of alas.] Alas; an expression of sorrow.

Alack! when once our grace we have forgot,
Nothing goes right; we would, and we would not.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

At thunder now no more I start,

Than at the rumbling of a cart:

Nay, what's incredible, alack!

I hardly hear a woman's clack.

Swift.

ALACKADAY. interjection. [This, like the former, is for alas the day.] A word noting sorrow and melancholy.

ALACRIOUSLY. adv. [from alacrius, supposed to be formed from alacris; but of alacrius I have found no example.] Cheerfully; without dejection.

Epaminondas alacriously expired, in confidence that he left behind him a perpetual memory of the victories he had achieved for his country. Government of the Tongue.

ALACRIOUSNESS. * n. s. [from alacrius.] Briskness, liveliness.

To infuse some life, some alacriness into you, for that purpose, I shall descend to the more sensitive, quickening, enlivening part of the text. Hammond, Sermon, p. 553.

ALACRITY. n. s. [alacritas, Lat.] Cheerfulness, expressed by some outward token; sprightliness; gaiety; liveliness; cheerful willingness.

These orders were, on all sides, yielded unto with no less alacrity of mind, than cities, unable to hold out any longer, are wont to shew when they take conditions, such as it liketh him to offer them, which hath them in the narrow straits of advantage. Hooker.

A L A

Give me a bowl of wine;
I have not that alacrity of spirit,
Nor cheer of mind, that I was wont to have. Shakespeare.
He glad, that now his sea should find a shore,
With fresh alacrity, and force renew'd,
Springs upward. Milton, P. L.

Never did I then more joyfully obey,
Or sooner understood the sign to fly:
With such alacrity they bore away,
As if, to praise them, all the states stood by. Dryden.

ALAMIRE.† n. s. The lowest note but one in Guido Arctine's scale of musick.

She run through all the keys from a-lami-re to double gammut. Gayton, Notes on D. Quir. p. 83.

ALAMO'DE.† adv. [à la mode, Fr.] According to the fashion: a low word. It is used likewise by shopkeepers for a kind of thin silken manufacture.

Her alamodes are suitable shapings of her mind to all changes of occurrences or condition; when wooed, not scornful; when wed, not imperious or various; in abundance, moderate; in straightenings, content or patient.

Whitlock, Manners of the Eng. p. 354.
The principal branch of the alamode [style] is the prurient, a style greatly advanced and honoured of late by the practice of persons of the first quality.

ALAND. adv. [from a for at, and land.] At land; landed; on the dry ground.

He only, with the prince his cousin, were cast aland, far off from the place whither their desires would have guided them. Sidney.

Three more, fierce Eurus, in his angry mood,
Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand,
And, in mid ocean, left them moor'd aland. Dryden.

ALA'RM.† n. s. [from the French, à l'arme, to arms; as crier à l'arme, to call to arms.]

1. A cry by which men are summoned to their arms; as, at the approach of an enemy.

When the congregation is to be gathered together, you shall blow, but you shall not sound an alarm. Numb. 10.

God himself is with us for our captain, and his priests with sounding trumpets, to cry alarms against you. Chron. xiii. 12.

The trumpets loud clangour
Excites us to arms,
With shrill notes of anger,
And mortal alarms. Dryden.

Taught by this stroke, renounce the war's alarms,
And learn to tremble at the name of arms. Pope, Iliad.

2. A cry, or notice, of any danger approaching; as, an alarm of fire.

3. Any tumult or disturbance.

Crowds of rivals for thy mother's charms,
Thy palace fills with insults and alarms. Pope, Odyssey.

4. A clock that strikes an alarm.

If a stranger open it, it setteth an alarm a-going, which the stranger cannot stop from running out.

Marq. Worcester, Cent. of Inv. 72.

The alarm in the watch will awaken men to a reflection upon the art of its contriver. Spencer, on Prodiges, p. 124.

To ALA'RM. v. a. [from alarm, the noun.]

1. To call to arms.

2. To disturb; as, with the approach of an enemy.

The wasp the hive alarms
With louder hums, and with unequal arms. Addison.

3. To surprise with the apprehension of any danger.

When rage misguides me, or when fear alarms,
When pain distresses, or when pleasure charms. Tickell.

4. To disturb in general.

His son, Cupavo, dash'd the briny flood;
Upon his steed a branny Centaur stood,
Who heav'd a rock, and threat'ning still to throw,
With lifted hand alarm'd the seas below. Dryden.

ALARM-BELL.† n. s. [from alarm and bell.] The bell that is rung at the approach of an enemy.

A L A

On the gates alarm-bells, or watchbells, twenty pound weight of metal. Milton, Hist. of Moscow, ch. 3.

The alarm-bell rings from our Alhambra walls,
And, from the streets, sound drums and atambells. Dryden.

ALA'RMING. particip. adj. [from alarm.] Terrifying; awakening; surprising; as, an alarmonic message: an alarmonic pain.

ALARMICALLY. adv. In an alarmonic manner.

ALARMIST.† n. s. He who excites an alarm. The word is quite modern.

ALARMPOST. n. s. [from alarm and post.] The post or place appointed to each body of men, to appear at, when an alarm shall happen.

ALARMWATCH.† n. s. [from alarm and watch.] A watch that strikes the hour by regulated movement; an alarm.

You shall have a gold alarmwatch, which, as there may be cause, shall awake you. Sir T. Herbert, Mem.

This relation is in prosecution of what is formerly mentioned, concerning the clock or alarmwatch his Majesty intended to dispose of. Ibid.

ALA'RUM.† n. s. [corrupted, as it seems, from alarm.] See ALARM.

Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths,
Our bruised arms hung up for monuments,
Our stern alarums chang'd to merry meetings. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

His Majesty did most worthily and prudently ring out the alarm-bell, to awaken all other princes. Bacon, Charge in the Star-Chamber.

That Almatro might better bear.
She sets a drum at either ear;
And loud or gentle, harsh or sweet,
Are but th' alarums which they beat. Prior.

To ALA'RUM. v. a. [corrupted from To alarm.] See ALARM.

Withered murder
(Alarm'd by his sentinel the wolf,
Whose howl's his watch) thus with his stealthy pace
Moves like a ghost. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

ALA'S. interj. [helas, Fr. cylaes, Dutch.]

1. A word expressing lamentation, when we use it of ourselves.

But yet, alas! O but yet, alas! our haps be but hard haps. Sidney.

Alas! how little from the grave we claim?
Thou but preserv'st a form, and I a name. Pope.

2. A word of pity, when used of other persons.

Alas! poor Proteus, thou hast entertained
A fox to be the shepherd of thy lambs. Shakespeare.

3. A word of sorrow and concern, when used of things.

Thus saith the Lord God, smite with thine hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, Alas! for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel. Ezekiel.

Alas! both for the deed, and for the cause! Milton.

Alas! for pity of this bloody field;

Piteous indeed must be, when I, a spirit,
Can have so soft a sense of human woes. Dryden.

ALAS THE DAY. interj. Ah, unhappy day!

Alas the day! I never gave him cause. Shakespeare.

Alas a day! you have ruined my poor mistress: you have made a gap in her reputation; and can you blame her if she make it up with her husband? Congreve.

ALAS THE WHILE. interj. Ah! unhappy time!

All as the sheep, such was the shepherd's look;
For pale and wan he was, (alas the while!)
May seem he lov'd, or else some care he took. Spenser.

AL'ATE.† adv. [from a and late.] Lately; no long time ago.

I sawe stonyng the goodly portress,
Whiche axed me, from whence I came alate. Hawes, Tower of Doctrine, ch. 1.

A L B

They all lock themselves up alate;
Or talk in character. B. Jonson, Sej. ii.

Where chilling frost alate did nip,

There flasheth now a fire;

Where deep disdain bred noisom hate.

There kindly now desire. Greene, Dittie of Dorastilla.

ALATERNUS.* n. s. [In botany.] Evergreen privet.

The alaternus, which we have lately received from the hottest parts of Languedoc, thrives with us in England, as if it were an indigene. Evelyn.

ALB.* n. s. [album, Lat.] A surplice; a white linen vestment worn by priests; as Dr. Johnson observes; but it differed from the modern surplice, as it was worn close at the wrists, like as the lawn sleeves of a bishop now are.

Each priest adorn'd was in a surplice white;

The bishops donn'd their albs and copes of state. Fairfax, Tasso, ii. 4.

They [the bishops] shall have upon them in time of their ministration, besides their rochet, a surplice or alb, and a cope or vestment. Rubrick of K. Edw. VI.

ALBATROSS.* n. s. A south sea bird.

We saw a great number of sea birds, particularly albatrosses. Hawkesworth's Voyages.

ALBE'. } adv. [a coalition of the words all be it so.

ALBE'IT. } Skinner. Although; notwithstanding; though it should be.

Ne wou'd he suffer sleep once thitherward

Approach, albe his drowsy den was next. Spenser.

This very thing is cause sufficient, why duties belonging to each kind of virtue, albeit the law of reason teach them, should, notwithstanding, be prescribed even by human law. Hooker.

One whose eyes,

Albeit unused to the melting mood,

Drop tears, as fast as the Arabian trees

Their medicinal gum. Shakespeare.

He, who has a probable belief, that he shall meet with thieves in such a road, thinks himself to have reason enough to decline it, albeit he is sure to sustain some loss, though yet considerable, inconvenience, by his so doing. South, Serm.

ALBICORE.* n. s. A sea-fish.

The albicore that followeth night and day

The flying-fish, and takes them for his prey. Davies, Secrets of Angling, ii.

ALBIFICATION.* n. s. [from albus and fo.] A chemical term for making white.

Our lampes brenning bothe night and day,

To bring about our crafte if that we may:

Our journeis eke of calcination,

And of waters albification. Chaucer, Chan. Yeoman's Tale.

ALBIGENSES.* n. s. A sect so called from Albi, in Upper Languedoc, where they originated. They forbade the eating of flesh, condemned matrimony, and denied, as the Romanists say, that men ought to make any external profession of their faith.

Anselm Fayditt, a troubadour of the eleventh century, wrote a sort of satirical drama called the Heresy of the Fathers, "Heregia del Preyres," a ridicule on the council which condemned the Albigenses. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 36.

ALBUGINEOUS.* adj. [albugo, Lat.] Resembling the white of an egg.

Eggs will freeze in the albugineous part thereof. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I opened it by incision, giving vent first to an albugineous, then to white concreted matter; upon which the tumour sunk. Wiseman's Surg.

ALBUGO. n. s. [Lat.] A disease in the eye, by which the cornea contracts a whiteness. The same with leucoma.

ALBUM.* n. s. [Lat.] A book, in which foreigners have long been accustomed to insert the autographs of celebrated people. Or, as Howell quaintly explains it, "A small leger booke fairely bound up table-book will, wherein when they [travellers] meet with any person of note and eminency, and journey or pension with him any time, they desire him to write his name with some short sentence, which they call the mot of remembrance." Instructions for Foreign Travel, p. 53.

The composer of this work, in his begging scraps all about, I know not by what means, seems to have lighted on a merry definition of an ambassador, which above eight years before, passing by that way, I had chanced to set down, at my friend's, Mr. Christopher Fleckamor, in his album of friends, after the German custom, (a white paper book used by the Dutch for such kind of mottoes) which was worded thus: Legatus est vir bonus peregrinatus ad mentendum reipub. causam.

Sir H. Wotton, Lett. to M. Velserus.

ALBURN COLOUR. n. s. See AUBURN.

ALCA'ICK.* adj. Signifying the measure of verse used by the poet Alcæus.

There is the smaller Alcaick verse with a molosse interposed in that noble place in the Revelation, which consists of strong and harmonious measures. Blackwall, Sac. Class. ii. 100.

Leave things so prostitute,

And take th' Alcaick lute,

Or thine own Horace, or Anacreon's lyre. B. Jonson to Himself.

ALCA'ICK.* n. s. The verse itself, consisting of two dactyls and two trochees.

Take away that foot καὶ λαοὶς from ἰθὺς καὶ λαοὶς καὶ βασιλεῖς, Rev. x. 14. and you have that fine Alcaick, "Ἐθνοὶ καὶ βασιλεῖς πολλοὶ."

Blackwall, Sac. Class. ii. 101.

He has a copy of Alcaicks extant in an Oxford collection on the death of Camden.

Warton, Notes to Milton's Smaller Poems, p. 429.

ALCAHEST. n. s. An Arabick word, to express an universal dissolvent, pretended to by Paracelsus and Helmont. Quincy.

ALCA'ID. n. s. [from al, Arab. and קרקק, the head.]

1. In Barbary, the governour of a castle.

Th' alcid

Shuns me, and, with a grim civility,

Bows, and declines my walks. Dryden.

2. In Spain, the judge of a city, first instituted by the Saracens. Du Cange.

ALCANNA. n. s. An Egyptian plant used in dying; the leaves making a yellow, infused in water, and a red in acid liquours.

The root of alcanna, though green, will give a red stain.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ALCHYMICAL. adj. [from alchymy.] Relating to alchymy; produced by alchymy.

The rose-noble, then current for six shillings and eightpence, the alchymists do affirm as an unwritten verity, was made by projection or multiplication alchymical of Raymond Lully in the tower of London. Camden, Rem.

ALCHYMICALLY. adv. [from alchymical.] In the manner of an alchymist; by means of alchymy.

Raymond Lully would prove it alchymically. Camden.

ALCHYMIST.* n. s. [from alchymy.] One who pursues or professes the science of alchymy. Chaucer calls such an one, an alchymister.

To solemnize this day, the glorious sun

Stays in his course, and plays the alchymist,

Turning with splendour of his precious eye,

The meagre cloddy earth to glittering gold. Shakespeare, K. John.

Every alchymist knows, that gold will endure a vehement fire for a long time without any change; and after it has been divided by corrosive liquors, into invisible parts, yet may presently be precipitated so as to appear in its own form. Greuv.

ALCHYMI'ITICAL.* adj. Acting like an alchymist; practising alchymy.

A L C

The alchymistical cabalists, or cabalistical alchymists, have extracted the name, or number, whether you will, out of the word Jehovah, after a strange manner. Lightfoot, Miscell. p. 9.
As the first sort of legislators attended to the different kinds of citizens, and combined them into one commonwealth, the others, the metaphysical and alchymistical legislators, have taken the direct contrary course. Burke.

To ALCHYMIZE. * v. a. [from alchymy.] To transmute.

Not that you feared the discolouring cold
Might alchymize their silver into gold. Lovelace, Lucret. p. 7.

ALCHYMY, n. s. [of al, Arab. and χμυα.]

1. The more sublime and occult part of chymistry, which proposes, for its object, the transmutation of metals, and other important operations.

There is nothing more dangerous than this deluding art, which changeth the meaning of words, as alchymy doth, or would do, the substance of metals, maketh of any thing what it listeth, and bringeth, in the end, all truth to nothing. Hooker.

O he sits high in all the people's hearts :
And that which would appear offence in us,
His countenance, like richest alchymy,
Will change to virtue, and to worthiness. Shakespeare, J. Cas.
Compar'd to this,

All honour's mimic, all wealth alchymy is. Donne.

2. A kind of mixed metal; used for spoons, and kitchen utensils.

White alchymy is made of pan-brass one pound, and arsenicum three ounces; or alchymy is made of copper and auripigmentum. Bacon, Phys. Rem.

They bid cry,
With trumpets regal sound, the great result :
Tow'ards the four winds, four speedy cherubim
Put to their mouths the sounding alchymy,
By herald's voice explained. Milton, P. L.

ALCOHOL, n. s. An Arabick term used by chymists for a high rectified dephlegmated spirit of wine, or for any thing reduced into an impalpable powder. Quincy.

If the same salt shall be reduced into alcohol, as the chymists speak, or an impalpable powder, the particles and intercepted spaces will be extremely lessened. Boyle.

Sal volatile oleosum will coagulate the serum on account of the alcohol, or rectified spirit which it contains. Arbuthnot.

ALCOHOLIZATION, n. s. [from alcoholize.] The act of alcoholizing or rectifying spirits; or of reducing bodies to an impalpable powder.

To ALCOHOLIZE, v. a. [from alcohol.]

1. To make an alcohol; that is, to rectify spirits till they are wholly dephlegmated.

2. To comminute powder till it is wholly without roughness.

ALCORAN, † n. s. [al and koran, Arab.] The book of the Mahometan precepts, and credenda.

If this would satisfy the conscience, we might not only take the present covenant, but subscribe to the council of Trent; yea, and to the Turkish alcoran; and swear to maintain and defend either of them. Saunderson against the Cor.

Dryden furnishes an example of the present accentuation of this word. But in our elder poetry the accent is on both the first and second syllables.

And he allow'd to be the better man,
In virtue of his holier alcoran. Hind and Panth. ver. 708.
For by the holy alcoran I swear. Trag. of Soliman and Per.
Accursed Soliman, profane alcoran. Ibid.

ALCORANISH, * adj. [from alcoran.] Relating to Mahometanism.

What they want in architecture, they supply in reliques venerably accounted of for entombing the carcases of some alcoranish doctors. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 29.

I have called the alcoranish Arabick a hodge-podge or jumble of several corrupt dialects of the Hebrew. Parkhurst, Heb. Lex. Pref.

ALCOVE, † n. s. [alcoba, Span. alkove, Dan. But originally from the Arab. alkobba. V. Dict. de la Lengua Castellana, por la R. Acad. Espan. And Bp. Patrick on Numbers, xxv. 8.] A recess, or part of a chamber, separated by an estrade or partition, and other corresponding ornaments; in which is placed a bed of state, and sometimes seats to entertain company. Trevor.

The wearied champion lull'd in soft alcoves,
The noblest boast of thy romantick groves.
Oft, if the muse presage, shall he be seen
By Rosamunda fleeting o'er the green,
In dreams be hail'd by heroes' mighty shades,
And hear old Chaucer warble through the glades. Tickell.

Deep in a rich alcove the prince was laid,
And slept beneath the pompous colonnade. Pope, Odys.

Of these, eighteen were let into the bed-chamber: but they stood at the furthest end of the room. The ladies stood within the alcove. Burnet, Hist. of his own Time, 1688.

2. A recess in gardens or pleasure grounds.

Cliffden's proud alcove,
The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love. Pope.

ALDER, n. s. [alnus, Lat.] A tree having leaves resembling those of the hazel; the male flowers, or katkins, are produced at remote distances from the fruit, on the same tree; the fruit is squamose, and of a conical figure. The species are; 1. The common or round-leaved alder. 2. The long-leaved alder. 3. The scarlet alder. These trees delight in a very moist soil. The wood is used by turners, and will endure long under ground, or in water. Millar.

Without the grot, a various sylvan scene
Appear'd around, and groves of living green;
Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragrant shade. Pope, Odys.

ALDERLIEVEST, † adj. superl. [from alder, of all; correspondent with ealpa the gen. plural of eal, Sax. all; and often formerly used in composition with adjectives of the superlative degree, as alderbest, alderlest, Prompt. Parv. alderworst, Gower; and lieve, dear, beloved.] Most beloved; most dear.

The mutual conference that my mind hath had,
In courtly company, or at my beads,
With you, mine alderlievest sovereign;
Makes me the bolder. Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. II.

ALDERMAN, † n. s. [from ald, old, and man, Sax. alderman, princeps, primarius. Burke uses earldorman, from the Sax. eanl. See EALDERMAN.]

1. The same as senator, Cowel. A governor or magistrate, originally, as the name imports, chosen on account of the experience which his age had given him.

Tell him, myself, the mayor, and alderman,
Are come to have some conference with his grace. Shakespeare.
Though my own alderman conferr'd my bays,
To me committing their eternal praise;
Their full-fed heroes, their pacifick wars;
Their annual trophies, and their monthly wars. Pope, Dun.

2. In the following passage it is, I think, improperly used.

But if the trumpet's clangour you abhor,
And dare not be an alderman of war,
Take to a shop, behind a counter lie. Dryden, Juv. Sat.

ALDERMANITY, * n. s. [from alderman.] This uncommon word is twice used by Ben Jonson, and in both instances with his accustomed facetiousness.

1. The behaviour and manners of an alderman.

He has rich ingredients in him, I warrant you, if they were extracted; a true receipt to make an alderman, as he were wrought well upon, according to art. — I would fain see an alderman in chimia! that is, a treatise of aldermanity, truly written. Staple of News, A. iii.

2. The society of aldermen.

Thou [London] canst draw forth thy forces, and fight dry
The battles of thy aldermanity;
Without the hazard of a drop of blood,
More than the surficits in thee that day stood.

Underwoods, Speech acc. to Horace.

A'LDERMANLIKE.* adj. In the manner of an alderman.

Last of all came the curate and barber upon their mighty pittles, and with their faces covered, all in a grave posture, and with an aldermanlike pace, travelling no faster than the slow steps of the heavy oxen permitted them.

Shelton, Trans. of D. Quir. i. iv. 20.

A'LDERMANLY. adv. [from alderman.] Like an alderman; belonging to an alderman.

These, and many more, suffered death, in envy to their virtues and superiour genius, which emboldened them, in exigencies (wanting an aldermanly discretion) to attempt service out of the common forms. Swift, Miscell.

A'LDERN. adj. [from alder.] Made of alder.

Then alder boats first plow'd the ocean. May, Virg.

A'LE. n. s. [eale, Sax.]

1. A liquor made by infusing malt in hot water, and then fermenting the liquor.

You must be seeing christenings. 'Do you look for ale and cakes here, you rude rascals?' Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

The fertility of the soil in grain, and its being not proper for vines, put the Egyptians upon drinking ale, of which they were the inventors. Arabian.

2. A merry meeting used in country places.

That ale is FESTIVAL, appears from its sense in composition;
as, among others, in the words Leet-ale, Lamb-ale, Whitsun-ale, Clerk-ale, and Church-ale.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iii. 128. n.

And all the neighbourhood from old records
Of antick proverbs drawn from Whitsun lords,
And their authorities at wakes and ales,
With country precedents, and old wives tales,
We bring you now.

B. Jonson.

A'LE-BENCH.* n. s. ["Good ale never wanted a friend upon the bench." Dr. J. White's Sermon at Pard's Cross (1615), p. 25.] A bench in or before an ale-house.

Too many there be, which upon the ale places, delight to set forth certain question not so much pertaining to edification as to vain-glory and hewing forth of their cunning; and so unsoberly to reason and dispute, that when neither part will give place to other, they fall to chiding and contention, and sometimes from hot words to further inconvenience.

Honolies, b. i. Against Contention.

The vulgar sort

Sit on their ale-bench with their cups and cans.

Sir John Oldcastle, i. 1.

A'LEBERRY. n. s. [from ale and berry.] A beverage made by boiling ale with spice and sugar, and sops of bread: a word now only used in conversation.

Their aleberries, cawdles, possets, each one,
Syllibubs made of milking pale,
But what are compos'd of a pot of good ale.

Beaumont.

A'LE-BREWER. n. s. [from ale and brewer.] One that professes to brew ale.

The summer-made malt brews ill, and is disliked by most of our ale-brewers. Mortimer's Husbandry.

A'LE-CONNER.* n. s. [from ale and con.] An officer in the city of London, whose business it is to inspect the measures of publick houses. Four of them are chosen or rechosen annually by the common-hall of the city; and whatever might be their use formerly, their places are now regarded only as sinecures for decayed citizens.

Such inspectors of the quality as well as quantity of ale, are not confined to the city of London, as Dr.
Johnson would insinuate in the preceding paragraph, but are still in existence in Cheshire, who are appointed at the lord's court-leet, and possess the privilege of tasting or drinking a limited measure at every publick house, at certain times in the year.

Headboroughs, tithingmen, aleconners, and sidesmen, are appointed, in the oaths incident to their offices, to be likewise charged to present the offences [of drunkenness.]

Act of Park 21 Jac. I. ch. 7.

A'LE-COST. n. s. [perhaps from alc and costus, Lat.]

The name of an herb.

Dict.

ALE'CTRYOMANCY, OR ALE'CTOROMANCY. n. s. [ἀλεκ-τρῶν and μάντις.] Divination by a cock.

Dict.

A'LE-FED.* adj. Fed with ale.

The milk-sop issue of this high-soaring sire, you shall perhaps find in his bed, clad in steel bodies [bodlice] to hinder the growth of his ale-fed corps. Stafford, Niobe, ii. 62.

A'LEGAR. n. s. [from ale and eager, sour.] Sour ale;

a kind of acid made by ale, as vinegar by wine,
which has lost its spirit.

A'LEGER. adj. [allegre, Fr. alacris, Lat.] Gay; cheerful; sprightly; a word not now used.

Coffee, the root and leaf betle, and leaf tobacco, of which the Turks are great takers, do all condense the spirits, and make them strong and aleger. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To ALE'GGE.* v. a. [Old Fr. allegger, alger, to ease or alleviate.] To lessen; to assuage.

Dr. Johnson has given this obsolete word (and with a mistaken etymology) as the pretended verb aligge, which Mr.
Mason positively asserts to be in the passage cited from Spenser, though probably an error of the press, or an intended countrified accent for allegger.
The fact is, neither Dr. Johnson nor Mr. Mason have attended to the true reading of the poet, which in the genuine editions is allegge, and not aligge.
Spenser also writes allegge; but not all-dge, which is the reading of a bad edition, and has misled
Mr. Boucher. Spenser copies Chaucer in the usage of this old word, and uses also the substantive alleggeance.

The joyous time now nigheth fast,

That shall allegge this bitter blast,

And slake the winter sorrow.

Pastorals, March.

A'LEHOOF. n. s. [from ale and hoof, head.] Ground-ivy, so called by our Saxon ancestors, as being their chief ingredient in ale. An herb.

Alchoof, or groundivy, is, in my opinion, of the most excellent and most general use and virtue, of any plants we have among us. Temple.

A'LEHOUSE.* n. s. [Sax. eallhūs.] A house where ale is publickly sold; a tipling house. It is distinguished from a tavern, where they sell wine.

Thou, most beauteous inn,

Why should hard-favoured grief be lodg'd in thee,

When triumph is become an alehouse guest?

Shakspeare.

One would think it should be no easy matter to bring any man of sense in love with an alehouse; indeed of so much sense, as seeing and smelling amounts to; there being such strong encounters of both, as would quickly send him packing, did not the love of good fellowship reconcile to these nuisances. South.

Thee shall each alehouse, thee each gillhouse mourn,

And answer'ing ginshops sowerer sighs return.

Pope.

A'LEHOUSE-KEEPER. n. s. [from alehouse and keeper.]
He that keeps ale publickly to sell.

You resemble perfectly the two alehouse-keepers in Holland, who were at the same time burgomasters of the town, and taxed one another's bills alternately. Letter to Swift.

A L E

ALEKNIGHT, n. s. [from ale and knight.] A pot-companion; a tipler: a word now out of use.

The old aleknights of England were well depicted by Hanville, in the ale-house colours of that time. Camden.

ALEMBICK, † n. s. [from al, Arab. and al-muḥḍi, a particular sort of vessel.] A vessel used in distilling, consisting of a vessel placed over a fire, in which is contained the substance to be distilled, and a concave closely fitted on, into which the fumes arise by the heat; this cover has a beak or spout, into which the vapours rise, and by which they pass into a serpentine pipe, which is kept cool by making many convolutions in a tub of water; here the vapours are condensed, and what entered the pipe in fumes, comes out in drops.

Though water may be rarefied into invisible vapours, yet it is not changed into air, but only scattered into minute parts; which meeting together in the alembeck, or in the receiver, do presently return into such water as they constituted before.

ALENGTH, † adv. [from a for at, and length.] At full length; along; stretched along the ground. Anciently written on length.

These wordes said, she streight her on length, and rested awhile. Chaucer, Test. of Love.

ALE'RT, † adj. [Fr. alerte, perhaps from alacris, but probably from à l'art, according to art or rule, Dr. Johnson says. But, in these etymologies, he is not successful. — The word seems to be of military origin; and though it is supposed by Major James, in his Military Dictionary, to be “formed of the French a and airte, the French formerly “writing airte for air, so that alerte means something continually in the air, and always ready to be “put in motion;” the word, I say, is not derived from such a strange combination, but from the military language, both of the French and Italian. “Être à l’erte, to observe or watch from a high place, to lie in wait,” Cotgrave’s Fr. and Eng. Dict. 1632. in V. erte, a watch-tower. “Stare al’erta, to be watchful,” Florio’s Ital. Dict. 1598. Hence the Spanish phrase, “al’erta,” ready prepared, put in order, Minshew’s Span. Dict. 1599. Mr. Tooke, who has traced the etymology to the Italian phrase all’erta, which he refers ultimately to the Latin erigere, without noticing the existence of the phrases in the dictionaries which I have named, or knowing that the word was in use among us as a military word early in the 17th century, is angry with Dr. Johnson for saying that alert has a contemptuous meaning also, which it certainly has, and which is not disproved by Mr. Tooke’s production of the French phrase, à l’herte, meaning in an erect posture.]

1. In the military sense, on guard; watchful; vigilant; ready at a call.

In this place the prince, finding his ruttors alert, (as the Italians say,) with advice of his valiant brother, he sent his trumpets to the Duke of Alva, &c.

Sir Roger Wilkams, Act. of the Low Countries, (1618.) p. 27.

He was always alert and attentive to the claims of friendship and benevolence. Graves’s Recoll. of Shenstone, p. 155.

2. In the common sense, brisk; pert; petulant; smart; implying some degree of censure and contempt.

I saw an alert young fellow, that cocked his hat upon a friend of his, and accosted him: Well, Jack, the old prig is dead at last. Addison, Spectator.

A L E

Why how now Doll Diamond, you’re very alert;
Is it your French breeding has made you so pert?

Swift, Verses edited by Dr. Barret, p. 96.

ALE’RTNESS, n. s. [from alert.] The quality of being alert; sprightliness; pertness.

That alertness and unconcern for matters of common life, a campaign or two would infallibly have given him.

Addison, Spectator.

ALE-STAKE,  n. s.* [from ale and stake.] A stake set up before an ale-house, by way of sign. Some have mistaken the meaning of this word, and called it a may-pole, as if the ale-stake never was adorned with garlands. Originally, a bush, perhaps of ivy, was the thing chosen for the sign. Skelton calls it an ale-pole.

A gerland had he sette upon his hede.

As gret as [if] it were for an ale-stake.

Chaucer, Prolog. Canterb. Tales.

Like a true ale-stake, he tells you where the best ale is.

Comment on the Miller’s Tale, &c. p. 3.

A’LETASTER, n. s. [from ale and taster.] An officer appointed in every courtleet, and sworn to look to the assize and the goodness of bread and ale, or beer, within the precincts of that lordship. Coxwell.

A’LEVAT, n. s. [from ale and vat.] The tub in which the ale is fermented.

ALE’w,  n. s.* Shouting, or crying aloud, of which last word Mr. Boucher supposes it a variety or corruption; and considers it the same word as what since Spenser’s time has been, and still is, written hullo.

Yet did she not lament with loud alew,

As women wont, but with deepe sighes and singulfes few.

Spenser, F. Q. v. vi. 13.

A’LEWASHED, adj. [from ale and wash.] Steeped or soaked in ale: not now in use.

What a beard of the general’s cut, and a horrid suit of the camp, will do among foaming battles and alewashed wits, is wonderful to be thought on.

Shakespeare.

A’LEWITE, n. s. [from ale and wife.] A woman that keeps an alehouse.

Perhaps he will swagger and hecter, and threaten to beat and butcher an alewife, or take the goods by force, and throw them the bad halfpence.

Swift, Draper’s Letters.

A’LEXANDERS, n. s. [smyrnium, Lat.] The name of a plant.

A’LEXANDER’S-FOOT, n. s. The name of an herb.

ALEXA’NDRINE, n. s. A kind of verse borrowed from the French, first used in a poem called Alexander. They consist, among the French, of twelve and thirteen syllables, in alternate couplets; and, among us, of twelve.

Our numbers should, for the most part, be lyrical. For variety, or rather where the majesty of thought requires it, they may be stretched to the English heroic of five feet, and the French Alexandrine of six.

Dryden.

Then, at the last, an only couplet fraught

With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,

A needless Alexandrine ends the song,

That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.

Pope, Essay on Criticism.

ALEXA’NDRINE,  adj.* Relating to the verse so called.

The harmony of his [Boileau’s] numbers, as far as Alexandrine lines will admit.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, i. 199.

ALEXIPHARMACAL,  adj.* [See ALEXIPHARMICK.] That which possesses an antidote.

A prosperous condition hath such a secret poison in it, as against which no medicine hath been sufficiently alexipharmacal.

Dean Pierce’s Sermon, 29th May, 1661, p. 12.

ALEXIPHIA’RMICK, † adj. [from ἀλεξ and φάρμακον.]

A L G

That which drives away poison; antidotal; that which opposes infection.

Some antidotal quality it may have, since not only the bone in the heart, but the horn of a deer, is alexipharmick.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

It should be written alexipharmack; as alexipharmacal is, and as the derivation requires.

ALEXITE'RICAL, or ALEXITE'RICK. adj. [from ἀλεξίω.]

That which drives away poison; that which resists fevers.

A'LGA.* n. s. [Lat. alga.] Sea-weed.

Oceanus was garlanded with alga, or sea-grass; and in his hand a trident.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

With alga who the sacred altar strews?

Dryden, Astr. Red. v. 120.

AL'GATES.† adv. [Sax. algeate; all-ways. Gate is the same as via; and still used for way in the Scottish dialect, and in the North of England. See AGATE.] On any terms; every way. Now obsolete.

Nor had the boaster ever risen more,
But that Renaldo's horse ev'n then down fell,
And with the fall his leg oppress'd so sore,
That, for a space, there must he algeate dwell.

Fairfax.

AL'GEBRA. n. s. [an Arabick word of uncertain etymology; derived, by some, from Geber the philosopher; by some, from gefi, parchment; by others, from algehista, a bonesetter; by Menager, from algiabarar, the restitution of things broken.] A peculiar kind of arithmetick, which takes the quantity sought, whether it be a number or a line, or any other quantity, as if it were granted, and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds by consequence, till the quantity at first only supposed to be known, or at least some power thereof, is found to be equal to some quantity or quantities which are known, and consequently itself is known. This art was in use among the Arabs, long before it came into this part of the world; and they are supposed to have borrowed it from the Persians, and the Persians from the Indians. The first Greek author of algebra was Diophantus, who, about the year 800, wrote thirteen books. In 1494, Lucas Pacciolus, or Lucas de Burgos, a cordelier, printed a treatise of algebra, in Italian, at Venice. He says, that algebra came originally from the Arabs. After several improvements by Vieta, Oughtred, Harriot, Descartes, Sir Isaac Newton brought this art to the height at which it still continues.

Trevoux and Chambers.

It would surely require no very profound skill in algebra, to reduce the difference of ninepence in thirty shillings.

Swift.

ALGEBRA'ICK.† adj. [from algebra.]

ALGEBRA'ICAL.

1. Relating to algebra; as, an algebraical treatise.
2. Containing operations of algebra; as, an algebraical computation.

The velocities of evanescent or nascent quantities are supposed to be expressed, both by finite lines of a determinate magnitude, and by algebraical notes or signs.

Ep. Berkeley, Analyst, § 36.

ALGEBRA'IST. n. s. [from algebra.] A person that understands or practises the science of algebra.

When any dead body is found in England, no algebraist or uncipherer can use more subtle suppositions, to find the demonstration of cipher, than every unconcerned person doth to find the murderers.

Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

A L I

Confining themselves to the synthitick and analytick methods of geometers and algebraists, they have too much narrowed the rules of method, as though every thing were to be treated in mathematical forms.

Watts, Logic.

A'LGID. adj. [algidus, Lat.] Cold; chill.

Dict.

A'LGIDITY. } n. s. [from algid.] Chilness; cold.

A'LGIDNESS. } Dict.

A'LGIFICK. adj. [from algor, Lat.] That which produces cold.

Dict.

A'LGOR. n. s. [Lat.] Extreme cold; chilness.

Dict.

A'LGORISM.† } n. s. [Arabick words, which are used

A'LGORITHM. } to imply the six operations of arithmetick, or the science of numbers. "Ab Arabibus nomen algorismi accepimus, pro praxi arithmetica per figuras numerales." Wallis.]

I send now to my good daughter Clement her algorisme stone.

Sir T. More, Lett. to his Daugh. Marg.

Let this poor figure of algorism trouble no divine ne wise man.

Martin on the Marriage of Priests, sign. G. ii. b.

He [Gerbert] certainly was the first who brought the algorithm from the Saracens, and who illustrated it with such rules as the most studious in that science cannot explain.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iii. 46.

ALGO'SE. adj. [from algor, Lat.] Extremely cold; chill.

Dict.

ALGUAZIL.* n. s. [Span.] An inferiour officer of justice; a constable.

The corregidor, in consequence of my information, has sent this alguazil to apprehend you.

Smollett, Gil Blas.

ALIAS.† adv.

1. A Latin word, signifying otherwise; often used in the trials of criminals, whose danger has obliged them to change their names; as, Simson alias Smith, alias Baker; that is, otherwise Smith, otherwise Baker. It is also applied to places; and generally to any persons known, or supposed to be known, by a second name.

What nation formerly knew not the acts of Englishmen better than themselves? otherwise, Polydore Virgil had not undertook, to our shame and prejudice, the English chronology; nor Verstegan, alias Rowly, the confidence to render well-nigh all the considerable gentry of this land, from the etymology of their names, Teutonicks.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 396.

2. [In law.] A writ of capias, issued a second time.

If the sheriff cannot find the defendant upon the first writ of capias, there issues out an alias writ.

Blackstone.

A'LIBI.* n. s. [A law term adopted by us from the Lat. alibi, elsewhere. It is found also in the old French, with the same meaning. V. Roquefort, Gloss. de la Langue Rom.]

The plea of a person charged with crime, who, to prove himself innocent, alleges, that, at the time stated in the accusation, he was at some place remote from that in which the fact was said to have been committed; the plea to invalidate the testimony, or supposed act, of a person, alleging that, at the time mentioned in the proceedings, he was at some place distant from that which had been specified.

A'LIBLE. adj. [alibilis, Lat.] Nutritive; nourishing; or that which may be nourished.

Dict.

A'LIEN. adj. [alienus, Lat.]

1. Foreign, or not of the same family or land.

The mother plant admires the leaves unknown
Of alien trees, and apples not her own.

Dryden.

From native soil

Exil'd by fate, torn from the tender embrace
Of his young guiltless progeny, he seeks Inglorious shelter in an alien land.

Philips.

2. Estranged from; not allied to; adverse to; with the particle from, and sometimes to, but improperly.

To declare my mind to the disciples of the fire, by a similitude not alien from their profession. Boyle.

The sentiment that arises, is a conviction of the deplorable state of nature, to which sin reduced us; a weak, ignorant creature, alien from God and goodness, and a prey to the great destroyer. Rogers, Serm.

They encouraged persons and principles, alien from our religion and government, in order to strengthen their faction. Swift, Miscell.

A'LIEEN. n. s. [alienus, Lat.]

1. A foreigner; not a denison; a man of another country or family; one not allied; a stranger.

In whomsoever these things are, the church doth acknowledge them for her children: them only she holdeth for aliens and strangers, in whom these things are not found. Hooker.

If it be prov'd against an alien,
He seeks the life of any citizen,
The party, 'gainst the which he doth contrive,
Shall seize on half his goods. Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

The mere Irish were not only accounted aliens, but enemies, so as it was no capital offence to kill them.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

Thy place in council thou hast rudely lost,
Which by thy younger brother is supply'd,
And art almost an alien to the hearts
Of all the court and princes of my blood. Shakspeare.

The lawgiver condemned the persons, who sat idle in divisions dangerous to the government, as aliens to the community, and therefore to be cut off from it. Addison, Freeholder.

2. [In law.] An alien is one born in a strange country, and never enfranchised. A man born out of the land, so it be within the limits beyond the seas, or of English parents out of the king's obedience, so the parents, at the time of the birth, be of the king's obedience, is not alien. If one born out of the king's allegiance, come and dwell in England, his children (if he beget any here) are not aliens, but denisons. Cowel.

To A'LIEEN.† v. a. [aliener, Fr. alieno, Lat.]

1. To make any thing the property of another.
If the son alien lands, and then repurchase them again in fee, the rules of descents are to be observed, as if he were the original purchaser. Hale, Hist. of Common Law.

2. To estrange; to turn the mind or affection; to make adverse; with from.

The king was disquieted, when he found, that the prince was totally aliened from all thoughts of, or inclination to, the marriage. Clarendon.

3. It is also used without from.

Whether this disease may not alien and remove my friends — I cannot tel. Donne, Devotions, p. 104.

He that is not ashamed of my bonds, not daunted with my checks, not aliened with my disgrace, is a friend for me.

Bp. Hall, Occ. Meditations, xxxiii.

A'LIEENABLE. adj. [from To Alienate.] That of which the property may be transferred.

Land is alienable, and treasure is transitory, and both must pass from him, by his own voluntary act, or by the violence of others, or at least by fate. Dennis, Letters.

To A'LIEENATE. v. a. [aliener, Fr. alieno, Lat.]

1. To transfer the property of any thing to another.
The countries of the Turks were once christian, and members of the church, and where the golden candlesticks did stand, though now they be utterly alienated, and no christians left. Bacon.

2. To withdraw the heart or affections; with the particle from, where the first possessor is mentioned.

The manner of men's writing must not alienate our hearts from the truth. Hooker.

Be it never so true which we teach the world to believe, yet if once their affections begin to be alienated, a small thing persuadeth them to change their opinions. Hooker.

His eyes survey'd the dark idolatries

Of alienated Judah. Milton, P. L.

Any thing that is apt to disturb the world, and to alienate the affections of men from one another, such as cross and distasteful humours, is, either expressly, or by clear consequence and deduction, forbidden in the New Testament. Tillotson.

Her mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old fellow. Addison.

A'LIEENATE. adj. [alienatus, Lat.] Withdrawn from; stranger to; with the particle from.

The Whigs are damnably wicked; impatient for the death of the queen; ready to gratify their ambition and revenge, by all desperate methods; wholly alienate from truth, law, religion, mercy, conscience, or honour. Swift, Miscell.

ALIENATE.† n. s. A stranger; an alien.

Whosoever eateth the lamb without this house, he is an alienate. Stapleton, Fortresse of the Faith, fol. 148.

ALIENATION.† n. s. [alienatio, Lat.]

1. The act of transferring property.

This ordinance was for the maintenance of their lands in their posterity, and for excluding all innovation or alienation thereof unto strangers. Spenser, State of Ireland.

God put it into the heart of one of our princes, to give a check to sacrilege. Her successor passed a law, which prevented all future alienations of the church revenues. Atterbury.

Great changes and alienations of property, have created new and great dependencies. Swift, on Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being alienated; as, the estate was wasted during its alienation.

That darkness which our sin causeth, in the alienation and absence of the light of God's countenance, is, without his great mercy, the beginning of an utter exclusion from the beatificall face of God. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 42.

3. Change of affection.

It is left but in dark memory, what was the ground of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king. Bacon.

4. Applied to the mind, it means disorder of the faculties.

Some things are done by man, though not through outward force and impulsion, though not against, yet without their wills; as in alienation of mind, or any like inevitable utter absence of wit and judgment. Hooker.

ALIENATOR.† n. s. [Lat. alienator.] He who transfers or alienates any thing.

Some of the popish bishops were no less alienators of their episcopal endowments, than many other bishops of the protestant church proved afterwards, in the reigns of Edward the Sixth and Elizabeth. Warton, Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 40.

ALIFE.† adv. A vulgarism for on my life, or of my life; meaning, I love as I love my life. Mr. Tyrwhitt thinks it an abbreviation of at life.

I love a ballad in print, a-life; for then we are sure they are true. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Thou lov'st a-life

Their perfum'd judgement. B. Jonson.

ALIFEROUS. adj. [from ala and fero, Lat.] Having wings. Dict.

ALIGEROUS. adj. [aliger, Lat.] Having wings; winged. Dict.

To ALIGGE.† v. a. See To ALEGGE, which is the true word.

To ALIGHT. v. n. [alhtan, Sax. af-lichten, Dutch.]

1. To come down, and stop. The word implies the idea of descending; as, of a bird from the wing; a traveller from his horse or carriage; and generally of resting or stopping.

There ancient night arriving, did alight

From her high weary waine. Spenser, F. Q.

There is alighted at your gate

A young Venetian Shakspeare, Mer. of Venice.

Slackness breeds worms; but the sure traveller,
Though he alights sometimes, still goes on.
When marching with his force he walks till night;

Herbert.

When with his horse he comes will alight.

Denham.

When Dedalus, to fly the Cretan shore,
His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore;
To the Cumean coast at length he came,
And here alighting built this costly frame.

Dryden, Æn.

When he was admonished by his subject to descend, he came down gently and circling in the air, and singing to the ground.
Like a lark, melodious in her mounting, and continuing her song till she alights; still preparing for a higher flight at her next sally.

Dryden.

When finish'd was the fight,
The victors from their lusty steeds alight;
Like them dismounted all the warlike train.

Dryden.

Should a spirit of superiour rank, a stranger to human nature, alight upon the earth, what would his notions of us be?

Addison, Spectator.

2. It is used also of any thing thrown or falling; to fall upon.

But storms of stones from the proud temple's height,
Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight.

Dryden.

ALIKE. adv. [from a and like.] With resemblance; without difference; in the same manner; in the same form. Dr. Johnson says, in some expressions it has the appearance of an adjective, but is always an adverb. The first and fourth examples, which he gives, have certainly this questionable appearance. However, alike is surely an adjective, as Mr. Mason has observed, in the sixth example from Fairfax.

The darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.

Psal. cxxxix. 12.

With thee conversing, I forget all time;
All seasons, and their change, all please alike.
Riches cannot redeem from the grave,
Which claims alike the monarch and the slave.

Dryden.

Let us unite at least in an equal zeal for those capital doctrines, which we all equally embrace, and are alike concerned to maintain.

Atterbury.

Two handmaids wait the throne: alike in place,
But differing far in figure and in face.

Pope.

With him is Guelpho, as his noble mate,
In birth, in acts, in arms, alike the rest.

Fairfax, Tasso.

ALIKE-MINDED.  part. adj.* Having the same mind.

I would to God, not you only that hear me this day, but all our brethren of this land, were alike-minded; we should not have such libellous presses, such unquiet pulpits, such distracted homes.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 82.

ALIMENT. n. s. [alimentum, Lat.] Nourishment; that which nourishes; nutriment; food.

New parts are added to our substance; and as we die, we are born daily; nor can we give an account, how the aliment is prepared for nutrition, or by what mechanism it is distributed.

Glanville, Scepais Scientifico.

All bodies which, by the animal faculties, can be changed into the fluids and solids of our bodies, are called aliments. In the largest sense, by aliment, I understand every thing which a human creature takes in common diet; as, meat, drink; and seasoning, as, salt, spice, vinegar.

Arbutnot.

ALIMENTAL. adj. [from aliment.] That which has the quality of aliment; that which nourishes; that which feeds.

The sun, that light imparts to all, receives
From all his alimental recompense,
In humid exhalations.

Milton, P. L.

Except they be watered from higher regions, these weeds must lose their alimental sap, and wither.

Brown.

Th' industrious, when the sun in Leo rides,
Forget not, at the foot of ev'ry plant,
To sink a circling trench, and daily pour.

A just supply of alimental streams,
Exhausted sap recruiting.

Philips.

ALIMENTALLY. adv. [from alimental.] So as to serve for nourishment.

The substance of food is invincible by the powerfulllest heat; and that not only alimentally in a substantial mutation, but also medicamentally in any corporeal conversion. Brown, Fulg. Err.

ALIMENTARINESS. n. s. [from alimentary.] The quality of being alimentary, or of affording nourishment.

Dict.

ALIMENTARY. adj. [from aliment.]

1. That which belongs or relates to aliment.

The solution of the aliment by mastication is necessary; without it, the aliment could not be disposed for the changes which it receives as it passeth through the alimentary duct.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. That which has the quality of aliment, or the power of nourishing.

I do not think that water supplies animals, or even plants, with nourishment, but serves for a vehicle to the alimentary particles, to convey and distribute them to the several parts of the body.

Ray on the Creation.

Of alimentary roots, some are pulpy and very nutritious, as, turnips and carrots. These have a fattening quality.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

ALIMENTATION. n. s. [from aliment.]

1. The power of affording aliment; the quality of nourishing.

2. The state of being nourished by assimilation of matter received.

Plants do nourish; inanimate bodies do not; they have an accretion, but no alimentation.

Baron, Nat. Hist.

ALIMONIOUS. adj. [from alimony.] That which nourishes: a word very little in use.

The plethora renders us lean, by suppressing our spirits, whereby they are incapacitated of digesting the alimonious humour, into flesh.

Harvey on Consumption.

ALIMONY. n. s. [alimonia, Lat.] Alimony signifies that legal proportion of the husband's estate, which, by the sentence of the ecclesiastical court, is allowed to the wife for her maintenance, upon the account of any separation from him, provided it be not caused by her elopement or adultery.

Before they settled hands and hearts,
Till alimony or death them parts.

Hudibras

ALIQUNT. adj. [aliquantus, Lat.] Parts of a number, which, however repeated, will never make up the number exactly; as, 3 is an aliquant of 10, thrice 3 being 9, four times 3 making 12.

ALIQOT. † adj. [aliquot, Lat.] Aliquot parts of any number or quantity, such as will exactly measure it without any remainder: as, 3 is an aliquot part of 12, because, being taken four times, it will just measure it.

It is supposing finite quantities to be aliquot or constituent parts of infinite; when indeed they are not so.

Clarke on the Attributes, p. 36.

ALISH. adj. [from ale.] Resembling ale; having qualities of ale.

Stirring it and beating down the yeast, gives it the sweet alish taste.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

ALITURE. n. s. [alitura, Lat.] Nourishment.

Dict.

ALIVE. † adj. [from a and live.] Formerly written on live, i. e. in life: "For prouder woman is there none on lyve," Chaucer, Tr. and Cress. B. 2.]

1. In the state of life; not dead.

Nor well alive, nor wholly dead they were,
But some faint signs of feeble life appear.

Dryden.

Not youthful kings in battle seiz'd alive,
Not scornful virgins who their charms survive.

Pope.

2. In a figurative sense, unextinguished; undestroyed; active; in full force.

Those good and learned men had reason to wish, that their proceedings might be favoured, and the good affection of such as inclined toward them, kept alive.

Hooker.

A L K

3. Cheerful; sprightly; full of alacrity.
She was not so much alive the whole day, if she slept more than six hours. Clarissa.

4. In a popular sense, it is used only to add an emphasis, like the French du monde; as, the best man alive; that is, the best, with an emphasis. This sense has been long in use, and was once admitted into serious writings, but is now merely ludicrous.

And to those brethren said, rise, rise by-live,
And unto battle do yourselves address;
For yonder comes the proudest knight alive,
Prince Arthur, flower of grace and noblesse. Spenser, F. Q.

The earl of Northumberland, who was the proudest man alive, could not look upon the destruction of monarchy with any pleasure. Clarendon.

John was quick and understood business, but no man alive was more careless in looking into his accounts. Arbuthnot.

ALKALINEST. n. s. A word used first by Paracelsus, and adopted by his followers, to signify an universal dissolvent, or liquor, which has the power of resolving all things into their first principles.

ALKALESCENT. adj. [from alkali.] That which has a tendency to the properties of an alkali.

All animal diet is alkalescent or anti-acid. Arbuthnot.

ALKALI. n. s. [The word alkali comes from an herb, called by the Egyptians kali; by us, glasswort. This herb they burnt to ashes, boiled them in water, and, after having evaporated the water, there remained at the bottom a white salt; this they called sal kali, or alkali. It is corrosive, producing putrefaction in animal substances, to which it is applied. Arbuthnot on Aliments.] Any substance, which, when mingled with acid, produces ebullition and effervescence.

ALKALINE. adj. [from alkali.] That which has the qualities of alkali.

Any watery liquor will keep an animal from starving very long, by diluting the fluids, and consequently keeping them from an alkaline state. People have lived twenty-four days upon nothing but water. Arbuthnot.

TO ALKALIZE. v. a. [from alkali.] To make bodies alkaline, by changing their nature, or by mixing alkalies with them.

ALKALIZATE. adj. [from alkali.] That which has the qualities of alkali; that which is impregnated with alkali.

The odour of the fixed nitre is very languid; but that, which it discovers, being dissolved in hot water, is different, being of kin to that of other alkalizing salts. Boyle.

The colour of violets in their syrup, by acid liquours, turns red, and, by urinous and alkalizing, turns green. Newton.

ALKALIZATION. n. s. [from alkali.] The act of alkalizing, or impregnating bodies with alkali.

ALKANET. n. s. [Anchusa, Lat.] The name of a plant.

This plant is a species of bugloss, with a red root, brought from the southern parts of France, and used in medicine. Millar.

ALKEKENGI. n. s. A medicinal fruit or berry, produced by a plant of the same denomination; popularly also called winter-cherry: the plant bears a near resemblance to Solanum, or Nightshade; whence it is frequently called in Latin by that name, with the addition or epithet of vesicarium. Chambers.

ALKERMES. n. s. In medicine, a term borrowed from the Arabs, denoting a celebrated remedy, of the consistence of a confection; whereof the kermes berries are the basis. The other ingredients are pippin-cyder, rose-water, sugar, ambergrease, musk, cinnamon, aloes-wood, pearls, and leaf-gold; but the sweets are usually omitted. The confectio alkermes is chiefly made at Montpellier. The grain, which gives it the denomination, is nowhere found so plentifully as there. Chambers.

Christophorus Ayrenus prefers bezoar stone, and the confection of alkermes, before other cordials; and amber in some cases: Alkermes comforts the inner parts, and bezoar stone hath an especial virtue against all melancholy affections.

Burton, Anat. Med. p. 397.

ALL. † adj. [Goth. allis, alls, Æll, Æal, galle, alle, Sax. oll, Welsh; al, Dutch; alle, Germ. all, Gr.]

1. Being the whole number; every one.

Brutus is an honourable man;
So are they all, all honourable men. Shakespeare, Jul. Cæs.

To graze the herb all leaving,

The great encouragement of all, is the assurance of a future reward. Tillotson.

2. Being the whole quantity; every part.

Six days thou shalt labour, and do all thy work. Deut. v. 13.
Political power, I take to be a right of making laws with penalties, and of employing the force of the community in the execution of such laws, and in the defence of the commonwealth; and all this only for the publick good. Locke.

3. The whole quantity applied to duration of time.

On those pastures cheerful spring,
All the year doth sit and sing;
And, rejoicing, smiles to see,
Their green backs wear his livery. Crashaw.

4. The whole extent of place.

Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice.

ALL. † adv. [See ALL, adj.]

1. Quite; completely.

How is my love all ready forth to come. Spenser.
Know, Rome, that all alone Marcus did fight Within Corioli gates. Shakespeare.

He swore so loud,
That, all amaz'd, the priest let fall the book. Shakespeare.
The Saxons could call a comet a fixed star, which is all one with stella errans, or cometa. Camden, Remains.

For a large conscience is all one,
And signifies the same with none. Hudibras.

Balm, from a silver box distill'd around,
Shall all bedew the roots, and scent the sacred ground. Dryden.

I do not remember he any where mentions expressly the title of the first-born, but all along keeps himself under the shelter of the indefinite term, heir. Lord.

Justice may be furnished out of fire, as far as her sword goes; and courage may be all over a continued blaze. Addison.

If e'er the miser durst his farthings spare,
He thinly spreads them through the publick square,
Where, all beside the rail, rang'd beggars lie,
And from each other catch the doleful cry. Gay.

2. Altogether; wholly: without any other consideration.

I am of the temper of most kings, who love to be in debt, are all for present money, no matter how they pay it afterward. Dryden.

3. Only; without admission of any thing else.

When I shall wed,
That lord, whose hand must take my plight, shall carry
Half my love with him, half my care and duty.
Sure I shall never marry, like my sister,
To love my father all. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

4. Although. This sense is truly Teutonic, but now obsolete.

Do you not think th' accomplishment of it
Sufficient work for one man's simple head,
All were it as the rest but simply writ. Spenser.

5. It is sometimes a word of emphasis; nearly the same with just.

A shepherd's swain, say, did thee bring,
 As his straying flock he fed;
 And, when his honour hath thee read,
 Crave pardon for thy hardyhead. Spenser, Pastorals.

6. It was anciently in English what it is now in the other Teutonic dialects, a particle of mere enforcement.

He thought them six-pence all too dear. Song in Shakspeare.
 Tell us what occasion of import
 Hath all so long detained you from your wife. Shakspeare.

7. It was thus used, till the time of Milton, in composition with to, signifying entirely; which some of the editors of that poet affected to improve into all too. But it is a common and forcible expression in our old language. It is found in our translation of the Bible, though some editions corruptly and improperly read "all to break," as if the verb were in the infinitive mood.

And a certain woman cast a piece of a milstone upon Abimelech's head, and all-to [i. e. entirely] brake his skull.
Judges, ix. 53.

Wisdom's self
 Oft seeks to sweet retired solitude;
 Where, with her best nurse, Contemplation,
 She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings,
 That in the various bustle of resort
 Were all-to ruffled, and sometimes impair'd.
Milton, Comus, ver. 380.

8. It is used with that, to signify a collection of similar things or occurrences.

Snuff, or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
 With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.
Pope, Rape of the Lock, C. 3.

ALL.† n. s.

The whole; opposed to part, or nothing.

And will she yet debase her eyes on me;
 On me, whose all not equals Edward's moiety? Shakspeare.
 Nought's had, all's spent,

Where our desire is got without content. Shakspeare, Macb.

The youth shall study, and no more engage
 Their flatt'ring wishes for uncertain age;
 No more with fruitless care, and cheated strife,
 Chase fleeting pleasure through the maze of life;
 Finding the wretched all they here can have,
 But present food, and but a future grave. Prior.

Our all is at stake, and irretrievably lost, if we fail of success. Addison.

2. Every thing.

Then shall we be cramm'd.—All the better: we shall be the more remarkable. Shakspeare.

Up with my tent, here will I lie to night;
 But where to morrow?—Well, all's one for that. Shakspeare.

All the fitter, Lentulus: our coming
 Is not for salutation; we have business. B. Jonson.

That is, every thing is the better, the same, the fitter.

Sceptre and power, thy giving, I assume;
 And gladlier shall resign, when in the end
 Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee,
 For ever; and in me all whom thou lov'st. Milton

They that do not keep up this indifferency for all but truth, put coloured spectacles before their eyes, and look through false glasses. Locke.

3. The phrase and all is of the same kind.

They all fell to work at the roots of the tree, and left it so little foothold, that the first blast of wind laid it flat upon the ground, nest, eagles, and all. L' Etrange.

A torch, snuff and all, goes out in a moment, when dipped in the vapour. Addison, Remarks on Italy.

4. All is much used in composition: but, in most instances, it is merely arbitrary; as, all-commanding.

Sometimes the words compounded with it, are fixed and classical; As, Almighty. When it is connected with a participle, it seems to be a noun; as, all-surrounding: in other cases an adverb; as, all-accomplished, or completely accomplished. Of these compounds, a small part of those which may be found, has been inserted by Dr. Johnson; and a considerable addition is now made. There are indeed few adjectives or participles, which may not be found thus compounded. They abound in modern poetry, particularly in that of Thomson and Young.

ALL-ABANDONED.* part. adj.

Deserted by all.
 The causes were of no small moment, which have thus beinasked your singular beauty under so unworthy array, and conducted you to this all-abandoned desert.

Shelton, Tr. of D. Quir. i. 4. 1.

ALL-ABHORRED.* part. adj.

Detested by all.
 Will you again unknit
 This churlish knot of all-aborred war?

Shakspeare, Hen. IV. p. 1.

ALL-ADMIRING.* part. adj.

Wholly admiring.
 Hear him but reason in divinity,
 And, all-adoring, with an inward wish
 You would desire, the king were made a prelate.

Shakspeare, Hen. V. i. i.

ALL-ADVISED.* part. adj.

Advised by all.
 What you divine of the new edition of the Paradise Lost, just now upon the point of appearing, may perhaps prove too true. • I agree with you, the editor prejudiced nobody in his favour by his specimen. He was all-advised to give such a one.
Bp. Warburton's Letters, p. 13.

ALL-APPROVED.* adj.

He who is approved by all.
 Why may it not be free for me to break out into an higher strain, and under it [the philosophy of Plato] to touch upon some points of Christianity; as well as all-approved Spenser sings of Christ under the name of Pan?

More's Song of the Soul, Preface.

ALL-ATONING.* part. adj.

Atoning for all.
 A patriot's all-atoning name. Dryden, Abs. and Achitophel.
 The effects of incapacity, shewn by the popular, in all the great members of the commonwealth, are to be covered by the all-atoning name of liberty. Burke.

ALL-BEARING.† adj.

That which bears every thing, omniparous.

O thou all-bearing earth,
 Which men do gape for till thou cramm'st their mouths
 And choak'st their throats with dust; open thy breast,
 And let me sink into thee! Marston's Ant. and Melida.

Whatever earth, all-bearing mother, yields
 In India east or west. Milton, P. L. v. 338.

Thus while he spoke, the sovereign plant he drew,
 Where on th' all-bearing earth unmark'd it grew. Pope.

ALL-BEAUTEONS.* adj.

Completely beautiful.
 My fancy form'd thee of angelick kind,
 Some emanation of the all-beauteous mind. Pope, Elois, ver. 62.

ALL-BEHOOLDING.* adj.

That which beholds all
 things.
 So many sumptuous bowers, within so little space,
 The all-beholding sun scarce sees in all his race.

Drayton's Polyolb. S. 17.

ALL-BLASTING.* part. adj.

That which blasts, de-fames, or destroys all things.
 Let his all-blasting tongue great errors find
 In Pallas' house. Marston's Satires, sat. 4.

ALL-CHANGING.* part. adj.

That which is perpetually changing.
 This same bias, this commodity,
 This bawd, this broker, this all-changing word.
Shakspeare, K. John, ii. 2.

ALL-CHEERING. adj.

That which gives gaiety and cheerfulness to all.

A L L

- Soon as the all-cheering sun
Should, in the farthest east, begin to draw
The shady curtains from Aurora's bed. Shakespeare.
- ALL-COMMANDING. adj. [from all and command.]
Having the sovereignty over all.
He now sets before them the high and shining idol of glory,
the all-commanding image of bright gold. Raleigh.
- ALL-COMPLYING. part. adj. Yielding or complying in every respect.
All bodies be of air compos'd,
Great nature's all-complying Mercury,
Unto ten thousand shapes and forms dispos'd.
More's Song of the Soul, App. st. 28.
- ALL-COMPOSING.† adj. That which quiets all men, or every thing.
—The sweet peace of all-composing night.
Crashaw's Poems, p. 54.
- Wrapt in embow'ring shades, Ulysses lies,
His woes forgot! but Pallas now address,
To break the bands of all-composing. Pope.
- ALL-COMPREHENSIVE. adj. Comprehending all things.
The divine goodness is manifested in making all creatures suitably to those ideas of their natures, which he hath in his all-comprehensive wisdom. Glanvill's Pre-existence of Souls, ch. 8.
- ALL-CONCEALING. part. adj. That which conceals
all things.
They stole away, and took their hasty flight,
Carried in cloudes of all-concealing night.
Spenser, M. Hubb. Tale, ver. 340.
- ALL-CONQUERING. adj. That which subdues every thing.
Second of Satan sprung, all-conquering death?
What think'st thou of our empire now? Milton.
- ALL-CONSTRAINING. part. adj. That which restrains or subjugates all things.
—Nature, by her all-constraining law,
Each bird to her own kind this season doth invite.
Drayton's Polyolb. S. 13.
- ALL-CONSUMING. adj. That which consumes every thing.
By age unbroke—but all-consuming care
Destroys perhaps the strength, that time would spare. Pope.
- ALL-DARING. adj. That which dares attempt every thing.
If I would fly to the all-daring power of poetry, where could
I not take sanctuary. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.
- ALL-DESTROYING. part. adj. Destroying all things.
Thy all-destroying arrows and thy bow
Thou hast ply'd so well about these woods, that now
Thou art gone out thy arts-master.
Sir R. Fanshawe, Part. Fid. p. 146.
- ALL-DEVASTATING. part. adj. Wasting all things.
From wounds her eaglets suck the reeking blood,
And all-devastating war provides her food. Sandys, Job, p. 58.
- ALL-DEVOURING. adj. That which eats up every thing.
Secure from flames, from envy's fiercer rage,
Destructive war, and all-devouring age. Pope.
- ALL-DIMMING. part. adj. That which obscures all things.
Then close his eyes with thy all-dimming hand.
Marston's Address to Oblivion, at the end of his Satires.
- ALL-DISCOVERING. part. adj. Disclosing every thing.
Till all-discovering time shall further truth declare.
More, Song of the Soul, Inf. of Worlds, st. 93.
- ALL-DISGRACED. part. adj. Completely disgraced.
The queen
Of audience, nor desire, shall fail; so she
From Egypt drive her all-disgraced friend,
Or take his life there. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop. iii. 10.

- ALL-DISPENSING. particip. adj.
1. That which dispenses all things.
As frankly bestowed on them by the all-dispensing bounty as rain and sunshine. Milton, of Reform, b. 2.
2. That which affords any dispensation or permission.
That little space you safely may allow;
Your all-dispensing power protects you now.
Dryden, Hind and Panther.
- ALL-DIVINE. adj. Supremely excellent.
Could I charm the queen of love,
To lend a quill of her white dove;—
Then would I write the all-divine
Perfections of my valentine. Howell's Lett. i. 5. 21.
- ALL-DIVINING. part. adj. Foretelling all things.
But is there aught in hidden fate can shun
Thy all-divining spirit? Sir R. Fanshawe, Part. Fid. p. 185.
- ALL-DREADED. adj. Feared by all.
The all-dreaded thunder-stone. Shakespeare, Song in Cymb.
- ALL-DROWSY. adj. Very drowsy.
All-drowsy night; who, in a car of jet,
By steeds of iron-gray (which mainly sweet Moist drops on all the world) drawn through the sky,
The helps of darkness waited orderly. Brown, Brit. Past. 2. 1.
- ALL-ELOQUENT. adj. Having all the force of eloquence.
O death all-eloquent, you only prove,
What dust we doat on, when 'tis man we love.
Pope, Eloisa, ver. 335.
- ALL-EMBRACING. part. adj. Embracing all things.
Cheer thee, my heart!
For thou too hast thy part
And place in the great throng
Of this unbounded all-embracing song.
Crashaw, Hymn to the Name of Jesus, Poems, p. 148.
- ALL-ENDING. part. adj. That which ends or closes
all things.
Methinks, the truth should live from age to age,
As 'twere retail'd to all posterity,
Even to the general all-ending day. Shakespeare, Rich. III. iii. 1.
- ALL-ENLIGHTENING. part. adj. Enlightening all things.
Phebus, arrayed in burning gold,
Lashing his fiery steeds, displays
His warm and all-enlight'ning rays.
C. Cotton's Morn. Quatrains, st. 12.
- ALL-ENRAGED. adj. Greatly enraged.
How shall I stand, when that thou shalt be hurl'd
On clouds, in robes of fire, to judge the world,
Usher'd with golden legions, in thine eye
Carrying an all-enraged majesty. John Hall, Poems, p. 77.
- ALL-FLAMING. part. adj. Flaming in every direction.
She could not curb her fear, but 'gan to start
At that all-flaming dread the monster spit.
Beaumont, Psyche, viii. 85.
- ALL-FOOLS-DAY. n. s. The first of April. A custom prevails every where among us, says the Spectator, on the first of April; when every body strives to make as many fools as he can.
The first of April, some do say,
Is set apart for all-fools-day. Poor Robin's Almanack, 1760.
The French too have their all-fools-day, and call the person imposed upon "an April fish, poisson d' Avril," whom we term an April fool. Grand's Popular Antiquities.
- ALL-FORGIVING. adj. Forgiving all.
That all-forgiving king,
The type of him above. Dryden, Thren. Aug. ver. 257.
- ALL-FOURS.† n. s. [from all and four.]
1. A low game at cards, played by two; so named from the four particulars by which it is reckoned, and which, joined in the hand of either of the

are said to make all-fours. The all-four are gh, low, Jack, and the game.

2. The arms used together with the legs on the ground.

"He went on all-fours."

ALL-GIVER. n. s. The Giver of all things.

If all the world

Should in a pet of temperance feed on pulse,
Drink the clear stream, and nothing wear but frieze,
The All-giver would be unthank'd, would be unprais'd.

Milton, Com. ver. 723.

ALL-GOOD. n. s. A Being of unlimited goodness.

Applied with great propriety by Dryden to the Maker of heaven and earth. All-good, as an adjective, is common.

● To the All-good his lifted hands he folds,
And thanks him low on his redeemed ground.

Dryden, Ann. Mir. ver. 1137.

ALL-GUIDING. part. adj. Guiding all things.

Now give me leave to answer thee, and those,
Who God's all-guiding providence oppose. Sandys, Job, p. 51.

ALL HAIL. n. s. [from all and hail, for health.] All health. This is therefore not a compound, though, perhaps usually reckoned among them; a term of salutation. Salve or salvete. Dr. Johnson has cited only poetical authority for the use of this expression; and Dr. Ash has absolutely pronounced it to be used only in poetry. But this is a great mistake.

And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. St. Matthew, xxviii. 9.

All hail, ye fields, whose constant peace attends!

All hail, ye sacred, solitary groves!

All hail, ye books, my true, my real friends,

Whose conversation pleases and improves.

Walsh.

To ALL-HAIL. n. s. To salute; to greet with exclamations.

While I stood rapt in the wonder of it,
Came missives from the king, who all-hailed me, Thane of Cawdor.

Shakespeare, Macb. i. 5.

ALL HALLOW. n. s. [from all and halloze.] All-saints-

ALL HALLOWS. n. s. day; the first of November.

ALL-HALLOWMASS. n. s. The term near All-saints-day.

It [Feb. 2.] has the name of Candlemass-day, because lights were distributed and carried about in procession, or because also the use of lighted tapers, which was observed all winter at vespers and litanies, were then wont to cease, till the next All-hallow-mass.

Bourne, Vulg. Antiquities, ch. 19.

ALL-HALLOWN. adj. [from all and halloze, to make holy.] The time about All-saints-day.

Farewell, thou latter spring! farewell.

All-hallown summer.

Shakespeare, Henry IV.

ALLHALLOWTIDE. n. s. See ALL-HALLOWN. The term near All-saints, or the first of November.

Cut off the bough about Allhallowtide, in the bare place, and set it in the ground, and it will grow to be a fair tree in one year.

Bacon, Natural History.

ALL-HEAL. n. s. [panax, Lat.] A species of iron-wood; which see.

This was the most respectable festival of our druids, called yule-tide; when mistletoe, which they called all-heal, was carried in their hands and laid on their altars, as an emblem of the salutiferous advent of Messiah.

Stukeley's Medullic Hist. of Carausius, b. 2.

ALL-HEALING. part. adj. Healing all things.

The Druids' invocation was to one all-healing or all-saving power.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 9.

Thy all-healing grace and spirit

Revive again what law and letter kill. Donne, Div. Poems, xvi.

ALL-HELPING. part. adj. Assisting all things.

That all-healing deity, or all-helping medicine, among the Druids.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 9.

ALL-HIDING. part. adj. Concealing all things.

O night, thou furnace of foetid-smoking smoke,
Let not the jealous day behold that face
Which underneath thy black all-hiding cloke
Immodestly lies martyr'd with disgrace.

Shakespeare, Rape of Lucrece.

ALL-HONoured. part. adj. Honoured by all.

What was it,

That mov'd pale Cassius to conspire? And what
Made the all-honour'd, honest, Roman Brutus,
With the arm'd rest, courtiers of beauteous freedom,
To drench the Capitol.

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop. ii. 6.

ALL-HURTING. part. adj. Hurting all things.

Not a heart, which in his level frame,
Could scape the hail of his all-hurting aim.

Shakespeare, Lover's Complaint.

ALL-IDOLIZING. part. adj. Worshipping any thing.

All-idolizing worms, that thus could crowd
And urge their sun all-idolizing thy cloud.

Crashaw, Poems, p. 156.

ALL-IMITATING. part. adj. Imitating every thing.

All-imitating ape.

More's Song of the Soul, i. ii. 136.

ALL-INFORMING. part. adj. That which actuates by vital powers.

'Twas He that made the all-informing light,
And with dark shadows clothes the aged night.

Sandys, Ps. 104.

ALL-INTERPRETING. part. adj. Interpreting or explaining all things.

The all-interpreting voice of charity.

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce, ii. 9.

ALL-JUDGING. adj. That which has the sovereign right of judgement.

I look with horror back,
That I detest my wretched self, and curse
My past-polluted life. All-judging Heav'n,
Who knows my crimes, has seen my sorrow for them.

Rowe, Jane Shore.

ALL-KNOWING. adj. Omniscient; all-wise.

Shall we repine at a little misplaced charity, we, who could no way foresee the effect; when an all-knowing, all-wise Being, showers down every day his benefits on the unthankful and underserving!

Atterbury, Sermons.

ALL-LICENSED. part. adj. Licensed to every thing.

Not only, sir, this your all-licensed fool,
But other of your insolent retinue,
Do hourly carp and quarrel.

Shakespeare, Lear, i. 4.

ALL-LOVING. adj. Of infinite love.

By hearty prayer to beg the sweet delight
Of God's all-loving spirit.

More, Song of the Soul, i. iii. 32.

ALL-MAKING. adj. That created all; omnifick. See ALL-SEEING.

ALL-MATURING. adj. That which matures all things.

So looks our monarch on this early fight,
The essay and rudiments of great success;
Which all-maturing time must bring to light.

Dryden, Ann. Mir. ver. 564.

ALL-MURDERING. adj. Completely destructive.

Thy cruel band extinguisheth
Thyself, and me, senate, and common folk,
And thy new raised town, with one all-murdering stroke.

Sir R. Fanshawe, 4th Book of Virgil.

ALL-OBEDIENT. adj. Absolutely obedient.

Hear, Father, hear! thy Lamb at last complains
Of some more painful thing than all his pains:
Then bows his all-obedient head, and dies
His own love's and our sin's great sacrifice.

Crashaw, Poems, p. 169.

ALL-OBEYING. part. adj. That, to which all pay obedience; an expression that Dr. Johnson formerly wished to change into all-obeyed. But the active participle, in a passive sense, is not uncommon in our old writers.

ALL

Tell him, from his obdurate breath I hear
 The doom of Egypt. Shakspeare, Ant. Cleop. iii. 11.
ALL-OBVIOUS.* adj. That which would cause en-fire forgetfulness.
 'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity
 Shall you pace forth. Shakspeare, Sonnets, S. 55.
ALL-OBSCURING.* part. adj. That which hides all things.
 It [life] is a dial, which points out
 The sun-set as it moves about;
 And shadows out, in lines of night,
 The subtle stages of time's flight;
 Till all-obscuring earth hath laid
 The body in perpetual shade.
Bp. Henry King's Poems, the Dirge.
ALL-PENETRATING.* part. adj. Pervading all things.
 Since I cannot escape from thy [Christ's] all penetrating presence, but must perforce approach, to mine owne reproach; behold, I bow my body putrefied to thine glorified, and render thee all possible thanks for the inconceivable grace thou hast done graceless me. Stafford, Niobe, ii. 31.
ALL-PERFECTNESS.* n. s. The perfection of the whole.
 For, as Philo observes, Pythagorean-like, Ten (which they call also ἀριθμοί, ἑρμῆς, and παγκόσμιος, the world, heaven, and all- perfectness;) is made by the scattering of the parts of Four:
 thus, 1, 2, 3, 4. Put these together now and they are Ten, παγκόσμιος, τὸ πᾶν, the Universe. More, Conj. Cabb. p. 153.
ALL-PIERCING.* part. adj. Discovering all things.
 Lest Phæbus should, with his all-piercing eye,
 Desery some Vulcan. Marston, Satires, Sat. 5.
ALL-POWERFUL. adj. Almighty; omnipotent; possessed of infinite power.
 O all-powerful Being, the least motion of whose will can create or destroy a world; pity us, the mournful friends of thy distressed servant. Swift.
ALL-PRAISED.* part. adj. Praised by all.
 This gallant Hotspur, this all-praised knight.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. 1.
ALL-RULING.* part. adj. Governing all things.
 The will
 And high permission of all-ruling heaven
 Left him at large to his own dark designs. Milton, P. L. i. 212.
 How oft amidst
 Thick clouds and dark doth Heaven's all-ruling Sire
 Choose to reside. Ibid. ii. 264.
ALL SAINTS DAY. n. s. The day on which there is a general celebration of the saints. The first of November.
ALL-SANCTIFYING.* part. adj. That which sanctifies the whole.
 The venerable and all-sanctifying names of the Apostles.
West, on the Resurrection, p. 328.
ALL-SAVING.* part. adj. Saving all things.
 The Druid's invocation was to one all-healing or all-saving power. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 9.
ALL-SEARCHING.* part. adj. That which searches and pervades all things.
 Consider next God's infinite, all-searching knowledge, which looks through and through the most secret of our thoughts, ransacks every corner of the heart, ponders the most inward designs and ends of the soul in all a man's actions.
South, Sermons, ii. 99.
ALL-SEER. n. s. He that sees or beholds every thing; he whose view comprehends all things.
 That high All-seer, which I dallied with,
 Hath turned my feigned prayer on my head,
 And giv'n in earnest what I begg'd in jest. Shakspeare.
ALL-SEEING. adj. That which beholds every thing.
 The same First Mover certain bounds has plac'd,
 How long those perishable forms shall last;

ALL

Nor can they last beyond the time assign'd
 By that all-seeing and all-making mind. Dryden.
ALL-SHAKING.* part. adj. That which shakes all things.
 Thou, all-shaking thunder,
 Strike flat the thick rotundity o' the world!
Shakspeare, Lear, iii. 2.
ALL-SHUNNED.* part. adj. Shunned by all.
 His poor self,
 A dedicated beggar to the air,
 With his disease of all-shunn'd poverty,
 Walks, like contempt, alone. Shakspeare, Tim. of Ath. iv. 2.
ALL SOULS DAY. n. s. The day on which supplications are made for all souls by the church of Rome;
 the second of November.
 This is all souls day, fellows, is it not? —
 It is, my lord. —
 Why then, all souls day is my body's doomsday. Shakspeare.
ALL-SUFFICIENCY.* n. s. Infinite ability.
 O God, the more we are sensible of our own indigence, the more let us wonder at thine all-sufficiency.
Bp. Hall, Occ. Meditations, lxx.
 He is of infinite goodness and mercy, truth, justice, wisdom, power, all-sufficiency. Whole Duty of Man.
ALL-SUFFICIENT. adj. Sufficient to every thing.
 The testimonies of God are perfect, the testimonies of God are all-sufficient unto that end for which they were given.
Hooker.
 He can more than employ all our powers in their utmost elevation: for he is every way perfect and all-sufficient. Norris.
ALL-SUFFICIENT.* n. s. Properly and emphatically denoting God.
 Through this [faith] Abraham saw a phoenix-like resurrection of his son, as possible with God; therefore obeyeth that command of offering his son, believing a metamorphosis possible with the All-sufficient.
Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 544.
ALL-SURVEYING.* part. adj. That which beholds
 all things.
 Then I observ'd the bold oppressions done,
 In presence of the all-surveying sun. Sandys, Eccles. p. 6.
ALL-SUSTAINING.* part. adj. That which upholds all things.
 Hath the day,
 Forgot his season, and the sun his way?
 Doth God withdraw his all-sustaining might?
Sir J. Beaumont, Poems, p. 69.
ALL-TELLING.* part. adj. That which tells or di-vulges all things.
All-telling fame
 Doth noise abroad, Navarre hath made a vow.
Shakspeare, Love's I. L. ii. 1.

 umphant.
 As you were ignorant of what were done,
 By Cupid's hand, your all-triumphing son. B. Jonson.
ALL-WATCHED.* part. adj. Watched throughout.
 Nor doth he dedicate one jot of colour,
 Unto the weary and all-watched night.
Shakspeare, Hen. V. iv. Chor.
ALL-WISE. adj. Possessed of infinite wisdom.
 There is an infinite, eternal, all-wise Mind governing the affairs of the world. South.
 Supreme, all-wise, eternal, potentate!
 Sole author, sole disposer of our fate! Prior.
ALL-WITTED.* adj. Completely witted; possessing every kind of wit.
 Come on, signior, now prepare to court this all-witted lady, most naturally, and like yourself.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, v. 1.
ALL-WORSHIPPED.* part. adj. Adored by all.

In her own joins

She hutch'd the all-worshipful ore, and precious gems,

To store her children with. Milton, Com. ver. 719.

ALLANTOIS, or ATLANTOIDES. n. s. [from αλλαντος, a gut, and ειδος, shape.] The urinary tunick placed between the amnion and chorion, which, by the navel and urachus, or passage by which the urine is conveyed from the infant in the womb, receives the urine that comes out of the bladder. Quincy.

To ALLA'TRATE. * v. n. [Lat. allatro.] To bark; to growl. Obsolete.

Let Cerberus, the dog of hell, allatrate what he list, to the contrary. Steeles, Anal. of Abuses.

To ALLA'Y. † v. a. [from alloyer, Fr. to mix one metal with another in order to coinage; it is therefore derived by some from à la loi, according to law, the quantity of metals being mixed according to law; by others, from allier, to unite; perhaps from allocare, to put together.]

1. To mix one metal with another, to make it fitter for coinage. In this sense, most authors preserve the original French orthography, and write alloy. See ALLOY. Roquefort, in his old French Glossary, gives us the verb allaier or allayer, "battre monnoie par ordre du souverain;" so that what Dr. Johnson has just said of the original orthography is questionable.

2. To join any thing to another, so as to abate its predominant qualities. It is used commonly in a sense contrary to its original meaning, and is, to make something bad, less bad. To obtund; to repress; to abate. Dr. Johnson might have added that the expression is often applied to the mixture of wine and other liquours with water. Thus, in our old dictionaries, "To alay wine, dihuo; alaide wine, vinum aquaticum."

Sir Diaphanous is a recusant

In sack: He only takes it in French wine,

With an alloy of water. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady, iii. 1.

Being brought into the open air,

I would alloy the burning quality

Of that felt poison.

Shakespeare.

No friendly offices shall alter or alloy that rancour, that frets in some hellish breasts, which, upon all occasions, will foam out at its foul mouth in slander and invective. South.

3. To quiet; to pacify; to repress. The word, in this sense, I think not to be derived from the French alloyer, but to be the English word lay, with a before it, according to the old form.

If by your art, you have Put the wild waters in this roar, alloy them.*Shakespeare.ALLA'Y. † n. s. [alloy, Fr.]

1. The metal of a baser kind mixed in coins, to place them, that they may wear less. As a fair tripartite with silver and copper, two carats, Nat. Hist. gold is alloyed with silver and copper only. As to a pound Troy; weight is mixed with alloy of which eighteen penny-alloy is added, to a pound. Cowell thinks the ing; which might have entervail the charge of coinage; which might have been done only by making

We are ge

In our own natures pure; but

The husband's stamp upon us, in we suffer.

And base ones, of you men, are alloys.

And make us blush like copper, mingled with us,

For fools are stubborn in the gold and Fl. Woman's Prize, i. 3.
As coins are harden'd by th' alloy,

Hudibras.

2. Any thing which, being added, abates the predominant qualities of that with which it is mingled; in the same manner, as the admixture of baser metals alloy the qualities of the first mass.

Dark colours easily suffer a sensible alloy, by little scattering light. Newton, Opticks.

3. Alloy being taken from baser metals, commonly implies something worse than that with which it is mixed.

The joy has no alloy of jealousy, hope and fear. Roscommon.

ALLA'YER. n. s. [from alloy.] The person or thing which has the power or quality of alloying.

Phlegm and pure blood are reputed allayers of acrimony; and Avicen countermands letting blood in cholerick bodies; because he esteems the blood a freenum bitis, or a bridle of gall, obtunding its acrimony and fierceness. Harvey.

ALLA'YMENT. n. s. [from alloy.] That which has the power of alloying or abating the force of another.

If I could temporize with my affection,

Or brew it to a weak and collier palate,

The like allayment would I give my grief.Shakespeare.

To ALLE'CT. * v. a. [Lat. allecto, allicio.] Old Fr. allicher, attirer par ruse.] This verb occurs in the Dict. of Huloet, where it is defined, "To stir with some pleasant mean; to intice."

ALLE'CTIVE. * n. s. [from the verb.] Allurement; and, in our elder dictionaries, called "sweetness in feeling."

What better allective could Lucifer devise to allure and bring men pleasantly into damnable servitude, than to purpose to them in form of a play [dice-playing] his principal treasury wherein the more part of sin is contained, and all goodness and virtue confounded. Sir T. Eliot, Gov. fol. 79. b.

Many strong allectives to evil in the lower carnal part of the man, as well as invitations and obligations to good in the upper and spiritual. Hammond, Sermons.

That new course of life — had nothing to recommend it to his taste but it's unpleasantness, the best allective unto him.

Fell, Life of Hammond, sect. 3.

ALLE'CTIVE. * adj. Alluring. Not now in use.

Woman yfarc'd with fraude and disceipt,

To thy confusion most allective bait.Chancer, Rem. of Love, ver. 14.

ALLEGATION. † n. s. [from allege.]

1. Affirmation; declaration,

Of ghosts, of goblins, and drad sorcery,

From nicer allegations we'll desist.More, Song of the Soul, App. st. 24.

2. The thing alleged or affirmed.

Hath he not twit our sovereign lady here

With ignominious words, though darkly cougth?

As if she had suborned some tarry none

False allegations — tois of some wear

3. An allegations, to overthrow his state. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

An excuse; a plea.

ALL'VE I omitted no means to be informed of my errors; and I expect not to be excused in any negligence on account of youth, want of leisure, or any other idle allegations. Pope.

To ALLE'GE. v. a. [allego, Lat.]

1. To affirm; to declare; to maintain.

2. To plead as an excuse, or produce as an argument.

Surely the present form of church government is such, as no law of God, or reason of man, hath hitherto been alleged, of force sufficient to prove they do ill, who, to the utmost of their power, withstand the alteration thereof. Hooker.

If we forsake the ways of grace or goodness, we cannot allege any colour of ignorance, or want of instruction; we cannot say we have not learned them, or we could not. Sprat.

He hath a clear and full view, and there is no more to be alleged for his better information. Locke.

ALLEGABLE. † adj. [from allege.] That which may be alleged.

Upon this interpretation all may be solved, that is allegable against it. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

Is there so much as the least shadow of excuse allegable for parents not bringing their children to the bishop to be confirmed by him? South, Sermons, v. 37.

ALLEGEMENT. † n. s. [from allege.] The same with allegation. Dict.

To Ramah they come to Saul, with many complaints and allegements in their mouths. By. Sanderson, Sermons, p. 636.

ALLEG'ER. n. s. [from allege.] He that alleges.

The narrative, if we believe it as confidently as the famous alleger of it, Pamphilio, appears to do, would argue, that there is no other principle requisite, than what may result from the lucky mixture of several bodies. Boyle.

ALLEG'IANCE. n. s. [allegeance, Fr.] The duty of subjects to the government.

I did pluck allegiance from men's hearts.
Loud shouts and salutations from their mouths,
Even in the presence of the crowned king. Shakspeare.

We charge you on allegiance to ourselves,
To hold your slaught'ring hands, and keep the peace.

The house of commons, to whom every day petitions are directed by the several counties of England, professing all allegiance to them, govern absolutely; the lords concurring, or rather submitting to whatsoever is proposed. Clarendon.

ALLEG'GIANT. adj. [from allege.] Loyal; conformable to the duty of allegiance: a word not now used.

For your great graces
Heap'd upon me, poor undeserver, I
Can nothing render but allegiant thanks,
My pray'rs to heav'n for you. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

ALLEGORICK. † adj. [from allegory.] After the manner of an allegory; not real; not literal.

A kingdom they portend thee; but what kingdom,
Real or allegorick, I discern not. Milton, P. R.
Those other allegorick precepts of beneficence, fetched out of the closet of nature. Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce, i. 10.

The frequent and familiar use of allegorick personifications in the public pageants, I mean the general use of them, greatly contributed to form the school of Spenser.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, ii. 202.

ALLEGORICAL. adj. [from allegory.] In the form of an allegory; not real; not literal; mystical.

When our Saviour said, in an allegorical and mystical sense, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you; the hearers understood him literally and grossly. Bentley.

The epithet of Apollo for shooting, is capable of two applications; one literal, in respect of the darts and bow, the ensigns of that god; the other allegorical, in regard to the rays of the sun. Pope.

ALLEGORICALLY. adv. [from allegory.] After an allegorical manner.

Virgil often make Iris the messenger of Juno, allegorically taken for the air. Peucham.

The place is to be understood allegorically; and what is thus spoken by a Phœacian with wisdom, is, by the Poet, applied to the goddess of it. Pope.

ALLEGORICALNESS. n. s. [from allegorical.] The quality of being allegorical. Dict.

ALLEGORIST.* n. s. [from allegory.] He who teaches or describes in an allegorical manner.

Philo, and Origen, and the like allegorists.

Whiston, Memoirs, p. 235.

The pencil of Spenser is as powerful as that of Rubens, his brother allegorist. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, ii. 96.

To ALLEGORIZE. v. a. [from allegory.] To turn into allegory; to form an allegory; to take in a sense not literal.

He hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his supposition of the tree itself to be true. Raleigh.

As some would allegorize these signs, so others would confine them to the destruction of Jerusalem. Burnet, Theory.

An alchymist shall reduce divinity to the maxims of his laboratory, explain morality by sal, sulphur, and mercury; and allegorize the scripture itself, and the sacred mysteries thereof into the philosopher's stone. Locke.

To ALLEGORIZE.* v. n. To treat as an allegory.

After his manner, he allegorizeth upon the sacrifices of the law. Pulke against Allen, p. 223.

Origen knew not the Pope's purgatory, though he allegorize of a certain purgatory. Ibid, p. 447.

ALLEGORIZER.* n. s. An allegorist.

The Stoick philosophers, as we learn from Cicero, were great allegorizers in their theology. Cowenry, Phil. Comp. v.

ALLEGORY. n. s. [ἀλληγορία.] A figurative discourse, in which something other is intended, than is contained in the words literally taken; as wealth is the daughter of diligence, and the parent of authority.

Neither must we draw out our allegory too long, lest either we make ourselves obscure, or fall into affectation, which is childish. Ben Jonson.

This word nymphs meant nothing else but, by allegory, the vegetative humour or moisture that quickeneth and giveth life to trees and flowers, whereby they grow. Peucham.

ALLEG'GRO. n. s. [Ital.] A word, denoting one of the six distinctions of time. It expresses a rapidly motion, the quickest of all, except Presto. It originally means gay, as in Milton.

ALLELUJAH. n. s. [This word is falsely written for Hallelujah, which see.] A word of spiritual exultation, used in hymns; it signifies, Praise God.

He will set his tongue to those pious divine strains, which may be a proper prelude to those allelujahs he hopes eternally to sing. Government of the Tongue.

ALLEMANDE. † n. s. [Formerly written allemaigne or almain, i. e. from Almany or Germany. Barb. Lat. Allemania.] A dance, well known in Germany and Switzerland. In our old musick books we find the distinction also of Spanish, Venetian, French, and Scottish allemands: The allemand was also used to denote the measure, whether grave or gay, by which the singing of the song was to be regulated.

To ALLEVIATE. † v. a. [allevio, Lat. . Reckoned by Heylin, in 1656, among uncouth and unusual words.]

1. To make light; to ease, to soften.

The pains taken in the speculative will much alleviate me in describing the practice part. Haven.

Most of the distempers are the effects of abused plenty and luxury, and must not be charged upon our Maker; who, notwithstanding, hath provided excellent medicines, to alleviate those evils which we bring upon ourselves. Bentley.

2. To extenuate, or soften; as, he alleviates his fault by an excuse.

ALLEVIATION. n. s. [from alleviate.]

1. The act of making light; of allaying, or extenuating.

All apologies for, and alleviations of faults, though they are the heights of humanity, yet they are not the favours, but the duties of friendship. South.

2. That by which any pain is eased, or fault extenuated.

This loss of one-fifth of their income will sit heavy on them, who shall feel it, without the alleviation of any profit. Locke.

ALLEVIATIVE.* n. s. [from alleviate.] A palliative; something mitigating.

Some cheering alleviative to lads kept to sixteen or seventeen years of age in pure slavery to a few Greek and Latin words.

Corah's Doom, (1672) p. 126.

ALLEY. n. s. [allée, Fr.]

1. A walk in a garden.

And all within were walks, and alleys wide,
With footing worn, and heading inward far.
Where alleys are close gravelled, the earth putteth forth the first year knotgrass, and after spiregrass. Bacon, Natural Hist.

Yonder alleys green,
Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown. Milton.

Come, my fair love, our morning's task we lose;
Some labour in the easiest life would chose,
Ours is not great: the dangling bows to crop,
Whose too luxuriant growth our alleys stop. Dryden.
The thriving plants, ignoble broomsticks made,
Now sweep those alleys they were born to shade. Pope.

2. A passage in towns narrower than a street.

A back friend, a shoulder clapper, one that commands the passages of alleys, creeks, and narrow lands Shakespeare.

ALLIANCE. n. s. [alliance, Fr.]

1. The state of connection with another by confederacy; a league. In this sense, our histories of Queen Anne mention the grand alliance.

2. Relation by marriage.

A bloody Hymen shall the alliance join Betwixt the Trojan and the Ausonian line. Dryden.

3. Relation by any form of kindred.

For my father's sake,
And, for alliance' sake, declare the cause
My father lost his head. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.
Adrastus soon, with gods averse, shall join
In dire alliance with the Theban line;
Thence strife shall rise, and mortal war succeed. Pope.

4. The act of forming or contracting relation to another; the act of making a confederacy.

Dorset, your son, that with a fearful soul
Leads discontented steps in foreign soil,
This fair alliance quickly shall call home
To high promotions. Shakespeare, Richard III.

5. The persons allied to each other.

I would not boast the greatness of my father,
But point out new alliances to Cato. Addison.

ALLIANT.* n. s. [from alliance.] An ally.

We do promise and vow for ourselves of each party alliants, electors, princes, and states.

The Accord of Ulm, Wotton's Rem. p. 532.

ALLI'CIENCY. n. s. [allicio, Lat.] The power of attracting any thing; magnetism; attraction.

The feigned central allicency is but a word, and the manner of it still occult. Glanville.

ALLI'CIENT.* n. s. [from allicio, Lat.] An attractor.

The awakened needle, with joy, leapeth towards its allicient.
Robinson's Endoxa, (1658) p. 121.

To ALLIGATE.† v. a. [Dr. Johnson gives this word, without reference to any dictionary; but it is found in our elder ones. Lat. alligo, old Fr. aligéer.] To tie one thing to another; to unite.

ALLIGA'TION. n. s. [from alligate.]

1. The act of tying together; the state of being so tied.

2. The arithmetical rule that teaches to adjust the price of compounds, formed of several ingredients of different value.

ALLIGATOR.† n. s. [Dr. Johnson gives no etymology of this word. — Sir T. Herbert says, it is corruptly called by seamen alligator, from allegardos, a word compounded of Spanish and Almain. Travels, p. 364. Cowel says, the corruption is from the Portugal word allagarto; a crocodile. See Cowel, under the word ANCIENT. Lagarto is the Spanish for a lizard; and Herrera calls the caiman, “lagarto ó crocodilo.”] The crocodile. This name is chiefly used for the crocodile of America, between which, and that of Africa, naturalists have laid down this difference, that one moves the upper, and the other the lower jaw; but this is now known to be chimerical, the lower jaw being equally moved by both. See CROCODILE.

In his needy shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator stuff'd, and other skins
Of ill-shap'd fishes. Shakespeare.

Aloft in rows large poppy heads were strung,
And here a scaly alligator hung. Garth, Dispensary.

ALLIGATURE. n. s. [from alligate.] The link, or ligature, by which two things are joined together. Dict.

ALLI'SION. n. s. [allido, allisum, Lat.] The act of striking one thing against another.

There have not been any islands of note, or considerable extent, torn and cast off from the continent by earthquakes, or severed from it by the boisterous allision of the sea.

Woodward.

ALLITERATION. n. s. [ad and litera, Lat.] Of what the critics call the alliteration or beginning of several words in the same verse with the same letter, there are instances in the oldest and best writers, as,

Behemoth biggest born. Milton, P. L.

ALLI'TERATIVE.* adj. [from alliteration.] Denoting words beginning with the same letter.

The alliterative measure, unaccompanied with rhyme, and including many peculiar Saxon idioms appropriated to poetry, remained in use so low as the sixteenth century.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 314.

ALLOCA'TION. n. s. [alloco, Lat.]

1. The act of putting one thing to another.

2. The admission of an article in reckoning, and addition of it to the account.

3. An allowance made upon an account: a term used in the exchequer. Chambers.

ALLOCU'TION.† n. s. [allocutio, Lat.] The act or manner of speaking to another. Written also adlocution, from adlocutio.

Upon such a high tribunal or scaffold we often see the emperor standing, and sometimes sitting, in medals and ancient bas-relieves; both in allocutions to the army, and in distributing their bounty to the people.

Sir G. Wheeler's Descript. of Anc. Churches, p. 91.

ALLO'DIAL.† adj. [Barb. Lat. allodialis, Fr. allodial.] Held without any acknowledgement of superiority; not feudal; independent.

In Kent, the king on the commission of particular offences was entitled to pecuniary mulcts from all the allodial tenants and their men. Ketham, Domesday Book, p. 154.

The possessions of their subjects were perfectly allodial; that is, wholly independent, and held of no superiour at all.

Blackstone.

ALLODIUM.† n. s. [A word of very uncertain derivation, but most probably of German original, Dr. Johnson says. Brady, in his Glossary annexed to his Old English History, mentions Wendelin's derivation of it from the Sax. ael, omnis, and lod, which he renders onus, from laban, tollere, auferre; but he rightly adds, that there is no congruity of sense between the two words. The same etymologist proposes also the Sax. aeld, senex; because allodium was an old patrimonial inheritance that descended from ancestors in blood. Hickes derives it from the Teutonic all and lod or lood, the annual produce of the land or farm. Somner, Sax. ael or all, and Teut. heyd or heit, which we call hode or hood, that is, allhood; which expresses the nature and condition of a thing, as knight-hode, man-hode, neighbour-hode, and many more, which denote, as it were, the totality and integrity of a thing. Or, Goth. all, omnis, and od, possessio, q. d. omnimoda possessio. V. Eng. and Swed. Dict. of Serenius. The example, which I give from our learned divine, Dr. Hammond, presents a mistaken etymology of the word. Mr. Boucher inclines to the etymology of the Saxon a, denoting to or unto, and leob the people; or else to the a privative, and leob a vassal or a fine.] A possession held in absolute independence, without any acknowledgement of a lord paramount. It is opposed to fee, or feudum, which intimates some kind of dependence. There are no allodial lands in England, all being held either mediately or immediately of the king.

When we have once thus discerned the peculiarity of our tenure, only that of allodium, not from any, ἀλλ' ἐκ Διός, but from God, as the lawyers have derived that word.

Hammond, Sermons.

ALLO'NGE. n. s. [allonge, Fr.]

1. A pass or thrust with a rapier, so called from the lengthening of the space taken up by the fencer.
2. It is likewise taken for a long rein, when the horse is trotted in the hand.

To ALLO'O. v. a. [This word is generally spoke halloo, and is used to dogs, when they are incited to the chase or battle; it is commonly imagined to come from the French allons; perhaps from all lo, look all; shewing the object.] To set on; to incite a dog, by crying alloo.

Alloo thy furious mastiff; bid him vex

The noxious herd, and print upon their ears

A sad memorial of their past offence.

Philips.

ALLOQUY. n. s. [alloquium, Lat.] The act of speaking to another; address; conversation.

Dict.

To ALLO'T. v. a. [from lot.]

1. To distribute by lot.
2. To grant.

Five days we do allot thee for provision,
To shield thee from disasters of the world;
And, on the sixth, to turn thy hated back
Upon our kingdom.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

I shall deserve my fate, if I refuse

That happy hour, which heaven allots to peace.

Dryden.

3. To distribute; to parcel out; to give each his share.

Since fame was the only end of all their studies, a man cannot be too scrupulous in allotting them their due portion of it.

Tatler.

ALLO'TMENT. n. s. [from allot.]

1. That which is allotted to any one; the part; the share; the portion granted.

There can be no thought of security or quiet in this world, but in a resignation to the allotments of God and nature.

L'Estrange.

Though it is our duty to submit with patience to more scanty allotments, yet thus much we may reasonably and lawfully ask of God.

Rogers, Sermons.

2. Part appropriated.

It is laid out into a grove for fruits and shade, a vineyard, and an allotment for olives and herbs.

Broome.

ALLO'TTERY. n. s. [from allot.] That which is granted to any particular person in a distribution. See ALLO'TMENT.

Allow me such exercises as may become a gentleman, or give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament.

Shakspeare.

To ALLO'W. v. a. [Dr. Johnson derives this word from the Fr. allouer, and that from the Lat.

allaudare. But the word is of Northern origin, as Serenius and Dr. Jamieson have both observed. Goth. lafa, Sax. lofan, to praise.]

To admit; as, to allow a position; not to contradict; not to oppose.

The principles, which all mankind allow for true, are innate; those, that men of right reason admit, are the principles allowed by all mankind.

Locke.

The power of musick all our hearts allow;

And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now.

Pope.

That some of the Presbyterians declared openly against the king's murder, I allow to be true.

Swift.

To justify; to maintain as right.

The Powers above

Allow obedience.

Shakspeare.

The Lord alloweth the righteous.

Psalms, xi. 6.

To grant; to yield; to own any one's title to.

We will not, in civility, allow too much sincerity to the professions of most men; but think their actions to be interpreters of their thoughts.

Locke.

I shall be ready to allow the pope as little power here as you please.

Swift.

To grant licence to; to permit.

Let's follow the old earl, and get the beldam

To lead him where he would; his roguish madness

Allows itself to say thing.

Shakspeare.

But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak, not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

1 Thess. ii. 4.

They referred all laws, that were to be passed in Ireland, to be considered, corrected and allowed first by the state of England.

Davies on Ireland.

To give a sanction to; to authorize.

There is no slander in an allow'd fool.

Shakspeare.

6. To give to; to pay to,

Ungrateful then! if we no tears allow

To him that gave us peace and empire too.

Waller.

7. To appoint for; to set out to a certain use; as, he allowed his son the third part of his income.

8. To make abatement, or provision; or to settle any thing, with some concessions or cautions, regarding something else.

If we consider the different occasions of ancient and modern medals, we shall find they both agree in recording the great actions and successes in war; allowing still for the different ways of making it, and the circumstances that attended it.

Addison.

ALLO'WABLE. adj. [from allow.]

1. That which may be admitted without contradiction.

It is not allowable, what is observable in many pieces of Raphael, where Magdalen is represented, before our Saviour, washing his feet, on her knees; which will not consist with the text.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

2. That which is permitted or licensed; lawful; not forbidden.

In actions of this sort, the light of nature alone may discover that which is in the sight of God allowable.

Hooker.

I was, by the freedom allowable among friends, tempted to vent my thoughts with negligence.

Boyle.

Reputation becomes a signal and a very peculiar blessing to magistrates; and their pursuit of it is not only allowable, but laudable.

Atterbury, Sermons.

ALLO'WABLENESS. n. s. [from allowable.] The quality of being allowable; lawfulness; exemption from prohibition.

Lots, as to their nature, use, and allowableless, in matters of recreation, are indeed impugned by some, though better defended by others.

South, Sermons.

ALLO'WABLY.* adv. [from allowable.] With claim of allowance.

These are much more frequently, and more allowably, used in poetry than in prose.

Lowth.

ALLO'WANCE. n. s. [from allow.]

1. Admission without contradiction.

That which wisdom did first begin, and hath been with good men long continued, challengeth allowance of them that succeed, although it plead for itself nothing. Hooker.

Without the notion and allowance of spirits, our philosophy will be lame and defective in one main part of it. Locke.

2. Sanction; licence; authority.

You sent a large commission to conclude, Without the king's will, or the state's allowance, A league between his highness and Ferrara. Shakspeare.

3. Permission; freedom from restraint.

They should therefore be accustomed betimes to consult and make use of their reason, before they give allowance to their inclinations. Locke.

4. A settled rate; or appointment for any use.

The victual in plantations ought to be expended almost as in a besieged town; that is, with certain allowance. Bacon.

And his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king; a daily rate for every day all his life. 2 Kings.

5. Abatement from the strict rigour of a law, or demand.

The whole poem, though written in heroick verse, is of the Pindarick nature, as well in the thought as the expression; and, as such, requires the same grains of allowance for it. Dryden.

Parents never give allowances for an innocent passion. Swift.

6. Established character; reputation.

His bark is stoutly timber'd, and his pilot Of very expert and approved allowance. Shakspeare.

ALLOY. n. s. [See ALLAY.]

1. Baser metal mixed in coinage.

That precise weight and fineness, by law appropriated to the pieces of each denomination, is called the standard. Fine silver is silver without the mixture of any baser metal. Alloy is baser metal mixed with it. Locke.

Let another piece be coined of the same weight, wherein half the silver is taken out, and copper, or other alloy, put into the place, it will be worth but half as much; for the value of the alloy is so inconsiderable as not to be reckoned. Locke.

2. Abatement; diminution.

The pleasures of sense are probably relished by beasts in a more exquisite degree, than they are by men; for they taste them sincere and pure without mixture or alloy. Atterbury.

ALLS.* n. s. [without a singular.] All one's goods: as, "I'll pack up my alls, and be gone." It is a vulgarity.

ALLSPICE.* n. s. [from all and spice.] That which we call Jamaica pepper or pimenta; which is the fruit of a tree growing in Jamaica, and other American islands.

The pimento trees or allspice grow spontaneously, and in great abundance, in many parts of Jamaica. Guthrie, Geog.

Pimenta, from its mixt flavour of several aromatics has obtained the name of all-spice. Hill's Mat. Medica.

ALLUBESCENCY. n. s. [allubescencia, Lat.] Willingness; content. Dict.

TO ALLUDE. v. n. [alludo, Lat.] To have some reference to a thing, without the direct mention of it; to hint at; to insinuate. It is used of persons; as, he alludes to an old story; or of things, as, the lampoon alludes to his mother's faults.

These speeches of Jerom and Chrysostom do seem to allude unto such ministerial garments as were then in use. Hooker.

True it is, that many things of this nature be alluded unto, yea, many things declared. Hooker.

Then just proportions were taken, and every thing placed by weight and measure: and this I doubt not was that artificial structure here alluded to. Burnet's Theory.

ALLUMINOR. n. s. [allumer, Fr. to light.] One who colours or paints upon paper or parchment; because he gives graces, light and ornament, to the letters or figures coloured. Cowel.

TO ALLURE. v. a. [leurer, Fr. looren, Dutch, behepen, Sax.] To entice to any thing whether good or bad; to draw towards any thing by enticement.

Unto laws that men make for the benefit of men, it hath seemed always needful to add rewards, which may more allure unto good, than any hardness deterreth from it, and punishments, which may more deter from evil, than any sweetness thereto allureth. Hooker.

The golden sun, in splendour likest heav'n, Allur'd his eye. Milton, P. L.

Each flatt'ring hope, and each alluring joy. Lytelton.

ALLURE. n. s. [from the verb allure.] Something set up to entice birds, or rather things, to it. We now write lure.

The rather to train them to his allure, he told them both often, and with a vehement voice, how they were over-topped and trodden down by gentlemen. Hagyard.

ALLUREMENT. n. s. [from allure.] That which allures, or has the force of alluring; enticement; temptation of pleasure.

Against allurement, custom, and a world Offended; fearless of reproach, and scorn, Or violence. Milton, P. L.

— Adam, by his wife's allurement, fell. Milton, P. R.

To shun the allurement is not hard

To minds resolv'd, forewarn'd, and well prepar'd;

But wondrous difficult, when once beset, To struggle through the straits, and break the involving net. Dryden.

The remembrance of the first repast is an easy allurement to the second. South, Sermon ii. 369.

ALLURER.† n. s. [from allure.] The person that allures; enticer; enveigler.

Our wealth decreases, and our changes rise;

Money, the sweet allurer of our hopes,

Ebbs out in oceans, and comes in by drops. Dryden, Prologue to the Prophetess.

ALLURING.* n. s. [from allure.] The power to allure.

I stand,

Thus heavy, thus regardless, thus despising

Thee, and thy best allurings. Beaumont and Fl. Woman's Prize, i. 3.

ALLURINGLY. adv. [from allure.] In an alluring manner; enticingly.

ALLURINGNESS. n. s. [from alluring.] The quality of alluring or enticing; invitation; temptation by proposing pleasure.

ALLUSION. n. s. [allusio, Lat.] That which is spoken with reference to something supposed to be already known, and therefore not expressed; a hint; an implication. It has the particle to.

Here are manifest allusions and footsteps of the dissolution of the earth, as it was in the deluge, and will be in its last ruin. Burnet's Theory.

This last allusion gall'd the Panther more, Because indeed it rubb'd upon the sore. Dryden.

Expressions now out of use, allusions to customs lost to us, and various particularities, must needs continue several passages in the dark. Locke.

ALLUSIVE.† adj. [alludo, allusum, Lat.] Hinting at something not fully expressed.

The foundation of all parables, is some analogy or similitude between the tropical or allusive part of the parable, and the thing couched under it and intended by it. South, Sermon ii. 276.

Where the expression in one place is plain, and the sense affixed to it agreeable to the proper force of the words, and no negative objection requires us to depart from it; and the expression, in the other, is figurative or allusive, and the doctrine, deduced from it, liable to great objections; it is reasonable, in this latter place, to restrain the extent of the figure and allusion to a consistency with the former. Rogers, Sermon.

ALLU'SIVELY. adv. [from allusive.] In an allusive manner; by implication; by insinuation.

The Jewish nation, that rejected and crucified him, within the compass of one generation, were, according to his prediction, destroyed by the Romans; and preyed upon by those eagles (Matt. xxiv. 18.) by which, allusively, are noted the Roman armies, whose ensign was the eagle. Hammond.

ALLU'SIVENESS. n. s. [from allusive.] The quality of being allusive.

There may, according to the multifarious allusiveness of the prophetic style, another notable meaning be also intimated.

Mors, Seven Churches, ch. 9.

ALLUVION. n. s. [alluvio, Lat. alluvion, Fr.]

1. The carrying of any thing to something else by the motion of the water.

2. The thing carried by water to something else.

The civil law gives the owner of land a right to that increase which arises from alluvion, which is defined an insensible increment, brought by the water. Cowel.

Languages are like laws or coins, which commonly receive some change at every shift of princes: or as slow rivers, by insensible alluvions, take in and let out the waters that feed them, yet are they said to have the same beds.

Howell's Lett. iv. 19.

ALLUVIOUS. adj. [from alluvion.] That which is carried by water to another place, and lodged upon something else.

To ALLY. v. a. [allier, Fr.]

1. To unite by kindred, friendship, or confederacy.

All these septa are allied to the inhabitants of the North, so as there is no hope that they will ever serve faithfully against them.

Spenser on Ireland.

Wants, frailties, passions closer still ally

The common int'rest, or endear the tie.

Pope.

To the sun ally'd,

From him they draw the animating fire.

Thomson.

2. To make a relation between two things, by similitude, or resemblance, or any other means.

Two lines are indeed remotely allied to Virgil's sense; but they are too like the tenderness of Ovid.

Dryden.

ALLY. n. s. [allie, Fr.] One united by some means of connexion; as marriage, friendship, confederacy.

He in court stood on his own feet; for the most of his allies rather leaned upon him than shored him.

Wotton.

We could hinder the accession of Holland to France, either as subjects, with great immunities for the encouragement of trade, or as an inferior and dependent ally under their protection.

Temple.

ALMACANTAR. n. s. [An Arabick word, written variously by various authors; by D'Herbelot, almocantar; by others, almucantar.] A circle drawn parallel to the horizon. It is generally used in the plural, and means a series of parallel circles drawn through the several degrees of the meridian.

ALMACANTAR'S STAFF. n. s. An instrument commonly made of pear-tree or box, with an arch of fifteen degrees, used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising and setting, in order to find the amplitude, and consequently the variation of the compass.

Chambers.

ALMANACK. n. s. derived by some, from the Arabick, al, and manah, Heb. to count, or compute; but others from al, Arabick, and man, a month, or manah, the course of the months; by others, from a Teutonic original, al, and maan, the moon, an account of every moon, or month: all of them are probable. Nor may Verstegan's remark be omitted. Al-mon-acht, he says, is the Saxon al-mon-heed, i. e. the regard or observation of all the moons; whence the word almanack.] A calendar; a book in which the revolutions of the seasons, with the return of feasts and fasts, is noted for the ensuing year.

It will be said, this is an almanack for the old year; all hath been well; Spain hath not assailed the kingdom.

Bacon.

This astrologer made his almanack give a tolerable account of the weather, by a direct inversion of the common prognosticators.

Government of the Tongue.

Beware the woman too, and shun her sight,

Who in these studies does herself delight;

By whom a greasy almanack is borne,

With often handling like chaff amper worn.

Dryden.

I'll have a fasting almanack printed on purpose for her use.

Dryden, Spanish Friar.

ALMANACK-MAKER. n. s. A maker of almanacks.

Mathematicians and almanack-makers are forced to eat their own prognosticks.

Cayton's Notes on Don Quix. p. 268.

He calculates his model to the elevation of a particular climate, but with the same success as almanack-makers do; to serve only for a year.

Butler's Characters.

ALMANDINE. n. s. [Fr. almandina, Ital.] A ruby courser and lighter than the oriental, and nearer the colour of the granate.

Dict.

ALMIGHTINESS. n. s. [from almighty.] Unlimited power; omnipotence; one of the attributes of God.

It serveth to the world for a witness of his almightiness, whom we outwardly honour with the chiefest of outward things.

Hooker.

In creating and making existent the world universal, by the absolute act of his own word, God shewed his power and almightiness.

Sir Walter Raleigh.

In the wilderness, the bittorn and the stork, the unicorn and the elk, live upon his provisions, and revere his power, and feel the force of his almightiness.

Taylor.

ALMIGHTY. adj. [Sax. ælmhit, ælmihit, ælmihitiz.] Of unlimited power; omnipotent.

The Lord appeared unto Abraham, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.

Genesis, xvii. 1.

He wills you in the name of God Almighty,

That you divest yourself, and lay apart

The borrow'd glories, that, by gift of heaven,

By law of nature and of nations' long

To him and to his heirs.

Shakespeare.

ALMOND. n. s. [amand, Fr. derived by Menage from amandala, a word in low Latin; by others, from Allemand, a German; supposing that almonds come to France from Germany. But the Spanish have almendra; and perhaps amand, amandola, and this, are all referable to amygdalum; as that is to αμυγδαλιον.] The nut of the almond tree, either sweet or bitter.

Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one.

Locke.

ALMOND-TREE. n. s. [amygdalus, Lat.]

It has leaves and flowers very like those of the peach tree, but the fruit is longer and more compressed; the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged.

Miller.

Like to an almond tree, mounted high

On top of green Selinus, all alone,

With blossoms brave bedecked daintly,

Whose tender locks do tremble every one,

At every little breath that under heav'n is blown.

Spenser, F. Q.

Mark well the flow'ring almonds in the wood,

If od'rous blooms the bearing branches load,

The glebe will answer to the sylvan reign;

Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.

Dryden.

ALMONDS OF THE THROAT, OR TONSILS, called improperly Almonds of the Ears; are two round glands placed on the sides of the basis of the tongue, under the common membrane of the fauces; each of them has a large oval sinus, which opens into the fauces; and in it are a great number of lesser ones, which discharge themselves through the great sinus of a mucous and slippery matter into the fauces, larynx, and œsophagus, for the moistening and lubricating those parts. When the œsophagus muscle acts, it compresses the almonds, and they frequently are the occasion of a sore throat. Quincy.

The tonsils, or almonds of the ears, are also frequently swelled in the king's evil; which tumour may be very well reckoned a species of it. Wiseman's Surgery.

ALMOND-FURNACE, or ALMAN-FURNACE, called also the Sweep, is a peculiar kind of furnace used in refining, to separate metals from cinders and other foreign substances. Chambers.

ALMOND-WILLOW.* n. s. A willow, whose leaves are of a light green on both sides.

Trees more and more fady, till they end in an almond-willow. Shenstone.

ALMONER, or ALMNER.† n. s. [eleemosynarius, Lat.] The officer of a prince, or other person employed in the distribution of charity. Milton uses the word with an immediate reference to the office of the almoner.

Who made you the busy almoner to deal about this dole of laughter and reprehension, which no man thanks your bounty for? Apol. for Smectymnus.

I enquired for an almoner; and the general fame has pointed out your reverence as the worthiest man. Dryden.

ALMONRY.† n. s. or ALMRY. [from almoner.] The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed. Written also almary, amry, and ambry, in the accounts of offices belonging to religious houses; and in the Promptuarium Parvulorum; and rendered almarium.

She would never limit any from laying proper objects for her charity in her way; nor confine that care to the ministers of the almonry. Burnet's Ess. of Q. Mary, p. 130.

He was educated in grammar and singing, as a boy of the almonry, or chorister, in the Benedictine convent, now the dean and chapter, of Durham. Warton's Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 384.

ALMO'ST. adv. [from all and most; that is, most part of all. Skinner.] Nearly; well nigh; in the next degree to the whole, or to universality.

Who is there almost, whose mind, at some time or other, love or anger, fear or grief, has not so fastened to some clog, that it could not turn itself to any other object. Locke.

There can be no such thing or action, as an almost infinite; there can be nothing next or second to an omnipotent God.

Beutley's Sermons.

Atlas becomes unequal to his freight,
And almost faints beneath the glowing weight. Addison.

ALMS.† n. s. [Sax. almer, elner, ælmer; ælmerre, from the Lat. eleemosyna. Gr. ἐλεημοσύνη.] Formerly written almosine, almosie, almose; or, almous, as it is in Scotland; almesse, as in Chaucer, and in writers of the sixteenth century also; and now alms. Dr. Johnson says, the word has no singular. But both his examples of the word shew, to which I add others, that, though it terminates in s, it has the singular form or construction. It is, in fact, without a plural; the spelling of almesse having passed first into almes, and then into alms.] What is given gratuitously in relief of the poor. •

My arm'd knees,
Which bow'd but in my stirrup, bend like his
That hath received an alm. Shakespeare.

The poor beggar hath a just demand of an alm from the rich man; who is guilty of fraud, injustice and oppression, if he does not afford relief according to his abilities. Swift.

A gypsy Jewess whispers in your ear,

And begs an alm.

Every morsel he eats, and every drop that he drinks, is an alm, and a largess, and a repeat, that he has no claim to. Dryden, Jew. Sat. 6.

South, Sermon. vii. 216.

ALMS-BASKET. n. s. [from alms and basket.] The basket in which provisions are put to be given away.

"There sweepings do as well,

As the best order'd meal;

For who the relish of these guests will fit,

Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

B. Jonson.

We'll stand up for our properties, was the beggar's song that lived upon the alms-basket. L'Estrange, Fables.

ALMSDEED. n. s. [from alms and deed.] An act of charity; a charitable gift.

This woman was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did. Acts, ix. 36.

Hard favour'd Richard, where art thou?

Thou art not here: murder is thy almsdeed;

Petitioner for blood thou ne'er put'st back.

Shakespeare.

ALMS-FOLK.* n. s. Persons noticed for supporting others by alms.

This knight and his lady had the character of very good alms-folks, in respect of their great liberality to the poor.

Styrr's Ann. of the Ref. i. 233.

ALMS-GIVER. n. s. [from alms and giver.] He that gives alms; he that supports others by his charity.

He endowed many religious foundations, and yet was he a great alms-giver in secret, which shewed that his works in public were dedicated rather to God's glory than his own. Bacon.

ALMS-GIVING.* n. s. [from alms and give.] The giving of alms.

Mercifulness, and alms-giving, purgeth from all sins, and delivereth from death. Homilies, B. 2. Of Alms-deeds.

Dedating the practice of the Jews down to us Christians, and so give you in a manner the history of alms-giving.

Hammond's Sermon.

ALMSHOUSE. n. s. [from alms and house.] A house devoted to the reception and support of the poor; an hospital for the poor.

The way of providing for the clergy by tithes, the device of almshouses for the poor, and the sorting out of the people into parishes are manifest. Hooker.

And to relief of lazars, and weak age

Of indigent faint souls, past corporal toil,

A hundred almshouses right well supplied.

Shakespeare.

Many penitents, after the robbing of temples, and other rapine, build an hospital, or almshouse, out of the ruins of the church, and the spoils of widows and orphans. L'Estrange.

Behold yon almshouse, neat, but void of state,

Where age and want sit smiling at the gate.

Pope.

ALMSMAN.† n. s. [from alms and man.]

1. A man who lives upon alms; who is supported by charity.

I'll give my jewels for a set of beads;

My gorgeous palace, for a hermitage;

My gay apparel for an almsman's gown.

Shakespeare.

2. He who gives alms.

You see how well-beloved and dear unto God they were, whom the Scriptures report unto us to have been good almsmen.

Homilies, B. 2. Of Alms-deeds, part 2.

ALMS-PEOPLE.* n. s. Members of an alms-house.

They be bound to pay four shillings the week to the six alms-people.

Wcever's Funeral Monuments

ALMUG-TREE. n. s. A tree mentioned in scripture.

Of its wood were made musical instruments, and it was used also in rails, or in a staircase. The Rabbins generally render it coral, others ebony, brazil, or pine. In the Septuagint it is translated corought wood, and in the Vulgate, Ligna Thyina. But coral could never answer the purposes of the almugin; the pine-tree is too common in Judea to be imported from Ophir; and the Thyrium, or citron-tree, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty, came from Mauritania. By the wood almugim, or algumim, or, simply gummim, taking al for a kind of article; may be understood oily and gummy sorts of wood, and particularly the trees which produce gum ammoniac, or gum arabick; and is, perhaps, the same with the Shittim wood mentioned by Moses. Calmet.

And the navy also of Hiram that brought gold from Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of almug-trees and precious trees. 1 Kings, x. 11.

A'LNAGAR, A'LNAGER, or A'NEGER. n. s. [from alnage.] A measurer by the ell; a sworn officer, whose business formerly was to inspect the assize of woollen cloth, and to fix the seals appointed upon it for that purpose; but there are now three officers belonging to the regulation of cloth-manufactures, the searcher, measurer, and alner. Dict.

A'LNAGE. n. s. [from alnage, or annage, Fr.] Ell-measure, or rather the measuring by the ell or yard. Dict.

A'LNIGHT. n. s. [from all and night.]

A service which they call alnigh, is a great cake of wax, with the wick in the midst; whereby it cometh to pass, that the wick fetcheth the nourishment farther off. Bacon.

A'LOES. † n. s. [אלוש, as it is supposed, Dr. Johnson says. Sax. alepa, S. Joh. cap. xix. 39.] A term applied to three different things.

1. A precious wood used, in the East, for perfumes, of which the best sort is of higher price than gold, and was the most valuable present given by the king of Siam, in 1686, to the king of France. It is called Tambac, and is the heart, or innermost part, of the aloe-tree; the next part to which is called Culembac, which is sometimes imported into Europe, and, though of inferiour value to the Tambac, is much esteemed: the part next the bark is termed, by the Portuguese, Pao d'aquila, or eagle-wood; but some account the eagle-wood not the outer part of the Tambac, but another species. Our knowledge of this wood is yet very imperfect. Savary.

2. Aloes is a tree which grows in hot countries, and even in the mountains of Spain.

3. Aloes is a medicinal juice extracted not from the odoriferous, but the common aloes tree, by cutting the leaves, and exposing the juice that drops from them to the sun. It is distinguished into Socotorine and Caballine, or horse aloes; the first is so called from Socotora; the second, because, being coarser, it ought to be confined to the use of farriers. It is a warm and strong cathartick.

ALOE'TICAL. adj. [from aloes.] Consisting chiefly of aloes.

It may be excited by aloetical, scammoniate, or acrimonious medicines. Wiseman's Surgery.

ALOE'TICK. n. s. [from aloes.] Any medicine is so called, which chiefly consists of aloes. Quincy.

ALO'FT. † adv. [lofter, to lift up, Dan. Loft, air, Icelandish; so that aloft is, into the air; anciently written, on loft.]

1. On high; above; in the air. Dr. Johnson says it is used chiefly in poetry. He had forgotten the usage of it by some of our best authors, and particularly the application of it in the Bible, where the marginal reading is this.

The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it, and is set aloft. Prov. xviii. 10.

Now is all Israel aloft, (which is interpreted in the margin of the Apocrypha, exalted.) 1 Esdras, viii. 92.

Simon also built a monument upon the sepulchre of his father and his brethren, and raised it aloft to the sight, with hewn stone behind and before. 1 Maccab. xiii. 27.

He that loves God, will soar aloft, and take him wings, and leaving the earth fly up to heaven. Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 639.

A third court—enclosed with tarrasse, leaded aloft, and fairly garnished on the three sides. Bacon, Ess. 45.

To have more breath they used to sleep upon their terraces, to which end they spread carpets aloft for their better accommodation. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 112.

2. A word used by seamen to call others from below on deck; all hands aloft.

Come aloft, boys, aloft! Beaum. and Fl. K. Burn. Postle.

For I have read in stories oft,
That love has wings, and soars aloft. Suckling.

Upright he stood, and bore aloft his shield,
Conspicuous from afar, and overlook'd the field. Dryden.

ALOFT. prep. Above.

The great luminary

Aloft the vulgar constellations thick,
That from his lordly eye keep distance due Dispenses light from far. Milton, P. L.

A'LOGY. † n. s. [old Fr. alogie, sottise, fatuite; from alogos.] Unreasonableness; absurdity. Dict.

ALONE. † adj. [alleen, Dutch; from al and een, or one, that is, single; anciently written all-one, i. e. entirely single. Some derive it from the Fr. à l'un.]

1. Without another.

The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;
Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then. Shakspeare.

If by a mortal hand my father's throne
Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone. Dryden.

God, by whose alone power and conservation we all live, and move, and have our being. Bentley.

2. Without company; solitary.

Eagles we see fly alone, and they are but sheep which always herd together. Sidney.

Alone, for other creature in this place
Living, or lifeless, to be found was none. Milton.

I never durst in darkness be alone. Dryden.

3. Not to be matched; without an equal.

All I can, is nothing
To her, whose worth makes other worthies nothing;
She is alone. Shakspeare, Two Gent. Ver. ii. 4.

4. Only.

Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. St. Matthew, iv. 4.

Since I had my office,
I've kept you next my heart; have not alone
Employ'd you where high profits might come home,
But paid my present havings, to bestow
My bounties on you. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII. iii. 2.

We do not trust your uncle; he would keep you
A bachelor still, by keeping of your portion;
And keep you not alone without a husband,
But in a sickness. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

ALONE. adv.

1. This word is seldom used but with the word let, if even then it be an adverb. It implies sometimes an ironical prohibition, forbidding to help a man who is able to manage the affair himself.

Let us alone to guard Corioli,
If they set down before's; 'fore they remove,
Bring up your army. Shakspeare.

Let you alone, cunning artificer;
See how his gorget peers above his gown,
To tell the people in what danger he was. B. Jonson.

2. To forbear; to leave undone.

His client stole it, but he had better have let it alone: for he lost his cause by his jest. Addison.

ALO'NELY.* adj. [old Eng. all onely.] Only; this, and no other. Thus, in our old dictionaries, we find "alonely son, or only child." Huloet.

By the same grace of God, by alonely God.

Mountagu's Appeal to Cæsar, p. 202.

ALO'NELY.* adv. [Dutch all-een-lyk, only. Old Eng. all onely.] Merely; sirgly.

The sorowe, daughter, which I make,

Is not all onely for your sake. Gower, Conf. Am. b. i.

For the wyll alonely is a deedly synne.

Institution of a Chr. Man, p. 111.

Not alonely the Germans, but also the Italians themselves, that counte as the Grekes did full arrogantly, all other nations to be barbarous and unlettered, savinge their owne.

Leland's New Year's Gift, E. 3.

ALO'NENESS.* n.s. [from alone.] That state which belongs not to another. A very significative word, and properly applied to God. I know of no lexicographer who has noticed this word; but I wonder that it escaped Mr. Boucher, who has minutely illustrated alonely.

God being sibi solus, ἀνάρχως, ἀνείσως, from everlasting, alone himself, and beside himself nothing, the first thing he did or possibly and conceivably could do, was to determine to communicate himself, and did so accordingly, primò, primùm, communicate himself out of his Aloneness everlasting unto somewhat else. Mountagu's App. to Cæsar, p. 61.

ALO'NG.† adv. [Sax. anblanz, onblonz, in longum.]

1. At length.

Some rowl a mighty stone; some laid along,
And, bound with burning-wires, on spokes of wheels are hung. Dryden.

2. Through any space measured lengthwise.

A firebrand carried along, leaveth a train of light behind it. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands,
Or the black water of Pomptina stands. Dryden.

3. Throughout; in the whole; with all prefixed.

Solomon, all-along in his Proverbs, gives the title of fool to a wicked man. Tillotson.

They were all-along a cross, untoward sort of people. South.

4. Joined with the particle with; in company; joined with.

I your commission will forthwith dispatch,
And he to England shall along with you. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Hence then! and Evil go with thee along,
Thy offspring, to the place of evil, Hell. Milton.

Religious zeal is subject to an excess, and to a defect, when something is mingled with it, which it should not have; or when it wants something that ought to go along with it. Sprat.

5. Sometimes with is understood.

Command thy slaves: my free-born soul disdains
A tyrant's curb; and restive breaks the reins.
Take this along; and no dispute shall rise
(Though mine the woman) for my ravish'd prize. Dryden.

6. Forward; onward. In this sense it is derived from allons, French.

Come then, my friend, my genius, come along,
Thou master of the poet and the song. Pope.

7. Owing to; in consequence of. [Sax. ze-lang, long of; not from ond-long, as Mr. Tyrhitt mistakenly asserts, in respect to this old usage of the word. Dr. Johnson, under the word long, has stated that synonymous adverb, or rather abbreviation of along, to be from the Sax. ze-lang, a fault, not considering, as Mr. Horne Tooke has observed, the ancient and accustomed distinction of along, Saxon as well as English. See also Lye, Dict.

Sax. Goth. Lat. in anblanz or onblonz, and zelang.]

I cannot tell whereon it was along,
But well I wot great strife is us among.

Chaucer, Chan. Yeom. Tale.

It's all along on you; I could not get my part a night or two before, that I might sleep on it.

Prol. Return from Parnassus.

Who is this 'long of?

Stubbes, Anat. of Abuses, P. ii.

ALO'NG-SIDE.* adv. A naval term. By the side of the ship.

ALO'NGST.† adv. [Dr. Johnson considers this word as a corruption of along. But this form of annexing to prepositions the termination of the superlative degree, is, as Mr. Boucher has observed, very ancient, and was practised by the Saxons. It is used by Scottish writers of modern times.] Along; through the length.

Hard by grew the true lover's primrose, whose kind savour wisheth men to be faithful and women courteous. Alongst, in a border, grew maidenhair.

Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier, p. 6.

The Turks did keep strait watch and ward in all their ports alongst the sea-coast. Knolles, History of the Turks.

ALO'OF.† adv. [all off, that is, quite off.]

1. At a distance; with the particle from. It generally implies a small distance, such as is within view or observation, Dr. Johnson says; but it also signifies distance as remote as possible. Witness the two examples from the English Seneca.

How then is the sinner aloof from God? From the holiness of God; from the grace and mercy of God; from the glory of God; from the holiness of God, he is no less distant than evil is from good, which is no less than infinitely.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 85.

He is aloof from grace, as the way; so from glory, as the end; here is indeed a great gulf, and unmeasurable, betwixt the sinner and heaven. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 86.

Then bade the knight this lady yeide aloof,
And to an hill herself withdraw aside,
From whence she might behold the battle's proof,
And else be safe from danger far descried. Spenser, F. Q.

As next in worth,
Came singly where he stood, on the bare strand,
While the promiscuous croud stood yet aloof, Milton, P. I.
The noise approaches, though our palace stood Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood. Dryden.

2. Applied to persons, it often insinuates caution and circumspection.

Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel,
And make the cowards stand aloof at bay. Shakspeare.

Going northwards, aloof, as long as they had any doubt of being pursued, at last when they were out of reach, they turned and crossed the ocean to Spain. Bacon.

The king would not, by any means, enter the city, until he had aloof seen the cross set up upon the greater tower of Granada, whereby it became christian ground. Bacon.

Two pots stood by a river, one of brass, the other of clay.
The water carried them away; the earthen vessel kept aloof from t'other. L'Estrange, Fables.

The strong may fight aloof; Ancæus try'd
His force too near, and by presuming dy'd. Dryden, Fables.

3. In a figurative sense, it is used to import art or cunning in conversation, by which a man holds the principal question at a distance.

Nor do we find him forward to be sounded;
But with a crafty madness keeps aloof,
When we would bring him on to some confession
Of his true state. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

4. It is used metaphorically of persons that will not be seen in a design.

A L P

It is necessary the queen join; for, if she stand aloof, there will be still suspicions: it being a received opinion, that she hath a great interest in the king's favour and power. Suckling.
5. It is applied to things not properly belonging to each other.

Love's not love,
When it is mingled with regards that stand
Aloof from th' entire point. Shakspeare, King Lear.

ALOUD. adv. [from a and loud.] Loudly; with a strong voice; with a great noise.

Strangled he lies! yet seems to cry aloud,
To warn the mighty, and instruct the proud;
That of the great, neglecting to be just,
Heaven in a moment makes an heap of dust. Waller.

Then heaven's high monarch thund'ring thrice aloud,
And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud. Dryden.

ALOW. adv. [from a and low.] In a low place; not aloft.

Weening that fortune hath a turn,
I look'd aloft, and would not look a low. Mir. for Mag. p. 318.

And now a low, and now aloft they fly,
As borne through air, and seem to touch the sky. Dryden.

ALP.* n. s. [Bas Bret. alp, alb, mons. Ital. alpe.] Some consider the etymology of this word, as meaning strictly, "a mountain white with snow," Gr. ἄλφος, Lat. albus. And because the Alps, which separate Italy from Germany and France, "perpetuis ferè nivibus albescunt." But the name alp is not peculiar to those mountains: "Alpes—etiam universim quavis montes altiores." Dr Cange, in V.] That which is mountainous or durable like the Alps; a mountain in general.

O'er many a frozen, many a fiery alp. Milton, P. L. ii. 620.
If the body bring but in a complaint of frigidity, by that cold application only, this adamantine alp of wedlock has leave to dissolve. Milton, Tetrachordon.

Those that, to the poles approaching, rise
In billows rolling into alps of ice. Thomson, Liberty, part 4.

ALPINE.* adj. [Lat. alpinus, Ital. alpino.]

1. Relating to the Alps.
Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold. Milton, Son. xviii.
Do they sleep in winter, like Gesner's Alpine mice? Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 243.

The lifeless summits proud
Of Alpine cliffs, where to the gelid sky
Snows pil'd on snows in wintry torpor lie.
Thomson, Cast. of Indolence, c. 2.

2. High, in a general sense.
Palmy shades, and aromatick woods,
That grace the plains, invest the peopled hills,
And up the more than alpine mountains wave. Thomson, Summer.

The sense of his words is strained; when "he views the Ganges from alpine heights:" that is, from mountains like the Alps. Johnson, Life of Akenside.

3. Denoting a peculiar kind of strawberry.
The alpine everlasting, or prolifick strawberry. Mauve.

ALPHA. n. s. The first letter in the Greek alphabet, answering to our A: therefore used to signify the first.

I am alpha and omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. Revelations, i. 8.

ALPHABET. n. s. [from ἄλφα, alpha, and βῆτα, beta, the two first letters of the Greeks.] The order of the letters, or elements of speech.

Thou shalt not sigh,
Nor wink, nor nod, nor kneel, nor make a sign,
But I of these will rest an alphabet,
And by still practice learn to know thy meaning. Titus Andronicus.

The letters of the alphabet, formed by the several motions of the mouth, and the great variety of syllables composed of letters, and formed with almost equal velocity, and the endless number of words capable of being framed out of the alphabet, either of more syllables, or of one are wonderful. Holder.

Taught by their nurses, little children get
This saying, sooner than their alphabet. Dryden, jun. Juv.

TO ALPHABET. v. a. [from alphabet, noun.] To range in the order of the alphabet.

ALPHABETARIAN.* n. s. [from alphabet.] An A B C scholar.

Every alphabetarian knowing well that the Latin of [a city.]
urbs or civitas. Abp. Sancroft's Sermon. p. 30.

ALPHABETICAL. adj. [from alphabet, alphabetique, Fr.] In the order of the alphabet; according to the series of letters.

I have digested in an alphabetical order, all the counties, corporations, and boroughs in Great Britain, with their respective tempers. Swift.

In reading he must couch, in a fair alphabetick paper-book, the notablest occurrences. Howell's Instruct. for For. Travell. p. 38.

The author probably had his eye upon alphabetick writing in his own time. Coventry's Phil. Conv. 4.

ALPHABETICALLY. adv. [from alphabetical.] In an alphabetical manner; according to the order of the letters.

I had once in my thoughts to contrive a grammar, more than I can now comprise in short hint; and a dictionary, alphabetically containing the words of the language, which the deaf person is to learn. Holder's Elements of Speech.

ALREADY. adv. [from all and ready.] At this present time, or at some time past; opposed to futurity; as, Will he come soon? He is here already. Will it be done? It has been done already.

Touching our uniformity, that which hath been already answered, may serve for answer. Hooker.

You warn'd me still of loving two;
Can I love him, already loving you? Dryden, Indian Emp.

See, the guards, from yon far eastern hill
Already move, no longer stay afford;
High in the air they wave the flaming sword,
Your signal to depart. Dryden, State of Innocence.

Methods for the advancement of piety, are in the power of a prince limited like ours, by a strict execution of the laws already in force. Swift.

Methinks already I your tears survey,
Already hear the horrid things they say,
Already see you a degraded toast,
And all your honour in a whisper lost! Pope.

ALS. adv. [Dutch als. Sax. alle, an abbreviation of eall-þra, alþra, also.] Also; likewise: a word now out of use.

Sad remembrance now the prince amoves
With fresh desire his voyage to pursue;
Als Una car'd her travel to renew. Spenser, F. Q.

ALSO. adv. [Sax. alþra, sicut.]

1. In the same manner; likewise.
In these two, no doubt, are contained the causes of the great deluge, as according to Moses, so also according to necessity; for our world affords no other treasures of water. Burnet's Theory.

2. Also is sometimes nearly the same with and, and only conjoins the members of the sentence.
God do so to me, and more also. 1 Samuel, xiv. 44.

ALT.* n. s. [In musick.] The higher part of the scale or gamut. As, F in alt, or F altus.

ALTAR. n. s. [altare, Lat. It is observed by Junius, that the word altar is received, with christianity, in all the European languages; and that altare is used by one of the Fathers, as appropriated to the Christian worship, in opposition to the arce of gentilism.]

1. The place where offerings to heaven are laid.

The goddess of the nuptial bed,
Tir'd with her vain devotions for the dead,
Resolv'd the tainted hand should be repell'd,
Which incense offer'd, and her altar held. Dryden.

2. The table in Christian churches where the communion is administered.

Her grace rose, and, with modest paces,
Came to the altar, where she knel'd, and, saintlike,
Cast her fair eyes to heav'n, and pray'd devoutly. Shakespeare.

3. A ridiculous species of metrical composition, the length and position of the verses in which were made to correspond with the appearance of an altar. W. Brown, in his elegant poem, "the Shephard's Pipe," has sacrificed to this false taste.

Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostick land;
There thou may'st wings display, and altars raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.

Dryden, Mac Flecknoe, ver. 207.

- ALTARAGE. n. s. [altaragium, Lat.] An emolument arising to the priest from oblations, through the means of the altar. Ayliffe's Parergon.

- ALTAR-CLOTH. n. s. [old Fr. also, autre-cloth.] The cloth thrown over the altar in churches.

I should set down the wealth, books, hangings, and altar-cloths, which our kings gave this abbey. Peacham on Drawing.
Their altar-cloths must not be touched but with a brush appropriated to that service. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 257.

- ALTAR-PIECE. n. s. [from altar and piece.] A painting placed over the altar.

With what enthusiasm must a popish painter work for an altar-piece? Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, i. 182.

- ALTARWISE. adv. [Placed or fashioned in the manner of an altar.

Some years before, I was told he [the Duke de la Valette] was at Paris, and Richelieu came to visit him: he having notice of it, Richelieu found him in a cardinal's cap, kneeling at a table altarwise, with his book and beads in his hand, and candles burning before him. Howell, Lett. i. vi. 46.

It is plain, in the last injunction of the queen, [Elizabeth,] that the holy table ought to stand at the upper end of the quire, north and south, or altarwise.

Abp. Laud's Speech in the Star Chamber.

- To ALTER. v. a. [alterer, Fr. from alter, Lat.]

1. To change; to make otherwise than it is. To alter, seems more properly to imply a change made only in some part of a thing; as, to alter a writing, may be to blot or interpolate it; to change it, may be, to substitute another in its place. With from and to; as, her face is altered from pale to red.

Do you note

How much her grace is alter'd on the sudden?
How long her face is drawn? how pale she looks,
And of an earthly cold? Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

Acts appropriated to the worship of God by his own appointment, must continue so, till himself hath otherwise declared: for who dares alter what God hath appointed? Stillington.

2. To take off from a persuasion, practise, or sect.

For the way of writing plays in verse, I find it troublesome and slow; but I am no way altered from my opinion of it, at least with any reasons which have opposed it. Dryden.

- To ALTER. v. n. To become otherwise than it was; as, the weather alters from bright to cloudy.

- ALTERABLE. adj. [from alter; alterable, Fr.] That which may be altered or changed by something else; distinct from changeable, or that which changes, or may change itself.

That alterable respects are realities in nature, will never be admitted by a considerate discernor. Glauville.

Our condition in this world is mutable and uncertain, alterable by a thousand accidents, which we can neither foresee nor prevent. Rogers.

I wish they had been more clear in their directions upon that mighty point, Whether the settlement of the succession in the House of Hanover be alterable or no? Swift.

- ALTERABLENESS. n. s. [from alterable.] The quality of being alterable, or admitting change from external causes.

- ALTERABLY. adv. [from alterable.] In such a manner as may be altered.

- ALTERAGE. n. s. [from alo.] The breeding, nourishing or fostering of a child.

In Ireland they put their children to fosterers: the rich sell, the meaner sort buying the alterage of their children; and the reason is, because in the opinion of the people, fostering has always been a stronger alliance than blood.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

- ALTERANT. adj. [alterant, Fr.] That which has the power of producing changes in any thing.

And whether the body be alterant or altered, evermore a perception precedeth operation; for else all bodies would be alike one to another. Bacon.

- ALTERATION. n. s. [from alter; alteration, Fr.]

1. The act of altering or changing.

Alteration, though it be from worse to better, hath in it inconveniencies, and those weighty. Hooker.

2. The change made.

Why may we not presume, that God doth even call for such change or alteration, as the very condition of things themselves doth make necessary? Hooker.

So he, with difficulty and labour hard,

Mov'd on:

But he once past, soon after, when man fell,
Strange alteration! Sin, and death, amain
Following his track (such was the will of heav'n!)

Pav'd after him a broad and beaten way.

Milton.

No other alteration will satisfy; nor this neither, very long, without an utter abolition of all order. South.

Appius Claudius admitted to the senate the sons of those who had been slaves; by which, and succeeding alterations, that council degenerated into a most corrupt body. Swift.

- ALTERATIVE. adj. [from alter.] Medicines called alterative, are such as have no immediate sensible operation, but gradually gain upon the constitution, by changing the humours from a state of dis-temperature to health. They are opposed to evacuants. Quincy.

When there is an eruption of humour in any part, it is not cured merely by outward applications, but by such alterative medicine, as purify the blood. Govern. of the Tongue.

- ALTERATIVE. n. s. An alterative medicine.

'Like an apothecary's shop, wherein are remedies for all infirmities of mind, purgatives, cordials, alteratives.

Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 279.

A complete cure by alteratives operating on the small capillaries, and by insensible discharges, must require length of time.

Bp. Berkeley, Siris, p. 94.

- To ALTERCATE. v. n. [Lat. altercor, old Fr. alterquer.] To wrangle; to contend with.

- ALTERCATION. n. s. [altercation, Fr. from altercor, Lat.]

Debate; controversy; wrangle.

By this hot pursuit of lower controversies amongst men professing religion, and agreeing in the principal foundations thereof, they conceive hope, that, about the higher principles themselves, time will cause altercation to grow. Hooker.

Their whole life was little else than a perpetual wrangling and altercation; and that, many times, rather for victory and ostentation of wit, than a sober and serious search of truth.

Hakewell on Providence.

- ALTERN. adj. [alternus, Lat.] Acting by turns, in succession, each to the other.

two great lights, great for their use.
To men: the greater to have rule by day,
The less by night, altern. Milton, P. L.

ALTERNACY. n. s. [from alternate.] Action performed by turns.

ALTERNAL.* adj. [Lat. alternus.] Alternative, as Sherwood explains it; or, done by turns or course; one after another, according to Bullokar.

ALTERNALLY.* adv. [from altern.] By turns.
Afranius and Petreius did command
Those camps with equal power, but concord made
Their government more firm: their men obey'd
Alternally both generals' commands. May's Lucan, b. 4.

ALTERNATE. adj. [alternus, Lat.] Being by turns; one after another; reciprocal.

Friendship consists properly in mutual offices, and a generous strife in alternate acts of kindness. South.

Hear how Timotheus' various lays surprise,
And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
While, at each change, the son of Lybian Jove
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love. Pope.

ALTERNATE ANGLES. [In geometry.] Are the internal angles made by a line cutting two parallels, and lying on the opposite sides of the cutting line; the one below the first parallel, and the other above the second.

ALTERNATE. n. s. [from alternate, adj.] That which happens alternately; vicissitude.

And rui'd in pleasure, or reposed in ease,
Grateful alternates of substantial peace,
They bless the long nocturnal influence shed
On the crown'd goblet, and the genial bed. Prior.

To ALTERNATE.* v. a. [Lat. alternare; or rather, in the instance from Milton, to be derived from the Italian alternare, to sing alternately, in the manner of cathedral choirs. V. Della Crusca. Sir E. Sandys uses the word also in reference to the ancient cantus alternus.]

1. To perform alternately.

Those who, in their course,
Melodious hymns about the sov'reign throne
Alternate all night long. Milton, P. L.
Their liturgy is much intermeddled with singing performed in a tune, neither artificial nor altogether neglected, but grave, alternated, and branched with diverse parts.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

2. To change one thing for another reciprocally.

The most High God, in all things appertaining unto this life, for sundry wise ends, alternates the disposition of good and evil, Grew.

To ALTERNATE.* v. n. To succeed or take place by turns.

Rage, shame, and grief, alternate in his breast.
Philips's Blenheim, v. 339.

ALTERNATELY. adv. [from alternate.] In reciprocal succession, so that each shall be succeeded by that which it succeeds, as light follows darkness, and darkness follows light.

The Princess Melisinda, bath'd in tears,
And toss'd alternately with hopes and fears,
Would learn from you the fortunes of her lord.
Unhappy man! whom sorrow thus and rage
To different ills alternately engage. Prior.
The rays of light are, by some cause or other, alternately disposed to be reflected or refracted for many vicissitudes. Newton.

ALTERNATENESS. n. s. [from alternate.] The quality of being alternate, or of happening in reciprocal succession. Dict.

ALTERNATION.* n. s. [from alternate.]
The reciprocal succession of things.

The one would be oppressed with constant heat, the other with insufferable cold; and so the defect of alternation would utterly impugn the generation of all things. Brown.

2. The answer of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.

Such alternations as are there [in the English liturgy] used, must be by several persons. Milton, Apol. for Smectymn.

3. Alternate performance, in the choral sense.

Antiphones I know they had;—but this came to no more than our alternation at the most ordinary singing of the psalms, by way of responds, but all in the same time and tune, and without any descant at all. Gregorie, Posthuma, p. 52.

There are anthems to be found amongst them, where every syllable has its just length; each part of a sentence its proper pause: where the words are not confused by perplexing alternations, or rendered tedious by unnecessary repetitions.

Mason on Church Musick, p. 130.

ALTERNATIVE. n. s. [alternatif, Fr.] The choice given of two things; so that if one be rejected, the other must be taken.

A strange alternative—

Must ladies have a doctor, or a dance? Young.

ALTERNATIVE.* adj. In an alternate manner.

The manners, the wits, the health, the age, the strength, and stature of men daily vary, but so as by a vicissitude and revolution they return again to the former points from which they declined, and again decline, and again return, by alternative and interchangeable course. Hakewill's Apology, p. 41.

ALTERNATIVELY.* adv. [from alternative.] In alternate manner; by turns; reciprocally.

An appeal alternatively made may be tolerated by the civil law as valid. Ayliffe, Parergon.

The pestles are not lifted up altogether, but alternatively, to make the powder turn the better in the working.

Hist. of Gunpowder in Sprat's Hist. of the R. Society, p. 280.

ALTERNATIVENESS. n. s. [from alternative.] The quality or state of being alternative; reciprocation. Dict.

ALTERNITY. n. s. [from altern.] Reciprocal succession; vicissitude; turn; mutual change of one thing for another; reciprocation.

They imagine, that an animal of the vastest dimensions, and longest duration, should live in a continual motion, without the alternity and vicissitude of rest, whereby all other animals continue. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ALTHEA.* n. s. [Gr. ἄλθια, Fr. althéa.] A flowering shrub; of which the common sort is marsh-mallow; but the althæa-frutex is a species of hibiscus. Dict.

ALTHOUGH. conj. [from all and though. See THOUGH.] Notwithstanding; however it may be granted; however it may be that.

We all know, that many things are believed, although they be intricate, obscure, and dark; although they exceed the reach and capacity of our wits; yea, although in this world they be no way possible to be understood. Hooker.

Me the gold of France did not seduce,
Although I did admit it as a motive
The sooner to effect what I intended. Shakspeare.

The stress must be laid upon a majority; without which the laws would be of little weight, although they be good additional securities. Swift.

ALTIGRADE. adj. [from altus and gradior, Lat.] Rising on high. Dict.

ALTILOQUENCE. n. s. [altus and loquor, Lat.] High speech; pompous language.

ALTIMETRY. u. s. [altimetria, Lat. from altus and metron.] The art of taking or measuring altitudes or heights, whether accessible, or inaccessible, generally performed by a quadrant.

ALTI'ONANT.* adj. [altisomus, Lat.] High sound-
ALTI'ONOUS. } ing; pompous or lofty in sound.

Speculative and positive doctrines, and allisonant phrases. Evclyn, Preface.

ALTITUDE. n. s. [altitudo, Lat.]

Height of place; space measured upward.

Ten musts attach'd as like not the altitude,
Which thou hast perpendicularly fall'n. Shakespeare.

Some define the perpendicular altitude of the highest mountains to be four miles; others but fifteen furlongs. Brown.

She shines above, we know, but in what place,
How near the throne, and heav'n's imperial face,
By our weak optics is but vainly guess'd;
Distance and altitude conceal the rest. Dryden.

2. The elevation of any of the heavenly bodies above the horizon.

Even unto the latitude of fifty-two, the efficacy thereof is not much considerable, whether we consider its ascent, meridian, altitude, or abode above the horizon. Brown, Valg. Err.

Has not a poet more virtues and vices within his circle, cannot he observe them and their influences in their oppositions and conjunctions, in their altitudes and depressions? Rymer.

3. Situation with regard to lower things.

Those members which are pairs, stand by one another in equal altitude, and answer on each side one to another. Ray.

4. Height of excellence; superiority.

Your altitude offends the eyes
Of those who want the power to rise. Swejt.

5. Height of degree; highest point.

He did it to please his mother, and to be partly proud; which he is, even to the altitude of his virtue. Shakespeare.

ALTI VOLANT. adj. [altivolans, Lat. from altus and volans.]

High flying. Dict.

ALTOGETHER. adv. [from all and together, Sax. algezdon, all collected or gathered.]

1. Completely; without restriction; without exception.

It is in vain to speak of planting laws, and plotting policy, till the people be altogether subdued. Spenser, State of Ireland.

We find not in the world any people that hath lived altogether without religion. Hooker.

If death and danger are things that really cannot be endured, no man could ever be obliged to suffer for his conscience, or to die for his religion; it being altogether as absurd to imagine a man obliged to suffer, as to do impossibilities. South.

I do not altogether disapprove of the manner of interweaving texts of scripture through the style of your sermon. Stoff.

2. Conjunctly; in company. This is rather all together.

Cousin of Somerset, join you with me,

And altogether with the Duke of Suffolk,

We'll quickly hoist Duke Humphry from his seat. Shakespeare.

ALTO-RELIEVO. n. s. Ital. That kind of relievo, in sculpture, which gives the figure formed after nature, and projecting as much as the life. See RELIEVO.

It is a back in alto-relievo that bears all the ridicule; though one would think a prominent belly a more reasonable object of it; since the last is generally the effect of intemperance, and of a man's own creation. Hay, Essay on Deformity.

ALUDEL. n. s. [from a and lutum; that is, without lute.] Aludels are subliming pots used in chemistry, without bottoms, and fitted into one another, as many as there is occasion for, without luting. At the bottom of the furnace is a pot that holds the matter to be sublimed and, at the top is a head, to retain the flowers that rise up. Quincy.

ALVEARY. n. s. [Lat. alvearium.] A beehive. One of our oldest lexicographers entitles his dictionary "alveary, or quadruple dictionary, containing four andrie tongues;" and the emblem in the title is a beehive. The word is in later dictionaries, though not noticed by Dr. Johnson. Barre is the author of the aforementioned alveary.

caused his pupils at Cambridge to collect classical phrases; and to their collections assigned the name before us.

Within a yeare or two, they had gathered together a great volume, which (for the apt similitude between the good scholars and diligent bees in gathering their wax and honey into their hive) I called them: their alveary; both for a memoriall by whom it was made, and also by this name to encourage other to the like diligence, for that they should not see their worthe prais for the same unworthie drowned in oblivion.

Barret to the Reader.

ALUM. n. s. [alumen, Lat.] A kind of mineral salt, of an acid taste, leaving in the mouth a sense of sweetness, accompanied with a considerable degree of astringency. The ancient naturalists allow of two sorts of alum, natural and factitious. The natural is found in the island of Milo, being a kind of whitish stone, very light, friable, and porous, and streaked with filaments resembling silver. England, Italy, and Flanders, are the countries where alum is principally produced; and the English roche-alum is made from a bluish mineral stone, in the hills of Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Saccharine alum is a composition of common alum, with rose-water and whites of eggs boiled together, to the consistence of a paste, and thus moulded at pleasure. As it cools, it grows hard as a stone.

Burnt alum is alum calcined over the fire.

Plumose or plume alum is a sort of saline mineral stone, of various colours, most commonly white, bordering on green; it rises in threads or fibres, resembling those of a feather; whence its name from pluma, a feather. Chambers.

By long beating the white of an egg with a lump of alum, you may bring it, for the most part, into white curds. Boyle.

ALUM STONE. n. s. A stone or calx used in surgery; perhaps alum calcined, which then becomes corrosive.

She gargled with oxyerate, and was in few days cured, by touching it with the vitriol and alum stones. Wiseman.

ALUMED. adj. [Lat. aluminatus.] Mixed with alum. Barret.

ALUMINOUS. adj. [from alum.] Relating to alum, or consisting of alum.

For do we not only conclude, because, by a cold and aluminous mixture, it is able a while to resist the fire, that from a peculiarity of nature, it subsisteth and liveth in it. Brown.

The mixture may have other mixture with it, to make it of a vitriolick or aluminous nature. Wiseman, Surgery.

ALUMINIST. adj. [from alum.] Having the nature of alum.

Upon discoursing concerning Irish slate, Sir William Petty remarked that there were two sorts in Ireland; the one more strong or slaty, found at Slane in the county of Meath; the other an earth or bole, being blacker and less slaty than the former, tasting something aluminist, and being found near some places which afford alum. Hist. Royal Soc. iv. 196.

ALUTATION. n. s. [Lat. aluta, old Fr. alude.] The tanning or dressing of leather. Dict.

ALWAYS. adv. [It is sometimes written alway, compounded of all and way; callegaza, Sax. tuttavia, Ital.]

1. Perpetually; throughout all time: opposed to some-time, or to never.

That, which sometime is expedient, doth not always so continue. Hooker.

Man never is, but always to be blest. Popc.

I loath it; I would not live always: let me alone; for my days are vanity. Job, vii. 16.

2. Constantly; without variation: opposed to some-times, or to now and then.

He is always great, when some great occasion is presented to him. Dryden.

Leave us not, we beseech Thee, destitute of thy manifold gifts, nor yet of grace to use them away to thy honour and glory. Collect, St. Barnabas' day.

A. M. † Stands for artium magister, or master of arts; the second degree of our universities, which, in some foreign countries, is called doctor of philosophy.

A. M. also denotes, in naval language, ante meridiem, i. e. before twelve o'clock at noon.

AM. † [Goth. am and im, sum. Sax. eam, am.] The first person of the verb to be. [See To BE.]

And God said unto Moses, I am that I am: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you. Exodus, iii. 14.

Come then, my soul: I call thee by that name, Thou busy thing, from whence I know I am: For knowing that I am, I know thou art: Since that must needs exist, which can impart. Prior.

AMABILITY. † n. s. [Lat. amabilitas, old Fr. amiablté.] This is a word of much higher antiquity than Bp. Taylor's time; being found in Barret's Alvearie; but Taylor uses it repeatedly, and with good effect. Loveliness; the power of pleasing.

In all the course of virtuous meditation, the soul is like a virgin invited to a matrimonial contract; it inquires into the condition of the person, his estate and disposition, and other circumstances of amability and desire.

Bp. Taylor, Gr. Exemplar, p. 60.

No rules can make amability: our minds and apprehensions make that; and so is our felicity. Bp. Taylor.

AMADETTO. n. s. A sort of pear [See PEAR.] so called, says Skinner, from the name of him who cultivated it.

AMADOT. n. s. A sort of pear. [See PEAR.]

AMA'IN. † adv. [from maine, or maigne, old Fr. derived from magmus, Lat. or from the Sax. mægn, vis, robur, virtus.] With vehemence; with vigour; fiercely; violently. It is used of any action performed with precipitation, whether of fear or courage, or of any violent effort.

Great lords, from Ireland an I come amain, To signify that rebels there are up. Shakspeare.

What! when we fled amain, pursued, and struck With heav'n's afflicting thunder, and besought The deep to shelter us? Milton.

The hills, to their supply, Vapour and exhalation dusk and moist, Sent up amain. Milton.

From hence the boar was rous'd, and sprung amain, Like light'ning sudden, on the warrior train, Beats down the trees before him, shakes the ground; The forest echoes to the crackling sound, Shout the fierce youth, and clamours ring around. Dryden.

AMA'LGAM. † } n. s. [Fr. amalgame. Gr. αμαλγαμα.] } γχαμιν.] The mixture of metals procured by amalgamation. See AMALGAMATION.

The retort brake, And what was sav'd, was put into the Pellicane, And sign'd with Hermes' seal.—I think 'twas so. We should have a new amalgama. B. Jonson, Alch. i. 3.

The induration of the amalgam appears to proceed from the new texture resulting from the coalition of the mingled ingredients, that make up the amalgam. Boyle.

They have attempted to confound all sorts of citizens, as well as they could, into one homogeneous mass; and then they have divided this amalgam into a number of incoherent republics. Burke.

To AMA'LGAMATE. † v. a. [from amalgame.] To unite metals with quicksilver, which may be practised upon all metals, except iron and copper. The use of this operation is, to make the metal soft and ductile. Gold is, by this method, drawn over other materials by the gilders. Used figuratively also.

Ingratitude is indeed their four cardinal virtues compacted and amalgamated into one. Burke.

To AMA'LGAME. * v. n. [μαλ and γαμιν. Fr. amalgamer.] To mix metals by amalgamation. From this old verb the modern amalgamate is formed.

The care and wo, That we had in our matres subliming, And in amalgaming, and calcining Of quicksilver. Chaucer, Chan. Yeom. Tale.

What is some three ounces of fresh materials?—Is't no more?—No more, Sir, of gold, to amalgame, with some six of mercury. B. Jonson, Alch. i. 3.

AMALGAMA'TION. n. s. [from amalgamate.] The act or practice of amalgamating metals.

Amalgamation is the mixing of mercury with any of the metals. The manner is thus in gold, the rest are answerable: Take six parts of mercury, mix them hot in a crucible, and pour them to one part of gold made red hot in another crucible; stir these well that they may incorporate; then cast the mass into cold water, and wash it. Bacon.

To AM'AND. * v. a. [Lat. amando.] This word is in our old dictionaries, though omitted by Dr. Johnson, who, however, has introduced into his dictionary, the substantive amandation.

To send one away. Cockeram.

AMANDA'TION. n. s. [from amando, Lat.] The act of sending on a message, or employment.

AMANUE'NSIS. † n. s. [Lat.] A person who writes what another dictates; or copies what has been written by another.

I had not that happy leisure; no amanuenses, no assistants.

Burton, Anat. Mel. to the Reader, p. 12.

In so many copies as have been made of the gospel, before printing was known; and considering the many translations of it into several languages, where the idioms are different, and the phrases may be mistaken; together with the natural slips of amanuenses; it is much more wonderful that there are no more various lections, than that there are so many.

Leslie's Truth of Christianity, p. 52.

The principal design of Bentley's notes is to prove that Milton's native text was vitiated by an infinite variety of licentious interpolations, and factitious readings, which, as he pretends, proceeded from the artifice, the ignorance, or the misapprehension, of an amanuensis, to whom Milton, being blind, had been compelled to dictate his verses.

Warton, Pref. to Milton, S. P.

AM'ARANTH. n. s. [amaranthus, Lat. from α and μαρξινω.]

1. The name of a plant.

The flowers have no petals; the cup of the flower is dry and multifid; the seeds are included in membranaceous vessels, which, when come to maturity, burst open transversely or horizontally, like purslane, each of which contains one or more roundish seeds.

Among the many species, the most beautiful are, 1. The tree amaranth. 2. The long pendulous amaranth, with reddish coloured seeds, commonly called Long lies a bleeding.

2. In poetry, it is sometimes an imaginary flower, supposed, according to its name, never to fade;

Immortal amaranth! a flower which once In paradise, fast by the tree of life, Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence, To heav'n remov'd, where first it grew, there grows.

And flowers aloft, shading the fount of life;
And where the river of bliss, through midst of heaven,
Rows o'er Elysian flowers her amber stream:
With these, that never fade, the Spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks, shewreathed with beams.

Milton, P. L.

AMARA'NTHINE. adj. [amaranthinus, Lat.] Relating to amaranths; consisting of amaranths.

By the streams that ever flow;
By the fragrant winds that blow
O'er the Elysian flowers;
By those happy souls that dwell
In yellow meads of Asphodel
Or amaranthine bowers.

Pope.

AMARITUDE. n. s. [amaritudo, Lat.] Bitterness.

What amaritude or acrimony is deprehended in choler, it acquires from a commixture of melancholy, or external malign bodies.

Harvey on Consumptions.

AMARULENCE. n. s. [amaritudo, Lat.] Bitterness. Dict.

AMARULENT.* adj. [Lat. amarulentus.] Bitter.

Mr. Boucher cites an example, viz. "all other pleasure of this life set aparte, as amarulent and bitter;" but names not the author.

AMASMENT. n. s. [from amass.] A heap; an accumulation; a collection.

What is now, is but an amasment of imaginary conceptions, prejudices, ungrounded opinions, and infinite impostures.

Glanville, Sceptis Scientifica.

To AMA'SS. v. a. [amasser, Fr.]

1. To collect together in one heap or mass.

The rich man is not blamed, as having made use of any unlawful means to amass riches, as having thriven by fraud and injustice.

Atterbury, Serm.

When we would think of infinite space, or duration, we, at first step, usually make some very large idea, as perhaps of millions of ages, or miles, which possibly we double and multiply several times. All that we thus amass together in our thoughts, is positive, and the assemblage of a great number of positive ideas of space or duration.

Locke.

2. In a figurative sense, to add one thing to another, generally with some share of reproach, either of eagerness or indiscrimination.

Such as amass all relations, must err in some, and be unbeliev'd in many.

Brown, Valg. Err.

Do not content yourselves with mere words, lest your improvements only amass a heap of unintelligible phrases.

Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

The life of Homer has been written, by amassing of all the traditions and hints the writers could meet with, in order to tell a story of him to the world.

Pope.

AMASS. n. s. [amass, Fr.] An assemblage; an accumulation.

This pillar is but a medley or amass of all the precedent ornaments, making a new kind by stealth.

Wotton.

To AMAZE. † v. n. [from a and mate. See MATE.]

1. To accompany; to entertain as a companion. It is now obsolete.

A lovely bevy of fair ladies sate,
Court'd of many a jolly paramour,
The which did them in modest wise amaze,
And each one sought his lady to aggrate.

Spenser, F. Q.

2. To terrify; to strike with horror. In this sense, it is derived from the old French, matter, to crush or subdue, Dr. Johnson says, It may also be referred to the Sp. mutare, Ital. mattare, Lat. mactare.

But in the porch, that did them sore amaze,
A flaming fire ymixt with smouldry smoke
And stinking sulphure, that with grisly hate
And dreadful horror did all entranc'd choke,

Enforced them their forward footing to revoke.

Spenser, F. Q.

When we are so easily dor'd and amazed with every sophism, it is a certain argument of great defect of inward furniture and worth.

Hales, Rem. p. 13.

3. To perplex; to discourage, as in our elder dictionaries; to puzzle. [old Fr. amater, fatiguer.]

Ye bene right hard amated, grations lord,
And of your ignorance great merrill make,
Whiles cause not well conceived ye mistake.

Spenser, F. Q.

AMATEUR.* n. s. [Fr.] A lover of any particular pursuit or system.

It must always be, to those who are the greatest amateurs or even professors of revolutions, a matter very hard to prove, that the late French government was so bad, that nothing worse, in the infinite devices of men, could come in its place.

Burke.

AMATO'RCULIST. n. s. [amatorculus, Lat.] A little insignificant lover; a pretender to affection. Dict.

AMATO'RIAL.* adj. [Probably adopted, by the author who uses it, from Milton's amatorious.] Relating to love.

Leland mentions eight books of his epigrams, amatorial verses, and poem on philosophical subjects.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. diss. 2.

They seem to have been tales of love and chivalry, amatorial sonnets, tragedies, comedies, and pastorals.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iv. 7.

AMATO'RIOUS.* adj. [Lat. amatorius.] Relating to love.

This is no mere amatorious novel;—but this is a deep and serious verity.

Milton, Doc. and Dis. of Div. i. 6.

AMATORY. adj. [amatorius, Lat.] Relating to love; causing love.

It is the same thing whether one ravish Lucretia by force, as Tarquin, or by amatory potions, not only allure her, but necessitate her to satisfy his lust, and incline her effectually, and draw her inevitably to follow him spontaneously.

Bp. Bramhall against Hobbes.

AMAUROSIS. n. s. [ἀμαυρόσις.] A dimness of sight, not from any visible defect in the eye, but from some distemperature of the inner parts, occasioning the representations of flies and dust floating before the eyes: which appearances are the parts of the retina hid and compressed by the blood vessels being too much distended; so that, in many of its parts, all sense is lost; and therefore no images can be painted upon them, whereby the eyes, continually rolling round, many parts of objects falling successively upon them, are obscure. The cure of this depends upon a removal of the stagnations in the extremities of those arteries which run over the bottom of the eye.

Quincy.

To AMAZE. † v. a. [from a and maze, perplexity; or it may be referred to the old Fr. amater, to confound.]

1. To confuse with terror.

Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee, and their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee, when I shall brandish my sword before them, and they shall tremble at every moment; every man for his own life in the day of the fall. Ezek. xxxii. 10.

2. To put into confusion with wonder.

Go, heav'nly pair, and with your dazzling virtues,
Your courage, truth, your innocence and love,
Amaze and charm mankind.

Smith.

3. To put into perplexity.

That cannot choose but amaze him. If he be not amazed, he will be mocked; if he be amazed, he will every way be mocked.

Shakespeare, As you like it, i. 5.

AMAZE. n. s. [from the verb amaze.] Astonishment; confusion, either of fear or wonder.

Fairfax, whose name in arms thro' Europe rings,
And fills all mouths with envy or with praise,
And all her jealous monarchs with amaze.

Milton, Sonnet.

Meantime the Trojan cuts his watery way,
Fix'd on his voyage through the curling sea,
Then casting back his eyes with dire amazement,
Sees on the Punick shore, the mounting blaze. Dryden.

AMAZEDLY, adv. [from amazed.] Confusedly; with amazement; with confusion.

I speak amazedly, and it becomes
My marvel, and my message. Shakespeare.

Stands Macbeth thus amazedly!
Come, sisters, cheer we up his spirits! Shakespeare.

AMAZEDNESS, n. s. [from amazed.] The state of being amazed; astonishment; wonder; confusion.

I was by at the opening of the farthest, heard the old shepherd deliver the manner how he found it; whereupon, after a little amazement, we were all commanded out of the chamber. Shakespeare.

AMAZEMENT, n. s. [from amaze.]

1. Such a confused apprehension as does not leave reason its full force; extreme fear; horror.

He answer'd nought at all; but adding new Fear to his first amazement, staring wide,
With stony eyes, and heartless hollow hue,
Astonish'd stood, as one that had espied
Infernal furies, with their chains untied. Spenser, F. Q.

But look! amazement on thy mother sits;
O step between her and her fighting soul:
Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works. Shakespeare.

2. Extreme dejection.

He ended, and his words impression left
Of much amazement to the infernal crew,
Distracted and surpris'd with deep dismay
At these sad tidings. Milton.

3. Height of admiration.

Had you, some ages past, this race of glory
Run, with amazement we should read your story;
But living virtue, all achievements past,
Meets envy still to grapple with at last. Waller.

4. Astonishment; wonder at an unexpected event.

They knew that it was he which sat for ains at the beautiful gate of the temple, and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him. Acts.

AMAZING, participial adj. [from amaze.] Wonderful; astonishing.

It is an amazing thing to see the present desolation of Italy, when one considers what incredible multitudes it abounded with during the reigns of the Roman emperours. Addison.

AMAZINGLY, adv. [from amazing.] To a degree that may excite astonishment; wonderfully.

If we arise to the world of spirits, our knowledge of them must be amazingly imperfect, when there is not the least grain of sand but has too many difficulties belonging to it, for the wisest philosopher to answer. Watts, Logic.

AMAZON, n. s. [α and $\mu\alpha\zeta$, or, according to others, $\alpha\mu\alpha$ and $\zeta\omega\iota$.] The Amazons were a race of women famous for valour, who inhabited Caucasus; they are so called from their cutting off their breasts, to use their weapons better. A warlike woman; a virago.

Stay, stay thy hands, thou art an amazon,
And fightest with the sword. Shakespeare.

When the strong town of Heunebond, near Rennes, was besieged by the French, this redoubted amazon [the Countess of Montfort] rode in complete armour from street to street, on a large courser, animating the garrison. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 254.

AMAZONIAN, adj. [from amazon.]

1. Warlike; usually applied to a virago.

Mahomet, by right of primogeniture, claimed but could not have the crown, so strong a faction was raised by his virago sister Peria-Conconna in the behalf of Ismael the second brother; command was given to Salmas-Mirza, general of the horse, to retaliate his [Mahomet's] amazonian sister; and accordingly her head with her long curled hair dangling down was upon a spear's point presented to Mahomet. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 279.

I do not less willingly own my weakness than my sex, being far from any such amazonian boldness as affects to contend with so many learned and godly men.

Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 179.
How ill beseeeming is it in thy sex,
To triumph like an amazonian trull! Shakespeare, Hen. VI. p. iii.

2. Relating to the Amazonians.

Those leaves
They gather'd, broad as amazonian target. Milton, P. L.
AMAZON-LIKE, adj. Resembling an amazon.

His hair, French-like, stares on his frighted head,
One lock, amazon-like, dishevel'd. Bp. Hall's Satires, iii. 7.

AMBA'GES, n. s. [Lat.] A circuit of words; a circumlocutory form of speech; a multiplicity of words; an indirect manner of expression. It was formerly used in the singular number; ambage being defined, both in Bullokar's and Cockeram's vocabularies, a long circumstance of words. The word ambages is of high authority in our writings.

Calthas led us with ambages,
That is to saine, with double wordis slie,
Such as men clepen a word with two visages. Chaucer, Tr. and Cress. v. 897.

Evident will those secret mysteries be unto him, which are privily hid unto others under dark ambages and parables. Bale on the Revel. Pref. A. vii.

There is a babbling way of speaking, when by many tedious ambages and long impertinencies men pour out a sea of words, and scarce one drop of sense or matter. Bp. Hopkins, Expos. p. 6.

The other cost me so many strains, and traps, and ambages to introduce, that I at length resolved to give it over. Swift, Tale of a Tub.

They gave those complex ideas names, that they might the more easily record and discourse of things they were daily conversant in, without long ambage and circumlocutions; and that the things, they were continually to give and receive information about, might be the easier and quicker understood. Locke.

AMBA'GIOUS, adj. [Fr. ambagieux, full of ambages. Cotgrave.] Circumlocutory; perplexed; tedious. Dict.

AMBASSADE, n. s. [ambassade, Fr.] Embassy: character or business of an ambassador: a word not now in use.

When you disgraced me in my ambassade,
Then I degraded you from being king. Shakespeare.

AMBA'SSADOUR, n. s. [ambassador, Fr. embaxador, Span. It is written differently, as it is supposed to come from the French or Spanish language; and the original derivation being uncertain, it is not easy to settle its orthography. Some derive it from the Hebrew מַשְׁלִיחַ , to tell, and מַשְׁלִיחַ , a messenger; others from ambactus, which, in the old Gaulish, signified a servant; whence ambascia, in low Latin, is found to signify service; and ambasciator, a servant; others deduce it from ambacht, in old Teutonic, signifying a government; and Junius mentions a possibility of its descent from ambaxos; and others from am for ad, and bassus, low, as supposing the act of sending an ambassadour, to be in some sort an act of submission. Goth. anabudans, one commanded; a bearer of commands, Sax. ambacht-men, messengers. Goth. also anubachts, a servant. Wachter derives ambacht, a servant, from amb, about, and achten, to follow. All these derivations lead us to write ambassadour, not embassadour.] A person sent in a publick manner from one sovereign power to another, and so to represent the power from which he is sent. The person of an ambassador is inviolable.

Ambassador is, in popular language, the general name of a messenger from a sovereign Power, and sometimes, ludicrously, from common persons. In the juridical and formal language, it signifies particularly a minister of the highest rank residing in another country, and is distinguished from an envoy, who is of less dignity.

Give first admittance to the ambassadors. Shakespeare.

Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before,
Nor ask'd you leave, nor did your faith implore;
But come, without a pledge, my own ambassador. Dryden.

Of have their black ambassadors appear'd
Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama. Addison.

AMBASSADRESS. n. s. [ambassadrice, Fr.]

1. The lady of an ambassador.

2. In ludicrous language, a woman sent on a message.

Well, my ambassadress —
Come you to menace war, and loud defiance?
Or does the peaceful olive grace your brow? Rowe.

A'MBASSAGE. n. s. [from ambassador.] An embassy; the business of an ambassador. Dr. Johnson accents it on the first syllable: the accent was formerly on the second.

He sent ambassage, lik'd me more than life.

Mir. for Mag. p. 61.

Maximilian entertained them with dilatory answers; so as the formal part of their ambassage might well warrant their further stay. Bacon.

A'MBASSY. n. s. [Low Lat. ambascia; and see AMBASSADOR.] An embassy.

To menace us with their proud ambassy.

Mir. for Mag. p. 573.

A thousand marks were sent to the Pope as a meek benevolence, which sealed up the drift and purpose of this ambassy. Proceedings against Garnet, sign. Gg. iv. b.

AMBER. n. s. [from ambar, Arab. whence the lower writers formed ambarum.]

A yellow transparent substance of a gumous or bituminous consistence, but a resinous taste, and a smell like oil of turpentine; chiefly found in the Baltick sea, along the coasts of Prussia. Some naturalists refer it to the vegetable, others to the mineral, and some even to the animal kingdom. Pliny describes it as a resinous juice, oozing from aged pines and firs, and discharged thence into the sea. He adds, that it was hence the ancients gave it the denomination of succinum, from succus, juice. Some have imagined it a concretion of the tears of birds; others, the urine of a beast; others, the scum of the lake Cephisis, near the Atlantick; others, a congelation formed in the Baltick, and in some fountains, where it is found swimming like pitch. Others suppose it a bitumen trickling into the sea from subterraneous sources; but this opinion is also discarded, as good amber having been found in digging at a considerable distance from the sea, as that gathered on the coast. Boerhaave ranks it with camphire, which is a concrete oil of aromattick plants, elaborated by heat into a crystalline form. Within some pieces of amber have been found leaves, and insects included; which seems to indicate, either that the amber was originally in a fluid state, or, that having been exposed to the sun, it was softened, and rendered susceptible of the leaves and insects.

A M B

Amber, when rubbed, draws or attracts bodies to it; and, by friction, is brought to yield light pretty copiously in the dark. Some distinguish amber into yellow, white, brown, and black: but the two latter are supposed to be of a different nature and denomination; the one called jet, the other ambergris. Trevoux and Chambers.

Liquid amber, is a kind of native balsam, or resin, like turpentine; clear, reddish, or yellowish; of a pleasant smell, almost like ambergris. It flows from an incision made in the bark of a fine large tree in New Spain, called by the natives ososol. Chambers.

If light penetrateth any clear body, that is coloured, as painted glass, amber, water, and the like, it gives the light the colour of its medium.

Peacham.

No interwoven reeds a garland made,
To hide his brows within the vulgar shade;
But poplar wreathes around his temples spread,
And tears of amber trickled down his head. Addison.

The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay,
And studded amber darts a golden ray. Pope.

A'MBER. adj. Consisting of amber.

With scarfs, and fans, and double charge of bravery,
With amber bracelets, beads, and all this knavery. Shakespeare.

To AMBER. v. a. To scent with amber.

Be sure

The wines be lusty, high, and full of spirit,
And amber'd all. Beaumont and Fl. Custom of the Country, iii. 1.
Of ambering or perfuming in infinitum. Hist. R. S. iv. 109.

A'MBER-COLOURED. adj. Frequently applied to the colour of the hair.

Sabina Poppea, Nero's wife, wore amber-coloured hair; so did all the Roman ladies in an instant; her fashion was theirs. Burton, Anat. Med. to the Reader, p. 37.

His amber-colour'd locks in ringlets run.

Dryden, Pul. and Arc. ver. 1348

AMBER DRINK. n. s. Drink of the colour of amber, or resembling amber in colour and transparency.

All your clear amber drink is flat. Bacon.

A'MBER-DROPPING. part. adj. Dropping amber.

Sabrina fair,

Listen where thou art sitting
Under the glassy, cool, translucent wave,
In twisted braids of lilies knitting
The loose train of thy amber-dropping hair.

Milton, Com. ver. 862.

A'MBERGRIS. n. s. [from amber and gris, or grey; that is, grey amber.]

A fragrant drug, that melts almost like wax, commonly of a greyish or ash colour, used both as a perfume and a cordial. Some imagine it to be the excrement of a bird, which, being melted by the heat of the sun, and washed off the shore by the waves, is swallowed by whales, who return it back in the condition we find it. Others conclude it to be the excrement of a cetaceous fish, because sometimes found in the intestines of such animals. But we have no instance of any excrement capable of melting like wax; and if it were the excrement of a whale, it should rather be found where these animals abound, as about Greenland. Others take it for a kind of wax or gum, which distils from trees, and drops into the sea, where it congeals. Many of the orientals imagine it springs out of the sea, as naphtha does out of some fountains. Others assert it to be a vegetable production, issuing out of the root of a tree, whose roots always shoot toward the sea, and discharge themselves into it. Others maintain, that ambergris is made from the honey-combs, which fall into the sea from the rocks, where the bees had formed their nests; several persons having seen pieces that were half ambergris, and half plain honey-comb; and others have found large pieces of ambergris, in which, when broke, honey-comb, and honey too, were found in the middle. Neumann absolutely denies it to be an animal substance, as not yielding in the analysis, any one animal principle. He concludes it to be a bitumen issuing out of the earth into the sea; at first of a viscous consistence, but hardening, by its mixture with some liquid naphtha, into the form in which we find it. Trevoux and Chambers.

Bermudas wall'd with rocks, who does not know
That happy island, where huge lemons grow,
Where shining pearl, coral, and many a pound,
On the rich shore, of ambergris is found. Waller.

A'MBER SEED, or musk seed, resembles millet, is of a bitterish taste, and brought dry from Martinico and Egypt. Chambers.

A'MBER TREE. n. s. [frutex Africanus ambram spirans.] A shrub, whose beauty is in its small evergreen leaves, which grow as close as heath, and, being bruised between the fingers, emit a very fragrant odour. Miller.

A'MBER-WEeping. * adj. [An elegant compound from amber and weep, which Pope has disjoined; for he was indebted to this word, when he wrote "And trees weep amber on the banks of Po."] Chambers.

Not the soft gold, which Steals from the amber-weeping tree,
Makes sorrow half so rich,
As the drops distill'd from thee. Crashaw's Poems, p. 2.

AMBIDEXTER. † n. s. [Lat.]

1. A man who has equally the use of both his hands.

Rodiginus, undertaking to give a reason of ambidexters, and left-handed men, delivereth a third opinion. Brown.

2. A man who is equally ready to act on either side, in party disputes. This sense is ludicrous. Formerly written ambidexter, and defined "a subtle knave that can play on both parts."

— Thy poor client's gold
Makes thee to be an ambidexter bold.

Garrigue's Epigrams, Ep. to a Lawyer, E. 71.
The rest are hypocrites, ambidexters, outsiders.

Burton, Anat. Mel. to the Reader, p. 36.
How does Melpy like this? I think I have vex'd her:

Little did she know, I was ambidexter. Sheridan to Swift.

AMBIDEXTERITY. n. s. [from ambidexter.]

1. The quality of being able equally to use both hands.

2. Double dealing.

AMBIDEXTROUS. adj. [from ambidexter, Lat.]

1. Having, with equal facility, the use of either hand.

Others, not considering ambidextrous and left-handed men, do totally submit unto the efficacy of the liver. Brown.

2. Double dealing; practising on both sides.

Æsop condemns the double practices of trimmers, and all false, shuffling, and ambidextrous dealings. J. Strange.

AMBIDEXTROUSNESS. n. s. [from ambidextrous.] The quality of being ambidextrous. Dict.

A'MBIENT. adj. [ambiens, Lat.] Surrounding; encompassing; investing.

A M B

This which yields or fills
All space, the ambient air wide interfills'd. Milton.
The thickness of a plate requisite to produce any colour, depends only on the density of the plate, and not on that of the ambient medium. Newton, Opt.

Around him dance the rosy hours,
And damasking the ground with flow'rs,
With ambient sweets perfume the morn. Fenton to L. Gower.

Illustrious virtues, who by turns have rose,
With happy laws her empire to sustain,
And with full pow'r assert her ambient main. Prior.

The ambient æther is too liquid and empty to impel horizontally with that prodigious celerity. Bentley.

A'MBIGU. n. s. [French.] An entertainment, consisting not of regular courses, but of a medley of dishes set on together.

When straiten'd in your time and servants few,
You'd richly then compose an ambigu;

Where first and second course, and your desert,
All in one single table have their part. King's Art of Cookery.

AMBIGUITY. n. s. [from ambiguous.] Doubtfulness of meaning; uncertainty of signification: double meaning.

With ambiguities they often entangle themselves, not marking what doth agree to the word of God in itself, and what in regard of outward accidents. Hooker.

We can clear these ambiguities
And know their spring, their head, their true descent. Shakespeare.

The words are of single signification, without any ambiguity; and therefore I shall not trouble you, by straining for an interpretation, where there is no difficulty; or distinction, where there is no difference. South.

AMBIGUOUS. adj. [ambiguus, Lat.]

1. Doubtful; having two meanings; of uncertain signification.

But what have been thy answers, what but dark,
Ambiguous, and with doubtful sense deluding. Milton.

Some expressions in the covenant were ambiguous, and were left so, because the persons who framed them were not all of one mind. Clarendon.

2. Applied to persons using doubtful expressions. It is applied to expressions, or those that use them, not to a dubious, or suspended state of mind.

Th' ambiguous gods who rub their lab'ring breast,
In these mysterious words his mind express;
Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest. Dryden.

Silence at length the gay Antinous broke,
Constrained a smile, and thus ambiguously spoke. Pope.

AMBIGUOUSLY. † adv. [from ambiguous.] In an ambiguous manner; doubtfully; uncertainly; with double meaning.

The words were ambiguously set down of purpose to cover, in some sort, the cruelty which lurketh in their own hearts.

Ep. Banquet, Dæd. Pos. iv. 4.
His true meaning, therefore, however darkly and ambiguously he sometimes speaks, must be this.

Clark on the Attributes, p. 27.

AMBIGUOUSNESS. n. s. [from ambiguous.] The quality of being ambiguous; uncertainty of meaning; duplicity of signification.

AMBIGUITY. n. s. [from ambo, Lat. and λογος, Gr.] Talk of ambiguous or doubtful signification. Dict.

AMBIGUOUS. adj. [from ambo and loquor, Lat.] using ambiguous and doubtful expressions. Dict.

AMBIGUOUS. n. s. [ambiloquium, Lat.] The use of doubtful and indeterminate expressions; discourse of doubtful meaning. Dict.

A'MBIT. n. s. [ambitus, Lat.] The compass or circuit of any thing; the line that encompasses any thing.

A M B

The task of a wild boar winds about almost into a perfect ring or hoop; only it is a little writhen. In measuring by the ambit, it is long or round about a foot and two inches; its basis an inch over. Grew, Museum.

AMBITION. † n. s. [ambitio, Lat.] The desire of something higher than is possessed at present.

1. The desire of preferment or honour.

Who would think, without having such a mind as Antiphus, that so great goodness could not have bound gratefulness? and so high advancement not have satisfied his ambition? Sidney.

2. The desire of any thing great or excellent.

The quick'ning power would be, and so would rest;

The sense would not be only, but be well;

But wit's ambition longeth to the best,

For it desires in endless bliss to dwell.

Davies.

Urge them, while their souls

Are capable of this ambition;

Let zeal, now melted by the windy breath

Of soft petitions, pity and remorse,

Cool and congeal again to what it was.

Shakespeare.

3. It is used with to before a verb, and of before a noun.

I had a very early ambition to recommend myself to your lordship's patronage.

Addison.

There was an ambition of wit, and an affectation of gaiety.

Pope, Pref. to his Letters.

4. Going about with studiousness to obtain praise.

[Lat. ambitio.]

I on the other side

U'd no ambition to commend my deeds;

The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer.

Milton, S. I. ver. 247.

Ambition is not often used in the plural number; but the following examples warrant such usage.

There's no motion

That tends to vice in man, but I affirm

It is the woman's part: Be it lying, note it,

The woman's; flattering, her's; deceiving, her's;

Ambitions, covetings, change of prides, disdain,

Nice longings, slanders, mutability,

All faults that may be nam'd.

Shakespeare, Cymb. ii. 5.

It is well, if any thing can kindle in us holy ambitions.

Bp. Hall, Contemplations.

AMBITIOUS. adj. [ambitiosus, Lat.]

1. Seized or touch'd with ambition; desirous of advancement; eager of honours; aspiring. It has the particle of before the object of ambition, if a noun; to, if expressed by a verb.

We seem ambitious God's whole work t'undo.

Donne.

The neigh'ring monarch's by thy beauty led,

Content in crowds, ambitious of thy bed:

The world is at thy choice, except but one,

Except but him thou canst not choose alone.

Dryden.

You have been pleas'd not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world, for want of that protection, of which he had been so long ambitious.

Dryden.

Trajan, a prince ambitious of glory, descended to the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates, and went upon the ocean, where, seeing a vessel trading to the Indies, he had thoughts of out-doing Alexander.

Arbutnot on Coins.

2. Eager to grow bigger; aspiring.

I have seen

Th' ambitious ocean swell and foam,

To be exalted with the threatening clouds.

Shakespeare.

AMBITIOUSLY. adv. [from ambitious.] In an ambitious manner; with eagerness of advancement or preference.

With such glad hearts did our despairing men

Salute th' appearance of the prince's fleet;

And each ambitiously would claim the ken,

That with first eyes did distant safety meet.

Dryden.

Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,

Ambitiously design'd his Sh—'s throne.

Dryden.

AMBITIOUSNESS. n. s. [from ambitious.] The quality of being ambitious.

A M B

A'MBITUDE. n. s. [ambis, Lat.] Compass; circuit; circumference. Dict.

To A'MBLE. v. n. [ambler, Fr. ambulo, Lat.]

1. To move upon an amble. See AMBLE.

It is good, on some occasions, to enjoy as much of the present, as will not endanger our futurity; and to provide ourselves of the virtuous's saddle, which will be sure to amble when the world is upon the hardest trot. Dryden.

2. To move easily, without hard shocks or shaking.

Who ambles time withal?—A rich man that hath not the gout; for he lives merrily, because he feels no pain; knowing no burthen of heavy tedious penury: him time ambles withal.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

3. In a ludicrous sense, to move with submission, and by direction; as, a horse that ambles, uses a gait not natural.

A laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she,

Shall make him amble on a gossip's message,

And take the distaff with a hand as patient,

As ere did Hercules.

Rowe, Jago Shore

4. To walk daintily and affectedly.

I am rudely stamp'd, and want love's majesty,

To strut before a wanton ambling nymph.

Shakespeare.

A'MBLE. † n. s. [from To amble.] A pace or movement, in which the horse removes both his legs on one side; as, on the far side, he removes his fore and hinder leg of the same side at one time, whilst the legs on the near side stand still; and when the far legs are upon the ground, the near side removes the fore leg and hinder leg, and the legs on the far side stand still. An amble is the first pace of young colts, but when they have strength to trot, they quit it. There is no amble in the manage; riding masters allow only of walk, trot, and gallop. A horse may be put from a trot to a gallop without stopping; but cannot be put from an amble to a gallop without a stop, which interrupts the justness of the manage.

Farrier's Dict.

His stede was all dapple gray,

It goth an amble in the way.

Chaucer, Rime of Sir Topas.

Such as have translated begging out of the old hackney-pace to a fine easy amble.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.

A'MBLER. † n. s. [from To amble.] A horse that has been taught to amble; a pacer.

A trotting horse is fit for a coach, but not for a lady's saddle; and an ambler is proper for a lady's saddle, but not for a coach.

Howell, Lett. i. v. 37.

A'MBLINGLY. adv. [from ambling.] With an ambling movement.

AMBO.* n. s. [Gr. ἄμβω, Fr. ambon.] A reading desk, or pulpit.

Between the ambrosias and the faithful, stood the ambo or reading-desk. Sir G. Wheeler, Des. of Anc. Churches, p. 76.

The principal use of this ambo was, to read the scriptures to the people, especially the epistles and gospels. They read the gospel there yet, and not at the altar.

Ibid. p. 78.

Chrysostom preached in the ambo or pulpit.

Ibid. p. 97.

The admirers of antiquity have been beating their brains about their ambony.

Milton, of Ref. in Eng. b. i.

AMBROSIA. † n. s. [Gr. ἀμβροσία.]

1. The imaginary food of the gods, from which every thing eminently pleasing to the smell or taste, is called ambrosia.

His dewy locks

Distill'd ambrosia.

Milton, P. L. v. 57.

It is no flaming lustre made of light,

No sweet concert, or well-tim'd harmony;

Ambrosia for to feast the appetite,

Or flowery odour mix'd with spicery.

G. Fletcher, Chr. Tr. ii. 41.

2. The name of a plant; formerly written ambrose, and ambrosie; as was also the pretended ambrosia of the gods.

At first ambrose it selfe was not sweeter,
At last black hellebore was not so bitter.

Burton, Anat. of Melan. iii. 2.
The coco, another excellent fruit, — wherein we find better than the outside promised; yielding a quart of ambrosie, coloured like new white wine, but far more aromatick tasted.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 29.

It has male flosculous flowers, produced off separate parts of the same plant from the fruit, having no visible petals; the fruit which succeeds the female flowers, is shaped like a club, and is prickly, containing one oblong seed in each. The species are,

1. The marine or sea ambrosia. 2. Taller unsavoury sea ambrosia. 3. The tallest Canada ambrosia. Miller.

AMBR'SIACK.* adj. [Lat. ambrosiacus.] Delicious, like ambrosia; sweet-smelling.

Here is beauty for the eye;
For the ear sweet melody;

Ambrosiack odours for the smell.

B. Jonson, Poetaster.

AMBR'SIAL.* adj. [from ambrosia.] Partaking of the nature or qualities of ambrosia; fragrant; delicious; delectable.

Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd
All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect
Sense of new joy ineffable diffus'd.

Milton.

The gifts of heaven my following song pursues,
Aerial honey, and ambrosial dews.

Dryden.

To furthest shores th' ambrosial spirit flies,
Sweet to the world and grateful to the skies.

Pope.

AMBROSIAN.* adj. [from ambrosia.] Sweet or odorous as ambrosia.

Your looks, your smiles, and thoughts that meet,
Ambrosian hands and silver feet,
Do promise you will do.

B. Jonson, Masques, Chor. of Sea-gods.

I'll lay my breast upon a silver stream,
And swim unto Elysium's lily fields;
There in ambrosian trees I'll write a theme
Of all the woeful sighs my sorrow yields.

Song, in the Seven Champ. of Chr.

AM'BRY.* n. s. [Barret gives a good description of ambry, which he derives from the Fr. aumosniere, a little purse, "wherein money was put for the poor; and at length was used for any hutch or close place to keep meat left after meals, which, at the beginning of Christianity, was ever distributed among the poor; and which we for shortness of speech call ambry." Kelham, among his Norman words, gives ambrey, a cupboard. It may be referred also to the Sax. ælmepuze. The Irish are supposed to have adopted amri, and the Welsh almeri, (a cupboard,) from the English. See ALMONRY, of which Dr. Johnson pronounces this word a corruption.]

1. The place where the almoner lives, or where alms are distributed.
2. The place where plate, and utensils for housekeeping, are kept; also a cupboard for keeping cold victuals: a word still used in the northern counties, and in Scotland.

AMBU ACE.* n. s. [from ambo, Lat. and ace, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Boucher concluded, by the spelling of ambu ace, that the word was of French origin; and he says, that he searched for it in vain in several dictionaries of that language. It is certainly in Cotgrave, where under ambuscats we find "faire ambuscats," to cast ambus. ace. Roquefort, under ambexas, says it is "mot employé au jeu de trictrac; on le nomme, bexet." Gloss. Lang. Rom.] A double ace; so called when two dice turn up the ace.

I had rather be in this choice, than throw ambu ace for my life.

Shakespeare, All's well that ends well.

This will be yet clearer, by considering his own instance of casting ambu ace, though it partake more of contingency than of freedom. Supposing the posture of the party's hand who did throw the dice, supposing the figure of the table, and of the dice themselves, supposing the measure of force applied, and supposing all other things which did concur to the production of that cast, to be the very same they were, there is no doubt but in this case the cast is necessary.

Bramhall, against Hobbes.

TO AMBULATE.* v. a. [Lat. ambulo.] This is noticed by Mr. Boucher as a Scottish verb, but not as an English one. It is found, however, in our elder dictionaries. "To move hither and thither." So, in our elder poetry, we have the participle ambulant for ambling:

On fair ambulant horse they sit. Gower, Conf. Am. B. 4.

And in later times, ambulant in prose.

A knight dormant, ambulant, combatant!

Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iv. 8.

AMBULA'TION.* n. s. [ambulation, Lat.] The act of walking.

From the occult and invisible motion of the muscles in station, proceed more offensive lassitudes, than from ambulation.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

AM'BULATIVE.* adj. [Fr. ambulatif.] Walking.

Sherrwood.

AM'BULATORY.* adj. [ambulo, Lat.]

1. That which has the power or faculty of walking.

The gradient, or ambulatory, are such as require some basis, or bottom, to uphold them in their motions: such were those self-moving statues, which, unless violently detained, would of themselves run away.

Wilkins, Math. Magic.

2. That which happens during a passage or walk.

He was sent to conduce hither the princess of whom his majesty had an ambulatory view in his travels.

Watson.

He answered that he would consult with him of it, in confession, walking; and so accordingly, in an ambulatory confession, he at large discoursed with him of the whole plot of the powder treason. Proceedings against Garnet, &c. sig. 8. 2.

3. Moveable; as, an ambulatory court; a court which removes from place to place for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

His council of state went ambulatory always with him.

Howell, Letters, i. 2. 14.

All the inhabitants of Arabia the desert are in continual fear of being buried in huge heaps of sand, and therefore dwell in tents and ambulatory houses.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 1.

Religion was established, and the changing ambulatory tabernacle fixed into a standing temple. South, Sermons, vii. 288.

AM'BULATORY.* n. s. ["The overmost part of a wall, within the battlements whereof men may walk." Barret, Alv.]

Parvis is mentioned as a court or portico before the church of Notre Dame at Paris, in John de Meun's part of the Roman de la Rose. The word is supposed to be contracted from Paradise. This perhaps signified an ambulatory. Many of our old religious houses had a place called Paradise.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 453.

AM'BURY.* n. s. [Sax. ampe.] A bloody wart on any part of a horse's body.

AMBUSCADE.* n. s. [embuscade, Fr. See AMBUSH.] A private station in which men lie to surprise others; ambush.

Then waving high her torch the signal made,
Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambuscade.

Dryden.

When I behold a fashionable table set out, I fancy that gout, fevers, and lethargies, with innumerable distempers, lie in ambuscade among the dishes.

Addison.

A M B

AMBUSCA'DO. n. s. [emboscada, Span.] A private post, in order to surprise an enemy.

Sometimes she driveth o'er a soldier's neck,
And then he dreams of cutting foreign throats,
Of breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades,
Of healths five fathom deep. Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet.

AMBUSCA'DOED. * adj. [from ambuscado.] Privately posted.

By the way, at Radgee Mahal, he was with such fury assaulted by Ebrahimean, (by this time re-encouraged and here ambuscado'd with six thousand horse,) that little wanted of putting him to the rout. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 85.

AMBUSH. n. s. [embusche, Fr. from bois a wood; whence embuscher, to hide in woods, ambushes being commonly laid under the concealment of thick forests.]

1. The post where soldiers or assassins are placed, in order to fall unexpectedly upon an enemy.

The residue retired deceitfully towards the place of their ambush, whence issued more. Then the earl maintained the fight. But the enemy, intending to draw the English further into their ambush, turned away at an easy pace. Hayward.

Charge, charge, their ground the faint Taxallans yield,
Bold in close ambush, base in open field. Dryden, Ind. Emp.

2. The act of surprising another by lying in wait, or lodging in a secret post.

Nor shall we need,
With dangerous expedition, to invade
Heav'n, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,
Or ambush from the deep. Milton, P. L.

3. The state of being posted privately, in order to surprise; the state of lying in wait.

4. Perhaps the persons placed in private stations.

For you, my noble lord of Lancaster,
Once did I lay an ambush for your life. Shakespeare, Richard II.

To AMBUSH. * v. a. To place in ambush.

This success persuaded them to hunt the enemy in the woods; where, whilst they were too carelessly ranging suspecting little danger, the subtil Turk having ambushed a thousand horse in those uncouth passages, charged the Persians.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 281.

AMBUSHED. adj. [from ambush.] Placed in ambush; lying in wait.

Thick as the shades, their issue swarming bands
Of ambush'd men, whom, by their arms and dress,
To be Taxallan enemies I guess. Dryden, Ind. Emp.

AMBUSHMENT. † n. s. [from ambush; which see.]

Ambush; surprise: a word now not used, Dr. Johnson says. Yet perhaps few words have better authority than this. Dr. Johnson also has not noticed that, in poetry, this word is accented on the second syllable. • •

Like as a wily fox, that having spied
Where on a sunny bank the lambs do play,
Full closely creeping by the hinder side,
Lies in ambushment of his hoped prey. Spenser.

Jeroboam caused an ambushment to come about behind them. 2 Chron. xiii. 13.

The Lord set ambushments against the children of Ammon, Moab, and Seir, which were come against Judah; and they were smitten. 1b. xx. 22.

And gaining them belief, the credulous Grecians guide
Into th' ambushment near that secretly was laid:
So to the Trojans' hands the Grecians were betray'd.

Some danger of ambushments in that thick wood, being seventy miles broad. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 77.

The close ambushment of worst errors.

All the ambushments of false promises, and ensnaring allurements, are against the law of these arms.

AMBU'ST. adj. [ambustus, Lat.] Burnt; scalded. Dict.

AMBU'STION. † n. s. [Lat. ambustio.] A burn, or scald. This word is produced by Dr. Johnson without any reference, but it occurs in our old vocabularies.

A M E

Dict. Cook.

A'MEL. † n. s. [Low Lat. amaylare. Fr. emailler, email. Dan. amelerey, to enamel.] The matter with which the variegated works are overlaid, which we call enamelled.

The materials of glass melted with calcined tin, compose an undiaphanous body. This white amel is the basis of all those fine concretes that goldsmiths and artificers employ in the curious art of enamelling. Boyle, on Colours.

To AMELIORATE. * v. a. [Fr. ameliorer.] To improve.

His humanity must exult at the probability of their lot being so much ameliorated. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, Let. 36.

AMELIORATION. * n. s. [Fr. amelioration.] Improvement.

The class of proprietors contributes to the annual produce by the expence which they may occasionally lay out upon the improvement of the land, upon the buildings, drains, enclosures, and other ameliorations; which they may either make or maintain upon it. A. Smith, Wealth of Nat. iv. 9.

The October politician is so full of charity and good nature, that he supposes, that these very robbers and murderers themselves are in a course of amelioration; on what ground I cannot conceive, except on the long practice of the crime, and by its complete success. Burke, Regicide Peace.

A'MELLED. * part. adj. [Low. Lat. "Item calicem meum meliorem deauratum et amelatum in pede cune ymaginibus de Passione." Will of Bp. Wykeham, 1443.] Enamelled.

So doth his [the jeweller's] hand encase in ammell'd gold. G. Chapman on B. Jonson's Sejanus.

AMEN. adv. [A word of which the original has given rise to many conjectures. Scaliger writes, that it is Arabick; and the Rabbies make it the compound of the initials of three words, signifying the Lord is a faithful king; but the word seems merely Hebrew, amen, which, with a long train of derivatives, signifies firmness, certainty, fidelity.] A term used in devotions, by which, at the end of a prayer, we mean, so be it, at the end of a creed, so it is.

One cried, God bless us! and, Amen! the other, As they had seen me with these hangman's hands.

Listening their fear, I could not say Amen,
When they did say God bless us. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting and to everlasting. Amen and Amen. Psal. xli. 13.

AMEN. * n. s.

These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God. Revel. iii. 14.

AMENABLE. adj. [amcsnable, Fr. amener quelqu'un, in the French courts, signifies, to oblige one to appear to answer a charge exhibited against him.] Responsible; subject so as to be liable to enquiries or accounts.

Again, because the inferior sort were loose and poor, and not amenable to the law, he provided, by another act, that five of the best and eldest persons of every sept, should bring in all the idle persons of their surname, to be justified by the law.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

To A'MENAGE. * v. a. [Old Fr. amengr, amaigner, i. e. amener, conduire, from minare. V. Roquefort, Gloss. Lang. Rom. Or from maignée, whence ménage, emmenager, &c.] To direct or manage by force. Dr. Johnson has placed this word as a substantive synonymous with amendence; but he has give no example of such word, nor do I know of any. To the existence of the verb he appears to have been a stranger.

With her, [Occasion,] whose will raging faror tame,
Must first begin and well her aménage. Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. xi.

A'MENANCE. † n. s. [Probably from the Lat. apænuſ.]

Conduct; behaviour; mien; a word diſused.

For he is fit to use in all ſayſs,

Whether for arms and warlike amenance,

Or elſe for wiſe and civil governance.

Spencer.

Well kēd him ſo far ſpace,

Th' enchanter, by his arms and amenance,

Whe'r under him he ſaw his Lybian ſteed to prance.

Spencer, F. Q.

To AME'ND. † v. a. [amēder, Fr. emendo, Lat.]

1. To correct; to change any thing that is wrong to ſomething better; to chaſtiſe.

I ſchal amēde him, and delyvere him.

Wicliffe, S. Luke, xxiii. 16.

Look, what is done cannot be now amēded.

Shakſpeare, K. Richard III., iv. 4.

If any thing had been done or attempted againſt them, it ſhould be redreſſed and amēded.

Lowth, Liſt of Wykeham.

2. To reform the life, or leave wickedneſs. In theſe two caſes we uſually write mēd. See MEND.

Amēd your ways and your doings, and I will cauſe you to dwell in this place.

Jerem. vii. 3.

3. To reſtore paſſages in writers which the copiers are ſuppoſed to have depraved; to recover the true reading.

Much more was to be done before Shakſpeare could be reſtored to himſelf; ſuch as amēding the corrupted text, &c.

Warburton, Pref. to Shakſpeare.

To AME'ND. v. n. To grow better. To amēd differs from to improve; to improve ſuppoſes or pōt denies that the thing is well already, but to amēd implies ſomething wrong.

As my fortune either amēds or impairs, I may declare it unto you.

Sidney.

At his touch

Such ſanctity hath heaven given his hand,

They preſently amēd.

Shakſpeare, Macbeth.

AME'NDABLE.* adj. [Fr. amenable.] Reparable.

Sherwood.

AME'NDE. † n. s. [French. Lat. emenda, from emendare.] This word, in French, ſignifies a fine, by which recompence is ſuppoſed to be made for the fault committed. We uſe, in a cognate ſignification, the word amēds.

AME'NDER. † n. s. [from amēd. Old Fr. amēdeur, emendateur.] A corrector, or one that enlargeth any thing.

Barret.

AME'NDEFUL.* adj. [from amēd and full.] Full of improvement.

Far fly ſuch rigour your amēdful hand!

Beaumont and Fl. Bloody Brother, iii. 1.

When your ears are freer to take in

Your moſt amēdful and unmatched fortunes,

I'll make you drown a hundred helpſeſs deaths

In ſea of one life pour'd into your boſom.

Ibid.

AMENDING.* n. s. The act of correcting.

All ingenious concealings or amēdings of what is originally or caſually amiſs. Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 163.

AME'NDMENT. n. s. [amēdment, Fr.]

1. A change from bad for the better.

Before it was preſented on the ſtage, ſome things in it have paſſed your approbation and amēdment.

Dryden.

Man is always mēding and altering his works; but nature obſerves the ſame tenour, becauſe her works are ſo perfect, that there is no place for amēdments; nothing that can be reprehended.

Ray on the Creation.

There are many natural defects in the underſtanding, capable of amēdment, which are overlooked and wholly neglected.

Locke.

2. Reformation of life.

Our Lord and Saviour was of opinion, that they which would not be drawn to amēdment of life, by the teſtimony which Moſes and the prophets have given, concerning the miſeries that follow ſinners after death, were not likely to be perſuaded by other means, although God from the dead ſhould have raiſed them up preachers.

Hooker.

Behold! famine and plague, tribulation and anguiſh, are ſent as ſcourges for amēdment.

2 Eſdras, xvi. 19.

Though a ſerious purpoſe of amēdment, and true acts of contrition, before the habit, may be accepted by God; yet there is no ſure judgement whether this purpoſe be ſerious, or theſe acts true acts of contrition.

Hammond, Practical Catechiſm.

3. Recovery of health.

Your honour's players hearing your amēdment,

Are come to play a pleaſant comedy.

Shakſpeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

AME'NDMENT. [emendatio, Lat.] It ſignifies, in law, the correction of an error committed in a proceſs, and eſpied before or after judgment; and ſometimes after the party's ſeeking advantage by the error.

Blount.

AME'NDS. n. s. [amēde, Fr. from which it ſeems to be accidentally corrupted.] Recompence; compensation; atonement.

If I have too auſterely puniſh'd you,

Your compensation makes amēnds.

Shakſpeare.

Of the amēnds recovered, little or nothing returns to thoſe that had ſuffered the wrong, but commonly all runs into the prince's coffers.

Raleigh, Essays.

There I a priſ'ner chain'd, ſcarce freely draw

The air impriſon'd alſo, cloſe and damp,

Unwholeſome draught; but here I feel amēnds,

The breath of heav'n, freſh blowing, pure and ſweet,

With day-ſpring born; here leave me to reſpire.

Milton.

Some little hopes I have yet remaining, that I may make the world ſome part of amēnds for many ill plays, by an heroic poem.

Dryden.

If our ſouls be immortal, this makes abundant amēnds and compensation for the frailties of life, and ſufferings of this ſtate.

Tillotſon.

It is a ſtrong argument for retribution hereafter, that virtuous perſons are very often unfortunate, and vicious perſons proſperous; which is repugnant to the nature of a Being, who appears infinitely wiſe and good in all his works; unleſs we may ſuppoſe that ſuch a promiſcuous diſtribution, which was neceſſary for carrying on the deſigns of providence in this life, will be rectified and made amēnds for in another.

Spectator.

AME'NITY. † n. s. [amenité, Fr. amēnitas, Lat.] Pleaſantneſs; agreeableneſs of ſituation. Defined alſo, in our old dictionaries, delectableneſs. We had formerly the adjective amēnious, in the ſenſe of pleaſant; as amēne has been and is ſtill uſed by the Scotch in the ſame ſignification. Amenity is now alſo applied to manners or behaviour.

If the ſituation of Babylon was ſuch at firſt, as in the days of Herodotus, it was a ſeat of amēnity and pleaſure.

Brown.

AMENACEOUS. adj. [amentatus, Lat.] Hanging as by a thread.

The pine tree hath amentaceous flowers or katkins.

Miller.

AME'NTY.* n. s. [old Fr. amence, amentie, dementia.] Madneſs.

Dict.

To AMER'CE. † v. a. [amercier, Fr. οδοραμν μιν αμερει, ſeems to give the original, Dr. Johnson thinks.]

1. To puniſh with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine; to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is uſed by Spenser of puniſhments in general. Its original ſenſe is of great antiquity, "Amercier, condamner quelqu'un à l'amēde," being found in the language of the tenth century, (V. Lacombe,) and is ultimately to be referred to à merci.

In like manner as to fines, care is taken that they ſhall not be exorbitant. Where the party is to be amerced, though he be at misericordia domini regis, yet the amercement must be affirmed by the jury. Bp. Ellys, Tracts on Eng. Liberty, ii. 33.

Where every one that misseth then her make,
Shall be by him amerc'd with penance due. Spenser.

But I'll amerce you with so strong a fine,
That you shall all repent the loss of mine. Shakspeare.

All the sniters were considerably amerced; yet this proved but an ineffectual remedy for those mischiefs. Hale.

2. Sometimes with the particle in before the fine.

They shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel. Deut. xxii. 19.

3. Sometimes it is used, in imitation of the Greek construction, with the particle of.

Millions of spirits, for his fault amerc'd
Of heav'n, and from eternal splendours flung
For his revolt. Milton.

AMERCEABLE. * adj. [from amerce.] Liable to amercement.

If the killing be out of any vill, the hundred is amercable for the escape. Hale, H. P. C. xi. 10.

AMERCER. n. s. [from amerce.] He that sets a fine upon any misdemeanour; he that decrees or inflicts any pecuniary punishment or forfeiture.

AMERCEMENT. † n. s. [from amerce.]

1. The pecuniary punishment of an offender, who stands at the mercy of the king, or other lord in his court. Cowel.

All amercements and fines that shall be imposed upon them, shall come unto themselves. Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. Punishment or loss in general.

Chrysostom, Jerome, and Austin, whom Erasmus and others in their notes on the New Testament have cited, to interpret that cutting off which St. Paul wished to them, who had brought back the Galatians to circumcision, no less than the amercement of their whole virility.

Milton, Treat. of Civ. Power in Ecc. Causes.

AMERCIAMENT. * n. s. The same as amercement in the juridical sense. [Low Lat. amerciamentum.]

We have divers judgments, that in behalf of the king by common bailiffs without special authority, distress may be taken, as for an amerciament in the sheriff's torne or leet, or for parliament-knights' fees. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 16.

King Edw. III. gave to Adam de Orleton, Bishop of Winchester, all amerciaments, forfeitures, &c. which belonged to him de anno, die, et vasto. Ashmole's Berkshire, ii. 426.

AMERICAN. * n. s. [from America.] An aboriginal native of America; an inhabitant of America.

Such of late

Columbus found the American, so girt
With feather'd cincture; naked else, and wild
Among the trees on isles and woody shores.

Milton, P. L. ix. 1116.

The Americans believe that all creatures have souls not only men and women, but brutes, vegetables, nay, even the most inanimate things, as stocks and stones. Addison, Spect. No. 56.

It has been said in the debate, that when the first American revenue act (the act in 1764 imposing the post duties) passed, the Americans did not object to the principle. It is true they touched it but very tenderly. Burke on Conciliation with America.

AMERICAN. * adj. Relating to America. See also the substantive.

We coasted part of the American continent, viz. Guiana, Florida, Virginia, New England.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 393.

AMES ACE. n. s. [a corruption of the word ambs ace, which appears, from very old authorities, to have been early softened by omitting the b.] Two aces on two dice.

But then my study was to cog the dice
And dextrously to throw the lucky six:
To shun ames ace, that swept my stakes away;
And watch the box, for fear they should convey False bones, and put upon me in the play.

Dryden.

A M I

A'MESS, n. s. [corrupted from amice.] A priest's vestment. Dict.

AMETHO'DICAL. adj. [from a and method.] Out of method; without method; irregular.

AMETHODIST. * n. s. [Gr. a without, and metodos, a and methodist. See METHODIST.] A physician who does not practice by theory; a quack.

But what talk I of the wrong and crosse courses of such physicians' practice, since it cannot be lookt for, that these empirical amethodists should understand the order of art, or the art of order. Whitlock's Manners of the Eng. p. 89.

A'METHYST. n. s. [from amethyst, contrary to wine, or contrary to drunkenness; so called, either because it is not quite of the colour of wine, or because it was imagined to prevent inebriation.]

A precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. The oriental amethyst is the hardest, scarcest, and most valuable; it is generally of a dove colour, though some are purple, and others white like the diamond. The German is of a violet colour, and the Spanish are of three sorts; the best are the blackest or deepest violet; others are almost quite white, and some few tintured with yellow. The amethyst is not extremely hard, but easy to be engraved upon, and is next in value to the emerald.

Savary and Chambers.

Some stones approached the granite complexion; and several nearly resembled the amethyst. Woodward.

A'METHYST, [in heraldry] signifies the same colour in a nobleman's coat, that purple does in a gentleman's.

AMETHYSTINE. adj. [from amethyst.] Resembling an amethyst in colour.

A kind of amethystine flint not composed of crystals or grains, but one entire massy stone. Grew.

AMIABLE. † adj. [aimable, Fr.]

1. Lovely; pleasing.

That which is good in the actions of men, doth not only delight as profitable, but as amiable also. Hooker.

She told her, while she kept it,
'Twould make her amiable, subdue my father
Intirely to her love; but if she lost it,
Or made a gift of it, my father's eye
Should hold her loathed. Shakspeare, Othello.

2. Pretending love; shewing love.

Lay amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife; use your art of wooing. Shakspeare.

3. Pleasant; elegant to the eye, as our old lexicographers define it.

Every part of the house affords so amiable a prospect, as makes the eye and smell contend which shall surfeit soonest of variety. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 185.

4. Friendly.

They assured him of all amiable usage.

Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. p. 21.

AMIABLENESS. † n. s. [from amiable.] The quality of being amiable; loveliness; power of raising love.

Amiability is the object of love. Burton, Anal. Mel. p. 417.
Did you ever see any man flattered and gratified out of his sins by the increase and amiableness of his temptations?

Hammond's Serm.

As soon as the natural gaiety and amiableness of the young man wears off, they have nothing left to commend them, but lie by among the lumber and refuse of the species. Addison.

AMIAILITY. * n. s. See AMABILITY.

AMIABLY. † adv. [from amiable.]

1. In an amiable manner; in such a manner as to excite love.

In the history of Legion, the parable of the ungrateful and cruel husbandman, and the narrative of the glorious transfiguration, and in all the other parallel discourses and parables, they are amiably perspicuous, vigorous, and bright.

Blackwall, Sac. Class. i. 380.

2. Pleasingly.

The palaces rise so amiably, and the mosques and humums with their cerulean tiles and gilded vases.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 129.

AMICABLE. adj. [amicabilis, Lat.] Friendly; kind. It is commonly used of more than one; as, they live in an amicable manner; but we seldom say, an amicable action, or an amicable man, though it be so used in this passage.

O grace serene! oh virtue heav'nly fair,
Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
Fresh blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky!
And faith, our early immortality!

Enter each mild, each amicable guest;
Receive and wrap me in eternal rest.

Pope.

AMICABLENESS. n. s. [from amicable.] The quality of being amicable; friendliness; goodwill.

AMICABLY. adv. [from amicable.] In an amicable manner; in a friendly way; with goodwill and concord.

They see

Through the dun mist, in blooming beauty fresh,
Two lovely youths, that amicably walk
O'er verdant meads, and pleas'd, perhaps, revolv'd
Anna's late conquests.

Philips.

I found my subjects amicably join,
To lessen their defects, by citing mine.

Prior.

In Holland itself, where it is pretended that the variety of sects live so amicably together, it is notorious how a turbulent party, joining with the Arminians, did attempt to destroy the republic.

Swift on the Sentiments of a Church of Englandman.

AMICE. n. s. [amictus, Lat. amict, Fr. "Primum ex sex indumentis episcopo & presbyteriis communibus sunt, amictus, alba, cingulum, stola, manipulus, & planeta." Du Cange. "Amictus quo collum stringitur, & pectus tegitur, castitatem interioris hominis designat; tegit enim cor, ne vanitates cogitet, stringit autem collum, ne inde ad linguam transeat mendacium." Bruno.] The first or undermost part of a priest's habit, over which he wears the alb.

Thus pass'd the night so foul, till morning fair
Came forth with pilgrim steps in amice grey.

Milton.

On some a priest, succinct in amice white,
Attends.

Pope.

AMID. prep. [Anciently amiddes. Sax. on-middan, AMIDST. } on-midder, in medio.]

1. In the midst; equally distant from either extremity.

Of the fruit

Of each tree in the garden we may eat;
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst
The garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat.

Milton.

The two ports, the bagnio, and Donatelli's statue of the great duke, amidst the four slaves, chained to his pedestal, are very noble sights.

Addison.

2. Mingled with; surrounded by; in the ambit of another thing.

Amid my flock with woe my voice I tear,
And, but bewitch'd, who to his flock would moan?
So hills amid the air encounter'd hills,
Hurl'd to and fro, with jaculation dire.

Milton.

What have I done, to name that wealthy swain,
The boar amidst my crystal streams I bring;
And southern winds to blast my flow'ry spring.

Dryden.

Amata's breast the fury thus invades,
And fires with rage amid the sylvan shades.

Dryden.

3. Amongst; conjoined with.

What tho' no real voice nor sound
Amid the radiant orbs be found?

In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing, as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine."

Addison.

AMISS. adv. [from a, which, in this form of composition, often signifies according to, and miss, the English particle, which shews any thing, like the Greek ωπα, to be wrong; as, to miscount, to count erroneously; to misdo, to commit a crime: amiss therefore signifies not right, or out of order.]

1. Faulty; criminal.

For that which thou hast sworn to do amiss,
Is yet amiss when it is truly done.

Shakspeare, K. John.

2. Faultily; criminally.

We hope therefore to reform ourselves, if at any time we have done amiss, is not to sever ourselves from the church we were of before.

Hooker.

O ye powers that search
The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
If I have done amiss, impute it not.

Addison.

3. In an ill sense.

She sigh'd withal, they constru'd all amiss,
And thought she wish'd to kill who long'd to kiss.

Fairfax.

4. Wrong; improper; unfit.

Examples have not generally the force of laws, which all men ought to keep, but of counsels only and persuasions, not amiss to be followed by them, whose case is the like.

Hooker.

Methinks, though a man had all science, and all principles, yet it might not be amiss to have some conscience.

Tillotson.

5. Wrong; not according to the perfection of the thing, whatever it be.

Your kindred is not much amiss, 'tis true;
Yet I am somewhat better born than you.

Dryden.

I built a wall, and when the masons plaid the knaves, nothing delighted me so much as to stand by, while my servants threw down what was amiss.

Swift.

6. Reproachful; irreverent.

Every people, nation and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dung-hill; because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort.

Daniel, iii. 29.

7. Impaired in health; as, I was somewhat amiss yesterday, but am well to-day.

Amis is marked as an adverb, though it cannot always be adverbially rendered; because it always follows the substantive to which it relates, contrary to the nature of adjectives in English; and though we say the action was amiss, we never say an amiss action. But Mr. Mason has given an instance from Fairfax, where amiss is an adjective, and must in construction be put before the substantive; otherwise, the sense of the passage, amiss being considered as an adverb, would be just reversed.

Thou well of life, whose streams were purple blood,

That flow'd here to cleanse the soul amiss
Of sinful man.

Fairfax's Tasso, iii. 8.

AMISS.* n. s. Culpability; fault.

To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
Each toy seems prologue to some great amiss.

Shakspeare, Hamlet, iv. 3.

Pale be my looks, to witness my amiss.

Lily's Woman in the Moon.

AMISSIION.† n. s. [amissio, Lat.] Loss.

To any members of the Church, the removing of the candlestick from them, may be their amission of their church-membership.

More, Seven Churches, ch. 3.

TO AMIT. v. a. [amitto, Lat.] To lose: a word little in use.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffuſion, and amitteth not its eſſence, but condition of fluidity. Brown, Vulg. Err.

AMITY. n. s. [amitie, Fr. amicitia, Lat.] Friendſhip, whether publick between nations, oppoſed to war, or among the people, oppoſed to discord, or between private perſons.

The prophet David did think, that the very meeting of men together, and their accompanying one another to the houſe of God, ſhould make the bond of their love inſoluble, and tie them in a league of inviolable amity. Hooker.

The monarchy of Great Britain was in league and amity with all the world. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

You have a noble and a true conceit Of godlike amity; which appears moſt ſtrongly In bearing thus the abſence of your lord. Shakſpeare.

And ye, oh Tyrians, with immortal hate Pursue this race, this ſervice dedicate To my deplored aſhes; let there be 'Twixt us and them no league nor amity. Denham.

AMMIRAL.* n. s. See ADMIRAL.

AMMONIAC. n. s. The name of a drug.

GUM AMMONIAC is brought from the Eaſt Indies, and is ſuppoſed to ooze from an umbelliferous plant. Dioscorides ſays, it is the juice of a kind of ferula growing in Barbary, and the plant is called agasyllis. Pliny calls the tree metopion, which, he ſays, grows near the temple of Jupiter Ammon, whence the gum takes its name. It ought to be in dry drops, white within, yellowiſh without, eaſily fuſible, reſinous, ſomewhat bitter, and of a very ſharp taſte and ſmell, ſomewhat like garlick. This gum is ſaid to have ſerved the ancients for incenſe, in their ſacrifices.

Savary, Trevoux.

SAL AMMONIAC is a volatile ſalt of two kinds, ancient and modern. The ancient ſort, deſcribed by Pliny and Dioscorides, was a native ſalt, generated in thoſe large inns where the crouds of pilgrims, coming from the temple of Jupiter Ammon, uſed to lodge; who, travelling upon camels, and thoſe creatures in Cyrene, where that celebrated temple ſtood, urining in the ſtables, or in the parched ſands, out of this urine, which is remarkably ſtrong, aroſe a kind of ſalt, denominated ſometimes from the temple, Ammoniac, and ſometimes from the country, Cyreniac. No more of this ſalt is produced there; and, from this deficiency, ſome ſuſpect there never was any ſuch thing: but this ſuſpicion is removed, by the large quantities of a ſalt, nearly of the ſame nature, thrown out by mount Ætna.

The modern sal ammoniac is made in Egypt; where long-necked glaſs bottles, filled with ſoot, a little ſea ſalt, and the urine of cattle, and having their mouths luted with a piece of wet cotton, are placed over an oven or furnace, in a thick bed of aſhes, nothing but the necks appearing, and kept there two days and a night, with a continual ſtrong fire. The ſteam ſwells up the cotton, and forms a paſte at the vent-hole, hindering the ſalts from evaporating; which ſtick to the top of the bottle, and are taken out in thoſe large cakes, which they ſend to England. Only ſoot exhale'd from dung, is the proper ingredient in this preparation; and the dung of camels affords the ſtrongest.

Our chymiſts imitate the Egyptian sal ammoniac, by adding one part of common ſalt to five of urine; with which ſome mix that quantity of ſoot, and putting the whole in a veſſel they raiſe from it, by ſublimation, a white, friable, farinaceous ſubſtance, which they call sal ammoniac. Chambers.

AMMONIACAL. adj. [from ammoniac.] Having the properties of ammoniac ſalt.

Human blood calcin'd, yields no fixed ſalt; nor is it a ſal ammoniac; for that remains immutable after repeated diſtillations; and diſtillation deſtroys the ammoniacal quality of animal ſalts, and turns them alkaliſine: ſo that it is a ſalt neither quite fixed, nor quite volatile, nor quite acid, nor quite alkaliſine, nor quite ammoniacal; but ſoft and benign, approaching neareſt to the nature of ſal ammoniac. Arbuthnot.

AMMUNITION. n. s. [ſuppoſed by ſome to com- from amonitio, which, in the barbarous ages, ſeems to have ſignified ſupply of proviſion; but it, ſurely, may be more reaſonably derived from munitio, fortiſication, choſes à munitions; things for the fortreſſes.] Military ſtores.

They muſt make themſelves defenſible againſt ſtrangers; and muſt have the aſſiſtance of ſome able military man, and convenient arms and ammunition for their defence. Baron.

The colonel ſtaid to put in the ammunition he brought with him; which was only twelve barrels of powder, and twelve hundred weight of match. Clarendon.

All the rich mines of learning ranſack't are, To furniſh ammunition for this war. Denham.

But now his ſtores of ammunition ſpent, His naked valour is his only guard:

Rag'd thunders are from his dumb cannon ſent, And ſolitary guns are ſcarcely heard. Dryden.

AMMUNITION BREAD. n. s. Bread for the ſupply of the armies or garrisons.

AMNESTY. † n. s. [ἀμνηστία.] An act of oblivion; an act by which crimes againſt the government, to a certain time, are ſo obliterated, that they can never be brought into charge.

Abraham to procure an everlaſting amneſty, and utter ceſſation thenceforth of all debate between himſelf and his nephew Lot and their ſervants, made uſe of this one argument, as the moſt prevalent of all other for that end, that they were brethren. Bp. Sanderson's Sermons, p. 472.

I never read of a law enacted to take away the force of all laws, by which a man may ſafely commit upon the laſt of June, what he would infallibly be hang'd for, if he committed it on the firſt of July; by which the greateſt criminals may eſcape, provided they continue long enough in power, to antiquate their crimes, and, by ſtifling them a while, deceive the legiſlature into an amneſty. Swift.

AMNICOLIST. n. s. [amnicola, Lat.] Inhabiting near a river. Dict.

AMNIGENOUS. n. s. [amnigenus, Lat.] Born of a river. Dict.

AMNION. † } n. s. [Lat. perhaps from ἀμνιον, Dr. AMNIO. } Johnson ſays; but ſurely it is directly from ἀμνιον, membrana foetum involvens.]

The innermoſt membrane with which the foetus in the womb is moſt immediately covered, and with which the reſt of the ſecundines, the chorion, and alantois, are ejected after birth. It is whiter and thinner than the chorion. It alſo contains a nutritious humour, ſeparated by glands for that purpoſe, with which the foetus is preſerved. It is outwardly cloathed with the urinary membrane, and the chorion, which ſometimes ſtick ſo cloſe to one another, that they can ſcarce be ſeparated. It has alſo its veſſels from the ſame origin as the chorion. Quincy.

AMOMUM. † n. s. [Lat.] A ſort of fruit.

The commentators on Pliny and Dioscorides differ about the ancient amomum; but the gene-reality of them suppose it to be a fruit different from ours. The modern amomum appears to be the sison of the ancients, or bastard stone parsley. It resembles the muscat grape, grows in clusters, and is about the thickness of a pea. This fruit is brought from the East Indies, and makes part of the composition of treacle. It is of a hot spicy taste and smell. Trevoux. Chambers.

Who not by corn or herbs his life sustains,
But the sweet essence of amomum drains.

Dryden, Transl. of Ovid.

AMONG.† } prep. [amanz, zemanz, Sax. Mr.
AMONGST. } Horne Tooke considers this word as the preterperfect zemanz, zemonz, zemunz, or amang, among, amung, of the verb mænzan, mangan, miscere, used as a participle without the termination on, ad, or ed, and meaning purely mixed. Wachter derives the German mengen, to mix, from maengd, a multitude; among, therefore, according to this etymology, means also mixed, or in the crowd. It is written sometimes, in our old language, amonges, and is used adverbially by Gower.

AMONG.* adv. See AMONG, prep.

For ever when I thinke amonge,
How all is on my selfe alonge,
I saie, O foole of all fooles,
Thou farest as he betwene two stoles
That wolde sit, and goth to ground. Gower, Conf. Am. B. iv.
And tho she toke hir childe in honde,
And yafe it souke; and ever amonge
She wepte, and otherwhile songe
To rocke with hir childe aslepe. Gower, Conf. Am. B. i.

1. Mingled with; placed with other persons or things on every side.

Amongst strawberries sow here and there some borage-seed;
and you shall find the strawberries under those leaves far more large than their fellows. Bacon.

The voice of God they heard,
Now walking in the garden, by soft winds
Brought to their ears, while day declin'd: they heard,
And from his presence hid themselves, among
The thickest trees, both man and wife. Milton.

2. Conjoined with others, so as to make part of the number.

I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem. Dryden.

There were, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design. Addison.

A'MORET.* n. s. [Ital. amoretto; and so the word is written in our own elder language.] A lover; a person enamoured.

The amoretto was wont to take his stand at one place—where sat his mistress. Gayton's Notes on D. Quix. p. 47.

When amoretts no more can shine,
And Stella owns she's not divine.

Dr. J. Warton's Poems, p. 108.

AMORETTE.* } n. s. [Fr. amourette.]
AMOURETTE. }

1. An amorous woman.

And eke as well by [he] amorettes
In mourning black, as bright burnettes.

Chaucer, Rom. of the R. 4755.

2. Love-knots, or flower; and, according to Mr. Chalmers, the heads of quaking grass called shalters.

For not iclad in silke was he,
But all in flouris and flourettes,
I paintid all with amorettes.

Ib. Rom. of the R. 892.

3. Petty amours. [Cotgrave, amourettes, love-tricks, dalliances.]

Three amours I have had in my life-time; as for amourettes, they are not worth mentioning. Walsh's Letters.

AMORIST.† n. s. [from amour.] An innamorato; a gallant; a man professing love. It seems to have been formerly used as a word of contempt.

I am afraid some man will take me for an amourist.

Stafford's Niobe, P. 2. p. 123.

Aristotle in his Ethicks, and Tully in his Tusculan questions, distinguish betwixt leeris, the lover, and ignavis, the amorist; as we distinguish betwixt ebrius, one that is drunke, and ebriosus, a drunkard. Because that a lover is one, that is indeed false in love; but an amorist is one, that is inclined to this folly, either by his natural constitution and temper of body, or else by reason of his education, discipline, custome, or the like. Ferrand's Love Melancholy, p. 139.

I, that ev'n now lisp'd like an amorist,
Am turn'd into a snaphaunce satyrist. Marston's Satyres, p. 38.
The pen of some vulgar amorist.

Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. B. 2.

Female beauties are as fickle in their faces as their minds; though casualties should spare them, age brings in a necessity of decay; leaving doters upon red and white, perplexed by uncertainty both of the continuance of their mistress's kindness, and her beauty, both which are necessary to the amorist's joys and quiet. Boyle.

AMORNINGS.* adv. In the mornings.

Thou and I

Will live so finely in the country, Jaques,
And have such pleasant walks into the woods
Amornings. Beaumont and Fl. Noble Gentleman, ii. i.

AMOROSA.* n. s. [Ital.] A wanton.

I took them for amorosas, and violators of the bounds of modesty. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 191.

AMOROSO.† n. s. [Ital.] A man enamoured.

This slut recites the dream false, and in her own person, when it was her amoroso's. Gayton's Notes on D. Quix. 3. 2.

A'MOROUS. adj. [amoroso, Ital.]

1. In love; enamoured; with the particle of before the thing loved; in Shakspeare, on.

Sure my brother is amorous on Hero; and hath withdrawn her father to break with him about it. Shakspeare.

The am'rous master own'd her potent eyes,
Sigh'd when he look'd and trembl'd as he drew;

Each flowing line confirm'd his first surprize,
And as the piece advanc'd, the passion grew. Prior.

2. Naturally inclin'd to love; disposed to fondness; fond.

Apes, as soon as they have brought forth their young, keep their eyes fastened on them, and are never weary of admiring their beauty: so amorous is nature of what she ever produces. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

3. Relating, or belonging to love.

I that am not shap'd for sportive tricks,
Nor made to court an am'rous looking-glass,
I, that am rudely stamp'd.

And, into all things from her air inspir'd
The spirit of love, and amorous delight. Milton.

In the amorous net
First caught they lik'd; and each his liking chose. Milton.

O! how I long my careless limbs to lay
Under the plantane's shade, and all the day

With am'rous airs my fancy entertain,
Invoke the muses, and improve my vein! Waller.

A'MOROUSLY.† adv. [from amorous.] Fondly; lovingly.

When thou wilt swim in that live-bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,

Gladder to catch thee, than thou him. Donne, Poems, p. 38.
She [the wife of Potiphar] looked upon him [Joseph] amorously, or rather lasciviously. Bp. Patrick on Genesis, 39.

A'MOROUSNESS. n. s. from amorous.] The quality of being amorous; fondness; lovingness; love.

A M O

All Gynecia's actions were interpreted by Basilius, as proceeding from jealousy of his amorousness. Sidney.

Lindamor has wit, and amorousness enough, to make him find it more easy to defend fair ladies, than to defend himself against them. Boyle on Colours.

AMORPHOUS.* adj. [Fr. amorphe, Gr. a and μορφη, without form.] Differing from the usual form; shapeless. A very modern word.

AMORPHY.* n. s. [Gr. μορφη, and the a privative.] Departure from established form. Used contemptuously by Swift.

As mankind is now disposed, he receives much greater advantage by being diverted than instructed: his epidemical diseases being fastidiousity, *amorph*y, and pscitation. Tale of a Tub.

AMORT.* adv. [à la mort, Fr. or from the verb amortir.] In the state of the dead; dejected; depressed; spiritless.

How fares my Kate? what, sweeting, all amort? Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew.

AMORTIZA'TION. } n. s. [amortissement, amortissable, AMORTIZEMENT. } Fr.] The right or act of transferring lands to mortmain; that is, to some community that never is to cease.

Every one of the religious orders was confirmed by one pope or other; and they made an especial provision for them, after the laws of amortization were devised and put in use by princes. Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Canonici.

To AMORTIZE.* v. a. [amortir, Fr.] To alien lands or tenements to any corporation, guild or fraternity, and their successors; which cannot be done without licence of the king, and the lord of the manour. Blount.

This did concern the kingdom to have farms sufficient to maintain an able body out of penury, and to amortize part of the lands unto the yeomanry, or middle part of the people. Bacon.

Anciently amortize was used for destroy or kill.

The good werkes that men dow while they ben in good lif, ben all amortised by sin following. Chaucer, Pars. Tale, ed. Tyrwhitt.

AMO'TION.* n. s. [Lat. amotio.] Removal.

The cause of his amotion is twice mentioned by the Oxford antiquary. T. Warton's Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 251.

AMO'VAL.* n. s. [from amove.] Total removal.

The amoval of these insufferable nuisances would infinitely clarify the air. Evelyn, 2. 4. 15.

To AMOVE.* v. a. [amoveo, Lat.]

1. To remove from a post or station: a juridical sense. As coroners may be elected by writ, so they may be amoved for reasonable cause, and new ones chosen in their room by writ. Hale, M. P. C. ii. 3.

2. To remove; to move; to alter: a sense now out of use. Fr. enmouvoir.

Therewith, amoved from his sober mood,
And lives he yet, said he, that wrought this act?
And do the heavens afford him vital food? Spenser, F. Q.
At her so piteous cry was much amoved
Her champion stout. Spenser, F. Q.

To AMO'UNT.* v. n. [monter, Fr.]

1. To rise to in the accumulative quantity; to compose in the whole; with the particle to. It is used of several sums in quantities added together.

Let us compute a little more particularly how much this will amount to, or how many oceans of water would be necessary to compose this great ocean rowling in the air, without bounds or banks. Burnet's Theory.

2. It is used, figuratively, of the consequence rising from any thing taken altogether.

A M P

The errors of young men are the ruin of business; but the errors of aged men amount but to this, that more might have been done, or sooner. Bacon.

Judgments that are made on the wrong side of the danger, amount to no more than an affectation of skill, without either credit or effect. L'Estrange.

3. To mount upwards. Obsolete. [Old Fr. amonter, amounter, arrive à un but très-élevé. Roquefort, Gloss. Lang. Rom. Amont, above, upwards. Kelham's Norm. Dict.]

When the larke doth fyrst amounte on high, and welcometh the morning shyne with her chearefull song. Persham's Garden of Eshquence, sign. g. i. b.

AMO'UNT. n. s. [from To amount.] The sum total; the result of several sums or quantities accumulated.

And now, ye lying vanities of life,
Where are you now, and what is your amount?
Vexation, disappointment, and remorse. Thomson.

AMO'UR. n. s. [amour, Fr. amor, Lat.] An affair of gallantry; an intrigue: generally used of vicious love. The ou sounds like oo in poor.

No man is of so general and diffusive a lust, as to prosecute his amours all the world over; and let it burn never so outrageously, yet the impure flame will either die of itself, or consume the botly that harbours it. South.

The restless youth search'd all the world around;
But how can Jove in his amours be found. Addison.

AM'PER. n. s. [amppe, Sax.] A tumour, with inflammation; bile: a word said, by Skinner, to be much in use in Essex; but, perhaps, not found in books.

AMPHIBIOUS.* adj. [αμφι and βίω. Mentioned by Heylin in 1656, as an unusual word.]

1. That which partakes of two natures, so as to live in two elements; as, in air and water.

A creature of amphibious nature,
On land a beast, a fish in water. Hudibras.

Those are called amphibious, which live freely in the air, upon the earth, and yet are observed to live long upon water, as if they were natural inhabitants of that element; though it be worth the examination to know, whether any of those creatures that live at ease, and by choice, a good while, or at any time upon the earth, can live, a long time together, perfectly under water. Locke.

Fishes contain much oil, and amphibious animals participate somewhat of the nature of fishes, and are oily. Arbutnot.

2. Of a mix'd nature, in allusion to animals that live in air and water.

Trailus of amphibious breed,
Motley fruit of mungrel seed;
By the dam from lordlings sprung,
By the sire exhal'd from dung. Swift.

AMPHI'BIOUSNESS. n. s. [from amphibious.] The quality of being able to live in different elements.

AMPHI'BIUM.* n. s. [Lat. amphibiun, Fr. amphibie.] That which lives as well on water as on land.

Sixty years is usually the age of this detested amphibium [the crocodile], whether it be beast, fish, or serpent.

Sir T. Herbert, Trauch, p. 364.
Of the epicene gender, hees and shees,
Amphibion Archy is the chief.

B. Jonson, Masques, Nept. Triumph.

AMPHIBOLO'GICAL.* adj. [Fr. amphibologique.] Doubtful. This adjective is introduced by Johnson without any reference; but it is found in the old vocabulary of Cockeram.

A fourth insinuates, ingratiates himself with an amphibological speech. Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 611.

AMPHIBOLO'GICALLY. adv. [from amphibological.] Doubtfully; with a doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOLOGY.† n. s. [ἀμφιβολία, Fr. amphibologie.] Discourse of uncertain meaning. It is distinguished from equivocation, which means the double signification of a single word; as, noli regem occidere timere bonum est, is amphibology; captare lepores, meaning by lepores, either hares or jests, is equivocation. The word is of very ancient authority in our language.

For goddis speke in amphibologies,
And for one sothe they tellin twenty lies.

Chaucer, Tr. and Cress. iv. 1406.

Now the fallacies whereby men deceive others, and are deceived themselves, the ancients have divided into verbal and real; of the verbal, and such as conclude from mistakes of the word, there are but two worthy our notation; the fallacy of equivocation and amphibology. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He that affirm'd 'gainst sense, snow black to be,
Might prove it by this amphibology;

Things are not what they seem. Verses on Cleaveland.

In defining obvious appearances, we are to use what is most plain and easy; that the mind be not misled by amphibologies, into fallacious deductions. Glanville.

AMPHIBOLOUS. adj. [ἀμφι and βίλλω.] Tossed from one to another; striking each way.

Never was there such an amphibolous quarrel, both parties declaring themselves for the king, and making use of his name in all their remonstrances to justify their actions. Howell.

AMPHIBOLY.* n. s. [Gr. ἀμφι and βίλλω, Fr. amphibolie.] Discourse of various meaning.

Come, leave your schemes,

And fine amphibolies. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady, ii. 5.

If it oracle contrary to our interest or humour, we will create an amphiboly, a double meaning where there is none.

Whitlock, Manners of the Eng. p. 254.

Making difference of the quality of the offence may (say they) give just ground to the accused party either to conceal the truth, or to answer with such amphibolies and equivocations as may serve to his own preservation. Bp. Hall, Cases of Cons.

AMPHIBOLY. n. s. [ἀμφι and λόγος.] Equivocation; ambiguity. Dict.

AMPHISBÆNA. n. s. [Lat. ἀμφισβήν.] A serpent supposed to have two heads, and by consequence to move with either end foremost.

That the amphisbæna, that is, a smaller kind of serpent, which moveth forward and backward, hath two heads, or one at either extreme, was affirmed by Nicander, and others.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbæna diro.

Milton.

AMPHISCIE. n. s. [Lat. ἀμφίσκιοι, of ἀμφι and σκια, a shadow.] Those people dwelling in climates, wherein the shadows, at different times of the year, fall both ways; to the north pole, when the sun is in the southern signs, and to the south pole when he is in the northern signs. These are the people who inhabit the torrid zone.

AMPHITHEATRE. n. s. [of ἀμφιθέατρον, from ἀμφι and θεαομαι.] A building in a circular or oval form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats one above another; where spectators might behold spectacles, as stage plays, or gladiators. The theatres of the ancients were built in the form of a semicircle, only exceeding a just semicircle by one fourth part of the diameter; and the amphitheatre is two theatres joined together; so that the longest diameter of the amphitheatre, was to the shortest, as one and a half to one.

Within, an amphitheatre appear'd
Rais'd in decrees; to sixty paces rear'd,
That when a man was plac'd in one degree,
Height was allow'd for him above to see.

Dryden.

Conceive a man placed in the burning iron chair at Lyons, amid the insults and mockeries of a crowded amphitheatre, and still keeping his seat; or stretched upon a grate of iron, over coals of fire, and breathing out his soul, among the exquisite sufferings of such a tedious execution, rather than renounce his religion, or blaspheme his Saviour. Addison.

AMPHITHEATRICAL.* adj. Relating to exhibitions in an amphitheatre.

In their amphitheatrical gladiatures, the lives of captives lay at the mercy of the vulgar. Gayton, Notes on D. Quir. iv. 21.

For the judiciary combats, as also for common athletic exercises, they formed an amphitheatrical circus of rude stones.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. i. 1.

AMPLE. adj. [amplus, Lat.]

1. Large; wide; extended.

Heav'n descends

In universal bounty, shedding herbs,

And fruits, and flowers, on Nature's ample lap. Thomson.

2. Great in bulk.

Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief?

She took 'em, and read 'em in my presence,

And now and then an ample tear trill'd down

Her delicate cheeks. Shakspeare, K. L.

3. Unlimited; without restriction.

Have what you ask, your presents I receive;

Land where, and when you please, with ample leave. Dryden.

4. Liberal; large; without parsimony.

If we speak of strict justice, God could no way have been bound to requite man's labours in so large and ample manner as human felicity doth import; in as much as the dignity of this exceedeth so far the other's value. Hooker.

5. Magnificent; splendid.

To dispose the prince the more willingly to undertake his relief, the earl made ample promises, that, within so many days after the siege should be raised, he would advance his highness's levies with two thousand men. Clarendon.

6. Diffusive; not contracted; as, an ample narrative; that is, not an epitome.

AMPLENESS.† n. s. [from ample.] The quality of being ample; largeness; splendour.

Writing against the Gentiles that Christ is true God, among other arguments, he [Chrisostom] useth the ampleness and largeness of Christendom for one.

Stapleton, Fortresse of the Faith, fol. 132. b.

Impossible it is for a person of my condition to produce any thing in proportion either to the ampleness of the body you represent, or of the places you bear. South.

TO AMPLIATE. v. a. [amplio, Lat.] To enlarge; to make greater; to extend.

He shall look upon it, not to traduce or extenuate, but to explain and dilucidate, to add and ampliate. Brown

AMPLIATION. n. s. [from ampliate.]

1. Enlargement; exaggeration; extension.

Odious matters admit not of an ampliation, but ought to be restrained and interpreted in the mildest sense. Ayliffe, Parerg.

2. Diffuseness; enlargement.

The obscurity of the subject, and the prejudice and prepossession of most readers, may plead excuse for any ampliation, or repetitions that may be found, whilst I labour to express myself plain and full. Holder.

TO AMPLIFICATE. v. a. [amplifico, Lat.] To enlarge; to spread out; to amplify. Dict.

AMPLIFICATION.† n. s. [amplification, Fr. amplification, Lat.]

1. Enlargement; extension.

We have been accustomed to receive this amplification of the visible figure of a known object only as the effect or sign of its being brought nearer. Reid's Inquiry.

2. It is usually taken in a rhetorical sense, and implies exaggerated representation or diffuse narrative; an image heightened beyond reality; a narrative enlarged with many circumstances.

I shall summarily, without any amplification at all, shew in what manner defects have been supplied: Davies.

Things unknown seem greater than they are, and are usually received with amplifications above their nature.

Brown, Vulg. Err.
Is the poet justifiable for relating such incredible amplifications? It may be answered; if he had put these extravagances into the mouth of Ulysses, he had been unpardonable; but they quit well with the character of Alcinous. Pope.

AMPLIFIER. v. n. s. [from amplify.]

1. One that enlarges any thing; one that exaggerates; one that represents any thing with a large display of the best circumstances; it being usually taken in a good sense.

Dorillaus could need no amplifier's mouth for the highest point of praise. Sidney.

There are amplifiers, who can extend half a dozen thin thoughts over a whole folio. Pope, Art of Sink in Poetry.

2. An enlarger in point of magnitude or grandeur.

After the mindes of Virgil, Ovid, and such other fabulouse poetes, these two cruel captaynes, Romulus and Remus receyved their fyrst nurryshment of a she-wolfe whom they sucked, in significacyon of the wonderfull tyranny whiche should follow in that great citty Rome, whereof they were the first amplifiers. Bale, Eng. Vol. P. ii. fol. A. iii. b.

TO AMPLIFY. v. a. [amplifier, Fr.]

1. To enlarge; to encrease any material substance, or object of sense.

So when a great moneyed man hath divided his chests, and coins, and bags, he seemeth to himself richer than he was: and therefore a way to amplify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts, and to examine it according to the several circumstances. Bacon.

All concaves that proceed from more narrow to more broad, do amplify the sound at the coming out. Bacon.

2. To enlarge, or extend any thing incorporeal.

As the reputation of the Roman prelates grew up in these blind ages, so grew up in them withal, a desire of amplifying their power, that they might be as great in temporal forces, as men's opinions have formed them in spiritual matters. Raleigh.

To exaggerate any thing; to enlarge it by the manner of representation.

Thy general is my lover; I have been
The book of his good acts; whence men have read
His fame unparallel'd, haply amplified. Shakspeare.

Since I have plainly laid open the negligence and errors of every age that is past, I would not willingly seem to flatter the present, by amplifying the diligence and true judgment of those servitors that have laboured in this vineyard. Davies.

4. To enlarge; to improve by new additions.

In paraphrase the author's words are not strictly followed, his sense too is amplified but not altered, as Waller's translation of Virgil. Dryden.

I feel age advancing, and my health is insufficient to increase and amplify these remarks, to confirm and improve these rules, and to illuminate the several pages. Watts.

TO AMPLIFY. v. n. Frequently with the particle on.

1. To speak largely in many words; to lay one's self out in diffusion.

When you affect to amplify on the former branches of a discourse, you will often lay a necessity upon yourself of contracting the latter, and prevent yourself in the most important part of your design. Watts, Logick.

2. To form large or pompous representations.

An excellent medicine for the stone might be conceived, by amplifying apprehensions able to break a diamond, Brown, Vulg. Err.

I have sometimes been forced to amplify on others; but here where the subject is so fruitful, that the harvest overcomes the reaper, I am shortened by my chain. Dryden.

Homer amplifies, not invents; and as there was really a people called Cyclopes, so they might be men of great stature, or giants. Pope, Odys.

AMPLITUDE. n. s. [amplitude, Fr. amplitude, Lat.]

1. Extent.

Whatever I look upon, within the amplitude of heaven and earth, is evidence of human ignorance. Glanville.

2. Largeness; greatness.

Men should learn how severe a thing the true inquisition of nature is, and accustom themselves, by the light of particulars, to enlarge their minds to the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. Bacon.

3. Capacity: extent of intellectual faculties.

With more than human gifts from heaven adorn'd,
Perfections absolute, graces divine,
And amplitude of mind to greatest deeds. Milton.

4. Splendour; grandeur; dignity.

In the great frame of kingdoms and commonwealths, it is in the power of princes, or estates, to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms. Bacon, Essays.

5. Copiousness; abundance.

You should say every thing which has a proper and direct tendency to this end; always proportioning the amplitude of your matter, and the fulness of your discourse, to your great design; the length of your time, to the convenience of your hearers. Watts, Logick.

6. Amplitude of the range of a projectile, denotes the horizontal line subtending the path in which it moved.

7. Amplitude, in astronomy, an arch of the horizon, intercepted between the true east and west point thereof, and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. It is eastern or ortive, when the star rises, and western or occiduus, when the star sets. The eastern or western amplitude, are also called northern or southern, as they fall in the northern or southern quarters of the horizon.

8. Magnetical amplitude, is an arch of the horizon contained between the sun at his rising, and the east or west point of the compass; or, it is the difference of the rising or setting of the sun, from the east or west parts of the compass. Chambers.

AMPLIFY. adv. [ample, Lat.]

1. Largely; liberally.

For whose well-being,
So amply, and with hands so liberal,
Thou hast provided all things. Milton.

The evidence they had before was enough, amply enough, to convince them; but they were resolved not to be convinced: and to those, who are resolved not to be convinced, all motives, all arguments are equal. Atterbury.

2. At large; without reserve.

At return
Of him so lately promis'd to thy aid,
The woman's seed; obscurely then foretold,
Now amply known, thy Saviour, and thy Lord. Milton.

3. At large; copiously; with a diffusive detail.

Some parts of a poem require to be amply written, and with all the force and elegance of words; others must be cast into shadows; that is, passed over in silence, or but faintly touched. Dryden, Dufrenoy.

TO AMPUTATE. v. n. a. [amputo, Lat.] To cut off a limb: a word used only in chirurgery, Dr. Johnson says. But we had formerly the verb ampute, "to cut off," without any specification. V. Cock-erum, Dict.

Amongst the cruizers, it was complained, that their surgeons were too active in amputating fractured members. Wiseeman, Surgery.

AMPUTA'TION. n. s. [amputatio, Lat.]

The operation of cutting off a limb, or other part of the body. The usual method of performing it, in the instance of a leg, is as follows. The proper part for the operation being four or five inches below the knee, the skin and flesh are first to be drawn very tight upwards, and secured from returning by a ligature two or three fingers broad: above this ligature another loose one is passed, for the gripe; which being twisted by means of a stick, may be straitened to any degree at pleasure. Then the patient being conveniently situated, and the operator placed to the inside of the limb, which is to be held by one assistant above, and another below the part designed for the operation, and the gripe sufficiently twisted, to prevent too large an hæmorrhage, the flesh is, with a stroke or two, to be separated from the bone with the dismembering knife. Then the periostium being also divided from the bone with the back of the knife, saw the bone asunder, with as few strokes as possible. When two parallel bones are concerned, the flesh that grows between them must likewise be separated before the use of the saw. This being done, the gripe may be slackened, to give an opportunity of searching for the large blood vessels, and securing the hæmorrhage at their mouths. After making proper applications to the stump, loosen the first ligature, and pull both the skin and the flesh, as far as conveniently may be, over the stump, to cover it; and secure them with the cross stitch made at the depth of half or three quarters of an inch in the skin. Then apply pledgets, astringents, plaisters, and other necessaries. Chambers.

The Amazons, by the amputation of their right breast, had the freer use of their bow. Brown, Vulg. Err.

AMULET. n. s. [amulette, Fr. amuletum, or apuletum, quod malum amolitur, Lat.] An appended remedy, or preservative; a thing hung about the neck, or any other part of the body, for preventing or curing of some particular diseases.

That spirits are corporeal, seems at first view a conceit derogative unto himself; yet herein he establisheth the doctrine of lustrations, amulets, and charms. Brown, Vulg. Err.

They do not certainly know the falsity of what they report; and their ignorance must serve you as an amulet against the guilt both of deceit and malice. Government of the Tongue.

AMURCO'SITY. n. s. [amurca, Lat.] The quality of lees or mother of any thing. Dict.

To AMUSE. † v. a. [amuser, Fr.]

1. To entertain with tranquillity; to fill with thoughts that engage the mind, without distracting it. To divert implies something more lively, and to please, something more important. It is therefore frequently taken in a sense bordering on contempt, Dr. Johnson says. But it is certainly used by our elder writers in the sense also of divert.

Those give themselves over to gormandisings and drunkenness, building up shadows, amusing themselves with no other things but pleasures and belly-cheer.

Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633) p. 96.

Such a religion as should afford both sad and solemn objects to amuse and affect the pensive part of the soul.

South, Sermon. 7. 1.

They think they see visions, and are arrived to some extraordinary revelations; when, indeed, they do but dream dreams, and amuse themselves with the fantastick ideas of a busy imagination. Decay of Piety.

I cannot think it natural for a man, who is much in love, to amuse himself with trifles. Walsh.

2. To draw on from time to time; to keep in expectation; as, he amused his followers with idle promises. The old sense of this English verb was,

“to put into a muse; to drive into a dump, i. e. a reverie; to hold, stay, or delay by a discourse, question, &c.” See Cotgrave, in AMUSÉ and AMUSER.

We do but tempt the tempter to put eternal fallacies upon us, and to amuse and scare us with one prodigy or other perpetually, as he did the heathens. Spencer on Prodiges, p. 111.

And then for the Pharisees, whom our Saviour represents as the very vilest of men, and the greatest of cheats; we have them amusing the world with pretences of a more refined devotion, while their heart was at that time in their neighbour's coffers.

South, Sermon. ii. 153.

Bishop Henry, on the other side, amused her with dubious answers, and kept her in suspense for some days.

Swift, Character of K. Stephen.

To AMUSE.* v. n. “To muse, or meditate; or, as Cotgrave writes, “to amuse, to think of.”

Or in some pathless wilderness amusing,

Plucking the mossy bark of some old tree. Lee, Jun. Brut.

AMUSEMENT. † n. s. [amusement, Fr.]

1. That which amuses; entertainment.

Every interest or pleasure of life, even the most trifling amusement, is suffered to postpone the one thing necessary.

Rogers.

During his confinement, his amusement was to give poison to dogs and cats, and see them expire by slower or quicker tortments.

Pope.

I was left to stand the battle, while others, who had better talents than a draper, thought it no unpleasant amusement to look on with safety, whilst another was giving them diversion, at the hazard of his liberty.

Swift.

2. Profound meditation.

Here I put my pen into the ink-horn; and fell into a strong and deep amusement, revolving in my mind with great perplexity the amazing change of our affairs.

Fleetwood, Pref. Lay-Baptism.

AMUSER. † n. s. [amuseur, Fr.] He that amuses, as with false promises. The French word is always taken in an ill sense, Dr. Johnson says. Cotgrave defines that word, “an amuser of people; one that holdeth folks at gaze, or putteth them into dumps.”

AMUSINGLY.* adv. In an amusing manner.

AMUSIVE. † adj. [from amuse.] That which has the power of amusing. I know not that this is a current word, Dr. Johnson says: it is certainly a very frequent word in Thomson, who uses it five or six times in his poems.

But amaz'd,

Beholds the amusive arch before him fly,

Then vanish quite away.

Thomson.

AMUSIVELY.* adv. In an amusive manner.

A south easterly wind succeeded, blowing fresh, and murmuring amusively among the pines.

Chandler, Trav. into Greece, p. 12.

AMYGDALATE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Made of almonds.

AMYGDALINE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Relating to almonds; resembling almonds.

AN. † article. [an, Goth. ane, Saxon. cen, Dutch, cinē, German.] The article indefinite, used before a vowel, or h mute. See A.

1. One, but with less emphasis; as, there stands a house.

Since he cannot be always employed in study, reading, and conversation, there will be many an hour, besides what his exercises will take up.

Locke.

2. Any, or some; as, an elephant might swim in this water.

A N A

He was no way at an uncertainty, nor ever in the least at a loss concerning any branch of it. Locke.

A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod,
An honest man's the noblest work of God. Pope.

3. Sometimes it signifies, like a, some particular state; but this is now disused.

It is certain, that odours do, in a small degree, nourish; especially the odour of wine; and we see men an hungred do love to smell hot bread. Bacon.

4. An is sometimes, in old authours, a contraction of and if, Dr. Johnson says; which is a mistake that could not escape the notice of Mr. Tooke and Dr. Jamieson. An is if, and may be thought a contraction of and, which, in our old language, is also if. "Fayn would I do you mirth, and I wist how," says Chaucer's host; that is, "if I knew how." Mr. Tooke derives an in this sense, however, from the Sax. verb annan, to give, of which an is the imperative mood: so that this word means conditionally like the conjunction if, "give, grant, allow."

An thou wer't my father, as thou art but my brother,
My younger brother too, I must be merry.

Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country, i. 1.

He can't flatter, he!

An honest mind and plain, he must speak truth;
An they will take it, so; if not, he's plain. Shakspeare.

5. Sometimes a contraction of and before if, according to Johnson; but it is no contraction, only a common redundancy of an.

Noting this penury, to myself I said

An if a man did need a poison now,

Whose sale's present death in Mantua,

Here lives a caitiff wretch would sell it him.

Shakspeare, Rom. and J. v. 1.

Well I know

The clerk will ne'er wear hair on's face that had it.

— He will an' if he live to be a man.

Shakspeare.

6. Sometimes it is a contraction of as if. This is the concluding remark of Johnson on an; which also is exceptionable. In the example, which he cites from Addison, who however is only reciting the boast of Shakspeare's weaver when transformed into a lion, it is certainly not a contraction of as if; however it may so mean; and can be considered only as a vulgarism; the use of it, as far as I know, being confined to low characters. Mr. Tooke considers Danc Quickly and Weaver Bottom, in Shakspeare, as the only users of the phrase; but it is, with equal propriety, put into the mouth of the contemptible Pandarus.

He will weep you, an' t were a man born in April.

Shakspeare, Tr. and Cr.

I will roar you an' t were any nightingale.

Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dr.

'A made a finer end, and went away an' it had been any christom child.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

An' t come to that once,

The devil pick his bones, that dies a coward.

Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country, i. 1.

My next pretty correspondent, like Shakspeare's lion in Pyramus and Thisbe, roars an' it were any nightingale.

Addison.

ANA. adv. [ana.] A word used in the prescriptions of physick, importing the like quantity; as, wine and honey, a or ana ʒii; that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.

In the same weight prudence and innocence take,

Ana of each does the just mixture make.

Cowley.

He'll bring an apothecary, with a chargeable long bill of anas.

Dryden.

A N A

ANA.† n. s. Books so called from the last syllables of their titles; as, Scaligerana, Thuana; they are loose thoughts, or casual hints, dropped by eminent men, and collected by their friends. This definition, Mr. Mason has observed, is incomplete; the termination ana being added to any connective title of literary scraps.

They were pleased to publish some Tunbrigiana this season; but such ana! I believe there never were so many vile little verses put together before. West to Gray.

ANABA'TISM.* n. s. The doctrine of Anabaptists. See ANABAPTIST.

Anabaptism is an heresy long since condemned both by the Greek and Latin Church. Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 1.

That would be Brownism and Anabaptism indeed.

Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. 1.

ANABA'TIST.* n. s. [The name is derived from the preposition ανα and βαπτίζω, and signifieth a re-baptiser; or at least such an one who alloweth of, and maintaineth, re-baptizing. Featley's Dippers Dipt, p. 23.]

Do you all consider with yourselves, whether you would be willing to have your children, your dearest friends and relations, grow up into rebels, schismatics, presbyterians, independents, anabaptists, quakers, the blessed offspring of the late reforming times. South, Sermon, vi. 83.

ANABA'TISTICAL.* adj. Relating to the notions of Anabaptists.

It was my hap, lighting on a certain parcel of queries, that seek and find not, to find not seeking, at the tail of anabaptistical, antinomian, heretical, atheistical epithets, a jolly slander, called Divorce at Pleasure. Milton, Colasterion.

By equality, that anabaptistical party is not intended, that all men should have power and state alike, so as to lay a level line over all mankind, sinking the mountings and raising the vallies, to make an even champaign. Standard of Equality, p. 1.

ANABA'TISTICK.* adj. Anabaptistical.

The excellent Bucer takes occasion severely to reprove those sour hypocrites of the anabaptistick sect in his time, who would not allow of any freer use of the good creatures of God, and would frown at any mirth in company, though never so innocent. Bp. Bull's Works, ii. 657.

Rodolphus Langius, a canon of Munster, and a tolerable Latin poet, after many struggles with the inveterate prejudices and authoritative threats of German bishops, and German universities, opened a school of humanity at Munster; which supplied his countrymen with every species of elegant learning, till it was overthrown by the fury of fanaticism, and the revolutions introduced by the barbarous reformations of the anabaptistick zealots, in the year 1534.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, ii. 415.

ANABA'TISTRY.* n. s. The sect or doctrine of the Anabaptists.

Thus died this imaginary king; and anabaptistry was suppressed in Munster. Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 9.

TO ANABA'TIZE.* v. a. [Gr. ανα and βαπτίζω.] To re-baptise.

Though some call their profound ignorances, new lights; they were better anabaptised into the appellation of extinguishers. Whitlock, Manners of the Eng. p. 160.

The love of novelty prevailed in several other instances, as in controuling the use and authority of the scripture; defending incestuous marriages, polygamy, divorce; the anabaptizing of infants, &c. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

ANACA'MPTICK. adj. [ανακαμπτω.] Reflecting, or reflected: an anucamptick sound, an echo; an anacamptick hill, a hill that produces an echo.

ANACA'MPTICKS. n. s. The doctrine of reflected light, or catoptricks. It has no singular.

ANACATHARTICK. n. s. See CATHARTICK. Any medicine that works upwards. Quincy.

ANACEPHALÆOSIS. † n. s. [ἀνακεφαλαιώσις.] Recapitulation, or summary of the principal heads of a discourse. Dict.

The old man is beset with a troop of diseases, when he is not able to resist a single one, and therefore must be subject to them all, as hath been said, and is resumed in the following: anacephalæosis. Smith, Old Age, p. 248.

ANA'CHIORETE. † } n. s. [sometimes viciously written anachorite; ἀναχωρητής.]

ANA'CHORITE. } Fr. anachorète. A monk, who, with the leave of his superiour, leaves the convent for a more austere and solitary life.

Yet lies not love dead here, but here doth sit,
Vow'd to this trench, like an anachorite.

Donne's Poems, p. 80.

A company of cynics, such as are monks, hermits, anachorites, that condemn the world, condemn themselves, condemn all titles, honours, offices; and yet in that contempt are more proud than any man living whatsoever.

Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 123.

An Englishman, so madly devout, that he had wilfully mured up himself as an anachoret; the worst of all prisoners.

Hall's Epistles, i. 5.

ANACHORE'TICAL.* adj. [Lat. anachoreticus.] Relating to an anachoret or hermit.

Those severe anachoretical and philosophical persons, who lived meanly as a sheep, and without variety as the Baptist.

Bp. Taylor's Sermons at Golden Grove, Sermon 15.

ANA'CHRONISM. n. s. [from ἀνά and χρόνος.] error in computing time, by which events are misplaced with regard to each other. It seems properly to signify an error by which an event is placed too early; but is generally used for any error in chronology.

This leads me to the defence of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido cotemporaries: for it is certain, that the hero lived almost two hundred years before the building of Carthage.

Dryden.

ANACHRON'ISTICK.* adj. Containing an anachronism.

Among the anachronistic improprieties, which this poem contains, the most conspicuous is the fiction of Hector's sepulchre.

Warton, Hist. E. P. ii. sect. 5.

ANACLA'TICKS. † n. s. [ἀνά and κλάω.] The doctrine of refracted light; dioptricks. It has no singular. The French write the word anaclastique, without denying its singular number.

ANACOENOSIS.* n. s. [Gr. ἀνακοίνωσις.] A figure in rhetoric; by which the speaker applies to his hearers or opponents for their opinion upon the point in debate.

Walker, Rhét. Grammar.

ANACREONTIQUE.* n. s. [Fr.] A little poem in the manner of Anacreon.

To the miscellanies [of Cowley] succeed the anacreontiques, or paraphrastic translations of some little poems, which pass, however justly, under the name of Anacreon.

Johnson, Life of Cowley.

A'NADEME.* n. s. [Gr. ἀνάθημα. Fr. anademe.] Crown of flowers.

In anadems for whom they curiously dispose
The red, the dainty white, the goodly damask rose.

Drayton's Polyolb. s. 15.

The self-lov'd will
Of man or woman should not rule in them,
But each with other wear the anademe.

B. Jonson, Masq. at Court.

At the end of this song, Circe was seen upon the rock, quaintly attired, her hair loose about her shoulders, an anadem of flowers on her head, with a wand in her hand.

W. Brown, Inner Temple Masque.

ANADIPLO'SIS. n. s. [ἀναδιπλωσις.] Reduplication; a figure in rhetoric, in which the last word of a foregoing member of a period becomes the first of the following; as, he retained his virtue amidst all his misfortunes, misfortunes which only his virtue brought upon him.

A'NAGLYPH.* n. s. [Fr. anaglyphe, from Gr. ἀνά and γλυφω.] An ornament effected by sculpture.

ANAGLY'PTICK.* n. s. See ANAGLYPH. What relates to the art of carving, chasing, engraving, or imbossing plate.

They rather concern the statuary art — though we might yet safely, I think, admit some of the Greek anaglypticks.

Erclayi, Sculptura, p. 16.

ANAGOGE'TICAL. adj. [ἀναγωγικός.] That which contributes or relates to spiritual elevation, or religious raptures; mysterious; elevated above humanity.

Dict.

ANAGO'GICAL. † adj. [Gr. and anagogique, Fr.] Mysterious; elevated; religiously exalted. It may be curious to remark that, in one of our old dictionaries, anagogick is defined, "one skillfull in expounding the scriptures."

Cockeram.

Which is an anagogical trope or hygh speakynge of my lorde above his compass.

Bale, Yet a Course at the Romayne Fore, fol. 36.

We cannot apply them [prophecies] to him, but by a mystical anagogical explication.

South, Sermon. viii. 161.

Now call you this devotion, as you please, whether duly, or hyperduly, or indirect, or reductive; or reflected, or anagogical worship, which is bestowed on such images; and puzzle, into idolatry, poor ignorant souls with what words and distinctions you think fittest.

Brevint, South and Samuel at Endor, p. 352.

ANAGO'GICALLY. adv. [from anagogical.] Mysteriously; with religious elevation.

ANAGO'GICKS.* n. s. [Gr. See ANAGOGETICAL.] Mysterious considerations.

The notes upon that constitution say, that the Misna Torah was composed out of the cabalistics and anagogicks of the Jews, or some allegorical interpretations pretended to be derived from Moses.

L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 248.

A'NAGRAM. † n. s. [ἀνά and γράφω.] A conceit arising from the letters of a name transposed; as this, of W, i, l, l, i, a, m, N, o, y, attorney-general to Charles I. a very laborious man, I moyl in law.

Anagram, called "a divination by names, [is] called by the ancients onomantia." The Greeks refer this invention to Lycophron — afterwards there were divers Greek wits that sported themselves herein, as he which turned Atlas, for his heavy burthen in supporting heaven, into Talas, that is, wretched. Some will maintain, that each man's fortune is written in his name, which they call anagramatism, or metagramatism.

Explan. of Hard Words, Acad. of Pleasure, 1638.

Though all her parts be not in th' usual place,

She hath yet the anagrams of a good face:

If we might put the letters but one way,

In that lean dearth of words, what could we say?

Donne's Poems, p. 70.

Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
In keen iambicks, but mild anagram.

Dryden, Mac Flecknoe, v. 204.

ANAGRAMMA'TICAL.* adj. [from anagram.] Forming an anagram.

For whom was devised Pallas's defensive shield, with Gorgon's head thereon, with this anagrammatical word.

Camden, Rem.

Some [places] have continued anagrammatical appellations, from half their own and their wives' names joined together.

Swift, on Barb. Denom. in Ireland.

ANAGRAMMA'TICALLY.* adv. In the manner of an anagram.

Please to cast your eye anagrammatically upon the name of the balsamum; you will find, "Convenient rebus nomina scēpe suis." Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iii. 3.

ANAGRA'MMATISM. † n. s. [Fr. anagrammatisme.] The act or practice of making anagrams.

The only quintessence that hitherto the alchemy of wit could draw out of names, is anagrammatism, or metagrammatism, which is a dissolution of a name truly written into his letters, as his elements, and a new connexion of it by artificial transposition, without addition, subtraction, or change of any letter into different words, making some perfect sense applicable to the person named. Camden.

ANAGRA'MMATIST. † n. s. [from anagram.] A maker of anagrams.

To his lo. fr. Mr. W. Aubrey, an ingenious anagrammatist, late turned minister. Gamage, Epigrams, Ep. 18.

To ANAGRA'MMATIZE. † v. n. [anagrammatiser, Fr.] To make anagrams.

Others suppose that by the word Sophyra, which is Ophyr anagrammatized, mentioned in the 72 interpreters, is intended or meant Soffala or Sophura. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 350.

Others, in Latin, anagrammatize it [the name of Eve] from Eva into Vae; because, they say, she was the cause of our woe! Austin's Hæc Homo, p. 182.

A'NALECTS,* [Fr. analectes, from ἀναλέγω, part. ἀναλεῖν.] In our old dictionaries, crunis which fall from the table. Figuratively, collections or fragments of authors; select pieces.

ANALEPTICK. † adj. [ἀναλεπτικός, Fr. analeptique.] Comforting; corroborating: a term of physick.

Analeptick medicines cherish the nerves, and renew the spirits and strength. Quincy.

ANA'LOGAL. adj. [from analogous.] Analogous; having relation.

When I see many analogal motions in animals, tho' I cannot call them voluntary, yet I see them spontaneous, I have reason to conclude that these in their principle are not simply mechanical. Hale.

ANALO'GICAL. adj. [from analogy.]

1. Used by way of analogy. It seems properly distinguished from analogous, as words from things; analogous signifies having relation, and analogical having the quality of representing relation.

It is looked on only as the image of the true God, and that not as a proper likeness, but by analogical representation.

Stillington.

When a word, which originally signifies any particular idea or object, is attributed to several other objects, not by way of resemblance, but on the account of some evident reference to the original idea, this is peculiarly called an analogical word: so a sound or healthy pulse, a sound digestion, sound sleep, are so called, with reference to a sound and healthy constitution; but if you speak of sound doctrine, or sound speech, this is by way of resemblance to health, and the words are metaphorical.

Watts, Logic.

2. Analogous; having resemblance or relation.

There is placed the minerals between the inanimate and vegetable province, participating something analogical to either.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

ANALO'GICALLY. † adv. [from analogical.] In an analogical manner; in an analogous manner.

[They] may also conceive how the divers measures of the mystical Babylon, or new Rome, may be, mutatis mutandis, analogically deduced from them.

Potter on the Number 666, p. 210.

What we have said of the worship of God, is analogically true of honouring the saints, who are best honoured by the remembrance and imitation of their virtues; not by scraping legs to, or clinging about, their images; which are no more like them, than an apple is to an oyster.

More, Antid. against Idolatry, p. 16.

I am convinced, from the simplicity and uniformity of the Divine Nature, and of all his works, that there is some one universal principle, running through the whole system of creatures analogically, and congruous to their relative natures.

Cheyne.

ANALO'GICALNESS. n. s. [from analogical.] The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy.

ANA'LOGISM. n. s. [ἀναλογισμός.] An argument from the cause to the effect.

To ANA'LOGIZE. † v. a. [Fr. analogiser.] To explain by way of analogy; to form some resemblance between different things; to consider something with regard to its analogy with somewhat else.

We have systems of material bodies, diversely figured and situated, if separately considered; they represent the object of the desire, which is analogized by attraction or gravitation.

Cheyne.

ANA'LOGOUS. † adj. [ἀνα and λόγος.] Though analogy is used by Hooker; analogous, Mr. Malone thinks, was not introduced into our language till after the restoration: for Fuller (Worthies in Bristol) uses, in its stead, το αναλογον. L'Estrange is the earliest author quoted by Johnson.]

1. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; having something parallel.

Exercise makes things easy, that would be otherwise very hard; as, in labour, watchings, heats, and colds; and then there is something analogous in the exercise of the mind, to that of the body. It is folly and infirmity that makes us delicate and froward. L'Estrange.

Many important consequences may be drawn from the observation of the most common things, and analogous reasonings from the causes of them. Arbuthnot.

2. It has the word to before the thing to which the resemblance is noted.

To apoplexies, dropsies, lethargies, there are analogous eclipses, inundations of waters, &c.

Spencer on Prodigies (1665), p. 71.

This incorporeal substance may have some sort of existence, analogous to corporeal extension: though we have no adequate conception hereof. Locke.

ANA'LOGOUSLY.* adv. In an analogous manner.

Can you, then, demonstrate from his unity, or omnipresence, which you conceive but analogously and imperfectly, that there cannot be such a distinction in his incomprehensible nature, as may be figured and represented to us by the personal distinction of man from man? Skellon, Deism Rev. Dial. 6.

ANA'LOGY. n. s. [ἀναλογία.]

1. Resemblance between things with regard to some circumstances or effects; as, learning is said to enlighten the mind; that is, it is to the mind what light is to the eye, by enabling it to discover that which was hidden before.

From God it hath proceeded, that the church hath evermore held a prescript form of common prayer, although not in all things every where the same, yet, for the most part, retaining the same analogy.

Hooker.

What I here observe of extraordinary revelation and prophecy, will, by analogy and due proportion, extend even to those communications of God's will, that are requisite to salvation. South.

2. When the thing to which the analogy is supposed, happens to be mentioned, analogy has after it the particles to or with; when both the things are mentioned after analogy, the particle between or betwixt is used.

If the body politick have any analogy to the natural, an act of oblivion were necessary in a hot distemper'd state. Dryden.

By analogy with all other liquors and concretions, the form of the chaos, whether liquid or concrete; could not be the same with that of the present earth. Burnet's Theory.

A N A

If we make Juvenal express the customs of our country, rather than of Rome, it is when there was some analogy between the customs. Dryden.

3. By grammarians, it is used to signify the agreement of several words in one common mode; as, from love is formed loved, from hate, hated, from grieve, grieved.

ANALYSIS. n. s. [ἀνάλυσις.]

1. A separation of a compound body into the several parts of which it consists.

There is an account of dew falling, in some places, in the form of butter, or grease, which grows extremely fetid; so that the analysis of the dew of any place, may, perhaps, be the best method of finding such contents of the soil as are within the reach of the sun. Arbutnot.

2. A consideration of any thing in parts, so as that one particular is first considered, then another.

Analysis consists in making experiments and observations, and in drawing general conclusions from them by induction, and admitting of no objections but such as are taken from experiments, or other certain truths. Newton, Opticks.

3. A solution of any thing, whether corporeal or mental, to its first elements; as, of a sentence to the single words; of a compound word, to the particles and words which form it; of a tune, to single notes; of an argument, to simple propositions.

We cannot know any thing of nature, but by an analysis of its true initial causes; till we know the first springs of natural motions, we are still but ignorants. Glanville.

ANALYST. n. s. [Fr. analyse, Gr. ανα and λυω.] He who analyzes a thing.

You, who are a skilful computist or analyst, may not therefore be deemed skilful in anatomy.

Bp. Berkley, Analyst, § 53.

The employment of modern analysts, however useful in mathematical calculations and constructions, doth not habituate the mind to apprehend clearly and infer justly. Ibid. § 49.

ANALYTICAL. adj. [from analysis.]

1. That which resolves any thing into first principles; that which separates any compound. See ANALYSIS.

Either may be probably maintained against the inaccuracy of the analytical experiments vulgarly relied on. Boyle.

2. That which proceeds by analysis, or by taking the parts of a compound into distinct and particular consideration.

Descartes hath here infinitely outdone all the philosophers that went before him, in giving a particular and analytical account of the universal fabrick; yet he intends his principles but for hypotheses. Glanville.

ANALYTICALLY. adv. [from analytical.] In such a manner as separates compounds into simples. See ANALYSIS.

I have seen sketches and rough draughts of some poems to be designed, set out analytically.

Oldisworth, in Johnson's Life of Smith.

ANALYTICK. adj. [αναλυτικος, Fr. analytique.] The manner of resolving compounds into the simple constituent or component parts, applied chiefly to mental operations.

He was in logic a great critic, Profoundly skill'd in analytick.

Madibras.

Analytick method takes the whole compound as it finds it, whether it be a species or an individual; and leads us into the knowledge of it, by resolving into its first principles, or parts, its generic nature, and its special properties; and therefore it is called the method of resolution. Watts, Logic.

ANALYTICK. n. s. Analytick method.

I cannot edify how, or by what rule of proportion, that man's virtue calculates, what his elements are, nor what his analyticks.

Milton, Tristram Shandy.

A N A

Your rant at analyticks, like dogs barking at the moon, hurts no body but yourself. That art will live, when you be dead; and those that know it, will not think it ever a whit the worse for your not understanding it, or railing at it.

Wallis, Correction of Hobbes, §. 12.

Of a long time I have suspected, that these modern analyticks were not scientific. Bp. Berkley, Analyst, §. 50.
TO ANALYZE. v. a. [ἀνάλυω.] To resolve a compound into its first principles. See ANALYSIS.

Chymistry enabling us to deparate bodies, and, in some measure, to analyze them, and take asunder their heterogeneous parts, in many chymical experiments, we may, better than in others, know what manner of bodies we employ; art having made them more simple or uncompounded, than nature alone is wont to present them us. Boyle.

To analyze the immorality of any action into its last principles; if it be inquired, why such an action is to be avoided, the immediate answer is, because it is sin. Norris, Miscell.

When the sentence is distinguished into subject and predicate, proposition, argument, act, object, cause, effect, adjunct, opposite, &c. then it is analyzed analogically and metaphysically. This last is what is chiefly meant in the theological schools, when they speak of analyzing a text of scripture.

Watts, Logick.

ANALYZER. n. s. [Fr. analyzer.]

1. That which has the power of analyzing.

Particular reasons incline me to doubt, whether the fire be the true and universal analyzer of mixt bodies. Boyle.

2. He who analyses, or investigates.

This appointment of the great Author of nature is clearly revealed, and well understood by the true analyzer, however naturalists may value themselves on the discovery.

Student, ii. 380.

ANAMORPHOSIS. n. s. [ἀνα and μορφωσις.] Deformation; a perspective projection of any thing, so that to the eye, at one point of view, it shall appear deformed, in another, an exact and regular representation. Sometimes it is made to appear confused to the naked eye, and regular, when viewed in a mirror of a certain form.

ANANAS. n. s. The pine apple.

It has a flower consisting of one leaf, divided into three parts, and funnel-shaped; the embryos produced in the tubercles, afterwards become fruit; the seeds in the tubercles are small, and almost kidney-shaped.

The species are, 1. Oval-shaped pine apple, with a whitish flesh. 2. Pyramidal pine apple, with a yellow flesh. 3. Pine apple, with smooth leaves. 4. Pine apple, with shining green leaves, and scarce any spines on their edges. 5. The olive-coloured pine. Miller.

Witness thou best anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond what'er
The poets imag'd in the golden age.

Thomson, Summer.

ANFNAS, wild. The same with penguin. See PENGUIN.

ANAPEST. n. s. [Gr. ἀναπαιστος.] A metrical foot, containing two short syllables and one long; or a dactyl reversed.

An anapest is all their music's song,
Whose first two feet are short, and third is long.

Sir J. Davier's Orchestra, st. 70.

There was no licence allowed by the ancients to the last syllable of anapests.

Bentley, Phal. III.

ANAPÉSTICK. adj. [Fr. anapestique.] Relating to the anapest, to a measure also often used in our ballads.

In my Latin Dissertation upon Johannes Antiochenus, I had started a new observation about the measures of the anapestick verse.

Bentley, Phal. III.

A N A

Thus was this kind of metre [alliteration] at length swallowed up and lost in our common burlesque alexandrine or anapestic verse.
Percy on the Met. of P. Ploumân's Fisions.

ANAPÉSTICK.* n. s. The anapestick measure.

A man that thoroughly reads the books he pretends to discourse of, would have been able to bring several seeming examples, where an anapestick is terminated with a trochee, or a tribrachys, or a cretick.
Bentley, Phil. III.

ANAPHORA. n. s. [ἀναφορά.] A figure, when several clauses of a sentence are begun with the same word, or sound; as, — Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?

ANAPLERO'TICK. adj. [ἀναπληρωτός.] *That which fills up any vacancy; used of applications which promote flesh.

A'NARCH. n. s. See ANARCHY. An author of confusion.

Him thus the anarch old,
With faltering speech, and visage incompounded, Answer'd.
Milton, P. J.

ANARCHICAL.† adj. [Fr. anarchique.] Confused; without rule or government.

To take a plain prospect of those anarchical confusions, and fearful calamities, which will inevitably ensue both in church and state.
Howell's Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 226.

In this anarchical and rebellious state of human nature, the faculties belonging to the material world presume to determine the nature of subjects belonging to the supreme Spirit. Chrys.

ANARCHICK.* adj. [Fr. anarchique.] Without rule. They expect, that they shall hold in obedience an anarchick people by an anarchick law.
Burke.

ANARCHISM.* n. s. [from anarchy.] Confusion; want of government.

I do look upon this bill as upon the gasping period of all good order: it will prove the mother of absolute anarchism.
Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 153.

A'NARCHIST.* n. s. [Fr. anarchiste, which, as well our own word, is modern.] He who occasions confusion, who lives without submission to rule, or who defies government. It is used contemptuously, but very unjustly so, by Mr. Tooke.

I see evidently that not he who demands rights, but he who abjures them, is an anarchist.
Divers. of Purley, ii. 2.

A'NARCHY. n. s. [ἀναρχία.] Want of government; a state in which every man is unaccountable; a state without magistracy.

Where eldest fight
And chaos, ancestors of nature, hold
Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.
Milton.

Arbitrary power is but the first natural step from anarchy, or the savage life; the adjusting power and freedom being an effect and consequence of maturer thinking.
Swift.

ANASARCA. n. s. [from ἀνά and σάρξ.] A sort of dropsy, where the whole substance is stuffed with pituitous humours.
Quincy.

When the lymph stagnates, or is extravasated under the skin, it is called an anasarca.
Arbutnot on Diet.

ANASARCOUS. adj. [from anasarca.] Relating to an anasarca; partaking of the nature of an anasarca.

A gentleman laboured of an ascites, with an anasarcous swelling of her belly, thighs, and legs.
Wiseman.

ANASTOMATICK. adj. [from ἀνά and σύνω.] That which has the quality of opening the vessels, or of removing obstructions.

ANASTOMOSIS.† n. s. [Fr. anastomose, from ἀνά and σύνω.] The inoculation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another; any of the arteries into the veins; by which communication, Cotgrave adds, they help one another.

ANASTROPHE.† n. s. [ἀντιστροφή.] a preposterous plucing, from ἀντιστρέφω.] A figure whereby words, which should have been precedent, are postponed.

Anastrophe [is] a preposterous order, or a backward setting of words, thus: All Italy about I went, which is contrary to plain order, I went about all Italy. Peacham, Gard. of Eloq.

Anastrophe, or inversion, is a figure by which we place last, and perhaps at a great distance from the beginning of the sentence, what, according to the common order, should have been placed first. Milton begins his Paradise Lost by a beautiful example of this figure. Walker, Rhetor. Grammar.

ANATHIEMA.† n. s. [Gr. ἀνάθεμα.]

1. A curse pronounced by ecclesiastical authority; excommunication.

The anathemata of the church sometimes denote more particularly those gifts, which were hanged upon pillars, and set in public view, as memorials of some great mercy which men had received from God. In allusion to which, Socrates thinks the term anathema is used for excommunication, because thereby a man's condemnation is published and proclaimed, as if it were hanged up upon a pillar.

Christian Antiquities, i. 249.

Her bare Anathemas fall but like so many brutes fulgmina upon the schismatical; who think themselves shrewdly hurt, forsooth, by being cut off from the body, which they choose not to be of.
South, Sermons.

2. Anglicised, and written anatheme; but little used.

But how is this divinity confronted by the Apostle, who hath denounced an anatheme to him, whosoever shall deliver as matter of faith (for so the Apostle must be understood) beside what was then delivered?

Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist (1616), p. 5.

Your holy father of Rome hath smitten with his thunderbolt of excommunications and anathemes, at one time or other, most of the orthodox churches of the world. Ibid. p. 129.

3. The object of the curse, or person cursed. This seems the original meaning, though now little used.

ANATHEMA'TICAL. adj. [from anathema.] That which has the properties of an anathema; that which relates to an anathema.

ANATHEMA'TICALLY. adv. [from anathematical.] In an anathematical manner.

ANATHEMATIZATION.* n. s. [Fr. anathematisation.] An extreme cursing.

Cotgrave.

To ANATHEMATIZE,† v. a. [Fr. anathematiser, from anathema.] To pronounce accursed by ecclesiastical authority; to excommunicate.

They were therefore to be anathematized, and, with detestation, branded and banished out of the church. Hammond.

The pope once every year (on Maundy Thursday) excommunicates and anathematizes all heretics.

Ep. Barlow's Remains, p. 220.

She therefore [the church of Rome] who is so very liberal of her anathemas and curses upon others, herself anathematized, with a vengeance, by one whose authority she herself acknowledges to be divine. Trapp, Popery truly stated, part i.

ANATHEMATIZER.* n. s. [from anathema.] He who pronounces an anathema or curse.

The higher strain of the censorious anathematizer, that breathes out woes and damnations. Hammond, Sermons.

How many famous churches have been most unjustly thunder-struck with direful censures of excommunication, upon pretence of this crime, which have been less guilty than their anathematizers!
Ep. Hall, Cases of Con.

ANATIFEROUS. adj. [from anas and fero, Lat.] Producing ducks. Not in use.

If there be anatiferous trees, whose corruption breaks forth into barnacles; yet, if they corrupt, they degenerate into maggots which produce not them again. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANATOCISM. n. s. [anatocismus, Lat. ανατοκισμός.] The accumulation of interest upon interest; the addition of the interest due for money lent, to the original sum. A species of usury generally forbidden.

ANATOMICAL. † adj. [Lat anatomicus, Fr. anatomique.]

1. Relating or belonging to anatomy.

When we are taught by logick to view a thing completely in all its parts, by the help of division, it has the use of an anatomical knife, which dissects an animal body, and separates the veins, arteries, nerves, muscles, membranes, &c. and shews us the several parts which go to the composition of a complete animal. Watts, Logick.

2. Proceeding upon principles taught in anatomy; considered as the object of anatomy.

There is a natural, involuntary distortion of the muscles, which is the anatomical cause of laughter; but there is another cause of laughter, which decency requires. Swift.

3. Anatomized; dissected; separated.

The continuation of solidity is apt to be confounded with, and, if we will look into the minute anatomical parts of matter, is little different from, hardness. Locke.

ANATOMICALLY. adv. [from anatomical.] In an anatomical manner; in the sense of an anatomist; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

While some affirmed it had no gall, intending only thereby no evidence of anger or fury, others have construed anatomically, and denied that part at all. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANATOMIST. † n. s. [Gr. ανατομικός, Fr. anatomiste.] He that studies the structure of animal bodies, by means of dissection; he that divides the bodies of animals, to discover the various parts.

Anatomists adjudged, that if nature had been suffered to run her own course, without this fatal interruption, he might have doubled his age. Howell.

Hence when anatomists discourse,
How like brutes organs are to ours;
They grant, if higher powers think fit,
A bear might soon be made a wit;
And that, for any thing in nature,
Pigs might squeak love odes, dogs bark satire. Prior.

TO ANATOMIZE. † v. a. [Gr. ανατομίζω, Fr. anatomiser.]

1. To dissect an animal; to divide the body into its component or constituent parts.

Our industry must even anatomize every particle of that body, which we are to uphold. Hooker.

2. To lay anything open distinctly, and by minute parts.

I speak but brotherly of him, but should I anatomize him to thee as he is, I must blush and weep, and then must look pale and wonder. Shakspeare.

Then dark distinctions reason's light disguis'd,
And into atoms truth anatomiz'd. Denham.

ANATOMY. n. s. [Gr. ἀνατομία.]

1. The art of dissecting the body.

It is proverbially said, Formica sua bilis inest, habet et multa splenem; whereas these parts anatomy hath not discovered in insects. Brown, Vulg. E.

It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind, as in that of the body; more good will accrue to mankind, by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such finer nerves and vessels, as will never escape our observation. Pope.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection.

Let the muscles be well inserted and bound together, according to the knowledge of them which is given by anatomy. Dryden.

3. The act of dividing any thing, whether corporeal or intellectual.

When a moneyed man hath divided his chests, he seems to himself richer than he is; therefore, a way to amplify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts. Bacon.

4. The body stripped of its integuments; a skeleton.

O that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth,
Then with a passion I would shake the world,
And rouse from sleep that fell anatomy,
Which cannot hear a feeble lady's voice. Shakspeare.

5. By way of irony or ridicule, a thin meagre person.

They brought one Pinch, a hungry lean-faced villain,
A mere anatomy, a mountebank,
A thread-bare juggler, and a fortune-teller,
A needy hollow-ey'd, sharp-looking wretch,
A living dead man. Shakspeare, Comedy of Errors.

ANATRON. n. s. The scum which swims upon the molten glass in the furnace, which, when taken off, melts in the air, and then coagulates into common salt. It is likewise that salt which gathers upon the walls of vaults.

ANBURY. † n. s. See AMBURY. Anbury is also a disease in turnips. See Grose's Prov. Gloss. and Marshall's Rural Economy of Norfolk.

ANCESTOR. † n. s. [Lat. ancessor for antecessor; Fr. ancestre, referred by Cotgrave to antecessure, by others to ains, i. e. before, and etre, to be; written formerly anciters, Foxe's Pref. to Sax. Gosp. and ancieters, Stapleton's Fort. of the Faith, 1565.] One from whom a person descends, either by the father or the mother. It is distinguished from predecessor; which is not, like ancestor, a natural, but civil denomination. An hereditary monarch succeeds to his ancestors; an elective, to his predecessors.

And she lies buried with her ancestors,
O, in a tomb where never scandal slept,
Save this of hers. Shakspeare, Much ado about Nothing.

Cham was the paternal ancestor of Nimus, the father of Chus, the grandfather of Nimrod; whose son was Belus, the father of Nimus. Raleigh.

Obscure! why pry'st thee what am I? I know
My father, grand-sire, and great grandsire too:
If farther I derive my pedigree,
I can but guess beyond the fourth degree.

The rest of my forgotten ancestors,
Where sons of earth like him, or sons of whores. Dryden.

ANCESTRAL.  adj.* [from ancestor.] Resembling ancestors.

History is the great looking-glass, through which we may behold with ancestral eyes, not only the various actions of ages past, and the odd accidents that attend time; but also discern the different humours of men, and feel the pulse of former times. Howell's Lett. iv. 11.

ANCESTREL. † adj. [from ancestor.] Claimed from ancestors; relating to ancestors: a term of law. Johnson elsewhere writes it ancestral.

Limitation in actions ancestrel, was anciently so here in England. Hale.

He soon afterwards solicited the office of sheriff, from which all his neighbours were glad to be relieved, but which he regarded as a resumption of ancestral claims, and a kind of restoration to blood after the attainder of a trader. Johnson, Rambler, No. 191.

ANCESTRY. n. s. [from ancestor.]

1. Lineage; a series of ancestors, or progenitors; the persons who compose the lineage.

Phedon I hight, quoth he; and do advance
Mine ancestry from famous Coradin,
Who first to raise our house to honour did begin. Spenser.

A tenacious adherence to the rights and liberties transmitted from a wise and virtuous ancestry, publick spirit, and a love of one's country, are the support and ornaments of government. Addison.

Say from what scepter'd ancestry ye claim,
Recorded eminent in deathless fame?

2. The honour of descent; birth.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but an ill one more contemptible. Addison.

A'NCHENTRY. n. s. [from ancient, and therefore properly to be written ancientry.] Antiquity of a family: ancient dignity; appearance or proof of antiquity.

Wooing, wedding, and repenting, is a Scotch jig, a measure and a cinque pace; the first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding mannerly modest, as a measure full of state and anchentry; and then comes repentance, and with his bad legs falls into the cinque pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave. Shakspeare.

A'NCHOR. † n. s. [anchora, Lat. ancep, ancop, Sax.]

1. A heavy iron, composed of a long shank, having a ring at one end to which the cable is fastened, and at the other, branching out into two arms or flocks, tending upwards, with barbs or edges on each side. Its use is to hold the ship, by being fixed to the ground.

He said, and wept; then spread his sails before
The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman shore:
Their anchors dropt, his crew the vessels moor. Dryden.

2. It is used, by a metaphor, for any thing which confers stability or security.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the veil. Heb.

3. The forms of speech in which it is most commonly used, are, to cast anchor, to lie or ride at anchor; and to weigh anchor.

The Turkish general perceiving that the Rhodians would not be drawn forth to battle at sea, withdrew his fleet, when casting anchor, and landing his men, he burnt the corn. Knolles, History of the Turks.

Ent'ring with the tide,

He dropp'd his anchors, and his pars he plid:
Furl'd every sail, and drawing down the mast,
His vessel moor'd, and made with haulers fast. Dryden.

Far from your capital my ship resides
At Rethrus, and secure at anchor rides. Pope.

4. The chape of a buckle; a buckle is usually described with its "tongue and anchor."

To A'NCHOR. v. n. [from anchor.]

1. To cast anchor; to lie at anchor.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach
Appear like mice; and yon tall anchoring bark Diminish'd to her cock. Shakspeare, King Lear.
Near Calais the Spaniards anchored, expecting their land-forces, which came not. Bacon.

Or the strait course to rocky Chios plow,
And anchor under Minos' shaggy brow. Pope.

2. To stop at; to rest on.

My intention, hearing not my tongue,
Anchors on Isabel. Shakspeare.

To A'NCHOR. † v. a.

1. To place at anchor; as, he anchored his ship.

2. To fix on.

My tongue should to my ears not name my boys,
Till that my nails were anchor'd in thine eyes. Shakspeare.
[She] wili'd me these tempests of vain love to fly,
And anchor fast myself on virtue's shore.

Sidney, Astroph. and Stella.

Posthumus anchors upon Imogen. Shakspeare, Cym. 4. 5.

There would he anchor his aspect, and die
With looking on his life. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cl. 3. 5.

Let us anchor our hopes, our trust, our confidence, upon his goodness. South, Sermon. viii. 141.

Witness that breast,
Which in thy bosom anchor'd his whole rest.

Bp. Henry King's Poems.

A'NCHOR. † n. s. [Dr. Johnson says, that Shakspeare seems to have used this word for anchoret, or an abstemious recluse person. And Mr. Steevens observes, that this abbreviation [he might have said established usage] of the word anchoret is very antient. No one will doubt this, when I add that the Saxon word ancep is anchoreta, solitarius, an hermit, a recluse. Barret, in his old dictionary, writes it ancher; and Chaucer, ankir. Rom. R. 6348.]

An anchor's cheer in prison be my hope!
Shakspeare, Hamlet, iii. 2.

'Fools! they may feed on words, and live on air,
That climb to honour by the pulpit's stair;
Sit seven years pining in an anchor's chair.

Bp. Hall's Satires, B. 4. Sat. 2.

A'NCHORABLE.  adj.* Fit for anchorage.

We hasted towards the Swalley road, judging the worst to be past; the Indian shore being all the way in view of us, and the sea every where 20 leagues from land anchorable.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 40.

A'NCHOR-HOLD. n. s. [from anchor and hold.] The hold or fastness of the anchor; and, figuratively, security.

The old English could express most aptly all the conceits of the mind in their own tongue, without borrowing from any; as for example: the holy service of God, which the Latins called religion, because it knitted the minds of men together, and most people of Europe have borrowed the same from them, they called most significantly can-fastness, as the one and only assurance and fast anchor-hold of our souls health. Camden.

A'NCHOR-SMITH. n. s. [from anchor and smith.] The maker or forger of anchors.

Smithing comprehends all trades, which use either forge or file, from the anchor-smith to the watchmaker; they all working by the same rules, though not with equal exactness, and all using the same tools, though of several sizes. Moxon.

A'NCHORAGE. † n. s. [Fr. anchraige, ancrage.]

1. The hold of the anchor.

Let me resolve whether there be indeed such efficacy in nurture and first production; for if that supposal should fail us, all our anchorage were loose, and we should but wander in a wild sea. Wotton.

2. The set of anchors belonging to a ship.

The bark that hath discharg'd her freight,
Returns with precious lading to the bay
From whence at first she weigh'd her anchorage. Shakspeare.

3. The duty paid for the liberty of anchoring in a port.

This corporation, otherwise a poor one, holds also the anchorage in the harbour, and bushelage of measurable commodities, as coals, salt, &c., in the town of Fowey.

Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

A'NCHORED. † participial adj. [from To anchor.]

1. Held by the anchor.

Like a well twisted cable, holding fast
The anchor'd vessel in the loudest blast. Waller.

2. Shaped liked an anchor; forked. Spoken of a serpent.

Shooting her anchor'd tongue,
Threat'ning her venom'd teeth. More, Song of the Soul, P. 2. ii. 29.

3. In heraldry, anchored, or ancred, means a cross so termed; as the four extremities of it resemble the flock of an anchor.

A'NCHORESS.  n. s.* [from anchor or ancher.] A female recluse; an hermitess; a religious woman who liveth solitary, as Bullokar defines the word.

Anch'resses that dwell
Mew'd up in walls. Fairfax, Tasso.

To this selected spot, now famous more
Than any grove, mount, plain had been before,
By relique, vision, burial, or birth,
Of anchoress or hermit. Browne, Brit. Pastorals, ii. 4.

A'NCHORET. † n. s. [contracted from anachoret, A'NCHORITE. † a'vaxupling.] A recluse; a hermit; one that retires to the more severe duties of religion.

Enforced solitariness is commonly seen in students, monks, friars, anchorites.

Burton, Anat. Mel. p. 85.

Macarius, the great Egyptian anchorite.

Abp. Usher, Answer to a Jesuit, p. 172.

His poetry indeed he took along with him; but he made that an anchorite as well as himself.

Sprat.

You describe so well your hermitical state of life, that none of the ancient anchorites could go beyond you, for a cave in a rock, with a fine spring; or any of the accommodations that besit a solitary life.

Pope.

ANCHOR'VY. † n. s. [from anchora, Span. or anchior, Ital. of the same signification. Formerly written anchore.] A little sea-fish, much used by way of sauce, or seasoning. Scaliger describes the anchovy as of the herring kind, about the length of a finger, having a pointed snout, a wide mouth, no teeth, but gums as rough as a saw. Others make it a sort of sardine, or pilchard: but others, with better reason, hold it a peculiar species, very different from either. The fishing is chiefly in the night-time; when a light being put on the stern of their little fishing vessels, the anchovies flock round, and are caught in nets.

Savary.

Sausages, anchoves, tobacco, caveare.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 73.

They present me with some sharp sauce, or a dish of delicate anchoves.

Brewer's Lingua, ii. 1.

We invent new sauces and pickles, which resemble the animal ferment in taste and virtue, as the salo-acid gravies of meat; the sault pickles of fish, anchovies, oysters.

Floper.

A'NCIENCY.* n. s. Antiquity. See A'NCIENTY.

The archbishop of Canterbury, as "primus par regni," the first peer of the kingdom, is ranked before all the nobility, seated at the king's right hand, &c. And the rest of the bishops follow him, in their due precedence, according to the dignity and anciencies of their respective sees.

Jura Clari, p. 42.

A'NCIENT. adj. [ancien, Fr. antiquus, Lat.]

1. Old; that happened long since; of old time; not modern. Ancient and old are distinguished; old relates to the duration of the thing itself, as, an old coat, a coat much worn; and ancient, to time in general, as, an ancient dress, a habit used in former times. But this is not always observed; for we mention old customs; but though old be sometimes opposed to modern, ancient is seldom opposed to new but when new means modern.

Ancient tenure is that whereby all the manours belonging to the crown, in St. Edward's or William the Conquerour's days, did hold. The number and names of which manours, as all others belonging to common persons, he caused to be written in a book, after a survey made of them, now remaining in the exchequer, and called doomsday book; and such as by this book appeared to have belonged to the crown at that time, are called ancient demesnes.

Cruet.

2. Old; that has been of long duration.

With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding.

Job. xii. 12.

Thales affirms, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient, because he never had any beginning.

Rolfeigh.

Industry

Gave the tall ancient forest to his axe.

Thomson.

3. Past; former.

I see thy fury: if I longer stay,

We shall begin our ancient bickerings.

Shakspeare.

A'NCIENT. † n. s. [from ancient, adj.]

1. Those that lived in old time were called ancients, opposed to the moderns.

And though the ancients thus their rules invade,
As kings dispense with laws themselves have made;

Moderns beware! or if you must offend

Against the precept, ne'er transgress its end.

Pope.

2. Senior: not in use.

He toucheth it as a special pre-eminence of Junias and Andronicus, that in Christianity they were his ancients.

Hooker.

3. Old men.

They called together all the ancients of the city; and all their youth ran together, and their women to the assembly.

Judith, vi. 16.

The same year were appointed two of the ancients of the people to be judges.

Hist. Susan. 5.

A'NCIENT. † n. s. [This word is also written anshent, and heraldick writers call the guidon used at funerals an anshent. Cowel supposes the word to have been corrupted by sailors from end-sheet. See Cowel's Interpreter in V. A'NCIENT.]

1. The flag or streamer of a ship, and, formerly, of a regiment.

More dishonourable ragged than an old faced ancient.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. 1.

2. The bearer of a flag, as was Ancient Pistol; whence in present use, ensign.

This is Othello's ancient, as I take it,

The same indeed, a very valiant fellow.

Shakspeare.

A'NCIENTLY. adv. [from ancient.] In old times.

Trebisond anciently pertained unto this crown; now unjustly possessed, and as unjustly abused, by those who have neither title to hold it, nor virtue to rule it.

Sidney.

The colewort is not an enemy, though that were anciently received, to the vine only; but to any other plant, because it draweth strongly the fattest juice of the earth.

Baron.

A'NCIENTNESS. † n. s. [Fr. ancienneté.] Antiquity; existence from old times.

Never shall ye see them trewly grounde ther doynge upon God's hoyle worde, but eyther upon ther owne sylchye tradycyons, or upon the croked customes of the countrey brought in fyrst of all by ther cursel counsell, or upon the auuncientnesse of ther fathers, or holinesse of ther doctors.

Bale, Yet a Course at the Romyshe Foxe, fol. 19.

The Fescenine and Saturnian were the same; they were called Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy.

Dryden.

A'NCIENTRY. † n. s. [from ancient.]

1. The honour of ancient lineage; the dignity of birth.

Of all nations under heaven, the Spaniard is the most mingled, and most uncertain. Wherefore, most foolishly do the Irish think to ennoble themselves, by wresting their ancientry from the Spaniard, who is unable to derive himself from any in certain.

Spenser on Ireland.

There is nothing in the between, that getting wenches with child, wronging the ancientry, stealing, fighting.

Shakspeare.

2. The character or imitation of antiquity.

Heralds may here take notice of the antiquity of the art; and, for their greater credit, blazon abroad, this precious piece of ancientry; for before the time of Semiramis we hear no news of coats or crests!

Gregory's Posthumus, p. 236.

You think the ten or twelve first lines the best; now I am for the fourteen last; add, that they contain not one word of ancientry.

West to Gray, Lett. 5. sect. 3.

A'NCIENTY.* n. s. [Fr. ancienneté.] Age; antiquity. Is not the forenamed council of ancienty above a thousand years ago?

Martin on the Marriage of Priests, sign. I. ii. b.

A'NCILE.* n. s. [Lat.] The sacred shield of the Romans.

Recorded to have been sent from heaven in a more celestial manner than the ancile of ancient Rome.

Potter on the Number 666, p. 176.

The Trojans secured their palladium; the Romans their ancile; and now the Roman Catholics have so great care of their images.

Brevint's Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 385.

A'NCILLARY.* adj. [Lat. ancillaris.] Chaucer calls the Virgin Mary the ancille of the Lord. Fr. ancille.

Lat. ancilla.] Attendant upon; subservient, as an handmaid.

It is beneath the dignity of the king's courts to be merely ancillary to other inferior jurisdictions. Blackstone.

ANCLE. See ANKLE.

AN'COME.* n. s. A small ulcerous swelling, formed unexpectedly. A word used in the North of England. Boucher.

AN'CONY. n. s. [in the iron mills.] A bloom wrought into the figure of a flat iron bar, about three feet long, with two square rough knobs, one at each end. Chambers.

AND.† conjunction. [Sax. and, from anab, the imperative of the Sax. anan-ab, to add to, or make an heap; according to Mr. Tooke. Dr. Jamieson prefers the Icelandick and, and the Su-Goth. æn, both meaning and as well as if; which indeed may more probably be the parent than the compound word unan-ab.]

1. The particle by which sentences or terms are joined, which it is not easy to explain by any synonymous word.

Sure his honesty

Got him small gains, but shameless flattery;

And filthy brokerage, and unseemly shift;

And borrow base, and some good ladies' gifts. Spenser.

What shall I do to be for ever known,

And make the age to come my own? Cowley.

The Danes unconquer'd offspring march behind;

And Mooin, the last of hygan kind. Dryden.

It shall ever be my study to make discoveries of this nature in human life, and to settle the proper distinctions between the virtues and perfections of mankind, and those false colours and resemblances of them that shine alike in the eyes of the vulgar. Addison.

2. And sometimes signifies though, and seems a contraction of and if; or means simply if.

It is the nature of extreme self-lovers, as they will set an house on fire, and it were but to roast their eggs. Bacon.

Nay, and I suffer this, I may go graze.

Beaumont and Fl. Woman's Prize, i. 3.

3. In and if, the and is redundant, and is omitted by all later writers, Dr. Johnson says; and Mr. Tooke approves it. The usage of it is found in our established version of the New Testament.

I pray thee, Launce, and if thou seest my boy,

Bid him make haste. Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

But and if that servant say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming. St. Luke, xii. 45.

AN'DABATISM.* n. s. [from andabate, Lat. Gladiators, who fought hood-winked; which word (andabate) stands in Ash and in James's Military Dictionary, but without any notice of this anglicised formation from it.] Uncertainty.

To state the question, that we might not fall to andabatism, we are to understand, that as there be two kinds of perfection, one of our way, the other of our country to which we are travelling; so there are two kinds also of fulfilling God's law, one of this life, the other of the next.

Shelford's Learned Discourses, (1635) p. 121.

ANDANTE.* adj. [Ital.] In musick; expressive, distinct, exact.

AN'DIRON.† n. s. [supposed by Skinner to be corrupted from hand-iron; an iron that may be moved by the hand, or may supply the place of a hand. By others imagined to be a corruption of end-iron, and in the north called brand-iron.] Irons at the end of a fire-grate, in which the spit turns; or irons in which wood is laid to burn.

If you strike an entire body, as an andiron of brass, at the top, it maketh a more treble sound, and at the bottom a baser.

Bacon.

ANDRO'GYNAL.† adj. [Fr. androginé, from ἀνδρ and γυν.] Having two sexes; hermaphroditical.

ANDRO'GYNALLY. adv. [from androgyñal.] In the form of hermaphrodites; with two sexes.

The examples hereof have undergone no real or new transsexion, but were androgyñally born, and under some kind of hermaphrodites. Brown, Fulg. Err.

ANDRO'GYNE.* n. s. [Fr. androgyne, from ἀνδρ and γυν.] A kind of hermaphrodite.

What shall I say of these vile and stinking androgyñes, that is to say, these men-women, with their curled locks, their crisped and frizzled hair? Harmer's Transl. of Beza, p. 173.

Plato, under the person of Aristophanes, tells a story, how that at first there were three kinds of men, that is, male, female, and a third mixt species of the other two, called for that reason androgyñes. Ferrand's Love Melancholy, p. 72.

ANDRO'GYSOUS. adj. The same with androgyñal.

ANDRO'GYNUS.† n. s. See ANDROGYNAL. An hermaphrodite; one that is of both sexes. This androgyñus is given by Dr. Johnson. But our elder dictionaries give the substantive androgyñe, which is from the Fr. sub. androgyne; as I have shewn. See ANDROGYNE.

ANDRO'TOMY. n. s. [from ἀνδρ and τέμνω.] The practice of cutting human bodies. Dict.

ANE'AR.* prep. [a and near.] Near.

The cardinal, pushed on, I suppose, by Walpole, continues to pursue me; and to fright the clergy of all sorts, as much as he can, from coming anear me. Bp. Atterbury, Lett. 50.

ANECDOTE.† n. s. [Gr. ἀνέκδοτος.]

1. Something yet unpublished; secret history.

Some modern anecdotes aver,

He nodded in his elbow chair. Prior.

2. It is now used, after the French, for a biographical incident; a minute passage of private life.

Facts and anecdotes relating to persons, who have rendered their names illustrious in publick and national stations, are commonly recorded at large in obvious books.

Watson, Life of Bathurst.

They will also specify the few remaining anecdotes, which occurred in a life so retired and sedentary as his.

Mason, Life of Gray.

ANECDO'TICAL.* adj. Relative to anecdotes.

Particular anecdotal traditions, whose authority is unknown or suspicious. Bolingbroke to Pope.

TO ANE'LE.* v. a. [from Sax. ele, oil. Aneled, illuminated. Prompt. Parv. Sometimes written annoil.]

To give extreme unction.

When he was houseled and aneled, and had all that a Christian man ought to have. Mort d' Arthur, iii. 175.

Unhouse'd, disappointed, unaneled. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Supposing that either he knew or prophesied of his departure; yet, before his departure, we sent for the abbot of the house to annoyle him. Cavendish's Life of C. Wolsey.

ANEMO'GRAPHY. n. s. [ἀνέμω and γράφω.] The description of the winds.

ANEMO'METER. n. s. [ἀνέμω and μέτρον.] An instrument contrived to measure the strength or velocity of the wind.

ANEMONE. n. s. [ἀνεμών.] The wind flower.

Upon the top of its single stalk, surrounded by a leaf, is produced one naked flower, of many petals, with many stamina in the center; the seeds are collected into an oblong head, and surrounded with a copious down. The principal colours in anemonies, are white, red, blue, and purple sometimes curiously intermixed. Miller.

Wind flowers are distinguished into those with broad and hard leaves, and those with narrow and soft ones. The broad leaved anemony roots should be planted about the end of September. These with small leaves must not be put into the ground till the end of October. Martimer.

From the soft wing of vernal breezes shed,
Anemones, auriculas, enrich'd
With shining meal o'er all their velvet leaves. Thomson, Spring.

ANEMOSCOPE. n. s. [ἀνέμος and σκόπεος.] A machine invented to foretel the changes of the wind. It has been observed, that hygrosopes made of cat's gut proved very good anemoscopes, seldom failing, by the turning the index about, to foretel the shifting of the wind. Chambers.

ANENT. † prep. A word used in the Scotch dialect. 1. Concerning; about; as, he said nothing anent this particular.

2. Over against; opposite to; as, he lives anent the market-house. Dr. Johnson has omitted to state, that anent is common in our northern counties for opposite. It is most probably from the Sax. an-gean, ex adverso. It is sometimes written ancust, and so spoken in the North of England; and is also written ancutis, in our oldest authors.

And right ancust him a dog snarling. B. Jonson, Alch. ii. 6.
I cannot but pass you my judgement anent those six considerations, which you offered, to invalidate those authorities that I so much reverence. K. Ch. I. to A. Henderson, p. 56.

ANES. n. s. The spires or beards of corn. Dict.

ANEURISM. † n. s. [ἀνεύρισμα, Fr. aneurisme.] A disease of the arteries, in which, either by a preternatural weakness of any part of them, they become excessively dilated, or by a wound through their coats, the blood is extravasated amongst the adjacent cavities. Sharp.

In the orifice, there was a throbbing of the arterial blood, as in an aneurism. Wiseman.

ANEW. † adv. [from a and new, Dr. Johnson says; but it is rather from all and new; which two words Chaucer uses for anew. Anew was also anciently written of newe.]

1. Over again; another time; repeatedly. This is the most common use.

Nor, if at mischief taken, on the ground
Be slain, but prisoners to the pillar bound,
At either barrier plac'd; nor, captives made,
Be freed, or, arm'd anew, the fight invade. Dryden.

That as in birth, in beauty you excel,
The muse might dictate, and the poet tell:
Your art no other art can speak; and you
To shew how well you play, must play anew. Prior.

The miseries of the civil war did, for many years, deter the inhabitants of our island from the thoughts of engaging anew in such desperate undertakings. Addison.

2. Newly; in a new manner.

He who begins late is obliged to form anew the whole disposition of his soul, to acquire new habits of life, to practise duties to which he is utterly a stranger. Rogers.

ANEWST, or ANEUST.  adv.* [Sax. nepeȝt, neighbourhood.] Nearly, almost. "Anewst the matter," i. e. about the matter. Much used in Berkshire.

ANFRACTUOSE. † adj. [Fr. anfrazueux, from anfractus, tus, Lat.] Winding; mazy; full of turnings and winding passages.

Behind the drum are several vaults and anfrazuous cavities in the ear-bone, so to intend the least sound imaginable, that the sense might be affected with it; as we see in subterraneous caves and vaults, how the sound is redoubled. Ray.

This is that part which deeply insinuates itself into all the anfrazuous passages of the brain. Smith's Old Age, p. 212.

ANFRACTUOUSNESS. † n. s. [from anfrazuous.] Fullness of windings and turnings. This word, given and defined by Dr. Johnson, is, in our old dictionaries, what is written anfractuosity; [Fr. anfractuosit  ,] and explained by Cotgrave "a manifold (and uneven) compass, involution, turning or winding about."

Arteries taking their rise from the left capsula of the heart, bringing through several circuits, ambages, and anfractuosit  s, the vital spirits. Robertus, Tr. iii. 22.

ANFRACTURE. n. s. [from anfractus, Lat.] A turning; a mazy winding and turning. Dict.

ANGARIATION.  [Lat. angario, to press.] Exertion.*
This leading of God's Spirit must neither be a forced angariation; (as if God would scold grace and salvation upon us against our wills,) nor some sudden protrusion to good.

Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 153.
The earth yields us fruit, but it is only perhaps once a year, and that not without much cost and angariation, requiring both our labour and patience. Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 43.

ANGEL. † n. s. [Gr. ἄγγελος; angelus, Lat. angel, Sax.]

1. Originally a messenger. A Spirit employed by God in the administration of human affairs.

Some holy angel
Fly to the court of England, and unfold
His message ere he come. Shakespeare.

Had we such a knowledge of the constitution of man, as it is possible angel have, and it is certain his Maker has; we should have a quite other idea of his essence. Locke.

2. Angel is sometimes used in a bad sense; as angels of darkness.

And they had a king over them, which was the angel of the bottomless pit. Revelations.

3. Angel, in scripture, sometimes, means man of God, prophet.

4. Angel is used, in the style of love, for a beautiful person.

Thou hast the sweetest face I ever look'd on,
Sir, as I have a soul, she is an angel. Shakespeare.

5. A messenger of any kind.
Put best, the dear good angel of the spring,
The nightingale. B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, v. 6.

6. A piece of money anciently coined and impressed with an angel, in memory of an observation of Pope Gregory, that the pagan Angli, or English, were so beautiful, that if they were christians, they would be angeli, or angels. The coin was rated at ten shillings.

Take an empty bason, put an angel of gold, or what you will, into it; then go so far from the bason, till you cannot see the angel, because it is not in a right line; then fill the bason with water, and you will see it out of its place, because of the refraction. Beech.

Shake the bars
Of hoarding abbots; their imprison'd angels
Set them at liberty. Shakespeare.

ANGEL. adj. Resembling angels; angelical.
I have mark'd

A thousand blushing apparitions
Start into her face; a thousand innocent shames
In angel whiteness bear away those blushes. Shakespeare.
Or virgins visited by angel powers.

With golden crowns and wreaths of heav'nly flow'rs. Pope, Rape of the Lock.

ANGEL-AGE.  n. s.* The existence or state of angels.

Why should you two,
That, happily, have been as chaste as I am,
Fairer, I think, by much, (for yet your faces,
Like ancient wall-built piles, shew worthy ruins,
After that angel-age turn mortal devils?

Beaumont and Fl. Valentinian, v. 2.
ANGEL-LIKE. † adj. [from angel and like.] Resembling an angel.

A N G

Myself have been an idle truant,
Omitting the sweet benefit of time,
To clothe mine age with angel-like perfection.
Shakspeare, T. Gent. Ver. ii. 4.

In heav'n itself thou sure wer't drest
With that angel-like disguise.
Waller.
ANGELICALLY.* adv. In an angelick manner; like an angel.

A'NGEL-WINGED.* adj. [from angel and wing.]
She [philosophy] all angel-winged
The heights of science, and of virtue gains,
Where all is calm and clear.
Thomson, Spring.

A'NGEL-WORSHIP.* n. s. The worshipping of angels.
Angel-worship is plainly forbidden in the text of St. Paul, which I am now considering, [Col. ii. 19, 20.] as also in Rev. xiv. 10, xxii. 9. Trapp's Popery truly stated, part 2.

A'NGEL-SHOT. n. s. [perhaps properly angle-shot, being folden together with a hinge.] Chain shot, being a cannon bullet cut in two, and the halves being joined together by a chain. Dict.

ANGELICA. n. s. Lat. ab angelica virtute. The name of a plant.

It has winged leaves divided into large segments; its stalks are hollow and jointed; the flowers grow in an umbel upon the tops of the stalks, and consist of five leaves, succeeded by two large channelled seeds.

The species are, 1. Common or manured angelica.
2. Greater wild angelica. 3. Shining Canada angelica. 4. Mountain perennial angelica, with columbine leaves. Miller.

ANGELICA. (Berry-bearing) [Aralia, Lat.]

The flower consists of many leaves, expanding in form of a rose, which are naked, growing on the top of the ovary: these flowers are succeeded by globular fruits, which are soft and succulent, and full of oblong seeds. Miller.

ANGELICAL. adj. [angelicus, Lat.]

1. Resembling angels.

It discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up, with an angelical swiftness, our eyes, that our mind, being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel upward. Raleigh.

2. Partaking of the nature of angels.

Others more mild
Retreated in a silent valley, sing
With notes angelical to many a harp,
Their own heroic deeds, and hapless fall
By doom of battle. Milton, P. L.

3. Belonging to angels; suiting the nature or dignity of angels.

It may be encouragement to consider the pleasure of speculations, which do ravish and sublime the thoughts with more clear angelical contentments. Wilkins's Dædalus.

ANGELICALNESS. n. s. [from angelical.] The quality of being angelical; resemblance of angels; excellence more than human.

ANGELICK.† adj. [angelicus, Lat. ængellic, Sax.] Partaking of the nature of angels; angelical; above human. Spenser has placed the accent on the first syllable.

Go visit her, in her chaste bowre of rest,
Accompany'd with angelick delights.
Here, happy creature, fair angelick Eve,
Partake thou also. Spenser, Sonnet.

My fancy form'd thee of angelick kind,
Some emanation of the all beauteous mind. Milton.

A'NGELOT.† n. s.

1. A musical instrument, somewhat resembling a lute. Dict.

A N G

2. A gold coin, the value of half an angel. [Fr. angélot, which Cotgrave translates the English angel; and some suppose to have been coined at Paris, while subject to the English. Yet the French antiquaries take no notice of that, but that it was current in France, and was so called from the impress on it of an angel bearing an armorial shield. See 'Lacombe. See Roquetfort, Gloss. de la Langue Rom. ANGELOT, ANGELET.]

3. A cheese so called. Cotgrave.

Skinner mentions this cheese to have been brought from Normandy, and supposes it to have been so called from some person of the name of Angelot, who first made or brought it into vogue. Mr. Boucher thinks it might owe its name to the price, i. e. of an angel or angelot. But these conjectures are removed by the authority of Roquetfort, who tells us, that the angelot cheese is certainly made in Normandy, and particularly in that part of it called Auge, whence angelot, and by corruption angelot.

A'NGER.† n. s. [a word, Dr. Johnson says, of no certain etymology, but, with most probability, derived by Skinner from ange, Sax. vered; which, however, seems to come originally from the Latin ango. The Goth. angur, trouble or grief, must also belong to the Lat. ango. The Sax. angwyllic, terrible, is, however, of near kin to anger.]

1. Anger is uneasiness or discomposure of the mind, upon the receipt of any injury, with a present purpose of revenge. Locke.

Anger is like
A full hot horse, who being allow'd his way,
Self-mettle tires him. Shakspeare.
Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? was thine anger against the rivers? was thy wrath against the sea, that thou didst ride upon thine horses and thy chariots of salvation? Hab. iii. 8.

Anger is, according to some, a transient hatred, or at least very like it. South.

2. Pain, or smart, of a sore or swelling. In this sense it seems plainly deducible from angor.

I made the experiment, setting the moxa where the first violence of my pain began, and where the greatest anger and soreness still continued, notwithstanding the swelling of my foot. Temple.

3. This substantive is not often used in the plural number.

You're too remiss and wanton in your angers.
Beaumont, and Fl. Wife for a Month, ii. 1.
Whose voices, angers, and terrors, and sometimes howlings, also he said he often heard. Abp. Usher's Answer to a Jesuit, p. 175.

To A'NGER. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To make angry; to provoke; to enrage.

Who would anger the meanest artisan, which carrieth a good mind? Hooker.

Sometimes he angers me,
With telling me of the moldwarp and the ant. Shakspeare.
There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people. Clarendon.

It anger'd Turenne, once upon a day,
To see a footman kick'd that took his pay. Pope.

2. To make painful.

He turneth the humours back, and maketh the wound bleed inwards, and angereth malign ulcers and pernicious imposthumations. Bacon.

A'NGERLY. adv. [from anger.] In an angry manner; like one offended: it is now written angrily.

Why, how now, Hecat, you look angrily? Shakspeare.
Such jester's dishonest indiscretion, is rather charitably to be pitied, than their exception either angrily to be grieved at, or seriously to be confuted. Carew.

A'NGERNESS.* n. s. The state of being angry.

Hail, innocent of angerness!

MS. cited by Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 315.

ANGIO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [from ἀγγείον and γραφω.] A description of vessels in the human body; nerves, veins, arteries, and lymphaticks.

ANGIO'LOGY. n. s. [from ἀγγείον and λόγος.] A treatise or discourse of the vessels of a human body.

ANGIOMONOSP'ERMOUS. adj. [from ἀγγείον, μόνος, and σπέρμα.] Such plants as have but one single seed in the seed-pod.

ANGIO'TOMY. n. s. [from ἀγγείον and τέμνω, to cut.] A cutting open of the vessels, as in the opening of a vein or artery.

A'NGLE.† n. s. [angli, Fr. angulus, Lat.]*

1. The space intercepted between two lines intersecting or meeting, so as, if continued, they would intersect each other.

Angle of the centre of a circle, is an angle whose vertex, or angular point is at the centre of a circle, and whose legs are two semidiameters of that circle.

Stone's Dict.

2. A corner. This definition occurs in Bullokar's old Expositor.

Into the utmost angle of the world.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. ix. 47.

A'NGLE.† n. s. [Goth. angul, hamus. Sax. angel.
German and Dutch, angel.] An instrument to take fish, consisting of a rod, a line, and a hook.

She also had an angle in her hand; but the taker was so taken, that she had forgotten taking. Sidney.

Give me this angle, we'll to the river there,
My musick playing far off, I will betray
Tawny finn'd fish; my bending hook shall pierce
Their slimy jaws. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

The patient fisher takes his silent stand,
Totent, his angle trembling in his hand;
With looks unmov'd, he hopes the scaly breed,
And eyes the dancing cork, and bending reed. Pope.

To A'NGLE.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To fish with a rod and hook.

The ladies angling in the crystal lakes,
Feast on the waters with the prey they take. Waller.

There meditate my time away,
And angle on, and beg to have
A quiet passage to a welcome grave. Walton, Angler's Wish.

2. To try to gain by some insinuating artifices, as fishes are caught by a bait.

By this face,
This seeming brow of justice, did he win
The hearts of all that he did angle for. Shakspeare.

The pleasant'st angling is to see the fish
Cut with her golden oars the silver stream,
And greedily devour the treacherous bait;
So angle we for Beatrice. Shakspeare.

To A'NGLE.* v. a. [Dr. Johnson has confounded this verb active with the neuter.] To entice.

If he spake courteously, he angled the people's hearts: if he were silent, he misused upon some dangerous plot. Sidney.

You have angled me on with much pleasure to the thatch'dhouse; and I now find your words true, That good company makes the way seem short. Walton, Compl. Angler, ch. i.

A'NGLED.* part. adj. Having angles.

He paints, he carves, he builds, he fortifies,
Makes citadels of curious fowls and fish;
Some he dry-ditches, some notes round with broths;
Mounts marrow bones; cuts fifty angled enstards.

B. Jonson, Masques. Nept. Triumph.

Like many-angled figures in the book
Of some great conjurer.

Donne, Poems, p. 86.

The thrice three-angled beech-nut shell. Bp. Hall, Sat. iii. 1.

A'NGLE-ROD. n. s. [angel roede, Dutch.] The stick to which the line and hook are hung.

It differeth much in greatness; the smallest being fit for thatching of houses; the second bigness is used for angle-rods, and in China, for beating of offenders upon the thighs.

Bacon.

He makes a May-fly to a miracle, and furnishes the whole country with angle-rods. Addison.

A'NGLER. n. s. [from anglè.] He that fishes with an angle.

He, like a patient angler, ere he strook,
Would let them play a while upon the hook. Dryden.

Neither do birds alone, but many sorts of fishes, feed upon insects; as is well known to anglers, who bait their hooks with them. Ray.

A'NGLES.* n. s. [Lat. Angli.] A people of Germany;
a name also by which the English have been called.

The number of Saxons and Angles, Jutes, and other nations that came over, were not only sufficient to conquer and waste this whole province, but even to plant and people it soon again with numerous and new inhabitants.

Temple, Intr. Hist. of Eng.

Demanding by what name this people were called, answer was made him, [Gregory,] that they were called Angles, or rather (if it were pronounced as they then called themselves) ENGL-
-I-S-C, that is to say, English. The reverend father, perceiving this name to allude unto the name of angels in Latin, said, Verily not without cause are they called Angles, for they have faces like angels. Verstegan's Restit. p. 153.

A'NGLICAN. adj. [from Anglus.] English.

He projected, by pensions unto hopeful persons in either university, to maintain a seminary of youth instituted in piety and learning upon the sober principles and old establishment of the Anglican church. Full, Life of Hammond, § 1.

A'NGLICAN.* n. s. A member of the church of England.

The old persecutors, whether Pagan or Christian, whether Arian or Orthodox, whether Catholicicks, Anglicans, or Calvinists, actually were, or at least they had the decorum to pretend to be, strong Dogmatists. Burke's Letter to R. Burke.

To A'NGLICISE.* v. a. [from Anglus.] To make
English; to convert into English.

He [the letter U] pleaded, that the same place and powers, which τ had in the Greek language, he stood fully intitled to in the English; and that therefore of right he ought to be possessed of the place of τ even in all Greek words anglicised, as system, hypocrite, etc. Edwards, Can. Crit. p. 275.

The glaring affectation of anglicising Latin words.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, ii. 282.

A'NGLICISM.† n. s. [from Anglus, Lat.] A form of speech peculiar to the English language; an English idiom.

Besides the ill habit which they get of wretched barbarizing against the Latin and Greek idiom, with their untutored anglicisms. Milton, of Education.

There is, amongst many others, an odd kind of anglicism, wherein some do frequently express themselves, as to say, your poores of Holland, Sir; your Jesuits of Spain, Sir; your courtesans of Venice, Sir. Whereunto one answered, not imperti-nently, My courtesans, Sir? Pox on them all for me, they are none of my courtesans.

Howell, Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 181.

A'NGLING.* n. s. [from anglè.] The art or practice of fishing with a rod.

Then did Education first the art invent

Of angling. Davors, Secrets of Angling, b. i.

A'NGLO-DANISH.* adj. What relates to the English Danes.

His excellent and large collection of Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Danish coins. Wotton, View of Hickes's Thesaurus, p. 82.

A'NGLO-NORMAN.* n. s. An English Norman.

Hickes observes, that all the charters which shine with gilt crosses, and painted images or figures, such as have often deceived men unexperienced in these things, though otherwise very learned, were spurious, and forged by Anglo-Normans long afterwards. Wotton, View of Hickes's Thesaurus, p. 53.

ANGLO-SAXON.* n. s. An English Saxon.

The Danish fashion of excessive drinking, a vice almost natural to the Northern nations, became so general among the Anglo-Saxons, that it was found necessary to restrain so pernicious and contagious a practice by a particular statute.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 1.

Long — the battle glean'd,

Ere, blood-cemented, Anglo-Saxons saw

Egbert and Peace on one united throne. Thomson, Lib. part 4.

Much greater honours seem to have been heaped upon the northern Scalds, in whom the characters of historian, genealogist, poet, and musician, were all united, than appear to have been paid to the minstrels and harpers of the Anglo-Saxons, whose talents were chiefly calculated to entertain and divert; while the Scalds professed to inform and instruct.

Percy's Reliques, Ess. i. 1.

ANGLO-SAXON.* adj. What relates to the Anglo-Saxons.

We might as well have printed our Anglo-Saxon remains in the common character, as others have done with Willeramus's "Francick Paraphrase," and Otfrid's "Evangelical History."

Bp. Newton to Mr. Lhwyd, Nic. Corr. i. 111.

It is probable, that the Danish invasions produced a considerable alteration in the manners of our Anglo-Saxon ancestors.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 1.

ANGOBEN. n. s. A kind of pear.

ANGOUR. n. s. [angor, Latin.] Pain.

If the patient be surprized with a lipothymous angour, and great oppress about the stomach, expect no relief from cordials.

Harvey.

ANGRIPLY. adv. [from angry.] In an angry manner; furiously; peevishly.

I will sit as quiet as a lamb;

I will not stir, nor wine, nor speak a word,

Nor look upon the iron angrily.

Shakspeare.

ANGRY. adj. [from anger.]

1. Touched with anger; provoked.

Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak: per adventure there shall be thirty found there. Gen. xviii. 30.

2. It seems properly to require, when the object of anger is mentioned, the particle at before a thing, and with before a person; but this is not always observed.

Your Coriolanus is not much missed, but with his friends; the commonwealth doth stand, and so would do, were he angry at it. Shakspeare.

Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. Gen. xli. 5.

I think it a vast pleasure, that who ever two people of merit regard one another, so many scoundrels envy and are angry at them. Swift.

3. Having the appearance of anger; having the effect of anger.

The north wind driveth away rain; so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue. Prov. xxv. 23.

4. In chirurgery, painful; inflamed; smarting.

This serum, being accompanied by the thinner parts of the blood, grows red and angry; and, wanting its due regress into the mass, first gathers into a hard swelling, and, in a few days, ripens into matter, and so dischargeth. Wiscman.

ANGUILLIFORM.* adj. [from Lat. anguilla, an eel, and forma.] A word applied, in zoology, to that class of fishes, which are soft and slippery like the eel, and have not scales.

ANGUISH.* n. s. [angoisse, Fr. angor, Lat.] Excessive pain either of mind or body; applied to the mind, it means the pain of sorrow, and is seldom used to signify other passions. Rarely used in the plural.

Not all so cheerful seemed she of sight,
As was her sister; whether drowd did dwell,
Or anguish in her heart, is hard to tell.

Spenser, F. Q.

Virtue's but anguish, when 'tis several,
By occasion wak'd, and circumstantial;
True virtue's soul 's always in all deeds alt.

Donne

They had persecutors, whose invention was as great as their cruelty. Wit and malice conspired to find out such deaths, and those of such incredible anguish, that only the manner of dying was the punishment, death itself the deliverance. South.

Perpetual anguish fills his anxious breast,
Nor stopt by business, nor compos'd by rest;
No music cheers him, nor no feast can please.

Dryden.

Seeing myself engaged, yea and engulph'd in so many anguishes and perplexities. Trans. of Boccacini, (1626) p. 37.

ANGUISHED.* part. [Dr. Johnson notices this word as an adjective derived from anguish. It is, in the sole example which he has given, rather a verb. Indeed it is one of our oldest verbs. Wicliffe uses it for the modern word distressed, 2 Cor. iv. 16. "In all things we suffer tribulation, but we be not anguished." And we may refer the etymology to the old Fr. angoisser, or perhaps to the Sax. verb angrumian.] Seized with anguish; tortured; excessively pained.

Socrates was seen and observed to be much anguished, grieved, and perplexed; still seeming to feel some grief of mind. Trans. of Boccacini, (1626) p. 108.

Oh! Saviour, what a dead night, what a fearful tempest, what an astonishing dereliction was that, wherein thou thyself crydest out in the bitterness of thine anguished soul, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me! Bp. Hall, Works, ii. 131.

Feel no touch

Of conscience, but of fame, and be Anguish'd, not that 'twas sin, but that 'twas she.

Donne, Poems, p. 33.

ANGULAR. adj. [from angle.]

1. Having angles or corners; cornered.

As for the figure of chrystal, it is for the most part hexagonal, or six cornered, being built upon a confused matter, from whence, as it were from a root, angular figures arise, even as in the amethyst and basaltus. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

2. Consisting of an angle.

The distance of the edges of the knives from one another, at the distance of four inches from the angular point, where the edges of the knives meet, was the eight part of an inch.

Newton's Opticks.

ANGULARITY.* n. s. [from angular.] The quality of being angular, or having corners.

What body ever yet could figure show

Perfectly perfect, as rotundity

Exactly round, or bluntness angularity?

More's Song of the Soul, 3. 2. 38.

ANGULARLY.* adv. [from angular.] With angles or corners.

A contracted, subtle, and intricate face, full of quirks and turnings, a labyrinthian face, now angularly, now circularly, every way aspected. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Another part of the same solution afforded us an ice angularly figured. Boyle.

ANGULARNESS. n. s. [from angular.] The quality of being angular.

ANGULATED. adj. [from angle.] Formed with angles or corners.

Topazes, amethysts, or emeralds, which grow in the fissures, are ordinarily crystallized, or shot into angulated figures; whereas, in the strata, they are found in rude lumps, like yellow, purple, and green pebbles. Woodward.

ANGULOSITY. n. s. [from angulosus.] Angularity; cornered form. Dict.

ANGULOUS. adj. [from angle.] Hooked; angular.

Nor can it be a difference, that the parts of solid bodies are held together by hooks, and angulous involutions; since the coherence of the parts of these will be of as difficult a conception. Glanville.

ANGU'ST.† adj. [angustus, Lat. anguste, Fr.] Narrow; strait; an adjective found in our elder dictionaries, though not so stated by Dr. Johnson.

If, as Tycho proves the moon to be distant from 50 and 60 semidiameters of the earth; and, as Peter Nonius will have it, the air be so angust, what proportion is there betwixt the other three elements and it? Burton, Anal. Met. p. 251.

ANGUSTA'TION. n. s. [from angustus.] The act of making narrow straitening; the state of being narrowed.

The cause may be referred either to the grumousness of the blood, or to obstruction of the vein somewhere in its passage, by some angustation upon it by part of the tumour. Wiseman.

ANHELA'TION.† n. s. [anhelo, Lat.] The act of panting; the state of being out of breath. It is termed, in Cockeram's dictionary, "the phthisick."

ANHELO'SE. adj. [anhelus, Lat.] Out of breath; panting; labouring of being out of breath. Dict.

ANIE'NTED.† adj. [ancantir, Fr.] Frustrated; brought to nothing. Formerly anientissed.

Ye han erred; for ye han brought with you, to your conseil, ire, covetise, and hastifnesse, the which three things ben contrary to every conseil honest and profitable: the which three things ye ne han not anientissed or destroyed. Chaucer, Melib.

ANIGHT.* adv. In the night. An old expression, used by Chaucer, and not lost in Shakspeare's time.

To wetin, if that any strange wight
With tempest thither were iblowe anight.

Chaucer, Leg. of Hyp. 108.

I broke my sword upon a stone, and bid him take that for coming anight to Jane Smile.

Shakspeare, As you Like it, ii. 4.

ANIGHTS.† adv. [from a for at, and night; or on nights; as anights was anciently written.] In the night time.

Sir Toby, you must come in earlier anights; my lady takes great exceptions at your ill hours. Shakspeare.

The turnkey now his flock returning sees,
Duly let out anights to steal for fees!

Swift, Description of Morning.

A'NIL. n. s. The shrub from whose leaves and stalks indigo is prepared.

ANILENESS.† } n. s. [anilitas, Lat.] The state of ANILITY. } being an old woman; the old age of women. Anility is not confined to the feminine character, as Dr. Johnson would imply. It means dotage in general, in our elder dictionaries.

Since the day in which the Reformation was begun, by how many strange and critical turns has it been perfected and handed down, if not entirely without spot or wrinkle, at least without blotches or marks of anility.

Sterne's Sermon on the Inauguration of K. Geo. III.

A'NIMABLE. adj. [from animate.] That which may be put into life, or receive animation. Dict.

ANIMADVE'RSAL.* n. s. [from animadvert.] That which has the power of perceiving and judging.

That lively inward animadversal: it is the soul itself; for I cannot conceive the body doth animadvert; when as objects, plainly exposed to the sight; are not discovered till the soul takes notice of them. More, Song of the Soul, Notes p. 422.

ANIMADVE'RSION. n. s. [animadversio, Lat.]

1. Reproof; severe censure; blame.

He dismissed their commissioners with severe and sharp animadversions. Clarendon.

VOL. I.

2. Punishment. When the object of animadversion is mentioned, it has the particle on or upon before it.

When a bill is debating in parliament, it is usual to have the controversy handled by pamphlets on both sides; without the least animadversion upon the authours. Swift.

3. In law.

An ecclesiastical censure, and an ecclesiastical animadversion, are different things; for a censure has a relation to a spiritual punishment, but an animadversion has only a respect to a temporal one; as, degradation, and the delivering the person over to the secular court. Alyffe, Parergon.

4. Perception; power of notice: not in use.

The soul is the sole percipient which hath animadversion and sense properly so called. Glanville.

ANIMADVE'RSIVE. adj. [from animadvert.] That has the power of perceiving; percipient: not in use.

The representation of objects to the soul, the only animadversive principle, is conveyed by motions made on the immediate organs of sense. Glanville.

ANIMADVE'RSIVENESS. n. s. [from animadversive.] The power of animadverting, or making judgement. Dict.
TO ANIMADVERT.† v. n. [animadverto, Lat.]

1. To pass censures upon.

I should not animadvert on him, who was a painful observer of the decorum of the stage, if he had not used extreme severity in his judgement of the incomparable Shakspeare. Dryden.

2. To inflict punishments. In both senses with the particle upon.

If the Authour of the universe animadverts upon men here below, how much more will it become him to do it upon their entrance into a higher state of being. Grew.

3. Used also without the particle.

It is the soul itself; for I cannot conceive the body doth animadvert, when, as objects, plainly exposed to the sight, are not discovered till the soul takes notice of them.

More, Song of the Soul, Notes p. 422.

ANIMADVE'RTER.† n. s. [from animadvert.] He that passes censures, or inflicts punishments.

In these animadversions, saith he, I find the mention of old cloaks, false beards, night-walkers, and salt lotion; therefore the animadverter haunts playhouses and bordelloes; for if he did not, how could he speak of such geer?

Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

God is a strict observer of, and a severe animadverter upon, such as presume to partake of those mysteries, without such a preparation. South.

A'NIMAL. n. s. [animal, Lat.]

1. A living creature corporeal, distinct, on the one side, from pure spirit; on the other, from mere matter.

Animals are such beings, which, besides the power of growing, and producing their like, as plants and vegetables have, are endowed also with sensation and spontaneous motion. Mr. Ray gives two schemes of tables of them.

Animals are either

Sanguineous, that is, such as have blood, which breathe either by

Lungs, having either

{ Two ventricles in their heart, and those either

{ Viviparous,

{ Aquatick, as the whale kind,

{ Terrestrial, as quadrupeds;

{ Oviparous, as birds.

But one ventricle in the heart, as frogs, tortoises, and serpents.

Gills, as all sanguineous fishes, except the whale kind.

Exsanguineous, or without blood, which may be divided into Greater, and those either,

{ Naked,

{ Terrestrial, as naked snails.
{ Aquatick, as the poulp, cuttle-fish, &c.

{ Covered with a tegument; either

{ Crustaceous, as lobsters and crab-fish.

{ Testaceous, either

{ Univalve, as limpets;

{ Bivalve, as oysters, muscles, cockles;

{ Turbinate, as periwinkles, snails, &c.

Lesser, as insects of all sorts.

Viviparous hairy animals, or quadrupeds, are either

{ Hoofed, which are either

{ Whole-footed or hoofed, as the horse and ass:

{ Cloven-footed, having the hoof divided into

{ Two principle parts, called bisulca, either

{ Such as chew not the cud, as swine;

{ Ruminant, or such as chew the cud; divided into

{ Such as have perpetual and hollow horns.

{ Beef-kind,

{ Sheep-kind,

{ Goat-kind.

{ Such as have solid, branched and deciduous horns, as the deer-kind.

Four parts, or quadrisulca, as the rhinoceros and hippopotamus.

Clawed or digitate, having the foot divided into { Two parts or toes, having two nails, as the camel kind;

{ Many toes or claws; either

{ Undivided, as the elephant;

{ Divided, which have either

{ Broad nails, and an human shape, as apes:

{ Narrower, and more pointed nails;

which, in respect of their teeth, are divided into such as have { Many fore-teeth, or cutters in each jaw;

{ The greater which have

{ A shorter snout and rounder head, as the cat-kind;

{ A longer snout and head, as the dog-kind.

{ The lesser, the vermin or weazel kind.

Only two large and remarkable fore-teeth, all which are phytivorous, and are called the hare kind. Ray.

Vegetables are proper enough to repair animals, as being near of the same specifick gravity with the animal juices, and as consisting of the same parts with animal substances, spirit, water, salt, oil, earth; all which are contained in the sap they derive from the earth. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Some of the animated substances have various organical or instrumental parts, fitted for a variety of motions from place to place, and a spring of life within themselves, as beasts, birds, fishes, and insects; these are called animals. Other animated substances are called vegetables, which have within themselves the principles of another sort of life and growth, and of various productions of leaves and fruit, such as we see in plants, herbs, and trees. Watts, Logick.

2. By way of contempt, we say of a stupid man, that he is a stupid animal.

A'NIMAL. adj. [animalis, Lat.]

1. That which belongs or relates to animals.

There are things in the world of spirits, wherein our ideas are very dark and confused; such as their union with animal nature, the way of their acting on material beings, and their converse with each other. Watts, Logick.

2. Animal functions, distinguished from natural and vital, are the lower powers of the mind, as, the will, memory, and imagination.

3. Animal life is opposed, on one side, to intellectual, and, on the other, to vegetable.

4. Animal is used in opposition to spiritual or rational, as, the animal nature.

A'NIMALCULE. n. s. [animalculum, Lat.] A small animal; particularly those which are in their first and smallest state.

We are to know that they all come of the seed of animalcules of their own kind, that were before laid there. Ray.

A'NIMALITY. n. s. [from animal.] The state of animal existence.

All the parts serving in any wise to animality, must be suddenly and irrecoverably smitten, and cease from their several uses. Smith, Old Age, p. 222.

The word animal first only signifies human animality. In the minor proposition, the word animal, for the same reason, signifies the animality of a goose: thereby it becomes an ambiguous term, and unfit to build the conclusion upon. Watts.

To A'NIMATE. v. a. [animo, Lat.]

1. To quicken; to make alive; to give life to: as, the soul animates the body; man must have been animated by a higher power.

2. To give powers to; to heighten the powers or effect of any thing.

But none, ah! none can animate the lyre,
And the mute strings with vocal souls inspire;
Whether the learn'd Minerva be her theme,
Or chaste Diana bathing in the stream;
None can record their heav'nly praise so well
As Helen, in whose eyes ten thousand Cupids dwell. Dryden.

3. To encourage; to incite.

The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might be best heard, and cried unto them with a loud voice. Knolles.

He was animated to expect the papacy, by the prediction of a soothsayer, that one should succeed Pope Leo, whose name should be Adrian. Bacon.

A'NIMATE. adj. [from To animate.] Alive; possessing animal life.

All bodies have spirits and pneumatical parts within them; but the main differences between animate and inanimate, are two: the first is, that the spirit of things animate are all contained within themselves, and are branched in veins and secret canals, as blood is; and, in living creatures, the spirits have not only branches, but certain cells or seats, where the principal spirits do reside, and whereunto the rest do resort: but the spirits in things inanimate are shut in, and cut off by the tangible parts, and are not pervious one to another, as air is in snow. Bacon.

Nobler birth

Of creatures animate with gradual life,
Of growth, sense, reason, all summ'd up in man. Milton.

There are several topicks used against atheism and idolatry; such as the visible marks of divine wisdom and goodness in the works of the creation, the vital union of souls with matter, and the admirable structure of animate bodies. Bentley.

A'NIMATED. part. adj. [from animate.] Lively; vigorous.

Warriours she fires with animated sounds;
Pours balm into the bleeding lover's wounds. Pope.

A'NIMATENESS. n. s. [from animate.] The state of being animated. Dict.

A'NIMATION. n. s. [from animate.]

1. The act of animating or enlivening.
Plants or vegetables are the principal part of the third day's work. They are the first product, which is the word of animation. Bacon.

2. The state of being enlivened.

Two general motions in all animation are its beginning and encrease; and two more to run through its state and declination.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

A'NIMATIVE. adj. [from animate.] That which has the power of giving life, or animating.

A'NIMATOR. n. s. [from animate.] That which gives life; or any thing analogous to life, as motion.

Those bodies being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their motor, and, if not fettered by their gravity, conform themselves to situations, wherein they best unite to their animator.

Broun.

A'NIMO'SE. † adj. [Fr. animeux.] Full of spirit; hot; vehement; resolute.

Dict.

A'NIMO'SENESS. n. s. [from animose.] Spirit; heat; vehemence of temper.

Dict.

A'NIMO'SITY. † n. s. [Fr. animosité, Lat. animositas.] But the old Fr. considers the word as implying only courage, resolution, and hardiness. See Cotgrave. The modern French is spite or malice. Vehemence of hatred; passionate malignity. It implies rather the disposition to break out into outrages, than the outrage itself.

They were sure to bring passion, animosity, and malice enough of their own, what evidence soever they had from others.

Clarendon.

If there is not some method found out for alaying these heats and animosities among the fair sex, one does not know to what outrages they may proceed.

Addison.

No religious sect ever carried their aversions for each other to greater heights than our state parties have done; who, the more to inflame their passions, have mixed religious and civil animosities together; borrowing one of their appellations from the church.

Swift.

A'NISE. n. s. [anisum, Lat.] A species of apium or parsley, with large sweet scented seeds. This plant is not worth propagating in England for use, because the seeds can be had much better and cheaper from Italy.

Miller.

Ye pay little of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgement, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

Matt. xxiii. 23.

A'NKER. n. s. [ancker, Dut.] A liquid measure chiefly used at Amsterdam. It is the fourth part of the awme, and contains two stekans: each stekan consists of sixteen mengles; the mengle being equal to two of our wine quarts.

Chambers.

A'NKLE. n. s. [ancleop, Sax. anckel Dutch.] The joint which joins the foot to the leg.

One of his ankles was much swelled and ulcerated on the inside, in several places.

Wiseman.

My simple system shall suppose,
That Alma enters at the toes;
That then she mounts by just degrees
Up to the ankles, legs and knees.

Prior.

A'NKLED.  adj.* Relating to the ankles.

Say he be black, he's of a very good pitch,
Well ankled, two good confident calves.

Beaum. and Fl. Wit at sev. Weapons, i. 1.

A'NKLE-BONE. n. s. [from ankle and bone.] The bone of the ankle.

The shin-bone, from the knee to the instep, is made by shadowing one half of the leg with a single shadow, the ankle-bone will shew itself by a shadow given underneath, as the knee.

Peacham.

A'NNAL.  n. s.* See ANNALS.

A'NNALIST. † n. s. [old Fr. annaliste.] A writer of annals.

This is the sum of what passed in three years against the Danes, returning out of France, set down so perplexly by the Saxon annalist.

Milton, Hist. of Eng. b. v.

Their own annalist has given the same title to that of Syriani.

Atterbury.

A'NNALS. † n. s. [Without singular number, Lat. annales, Dr. Johnson says; but he is mistaken. Annal occurs in our best authors.] History digested in the exact order of time; narratives in which every event is recorded under its proper year.

Huntingdon, as his manner is to comment upon the annal text, makes a terrible description of that fight between Cuthred and Ethelbald.

Milton, Hist. of Eng. b. iv.

To follow him in the pace that nature lent him, his life; or to the place where nature left him, his death; deserveth a various and curious tract; and were rather an annal, than an annual remembrance, to think hereby to add to him reputation.

Dr. Price's Sermon on Prince Henry's Death, (1613) p. 3.

Ye warlike dead, who fell of old!

In Britain's cause, by fame enroll'd

In deathless annal, deathless deeds inspire!

Young, Sea-Piece, Od. 2.

Whether it be a last year's annal; a general history of England; or the present state of all mankind; it is undertaken with equal confidence, and finished with equal success.

Warburton on Prodiges, p. 59.

Could you with patience bear, or I relate,

O nymph! the tedious annals of our fate!

Through such a train of woes if I should run,

The day would sooner than the tale be done!

Dryden.

We are assured, by many glorious examples in the annals of our religion, that every one, in the like circumstances of distress, will not act and argue thus; but thus will every one be tempted to act.

Rogers.

To A'NNALIZE.  v. a.* [from annal.] To record.

Observe the miracle, deserving a Baronius to annalize it.

Sheldon, Mir. of Antichrist, p. 332.

A'NNATS. † n. s. [Without singular, annates, Lat.]

1. First fruits; because the rate of first fruits, paid of spiritual livings, is after one year's profit.

Coxwell.

Which annates, or first fruits, were first suffered to be taken within the realm, for the only defence of Christian people against the Infidels.

Acts of Parl. 33 ann. H. VIII. 31.

Those the council of Basil damned the payment of annats, yet they were paid here till Hen. VIII. annexed them for ever to the crown.

Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 172.

2. Masses said in the Romish church for the space of a year, or for any other time, either for the soul of a person deceased, or for the benefit of a person living.

Ayliffe, Parerg.

To ANNE'AL. † v. a. [Sax. anaelan, to heat, to inflame.]

1. To heat glass, that the colours laid on it may fix.

But when thou dost anneal in glass thy story,

then the light and glory

More rev'rend grows, and more doth win,

Which else shews waterish, bleak, and thin.

Herbert.

When you purpose to anneal, take a plate of iron made fit for the oven; or take a blue stone, which being made fit for the oven, lay it upon the cross bars of iron.

Peacham.

Which her own inward symmetry reveal'd,

And like a picture shone in glass anneal'd.

Dryden.

2. To heat glass after it is blown, that it may not break.

3. To heat any thing in such a manner as to give it the true temper.

ANNE'ALING.  n. s.* [from anneal.] The art of tempering glass. It is called by the workmen nealing. It is mentioned by Sir William Petty as one of the "several sorts of colorations now commonly used in human affairs, and as vulgar trades in these nations."

12. Enameling and anealing.*Sprat, Hist. of the Royal Soc. p. 286.*To ANNEX. v. a. [annecto, annexum, Lat. annexer, Fr.]

1. To unite to at the end; as, he annexed a codicil to his will.
2. To unite; as, a smaller thing to a greater; as, he annexed a province to his kingdom.
3. To unite à posteriori; annexion always presupposing something; thus, we may say, punishment is annexed to guilt; but not guilt to punishment.

Concerning fate or destiny, the opinions of those learned men, that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general and universally powerful than it is.

Raleigh.

Nations will decline so low
From virtue, which is reason, that no wrong,
But justice, and some fatal curse annex'd,
Deprives them of their outward liberty.

Milton.

I mean not the authority, which is annexed to your office;
I speak of that only which is inborn and inherent to your person.

Dryden.

He cannot but love virtue wherever it is, and annex happiness always to the exercise of it.

Atterbury.

The temporal reward is annexed to the bare performance of the action, but the eternal to the obedience.

Rogers.

ANNEX. n. s. [from To annex.] The thing annexed; additament.

Failing in his first attempt to be but like the highest in heaven, he hath obtained of men to be the same on earth, and hath accordingly assumed the annexes of divinity.

Brown.

ANNEXARY.* n. s. [from annex.] Addition.

The lay people of all sorts, both men and women, both single and married, do inroll themselves into one or more of these societies, approaching so much nearer to the state of the clergy; unto which sundry of them are no other than annexaries and appurtenances.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

ANNEXATION.† n. s. [from annex.]

1. Conjunction; addition.

For the patrimonies of both crowns, I see no annexation will arise; except your majesty would be pleased to make one compounded annexation, for an inseparable patrimony, to the crown, out of the lands of both nations.

Bacon on the Union of Eng. and Scotland.

If we can return to that charity and peaceable mindedness, which Christ so vehemently recommends to us, we have his own promise, that the whole body will be full of light, Matt. vi. that all other christian virtues will, by way of concomitance or annexation, attend them.

Hammond.

2. Union; act or practice of adding or uniting.

How annexations of benefices first came into the church, whether by the prince's authority, or the pope's licence, is a very great dispute.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

The dean of Windsor, by an ancient annexation, is patron thereof.

Bp. Hall, Specialties of his Life, p. 27.

ANNEXION. n. s. [from annex.] The act of annexing; addition.

It is necessary to engage the fears of men, by the annexion of such penalties as will overbalance temporal pleasure.

Rogers.

ANNEXMENT. n. s. [from annex.]

1. The act of annexing.
2. The thing annexed.

- When it falls,

Each small annexment, petty consequence,
Attends the boisterous ruin.

Shakspeare.

ANNIHILABLE.† adj. [from annihilate.] That which may be reduced to nothing; that which may be put out of existence.

Is not this contradicting himself, for a man to affirm (as Cartes does in all his writings) that the world was created by God and depends on him, and yet at the same time to declare that it implies as plain a contradiction to suppose any part of matter annihilable by the power of God, as to suppose that two and three should not make five?

Clarke's Evidences, Pref. p. 137

To ANNIHILATE. v. a. [ad and nihilum, Lat.]

1. To reduce to nothing; to put out of existence.

It is impossible for any body to be utterly annihilat'd; but that as it was the work of the omnipotency of God, to make somewhat of nothing; so it requireth the like omnipotency to turn somewhat into nothing.

Baron.

Thou taught'st me, by making me

Love her, who doth neglect both me and thee,

T' invent and practise this one way, t' annihilate all three.

Donne.

He despaired of God's mercy; he, by a decollation of all hope, annihilated his mercy.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Whose friendship can stand against assaults, strong enough to annihilate the friendship of puny minds; such an one has reached true constancy.

South.

Some imagined, water sufficient to a deluge was created, and, when the business was done, disbanded, and annihilated.

Woodward.

2. To destroy, so as to make the thing otherwise than it was.

The flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated, this place, so as no man can find any mark or memory thereof.

Raleigh.

3. To annul; to destroy the agency of any thing.

There is no reason, that any one commonwealth should annihilate that whereupon the whole world has agreed.

Hooker.

ANNIHILATE.* adj. [Formerly written adnihilate, as the verb and substantive also were.] Annihilated.

What is then become of those immense bales of paper, which must needs have been employed in such numbers of books? Can these also be wholly annihilate?

Swift, Tale of a Tub, Ded.

Any of which, by the smallest transposal or misapplication, is utterly annihilate.

Ibid. Pref.

ANNIHILATION. n. s. [from annihilate.] The act of reducing to nothing. The state of being reduced to nothing.

God hath his influence into the very essence of things, without which their utter annihilation could not choose but follow.

Hooker.

That knowledge, which as spirits we obtain,
Is to be valu'd in the midst of pain:

Annihilation were to lose heav'n more:

We are not quite exil'd, where thought can soar.

Dryden.

ANNIVERSARILY.* adv. Annually.

A day was appointed by publick authority to be kept anniversarily sacred unto the memory of that deliverance and victory.

Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 312.

ANNIVERSARY. n. s. [anniversarius, Lat.]

1. A day celebrated as it returns in the course of the year.

For encouragement to follow the example of martyrs, the primitive christians met at the places of their martyrdom, to praise God for them, and to observe the anniversary of their sufferings.

Stillingfleet.

2. The act of celebration, or performance, in honour of the anniversary day.

Donne had never seen Mrs. Drury, whom he has made immortal in his admirable anniversaries.

Dryden.

3. Anniversary is an office in the Romish church, celebrated not only once a-year, but which ought to be said daily through the year, for the soul of the deceased.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

ANNIVERSARY. adj. [anniversarius, Lat.] Returning with the revolution of the year; annual; yearly.

The heaven whirled about with admirable celerity, most constantly finishing its anniversary vicissitudes.

Ray.

They deny giving any worship to a creature, as inconsistent with christianity; but confess the honour and esteem for the martyrs, which they expressed by keeping their anniversary days, and recommending their example.

Stillingfleet.

A'NNIVERSE.* n. s. Anniversary.

It seems as if they sent the new-born guest
To wait on the procession of their feast;
And on their sacred anniversary decreed
To stamp their image on the promis'd seed.

Dryden, Brit. Red. ver. 29.

Who shall presume to mourn thee, Donne, unless
He could his tears in thy expressions dress,
And teach his grief that reverence of thy hearse,
To weep lines learned as thy anniversary.

Mayne on the Death of Donne.

A'NNO DOMINI.† [Lat.] In the year of our Lord; as, anno domini, or A. D. 1751; that is, in the seventeen hundred and fifty-first year from the birth of our Saviour.

Stadlin's within:

She raises all your sudden ruinous storms
That shipwreck barks; and tears up growing oaks;
Flies over houses; and takes Anno Domini
Out of a rich man's chimney.

Middleton's Witch, i. 2.

ANNO'ISANCE. n. s. [from annoy, but not now in use.]

It hath a double signification. Any hurt done either to a publick place, as highway, bridge, or common river, or to a private, by laying any thing that may breed infection, by encroaching, or such like means. The writ that is brought upon this transgression. See NUISANCE, the word now used.

Blount.

ANNOLIS. n. s. An American animal, like a lizard.ANNOMINA'TION. [Barb. Lat. annominatio.] Alliteration. See AGNOMINATION.

Giraldus Cambrensis speaks of annomination, which he describes to be what we call alliteration, as the favourite rhetorical figure both of the Welsh and English in his time.

Tyrrhitt, Ess. on the Lang. of Chaucer, § 1. n.

To A'NNOTATE.* v. n. [Lat. annoto, Fr. annoter.]

To make annotations. An useful word, hitherto unnoticed by our lexicographers; which I find in a very strange and obscure tract; and which Johnson adopts in his definition of the verb comment.

Give me leave to annotate on the words thus.

Live's Orat. p. 26.

ANNO'ATION.† n. s. [annotatio, Lat.] Explications or remarks written upon books; notes. Formerly, "a mark, note, or sign, whereby to know a thing."

Hudoe.

How shamefully are the bibles handled, which now hath neither annotations nor table.

Bale's Yet a Course at the Romyshe Foxe, fol. 7. (1543).

It might appear very improper to publish annotations, without the text itself whereunto they relate.

Boyle.

ANNO'ATIONIST.* n. s. [from annotation.] A writer of notes; a commentator.

How fitly the Saracens are resembled to locusts, or scorpion-tail'd locusts, in Apocal. ix. 3. 5. 10. (as the like is also said of the Turks, ver. 19.) Mr. Mede hath with far more clearness shewn, than the annotationists of the new way have discovered.

Worthington's Miscell. p. 58.

A'NNOTATOR.† n. s. [Lat.] A writer of notes, or annotations; a scholiast; a commentator.

Our countryman, Cardinal Allen, and the Rhemish annotators.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 217.

The contexture of this discourse will perhaps be the less subject to ravel out, if I hem it with the speech of our learned and pious annotator.

Spencer on Prodiges, p. 202.

I have not that respect for the annotators, which they generally meet with in the world.

Felton on the Classics.

The observations of faults and beauties is one of the duties of an annotator, which some of Shakspeare's editors have attempted, and some have neglected.

Dr. Johnson, Prop. for print. Shakspeare.

To ANNOUNCE. v. a. [annoncer, Fr. annuncio, Lat.]

1. To publish; to proclaim.

Of the Messiah I have heard foretold
By all the prophets; of thy birth at length
Announc'd by Gabriel with the first I knew.

Milton.

2. To pronounce; to declare by a judicial sentence.

Those, mighty Jove, new-born, thy glorious care,
Who model nations, publish laws, announce
Or life or death.

Prior.

ANNOUNCEMENT.* n. s. [Fr. annoncement.] In our old dictionaries announcing is found, instead of this word, which is quite of modern use.] A declaration; an advertisement; a notification.ANNOUN'CE. n. s. [Fr. annonceur.] A declarer; a proclaimer; an advertiser; a bringer of news; a carrier of tidings.

Cotgr.

To ANNOY. v. a. [annoyer, Fr.] To incommode; to vex; to tease; to molest.

Woe to poor man; each outward thing annoys him;
He heaps in inward grief, that most destroys him.

Sidney.

Her joyous presence and sweet company,
In full content he there did long enjoy;

Ne wicked envy, nor vile jealousy,
His dear delights were able to annoy.

Spenser, F. Q.

As one who long in populous city pent,
Where houses thick, and sewers, annoy the air,
Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe
Among the pleasant villages, and farms
Adjoin'd, from each thing met conceives delight.

Milton.

Insects seldom use their offensive weapons, unless provoked:
let them but alone, and annoy them not.

Ray.

ANNOY.† n. s. [old Fr. anoi, annoy.] Injury; molestation; trouble.

Sleep, Richmond, sleep in peace, and wake in joy;

Good angels guard thee from the boar's annoy.

Shakspeare.

All pain and joy is in their way;

The things we fear bring less annoy
Than fear, and hope brings greater joy;

But in themselves they cannot stay.

Dowd.

What then remains, but, after past annoy,

To take the good vicissitude of joy.

Dryden.

ANNOYANCE. n. s. [from annoy.]

1. That which annoys; that which hurts.

A grain, a dust, a gnat, a wandering hair,
Any annoyance in that precious sense.

Shakspeare.

Crows, ravens, rooks, and magpies, are great annoyances to corn.

Mortimer.

2. The state of being annoyed; or act of annoying.

The spit venom of their poisoned hearts breaketh out to the annoyance of others.

Hooker.

The greatest annoyance and disturbance of mankind, has been from one of those two things, force or fraud.

Saunders.

For the further annoyance and terror of any besieged place they would throw into it dead bodies.

W. R. S.

ANNOYER.† n. s. [from annoy, an old English substantive, in Sherwood.] The person that annoys.ANNOYFUL. adj. [This adjective, and its cognate annoyous, have been employed, in our old language, by the same etymological analogy as joyful and joyous are from joy.] Full of annoy or trouble.

For all be it so, that all things are annoy'd, algaes it is not to repave in yaving of judgement, ne in vengeance taking, when it is sufficient and reasonable.

Chaucer, Melib.

ANNOYOUS.* adj. [Old Fr. adoleus.] Troublesome.

Ye ban eloped to your counsel a gret multitude of people, ful chargeant and ful annoyous for to here.

Chaucer, Melib.

ANNUAL. adj. [annuel, Fr. from annus, Lat.]

1. That which comes yearly.

Annual let me, the grape, the rose, renew,
The juice tartareous, and the balmy dew.

Pope.

2. That which is reckoned by the year.

The king's majesty

Doth pay your honour to you; to which

A N N

A thousand pounds a-year, annual support,
Out of his grace he adds. Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

3. That which lasts only a year.

The dying in the winter of the roots of plants that are annual, seemeth to be caused by the over-expend of the sap; which being prevented, they will superannuate, if they stand warm. Bacon.

Every tree may, in some sense, be said to be an annual plant, both leaf, flower, and fruit, proceeding from the coat that was superinduced over the wood the last year. Ray.

ANNUALLY. adv. [from annual.] Yearly; every year.

By two drachms, they thought it sufficient to signify a heart; because the heart at one year weigheth two drachms, that is, a quarter of an ounce; and unto fifty years annually encreaseth the weight of one drachm. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

The whole strength of a nation is the utmost that a prince can raise annually from his subjects. Swift.

ANNUARY.* adj. [Lat. annuus.] Annual.

Supply anew

With annuary cloaks the wandering Jew.

John Hall, Poems, p. 10.

ANNUITANT. † n. s. [from annuity.] He that possesses or receives an annuity.

Whence shall we furnish materials for the meditation of the glutton between his meals, of a sportsman in a rainy month, of the annuitant between the days of quarterly payment?

Idler, No. 24.

ANNUITY. n. s. [annuité, Fr.]

1. A yearly rent to be paid for term of life or years.

The differences between a rent and an annuity are, that every rent is going out of land; but an annuity charges only the granter, or his heirs, that have assets by descent. The second difference is, that, for the recovery of an annuity, no action lies, but only the writ of annuity against the granter, his heirs, or successors; but of a rent, the same actions lie as do of land. The third difference is, that an annuity is never taken for assets, because it is no freehold in law; nor shall be put in execution upon a statute merchant, statute staple, or elegit, as a rent may. Coxell.

2. A yearly allowance.

He was generally known to be the son of one earl, and brother to another, who supplied his expence, beyond what his annuity from his father would bear. Clarendon.

To ANNU'L. v. a. [old Fr. adnullier, adnuller.]

1. To make void; to nullify; to abrogate; to abolish.

That which gives force to the law, is the authority that enacts it; and whoever destroys this authority, does, in effect, annul the law. Rogers.

2. To reduce to nothing; to obliterate.

Light the pure work of God to me's extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annul'd, which might in part my grief have eas'd. Milton.

ANNULAR. † [Fr. annulaire, from annulus, Lat.]

In the form of a ring.

That they might not, in bending the arm or leg, rise up, he has tied them to the bones by annular ligaments. Cheyne.

ANNULARY. † adj. [Fr. annulaire, from annulus, Lat.]

In the form of rings.

Because continual respiration is necessary, the wind-pipe is made with annulary cartilages, that the sides of it may not flag and fall together. Ray.

ANNULET. n. s. [from annulus, Lat.]

1. A little ring.

2. [In heraldry.] A difference or mark of distinction, which the fifth brother of any family ought to bear in his coat of arms.

3. Annulets are also a part of the coat-armour of several families; they were anciently reputed a mark of nobility and jurisdiction, it being the custom of prelates to receive their investiture per baculum & annulum.

4. [In architecture.] The small square members, in the Dorick capital, under the quarter round, are called annul-ts.

5. Annulet is also used for a narrow flat moulding common to other parts of the column; so called, because it encompasses the column round. Chambers.

ANNU'LEMENT.* n. s. [Fr. annullement.] The act of annulling.

To ANNU'MERATE. v. a. [annumero, Lat.] To add to a former number; to unite to something beforementioned.

ANNUMERATION. n. s. [annumeratio, Lat.] Addition to a former number.

To ANNUNCIATE. † v. a. [annuncio, Lat.] To bring tidings; to relate something that has fallen out: a word not in popular use, as Dr. Johnson observes; but formerly of established usage, as our old dictionaries shew.

Lo Sampson, which that was annunciat

By the angel, long or his nativee. Chaucer, Monk's Tale.

There [in the almanack] should he see his blessed Saviour's conception annuntiated by the angel, March 25.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 33.

They who did foretell the birth of John, the fore-runner of Christ; they who did annunciate unto the blessed Virgin the conception of the Saviour of the world, — they have a constant and a perpetual relation to the children of God.

Pearson, on the Creed, Art. 9.

Let my death be thus annunciated and shewn forth till I come to judgement. Bp. Bull, Corrupt. of the Ch. of Rome.

ANNUNCIATION. † n. s. [Fr. annonciation.]

1. The name given to the day celebrated by the church, in memory of the angel's salutation of the blessed Virgin; solemnized with us on the twenty-fifth of March.

Upon the day of the annunciation, or Lady-day, meditate on the incarnation of our blessed Saviour: and so upon all the festivals of the year. Bp. Taylor.

2. Proclamation; promulgation.

The annunciation of the Gospel. Hammond's Sermon, p. 173.

ANODYNE. † adj. [from an and odyn, Fr. anodin, "remedes anodins," Cotgrave.] That which has the power of mitigating pain.

The anodyne draught of oblivion, thus drugged, is well calculated to preserve a galling wakefulness. Burke.

ANODYNE.* n. s. A medicine which assuages pain. [The two examples, which follow, are those given improperly by Dr. Johnson, as Mr. Mason has observed, to the adjective.]

Yet durst she not too deeply probe the wound,

As hoping still the nobler parts were sound:

But strove with anodynes to assuage the smart,

And mildly thus her medicine did impart. Dryden.

Anodynes, or abaters of pain of the alimentary kind, are such things as relax the tension of the affected nervous fibres, as decoctions of emollient substances; those things which destroy the particular acrimony which occasions the pain, or what deadens the sensation of the brain, by procuring sleep. Arbuthnot.

To ANOINT. v. u. [oindre, enoindre; part. oint, enoint, Fr.]

1. To rub over with unctuous matter, as oil, or unguents.

Anointed let me be with deadly venom. Shakespeare.

Thou shalt have olive trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil: for thine olive shall cast his fruit. Deut. xxviii. 40.

2. To smear; to be rubbed upon.

Warm waters then in brazen caldrons borne,
Are pour'd to wash his body, joint by joint,
And fragrant oils the stiffen'd limbs anoint.

Dryden.

3. To consecrate by unction.

I would not see thy sister,
In his anointed flesh stick boarish fangs.

Shakspeare.

ANO'INTER.† n. s. [from anoint.] The person that anoints.

At Watlington, in Oxfordshire, there was a sect called Anointers, from their anointing people before they admitted them into their communion. Dr. Plot's Oxfordshire, chap. xxxviii.
Grey's Notes on Hudibras, 3. 2.

ANO'INTING.* n. s. [from anoint.] Anointment; the act of anointing.

Their bathings and anointings before their feasts, their perfumes and sweet odours in diverse kinds at their feasts.

Hakewill's Apology, p. 390.

All the accomplishments and treasures of amorous delicacy, as sweet washings, anointings, clothings with embroidery, &c.
Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 23.

ANO'INTMENT.* n. s. The state of being anointed.

That sovran lord, who, in the discharge of his holy anointment from God the Father, which made him supreme bishop of our souls, was so humble as to say, Who made me a judge or divider over you?

Milton, Animadv. Rem. Def.

ANO'MALISM. n. s. [from anomaly.] Anomaly; irregularity; deviation from the common rule. Dict.

ANOMALISTICAL. adj. [from anomaly.] Irregular; applied in astronomy to the year, taken for the time in which the earth passeth through its orbit, distinct from the tropical year.

ANO'MALOUS.† adj. [a priv. and ἀνόμας, Fr. anomal.]

Irregular; out of rule; deviating from the general method or analogy of things: it is applied, in grammar, to words deviating from the common rules of inflection; and, in astronomy, to the seemingly irregular motions of the planets.

There will arise anomalous disturbances not only in civil and artificial, but also in military officers. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

He being acquainted with some characters of every speech, you may at pleasure make him understand anomalous pronunciation.

Holder.

Metals are gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, and iron: to which we may join that anomalous body, quicksilver or mercury.

Locke.

ANO'MALOUSLY. adv. [from anomalous.] Irregularly; in a manner contrary to rule.

Eve was not solemnly begotten, but suddenly framed, and anomalously proceeded from Adam. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

ANO'MALOUSNESS.* n. s. [from anomalous.] Irregularity.

ANOMALY.† n. s. [anomalie, Fr. anomalie, Lat. ἀνὸμαλῶς.] Irregularity; deviation from the common rule.

The vulgar pronunciation of this letter hath diverse anomalies.

Butler, Eng. Gr. (1633.) p. 26.

If we should chance to find a mother debauching her daughter, as such monsters have been seen, we must charge this upon a peculiar anomaly and baseness of nature.

South.

I do not pursue the many pseudographies in use, but intend to shew how most of these anomalies in writing might be avoided and better supplied.

Holder.

A'NOMY.† n. s. [a priv. and νόμος, Fr. anomie.] Breach of law.

If sin be good, and just, and lawful, it is no more evil, it is no sin, no anomy.

Bramhall against Hobbes.

The delights of the body betray us, through our over indulgence to them, and lead us captive to anomy and disobedience.

Glauville's Praer. of Souls, ch. 14.

Iniquity, in the Greek text, is ἀνομία, anomy; or a life without law.

Shelford's Discourses, p. 269.

ANON.† adv. [Junius imagines it to be an elliptical form of speaking for in one, that is, in one minute;

Skinner from a and nean, or near; Minsheu from on. It seems to be the Sax. an, meaning one, and on meaning in. In an old romance I have seen it written onane. So Gawen Douglas writes it, (on ane,) according to Mr. Tooke.]

1. Quickly; soon; in a short time.

A little snow, tumbled about,

Anon becomes a mountain.

Shakspeare.

Will they come abroad anon?

Shall we see young Oberon?

B. Jonson.

However, witness, Heaven!

Heaven, witness thou anon! while we discharge

Freely our part.

Milton.

He was not without design at that present, as shall be made out anon: meaning by that device to withdraw himself.

Clay.

Still as I did the leaves inspire,

With such a purple light they shone.

As if they had been made of fire,

And spreading so, would flame anon.

Wallis.

2. Sometimes; now and then; at other times. In this sense is used ever and anon, for now and then.

Full forty days he pass'd, whether on hill

Sometimes, anon in shady vale, each night,

Or harbour'd in one cave, is not revealed.

Milton.

ANO'NYMOUS. adj. [a priv. and ὄνομα.] Wanting a name.

These animalcules serve also for food to another anonymous insect of the waters.

Rau.

They would forthwith publish slanders unpunished, the authors being anonymous, the immediate publishers thereof sculking.

Notes on the Dunclad.

ANO'NYMOUSLY. adv. [from anonymous.] Without a name.

I would know, whether the edition is to come out anonymously, among complaints or spurious editions.

Swift.

ANOREXY. n. s. [ἀνορεξία.] Inappetency, or loathing of food.

Quincy.

ANO'THER.† adj. [Goth. anþar, another.]

1. Not the same.

He that will not lay a foundation for perpetual disorder, must of necessity find another rise of government than that.

Locke.

2. One more; a new addition to the former number.

— A fourth? —

What! will the line stretch out to th' crack of doom?

Another yet? — a seventh! I'll see no more.

Shakspeare.

3. Any other; any one else.

If one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him.

1 Samuel, ii. 25.

Why not of her? prefer'd above the rest,

By him with nightly deeds, and open love profess'd;

So had another been, where he his vows address'd.

Dryden.

4. Not one's self.

A man shall have diffused his life, his self, and his whole concerns so far, that he can weep his sorrows with another's eyes; when he has another heart besides his own, both to share, and to support his grief.

South.

5. Widely different: much altered.

When the soul is beaten from its station, and the mounds of virtue are broken down, it becomes quite another thing from what it was before.

South.

ANO'THERGAINES. adj. [See ANOTHERGUESS.] Of another kind. This word I have found only in Sidney.

If my father had not plaid the hasty fool, I might have had another gains husband than Dametas.

Sidney.

ANO'THERGATES.* adj. [from another and gate or gait, Sax. gaet, a road or way.] Of another sort or turn.

If we be of the spirituality, there should be in us another-gates manifestation of the spirit than is ordinarily to be found in the temporality.

Bp. Sanderson, Serm. ad Cler. iii

A good report maketh the bones fat, saith Solomon; and that, I woe, is anothergates manner, than to make the face shine.
Bp. Sanderson, Sermons, p. 363.

Hudibras, about to enter
Upon anothergates adventure. Hudibras, C. iii. ver. 428.

ANOTHERGUESS. † adj. [This word, which though rarely used in writing, is somewhat frequent in colloquial language, Dr. Johnson conceives to be corrupted from anotherguise; that is, of a different guise, or manner, or form. But it may be corrupted from anothergates.] Of a different kind.

If you are bent to wed, I wish you anotherguess wife than Socrates had.
Howell's Lett. B. i. iv. 9.

Oh Hocus! where art thou? It used to go in anotherguess manner in thy time.
Arbuthnot.

ANOU'GH, * ANOW. See ENOUGH, ENOW.

A'NSATED. adj. [ansatus, Lat.] Having handles; or something in the form of handles.

A'NSLAUGHT. * n. s. [Sax. plagan, on-plagan, to strike, to kill.] An attack; a fray. The parent, perhaps, of ONSLOUGHT, which see. Not now in use.
I do remember yet that anslaught, thou wast beaten,
And fled'st before the butler.
Beaumont and Fl. Mons. Thomas, ii. 2.

To A'NSWER. † v. n. [The etymology is uncertain; the Saxons had andppapan, but in another sense; the Dutch have antwoorden. Such is Dr. Johnson's etymological notice of this word. — The Saxons, however, had andppapan, and also anppapan, in the sense of to answer. See Lye, Dict. Sax. et Goth. Serenius notices the Goth. andswara, reddere rationem facti, and the M. Goth. andswaurd, whence perhaps the Dutch antwoorden. The Danes have the verb answear, to answer.]

1. To speak in opposition. [Mr. Mason has rightly observed that several of Dr. Johnson's senses of this word, as a verb neuter, may be called active. I have separated such.]

If it be said, we may discover the elementary ingredients of things, I answer, that it is not necessary that such a discovery should be practicable.
Boyle.

2. To be accountable for: with for.

Those many had not dared to do evil
If the first man that did th' edict infringe
Had answer'd for his deed.
Shakspeare.

Some men have sinned in the principles of humanity, and must answer for not being men.
Brown, Vulgar Errors.

If there be any absurdity in this, our author must answer for it.
Locke.

3. To vindicate; to give a justificatory account of: with for.

The night, so impudently fixed for my last, made little impression on myself; but I cannot answer for my family.
Swift.

4. To give an account.

How they have been since received, and so well improved, let those answer either to God or man, who have been the author and promoters of such wise council.
Temple.

He wants a father to protect his youth,
And rear him up to virtue. You must bear
The future blame, and answer to the world,
When you refuse the easy honest means
Of taking care of him.
Southern.

5. To correspond to; to suit with.

As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man.
Prov. xxvii. 19.

6. To act reciprocally.

Say, do'st thou yet the Roman harp command?
Do the strings answer to thy noble hand?
Dryden.

7. To stand as opposite or correlative to something else.

There can but two things create love, perfection and usefulness; to which answer, on our part, 1. Admiration; and 2. Desire: and both these are centered in love.
Bp. Taylor.

8. To succeed; to produce the wished event.

Jason followed her counsel, whereto, when the event had answered, he again demanded the fleece.
Raleigh.

In operations upon bodies for their version or alteration, the trial in great quantities doth not answer the trial in small: and so deceiveth many.
Bacon.

To A'NSWER. † v. a.

1. To speak in return to a question.

Are we succour'd? are the Moors remov'd?
Answer these questions first, and then a thousand more:
Answer them altogether.
Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. To be equivalent to; to stand for something else.

A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry; but money answereth all things.
Ecc. x. 19.

3. To satisfy any claim, or petition, of right or justice.

Zelmane with rageful eyes bid him defend himself; for no less than his life would answer it.
Sidney.

Revenge the jeering and disdain'd contempt
Of this proud king, who studies day and night
To answer all the debt he owes unto you,
Even with the bloody payments of your deaths.
Shakspeare, Henry IV. P. 1.

Let his neck answer for it, if there is any martial law in the world.
Ibid. Hen. V.

Men no sooner find their appetites unanswered, than they complain the times are injurious. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.
That yearly rent is still paid, even as the former casualty itself, was wont to be, in parcel meal paid in and answered.
Bacon.

4. To bear proportion to.

Weapons must need be dangerous things, if they answered the bulk of so prodigious a person.
Swift, Gull. Travels.

5. To perform what is endeavoured or intended by the agent.

Our part is, to choose out the most deserving objects, and the most likely to answer the ends of our charity.
Atterbury, Sermon.

6. To comply with.

He dies that touches of this fruit,
Till I and my affairs are answered. Shakspeare, As you like it.

7. To appear to any call, or authoritative summons; in which sense, though figuratively, the following passage may be, perhaps, taken.

Thou wert better in thy grave than to answer, with thy uncovered body, this extremity of the skies. Shakspeare, Lear.

8. To be over-against any thing.

Fire answers fire; and, by their paly beams,
Each battle sees the other's umber'd face.
Shakspeare, Henry V. Chorus.

A'NSWER. † n. s. [Goth. andswor, excusatio, Ser. Dict. Sax. andppape, an answer. Dan. ansvar, answer, security.]

1. That which is said, whether in speech or writing, in return to a question, or position.

It was a right answer of the physician to his patient, that had sore eyes: If you have more pleasure in wine than in yod sight, wine is good.
Locke.

How can we think of appearing at that tribunal, without being able to give a ready answer to the questions which he shall then put to us, about the poor and the afflicted, the hungry and the naked, the sick and imprisoned?
Atterbury.

2. An account to be given to the demand of justice.

He'll call you to so hot an answer for it,
That you shall chide your trespass. Shakspeare.

3. In law, a confutation of a charge exhibited against a person.

A personal answer ought to have three qualities; it ought to be pertinent to the matter in hand; it ought to be absolute and unconditional; it ought to be clear and certain. Ayliffe.

4. Retaliation; corresponding practice.

Great the slaughter is Here made by the Roman; great the answer he Britons must take. Shakspeare, Cym. v. 3.

A'NSWER-JOBBER. n. s. [from answer and jobber.]

He that makes a trade of writing answers.

What disgusts me from having any thing to do with this race of answer-jobbers, is, that they have no sort of conscience in their dealing. Swift, on the Barrier Treaty.

A'NSWERABLE. adj. [from answer.]

1. That to which a reply may be made; that which may be answered; as, the argument, though subtle, is yet answerable.

2. Obligated to give an account; obliged to answer any demand of justice; or stand the trial of an accusation.

Every chief of every kindred or family should be answerable, and bound to bring forth every one of that kindred, at all times to be justified, when he should be required, or charged with any treason or felony. Spenser, State of Ireland.

Will any man argue, that if a physician should manifestly prescribe poison to all his patients, he cannot be justly punished, but is answerable only to God. Swift.

He cannot think ambition more justly laid to their charge, than to other men, because that would be to make such government answerable for the errors of human nature. Swift.

3. Correspondent.

It was but such a likeness as an imperfect glass doth give, answerable enough in some features and colours, but erring in others. Sidney.

The daughters of Atlas were ladies, who, accompanying such as came to be registered among the worthies, brought forth children answerable in quality to those that begot them. Ralegh.

4. Proportionate; suitable.

Only add

Deeds to thy knowledge answerable; add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance; add love
By name to come call'd charity, the soul
Of all the rest. Milton.

5. Suitable; suited.

The following, by certain estates of men, answerable to that which a great person himself professeth, as of soldiers to him that hath been employed in the wars, hath been a thing well taken even in monarchies. Bacon.

If answerable style I can obtain
Of my celestial patroness. Milton.

6. Equal; equivalent.

There be no kings whose means are answerable unto other men's desires. Ralegh.

7. Relative; correlative.

That, to every petition for things needful, there should be some answerable sentence of thanks provided particularly to follow, is not requisite. Hooker.

A'NSWERABLY. adv. [from answerable.] In due proportion; with proper correspondence; suitably.

The broader seas are, if they be entire, and free from illands, they are answerably deeper. Brerewood on Languages.

It bears light sorts, into the atmosphere, to a greater or lesser height, answerably to the greater or lesser intenseness of the heat. Woodward.

A'NSWERABLENESS. n. s. [from answerable.] The quality of being answerable. Dict.

To shew therefore the correspondency and answerableness which is between this bridegroom and his spouse, &c. Harmar, Transl. of Beza, p. 196.

A'NSWERER. n. s. [from answer.]

1. He that answers; he that speaks in return to what another has spoken.

I know your mind, and I will satisfy it, neither will I do it like a niggardly answerer going no further than the bounds of the question. Sidney.

2. He that manages the controversy against one that has written first.

It is very unfair in any writer to employ ignorance and malice together; because it gives his answerer double work. Swift.

ANT. n. s. [æemtt, Sax. which Junius imagines, not without probability, to have been first contracted to æmt, and then softened to ant.] An emmet; a pismire. A small insect that lives in great numbers together in hillocks.

We'll set thee to school to an ant, to teach thee there's no lab'ring in the winter. Shakspeare.

Methinks, all cities now but ant-hills are,
Where when the several labourers I see
For children, house, provision, taking pain,
They're all but ants, carrying eggs, straw, and grain. Donne.

Learn each small people's genius, policies;
The ant's republick, and the realm of bees. Pope.

A'NT-BEAR. n. s. [from ant and bear.] An animal that feeds on ants.

Divers quadrupeds feed upon insects; and some live wholly upon them; as two sorts of tamanduas upon ants, which therefore are called in English ant-bears. Ray.

A'NT-HILL, OR HILLOCK. n. s. [from ant and hill.]

The small protuberances of earth in which ants make their nests.

Put blue flowers into an ant-hill, they will be stained with red; because the ants drop upon them their stinging liquor, which hath the effect of oil of vitriol. Ray.

Those who have seen ant-hillocks, have easily perceived those small heaps of corn about their nests. Addison.

AN'T. A contraction for and it, or rather and if it; as, an't please you; that is, and if it please you.

ANTA'GONISM.* n. s. Contest. See ANTAGONY.

ANTA'GONIST.† n. s. [Gr. ἀνταγωνιστής, Fr. antagoniste.]

1. One who contends with another; an opponent. It implies generally a personal and particular opposition.

Our antagonists in these controversies may have met with some not unlike to Ithacius. Hooker.

What was set before him,
To heave, pull, draw, and break, he still perform'd,
None daring to appear antagonist. Milton.

It is not fit, that the history of a person should appear, till the prejudice both of his antagonists and adherents be softened and subdued. Addison.

2. Contrary.

The short club consists of those who are under five feet; ours is to be composed of such as are above six. These we look upon as the two extremes and antagonists of the species; considering all these as neuters, who fill up the middle space. Addison.

3. In anatomy, the antagonist is that muscle which counteracts some others.

A relaxation of a muscle must produce a spasm in its antagonist, because the equilibrium is destroyed. Arbuthnot.

ANTAGONI'STICK.* adj. [from antagonist.] Contending as an antagonist.

It may be too, if the ordinance of nature;
Their valours are not yet so combatant,
Or truly antagonistick, as to fight,
But may admit to hear of some divisions
Of fortitude, may put 'em off their quarrel. B. Jonson, Mays. Lady.

To ANTA'GONIZE. v. n. [ἀντί and ἀγωνίζω.] To contend against another. Dict.

ANTA'GONY.* n. s. [ἀντί and ἀγώνια.] Contest, opposition.

For others born idolaters, the moral reason of their dangerous keeping, and the incommunicable antagony that is between Christ and Belial, will be sufficient to enforce the commandment of those two inspired reformers, Ezra and Nehemiah, to put an idolater as well under the Gospel.

Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Div. i. 8.

ANTA'LGICK. † adj. [Fr. antalgique, from ἀντί, against, and ἄλγος, pain.] That which softens pain; anodyne.

ANTANACLASIS. n. s. [Lat. from ἀντανάλασις, from ἀντανάλαω, to drive back.]

1. A figure in rhetorick, when the same word is repeated in a different, if not in a contrary signification; as, In thy youth learn some craft, that in old age thou mayst get thy living without craft. Craft, in the first place, signifies science or occupation; in the second, deceit or subtilty.

2. It is also a returning to the matter at the end of a long, parenthesis; as, Shall that heart, (which does not only feel them, but hath all motion of his life placed in them,) shall that heart, I say, &c.

Smith, Rhetorick.

ANTAPHRODITICK. † adj. [Fr. antaphroditique, from ἀντί, against, and Ἀφροδίτη, Venus.] That which is efficacious against the venereal disease.

ANTAPOPLE'CTICK. adj. [ἀντί, against, and ἀποπληξίς, an apoplexy.] Good against an apoplexy.

ANTARCTICK. adj. [ἀντί, against, and ἄρκτος, the bear, or northern constellation.] The southern pole, so called, as opposite to the northern.

Downward as far as antarctic.

Milton.

They that had sail'd from near th' antarctic pole,

Their treasure safe, and all their vessels whole,

In sight of their dear country ruin'd be,

Without the guilt of either rock or sea.

Waller.

ANTARTHRITICK. † adj. [Fr. antarthritique, ἀντί, against, and ἀρθρίτις, the gout.] Good against the gout.

ANTASTHMA'TICK. adj. [from ἀντί and ἀσθμα.] Good against the asthma.

ANTE. A Latin particle signifying before, which is frequently used in compositions; as, antediluvian, before the flood; antechamber, a chamber leading into another apartment.

A'NTEACT. n. s. [from ante and act.] A former act.

ANTEAMBULA'TION. n. s. [from ante and ambulatio, Lat.] A walking before. Dict.

ANTECEDA'NEOUS.* adj. [from antecede.] Going before; preceding.

Admit that, which as capable of antecedaneous proof may be presupposed.

Barrow, Sermons, ii. 407.

To ANTECE'DE. v. n. [from ante, before, and cedo, to go.] To precede; to go before.

It seems consonant to reason, that the fabrick of the world did not long antecede its motion.

Hale.

ANTECE'DENCE. n. s. [from antecede.] The act or state of going before; precedence.

It is impossible that mixed bodies can be eternal, because there is necessarily a pre-existence of the simple bodies, and an antecedence of their constitution preceding the existence of mixed bodies.

Hale.

ANTECE'DENCY.* n. s. The state of going before.

There can be no multitude without one, but one may be without a multitude; for unity is before any multiplied number. Which antecedency of unity, in the same place, he [Dionysius] applieth unto the Deity. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 308.

ANTECE'DENT. adj. antecedens, Lat.

1. Going before; preceding. Antecedent is used, I think, only with regard to time; precedent, with regard both to time and place.

To assert, that God looked upon Adam's fall as a sin, and punished it, when, without any antecedent sin of his, it was impossible for him not to fall, seems a thing that highly reproaches essential equity and goodness.

South.

2. It has to before the thing which is supposed to follow.

No one is so hardy as to say, God is in his debt; that he owed him a nobler being: for existence must be antecedent to merit.

Collier.

Did the blood first exist, antecedent to the formation of the heart? But that is to set the effect before the cause.

Bentley.

ANTECE'DENT. n. s. [antecedens, Lat.]

1. That which goes before.

A duty of so mighty an influence, that it is indeed the necessary antecedent, if not also the direct cause of a sinner's return to God.

South.

2. In grammar, the noun to which the relative is subjoined; as, the man who comes hither.

Let him learn the right joining of substantives with adjectives, the noun with the verb, and the relative with the antecedent.

Ascham.

3. In logick, the first proposition of an enthymeme or argument, consisting only of two propositions.

Conditional or hypothetical propositions are those whose parts are united by the conditional particle if; as, if the sun be fixed, the earth must move: if there be no fire, there will be no smoke. The first part of these propositions, or that wherein the condition is contained, is called the antecedent, the other is called the consequent.

Watts, Logick.

ANTECEDENTLY. adv. [from antecedent.] In the state of antecedence, or going before; previously.

We consider him antedecently to his creation, while he yet lay in the barren womb of nothing, and only in the number of possibilities.

South.

ANTECE'SSOR. † n. s. [Latin.]

1. One who goes before, or leads another; the principal.

Dict.

The successor seldom prosecuting his antecessor's devices.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

Search the reports of the pope's own rolls: undoubtedly they would receive the same answer which popes in former times have had, and with the same quick dispatch that our antecessors in this case have thought to be requisite.

Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Garret, sign. Ilb. 4.

'Tis certainly derived to them by their antecessours.

Hammond on the Festivals of the Church.

2. A prepossessor; one that possessed the land before the present possessor.

The antecessor was most commonly he that possessed the lands in king Edward's time before the conquest.

Brady, Gloss.

A'NTECHAMBER. n. s. [from ante before, and chamber; it is generally written, improperly, antichamber.] The chamber that leads to the chief apartment.

The empress has the antichambers past,

And this way moves with a disorder'd haste.

Dryden.

His antichamber, and room of audience, are little square chambers wainscoted.

Addison.

A'NTECHAPEL.* n. s. [ante and chapel.] That part of the chapel through which the passage is to the choir or body of it.

I presume he afterwards altered his directions, with regard to the place of interment; for he was buried on the south side of the ante-chapel of Trinity College chapel.

Warton, Life of Bathurst, p. 190.

ANTECURSOR. n. s. [Latin.] One who runs before.

Dict.

To ANTEDATE. † v. a. [from ante and datum, Lat.]

1. To date earlier than the real time, so as to confer a fictitious antiquity.

Now thou hast lov'd me one whole day,
To-morrow when thou leav'st, what wilt thou say?

A N 'T

Wilt thou then antedate some new-made vow,
Or say, that now
We are not just those persons, which we were?

Donne's Poems, p. 4.

By reading, a man does, as it were, antedate his life, and makes himself contemporary with the ages past. Collier.

2. To take something before the proper time.

You need not thank me, Canon; in your love
You antedated what I can do for you;
And I, in gratitude, am bound to this,
And am to much more.

Beaumont and Fl. Queen of Corinth, iii. 1.

An antedated and diseased old age of riot and drunkenness.

Spencer on Prodigies, p. 375.

Our joys below it can improve,

And antedate the bliss above.

Pope.

A'NTEDATE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Anticipation.

Why hath not my soul these apprehensions, these presages, these changes, those antedates, those jealousies, those suspicions of a sin, as well as my body of a sickness?

Donne's Devotions, p. 10.

ANTE'DILU'VIAN. adj. [from ante before, and diluvium, a deluge.]

1. Existing before the deluge.

During the time of the deluge, all the stone and marble of the antediluvian earth were totally dissolved. Woodward.

2. Relating to things existing before the deluge.

The text intends only the line of Seth, conduccable unto the genealogy of our Saviour, and the antediluvian chronology.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANTE'DILU'VIAN. n. s. One that lived before the flood.

We are so far from repining at God, that he hath not extended the period of our lives to the longevity of the antediluvians, that we give him thanks for contracting the days of our trial.

Bentley.

A'NTELOPE. n. s. [The etymology is uncertain.] A goat with curled or wreathed horns.

The antelope and wolf, both fierce and fell.

Spenser, F. Q. i. vi. 26.

ANTELU'CAN.* adj. [Lat. antelucanus. "Plinius secundus non tantum tempus, quo convenire Christiani soliti fuerint, sed quodammodo etiam locum, quamvis subobscurè, indigitasse videtur, dum ait, eos ante lucem convenire solitos fuisse, unde Tertullianus coetus Christianorum antelucanos appellavit." Böhmeri Dissert. Jur. Eccl. Antiq. 12mo. Halac. 1729. p. 35.] Early, before day-light.

There the Jupiter of exemplary honour and magnificence, there the Phosphorus of piety and antelucan devotion.

Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 44.

All manner of antelucan labourers, who make provision for the flesh, make the flesh their provision.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iii. 6.

ANTEMERIDIAN. adj. [from ante, before, and meridian, noon.] Before noon.

ANTEME'TICK. adj. [ἀντί, against, and ἐμέω, to vomit.] That which has the power of calming the stomach; of preventing or stopping vomiting.

ANTEMU'NDANE. †adj. [ante, before, and mundus, the world.] That which was before the creation of the world.

The Supreme,

Great, antemundane Father!

Young, Night Th. 5.

ANTENU'MBER. n. s. [from ante and number.] The number that precedes another.

Whatsoever virtue is in numbers, for conducing to consent of notes, is rather to be ascribed to the antenunder, than to the entire number, as that the sound returneth after six, or after twelve; so that the seventh or thirteenth is not the matter, but the sixth or the twelfth.

Bacon.

A N 'T

A'NTEPAST. n. s. [from ante, before, and pastum, to feed.] A foretaste; something taken before the proper time.

We were to expect our bliss only in the satiating our appetites, it might be reasonable, by frequent antepasts, to excite our gust for that profuse perpetual meal. Decay of Piety.

A'NTEPENULT. n. s. [antepenultima, Lat.] The last syllable but two, as the syllable te in antepenult: a term of grammar.

ANTEPILE'PTICK. adj. [ἀντί and ἐπιληψία.] A medicine against convulsions.

That bezoar is antidotal, lapis judaicus diuretical, coral antepileptical, we will not deny.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

To A'NTEPONE. v. a. [antepono, Lat.] To set one thing before another; to prefer one thing to another.

Dict.

ANTEPRE'DICAMENT. n. s. [antepredicamentum, Lat.] Something to be known in the study of logick, previously to the doctrine of the predicament.

ANTERIO'RITY. † n. s. [from anterior.] Priority; the state of being before either in time or situation.

Our poet could not have seen the prophecy of Isaiah, because he lived 100 or 150 years before that prophet; and this anteriority of time makes this passage the more observable.

Pope, Iliad xix. note, v. 93.

ANTERIOUR. adj. [anterior, Lat.] Going before, either with regard to time or place.

If that be the anterior or upper part wherein the senses are placed, and that the posterior and lower part, which is opposite thereunto, there is no inferior or former part in this animal; for the senses being placed at both extremes, make both ends anterior, which is impossible.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANTEPA'SCHAL.* adj. [from ante and paschal.] Relating to the time before Easter.

The dispute was very early in the church concerning the observation of Easter; one point whereof was, concerning the ending of the ante-paschal fast, which both sides determined upon the day they kept the festival. Nelson, Fasts and Festivals.

A'NTEROOM.* n. s. [from ante and room.] The room through which the passage is to a principal apartment.

An ante-room in the Duke's palace.

Shakspeare, T. Gent. Ver. Stage Dir.

ANTETE'MPLE.* n. s. [from ante and temple.] What we now call the nave, was, in the primitive churches, the ante-temple.

Of the ancient churches there was a two-fold division: If we take it in the stricter sense, it includes only the building within the walls, which were the "narthex" or ante-temple, where the penitents and catechumens stood; the "naos" or temple, &c.

Christian Antiquities, i. 229.

A'NTES. n. s. [Latin.] Pillars of large dimensions that support the front of a building.

ANTESTO'MACH. n. s. [from ante, before, and stomach.] A cavity which leads into the stomach.

In birds there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but it is immediately swallowed into a kind of antestomach, which I have observed in piscivorous birds. Ray.

To A'NTEVERT.* v. a. [Lat. antevertio.] To prevent. To antever some great danger to the publick, to ourselves, to our friend, we may and must disclose our knowledge of a close wickedness.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, Add. C. 3.

It is high time to mourn for the anteverting of a threatened vengeance.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 157.

ANTHELMINTHICK. † adj. [Fr. anthelmintique, ἀντί, against, and ἐλμίνος, a worm.] That which kills worms.

Anthelminticks, or contrary to worms, are things which are known by experience to kill them, as oils, or honey taken upon an empty stomach.

Arbuthnot.

ANTHEM.† n. s. [ἄνθῳμ], a hymn sung in alternate parts, and should therefore be written anthym, Dr. Johnson says; but neither the etymology, nor the orthography, which he proposes, is correct. Anthem is the Sax. anteþn, which is written by Chaucer antem, and in the Prompt. Par. antym; and corresponds to the Gr. ἀνθωνία, and the Fr. antienne, i. e. alternate singing. See ANTI-PHON.] A holy song; a song performed as part of divine service.

God Moses first, then David did inspire,
To compose anthems for his heavenly quire. Denham.

There is no passion that is not finely expressed in those parts of the inspired writings, which are proper for divine songs and anthems. Addison.

ANTHEM-WISE.* adv. According to the manner of singing anthems; that is, alternately. See ANTI-PHON.

Several quires, placed one over against another, and taking the voice by catches, anthem-wise, give great pleasure.

Bacon, Ess. xxxvii.

ANTHEMIS.* n. s. [In Botany.] Camomile.

The anthemis, a small but glorious flower,
Scarce rears his head; yet has a giant's tower. Tate's Cowley.

ANTHOLOGY.† n. s. [ἀνθολογία, from ανθ, a flower, and λεγω, to gather.]

1. A collection of flowers.
2. A collection of devotions in the Greek church.
3. A collection of poems.

This clause, (ὡς δὲ μὴ χέρον) which is omitted in Clemens Alexandrinus, is found notwithstanding both in Diogenes Laertius, in his life, and also in the anthology.

Ferrand, Love Melancholy, p. 334.

They are very different from the simple sepulchral inscriptions of the ancients, of which that of Meleager on his wife, in the Greek anthology, is a model and master-piece.

Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, ii. 472.

ANTHOLOGICAL.* adj. Relating to an anthology.

ANTHONY'S FIRE. n. s. A kind of crabspeck.

ANTHRAX. n. s. [ἀνθραξ, a burning coal.] A scab or blotch that is made by a corrosive humour, which burns the skin, and occasions sharp pricking pains, a carbuncle. Quincy.

ANTHROPOLOGY. n. s. [from ἄνθρωπος, man, and λέγω, to discourse.] The doctrine of anatomy; the doctrine of the form and structure of the body of man.

ANTHROPOMORPHITE.† n. s. [ἀνθρωπομορφος.] One who believes a human form in the Deity; one of a sect who attributed to God the form of the human body.

It was the opinion of the anthropomorphites, that God had all the parts of a man, and that we are in this sense made according to his image. More, Conj. Cabb. p. 121.

Christians as well as Turks have had whole sects contending that the Deity was corporeal and of human shape, though few profess themselves anthropomorphites, yet we may find many amongst the ignorant, of that opinion. Locke.

ANTHROPOMORPHITE.* adj. Relating to the opinions of the anthropomorphites.

Multitudes could swallow the dull and coarse anthropomorphite doctrines. Glanvill's Præc. of Souls, ch. 4.

ANTHROPOPATHY.† n. s. [ἄνθρωπος, man, and πάθος, passion, Fr. anthropopathie.] The sensibility of man; the passions of man.

Two ways then may the Spirit of God be said to be grieved, in Himself, in his Saints; in Himself, by an anthropopathie, as we call it; in his Saints, by a sympathy; the former is by way of allusion to human passion and carriage.

Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 106.

ANTHROPOPHAGY.† n. s. [It has no singular.] ἄνθρωπος, man, and φαγω, to eat.] Man-eaters; cannibals; those that live upon human flesh.

The cannibals that each other eat,
The anthropophagi, and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders. Shakspeare, Othello.

It would make our cannibal Christians
Forebear the mutual eating one another,
Which they do do, more cunningly than the wild
Anthropophagi, that snatch only strangers!

B. Jonson, Staple of News, iii. 2.

But our poets have been preceded in the use of this word by an eminent old divine.

Histories make mention of a people called anthropophagi, men-eaters. B. Gilpin, Sermon before K. Edw. VI. (1552.)

ANTHROPOPHAGIAN. n. s. A ludicrous word, formed by Shakspeare from anthropophagi, for the sake of a formidable sound.

Go, knock, and call; he'll speak like an anthropophagian unto thee: knock, I say. Shakspeare.

ANTHROPOPHAGY. n. s. [ἄνθρωπος, a man, and φαγω, to eat.] The quality of eating human flesh, or man-eating.

Upon slender foundations was raised the anthropophagy of Diomedes his horses. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANTHROPOPHILY. n. s. [ἄνθρωπος, man, and σοφία, wisdom.] The knowledge of the nature of man.

ANTHYPNOTICK.† adj. [Fr. anthypnotique, from ἀντί, against, and ὑπν, sleep.] That which has the power of preventing sleep; that which is efficacious against a lethargy.

ANTIPOCHONDRIACK. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and ὑποχονδρία.] Good against hypochondriack maladies.

ANTIPOPHORA. n. s. [ἀντιπόφορα.] A figure in rhetorick, which signifies a contrary illation, or inference, and is when an objection is refuted or disproved by the opposition of a contrary sentence.

Smith's Rhetorick.

ANTHYSTERICK. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and ὑστερ.] Good against hystericks.

ANTI. [ἀντί.] A particle much used in composition with words derived from the Greek, and signifies contrary to; as, antimonarchical, opposite to monarchy.

ANTIACID.† n. s. [from ἀντί, and acidus, sour.] Contrary to sourness; alkalis.

Oils are antiacids, so far as they blunt acrimony; but as they are hard of digestion, they produce acrimony of another sort.

Arbutnot.

ANTIACID.* adj. Contrary to sourness.

All animal diet is alkaline or antiacid.

Arbutnot.

ANTIAPOSTLE.* n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and apostle.]

The cardinals of Rome are those persons which may be fitly stiled anti-apostles in the Romish hierarchy.

Potter on the Num. 666. p. 96.

ANTIARMINIAN.* n. s. He who opposes the Arminians, or Arminianism. See ARMINIAN.

We are alarmed by many letters, not only of false Latin, but false English too, and many bad characters cast on good men, especially on the Anti-arminians, who are all, especially Dr. Prideaux, made seditious persons, schismatics, if not heretics.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 181.

ANTIARTHRITICKS.* n. s. [ἀντί and αρθριτικός.] Medicines to assuage the gout. Dict.

ANTICACHECTICK.† adj. [Fr. anticachectique, from ἀντί, against, and καχεξία, a bad habit.] Things adapted to the cure of a bad constitution.

A N T

A'NTICHAMBER. n. s. This word is corruptly written for antechamber; which see.

A'NTICHRIST.* n. s. [from anti, against, and Χριστός.] The great enemy to Christianity.

As ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists. 1 John, ii. 18.

Antichrist, which was conceived in the primitive times, saw the light in Boniface the third, and was grown to his stature and άμυν in Gregory the Seventh.

Bp. Hall's Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, 3. § 6.

ANTICHRISTIAN. adj. [from anti, against, and Χριστός.] Opposite to Christianity.

That despised, abject, oppressed sort of men, the ministers, whom the world would make antichristian, and so deprive them of heaven. South.

ANTICHRISTIAN.* n. s. He who is an enemy to Christianity.

A new heresy, as the antichristians and priests of the broadest God, would persuade and make their credulous company to believe. Rogers on the Creed, Pref.

To call them Christian Deists, is a great abuse of language; unless Christians were to be distributed into two sorts, Christians and No-Christians, or Christians and Anti-Christians. Waterland, Ch. p. 63.

ANTICHRISTIANISM. n. s. [from antichristian.] Opposition or contrariety to Christianity.

Have we not seen many, whose opinions have fastened upon one another the brand of antichristianism? Decay of Piety.

ANTICHRISTIANITY.* n. s. [from antichristian.] Contrariety to Christianity.

Whether the pope be antichrist, or no, I will not pretend to determine; though, by the bye, he bids fair for that title; I am sure, popery is antichristianity.

Trapp, Popery truly stated, part 2.

ANTI'CHRONISM.* n. s. [anti, against, and Χρόνος, time.] Deviation from the right order or account of time.

Our chronologies are by transcribing, interpolation, misprinting, and creeping in of antichronisms, now and then strangely disordered. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Song. 4.

To ANTICIPATE. v. a. [anticipo, Lat.]

1. To take something sooner than another, so as to prevent him that comes after; to take first possession.

God hath taken care to anticipate and prevent every man, to draw him early into his church; to give piety the prepossession, and so to engage him in holiness. Hammond.

If our apostle had maintained such an anticipating principle engraven upon our souls before all exercise of reason; what did he talk of seeking the Lord, seeing that the knowledge of him was innate and perpetual? Bentley.

2. To take up before the time, at which any thing might be regularly had.

I find I have anticipated already, and taken up from Boccace, before I come to him; but I am of the temper of kings, who are for present money, no matter how they pay it. Dryden.

3. To foretaste, or take an impression of something, which is not yet, as if it really was.

The life of the desperate equals the anxiety of death, who but act the life of the damned, and anticipate the desolations of hell. Brown, Fulg. Err.

Why should we Anticipate our sorrows? 'tis like those That die for fear of death. Denham.

4. To prevent any thing by crowding in before it; to preclude.

Time, thou anticipat'st my dread exploits: The flighty purpose never is o'ertook, Unless the deed go with it. Shakespeare.

I am far from pretending to instruct the profession, or anticipating their directions to such as are under their government. Arbutnot.

A N T

ANTICIPATION. n. s. [from anticipate.]

1. The act of taking up something before its time.

The golden number gives the new moon four days too late, by reason of the aforesaid anticipation, and our neglect of it.

Holder.

It is not enough to be miserable when the time comes, unless we make ourselves so beforehand, and by anticipation.

L. Estrange.

2. Foretaste.

If we really live under the hope of future happiness, we shall taste it by way of anticipation and forethought, an image of it will meet our minds often, and stay there, as all pleasing expectations do. Atterbury.

3. Opinion implanted before the reasons of that opinion can be known.

The east and west, the north and south, have the same anticipation concerning one Supreme Disposer of things. Stillington.

What nation is there, that, without any teaching, have not a kind of anticipation, or preconceived notion of a Deity?

Derham.

ANTICIPATOR.* n. s. [Lat. anticipator.] This word occurs in Cotgrave, under anticipant. A preventer; a forestaller.

ANTICIPATORY.* adj. [from anticipate.] That which takes up something before its time.

Prophecy, being an anticipatory history, it is sufficient that it speak according to the usual language of historians.

More, Seven Churches, Pref. a. 5.

ANTICK. adj. [probably from antiquus, ancient, as things out of use appear old.] Odd; ridiculously wild; buffoon in gesticulation.

What! dares the slave

Come hither cover'd with an antick face,
And fler and scorn at our solemnity?

Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

Of all our antick sights, and pagantry,
Which English idiots run in crowds to see. Dryden.

The prize was to be conferred upon the whistler, that could go through his tune without laughing, though provoked by the antick postures of a merry Andrew, who was to play tricks.

Addison.

A'NTICK.* n. s.

1. He that plays anticks; he that uses odd gesticulation; a buffoon; the anticks or tricks themselves.

Within the hollow crown,
That rounds the mortal temples of a king,
Keeps death his court; and there the antick sits,
Scoffing his state. Shakespeare.

If you should smile, he grows impatient.—
Fear not, my lord, we can contain ourselves,
Were he the veriest antick in the world. Shakespeare.

We cannot feast your eyes with masks and revel,
Or courtly anticks: the sad sports we riot in,
Are tales of foughten fields.

Beaumont and Fl. Laws of Candy, iii. 1.

2. Odd appearance.

A work of rich entail, and curious mold,
Woven with anticks, and wild imagery. Spenser, F. Q.

For ev'n at first reflection she espies
Such toys, such anticks, and such vanities,
As she retires and shrinks for shame and fear. Davies.

That there be fit and proper texts of Scripture every where painted, [in the Church,] and that all the painting be grave and reverend, not with light colours or foolish anticks.

Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 13.

To A'NTICK.* v. a. [from antick.] To make antick.

• Mine own tongue
Splits what it speaks; the wild disguise hath almost Antick'd us all. Shakespeare.

Some, (grosser pride than which, think I, no passed age might shame,)

By art abusing nature, heads of antick hayre doe frame.
Warner, Albion's Eng. p. 220.

A'NTICKLY. † adv. [from antick.] In an antick manner; with odd postures, wild gesticulations, or fanciful appearance.

Scrambling, outfacing, fashion-mongring boys,
That lye, and cog, and flout, deprave, and slander,
Go antickly, and shew an outward hideousness,
And speak of half a dozen dangerous words. Shakspeare.

We had not rode above half a mile further, when lo! a Persian antickly habited, out of a poetic rapture, (for the Persians are for the most part poets,) sung our welcome.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 118.

ANTICLIMAX. n. s. [from ἀντί and κλίμαξ.] A sentence in which the last part expresses something lower than the first.

A certain figure, which was unknown to the ancients, is called by some an anticlimax. Addison.

This distich is frequently mentioned as an example.

Next comes Dalhoussey the great god of war,
Lieutenant col'nel to the earl of Mar.

ANTICONSTITUTIONAL. * adj. [from αντί and constitucional.] Against the constitution.

Nothing can be more easy than the creation of an anticonstitutional dependency of the two houses of parliament on the Crown will be in that case. Bolingbroke on Parties, Lett. 19.

ANTICONVULSIVE. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and convulsiv.] Good against convulsions.

Whatsoever produces an inflammatory disposition in the blood produces the asthma, as anticonvulsive medicines. Floyer.

ANTICOR. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and cor, the heart.] A preternatural swelling of a round figure, occasioned by a sanguine and bilious humour, and appearing in a horse's breast, opposite to his heart. An anticor may kill a horse, unless it be brought to a suppuration by good remedies. Farrier's Dict.

A'NTICOSMETICK. * adj. [αντί and κοσμητικός.] Destructive of beauty.

I would have him apply his anticosmetick wash to the painted face of female beauty. Lyttelton.

A'NTICOURT. * adj. [αντί, against, and court.] In opposition to the court.

The anticourt party courted him at such a rate, that he feared it might create a jealousy elsewhere. Reresby, Mem. p. 153.

ANTICO'URTIER. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and courtier.] One that opposes the court.

ANTICREA'TOR. * n. s. [from αντί, against, and creator.] One that opposes the creator or maker.

Let him ask the author of those toothless satires, who was the maker, or rather the antireator, of that universal foolery.

Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

ANTI'DOTAL. adj. [from antidote.] That which has the quality of an antidote, or the power of counteracting poison.

That bezoar is antidotal we shall not deny. Brown.

Animals that can innoxiously digest these poisons, become antidotal to the poison digested. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ANTIDO'TARY. * adj. [Fr. antidotaire.] Serving for a counterpoison; treating of counterpoisons.

Cotgrave.

To A'NTIDOTE. * v. a. [Fr. antidoter, to furnish with preservatives, to preserve by antidotes. Cotgrave.]

With this nosegay of rue and wormwood antidote thyself against the idolatrous infection of that strange woman's breath, whose lips yet drop as an honey-comb.

More, against Idolatry, ch. 10.

Either they were first unhappily planted in some place of ill and vicious education, where the devil and his agents infused such diabolical filth and poison into their hearts, that no discipline or advice, no sermons or sacraments, could ever after antidote or work it out. South, Sermon. vi. 367.

How I bless night's consecrating shades,
Which to a temple turn an universe;
Fill us with great ideas, full of heaven,
And antidote the pestilential earth. Young, Night Th. 9.

A'NTIDOTE. n. s. [ἀντίδοτον, antidotus, Lat. a thing given in opposition to something else.] A medicine given to expel the mischiefs of another, as of poison. Quincy.

Trust not the physician,
His antidotes are poison, and he slays
More than you rob. Shakspeare.

What fool would believe that antidote delivered by Pierius against the sting of a scorpion? To sit upon an ass, with one's face towards his tail. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Poison will work against the stars: beware;
For every meal an antidote prepare. Dryden, Juv.

ANTIDYSENTERICK. † adj. [from ἀντί, against, and dysenteria, a bloody flux, Fr. antidysenterique.] Good against the bloody flux.

A'NTIENT, * &c. See ANCIENT, &c.

ANTIETHUSIA'STICK. * adj. Opposing enthusiasm.

According to the antienthusiastick poet's method. Shaytesbury.

ANTIEPI'SCOPAL. * adj. Adverse to episcopacy.

Had I gratified their antiepiscopal faction at first, in this point, with my consent, and sacrificed the ecclesiastical government and revenues to the fury of their covetousness, ambition, and revenge, I believe they would then have found no colourable necessity of raising an army to fetch in and punish delinquents.

K. Charles I. Eik. Bas. ch. 9.

As for their principles, take them as I find them laid down by the antiepiscopal writers. Dr. Hiches, 30th Jan. Sermon. p. 17.

A'NTIFACE. * n. s. Opposite face.

The third is your soldier's face, a menacing and astounding face, that looks broad and big: the grace of this face consisteth much in a beard. The antiface to this, is your lawyer's face, a contracted, subtle, and intricate face, &c.

B. Johnson, Cypth. Rev.

ANTIFANA'TICK. * n. s. An enemy to fanaticks.

What fanatic, against whom he so often inveighs, could more presumptuously affirm whom the comforter hath empowered, than this antifanatic, as he would be thought?

Milton, Notes on Griffith's Sermon.

ANTIFE'BRILE. † adj. [from ἀντί, against, and febris, a fever, Fr. antifebrile.] Good against fevers.

Antifebrile medicines check the ebullition. Floyer.

ANTIFLA'TTERING. * adj. Opposite to flattering.

Satire is a kind of antiflattering glass, which shews us nothing but deformities in the objects we contemplate in it.

Delany, Observ. on Ld. Orrery, p. 144.

ANTIHYSTE'Rick. * n. s. [from the Fr. antihystérique.] A medicine good against hystericks.

It raiseth the spirits, and is an excellent antihysterick, not less innocent than potent. Bp. Berkeley, Serms, 99.

Antihystericks are undoubtedly serviceable in madness arising from some sorts of spasmodick disorders. Battie on Madness.

ANTILO'GARITHM. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and logarithm.] The complement of the logarithm of a sine, tangent, or secant; or the difference of that logarithm from the logarithm of ninety degrees.

Chambers.

ANTI'LOGY. n. s. [ἀντιλογία.] A contradiction between any words and passages in an authour. Dict.

ANTI'LOQUIST. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and loquor, to speak. A contradictor. Dict.

ANTI'LOQUY. * n. s. Noticed by Mr. Boucher as an old word, denoting preface, proem, or peroration; and therefore ought to be written anteloquy; and in the dictionary of Cockeram, antiloquy is said to be "a term which stage-players use, called their cue." This probably meant rehearsal or previous recitation, anteloquium.

ANTIMAGISTRICAL.* adj. [from ἀντί, and magistral.]

Against the office of a magistrate.

It would have been impossible for the Christian religion to have made such a spread in the world, at least, to have gained any countenance from the civil power, had it owned such antimagistral assertions, either by its own avowed principles, or by the practice of its primitive possessors. South, Sermon. v. 261.

ANTIMANIACAL.* adj. [ἀντί, and μανία.] Good against madness.

With respect to vomits, it may seem almost heretical to impeach their antimaniacal virtues. Battie on Madness.

ANTIMASQUE.* n. s. [A word of frequent usage in the seventeenth century. It may have denoted a masque in contradistinction to the principal masque, ἀντί, and masque; or preceding it, ante and masque; or a masque of anticks.

Let antimasques not be long; they have been commonly of fools, satyrs, baboons, wild-men, antiques, beasts, &c. moving, and the like. Bacon, Ess. of Masques and Triumphs.

On the scene he thrusts out first an antimasque of bugbears. Milton, Answer to Eik. Bas. xx.

ANTIMINISTERIAL.* adj. Opposing the ministry or administration of the country. See ADMINISTRATION and MINISTRY.

If I say any thing antiministerial, you will tell me you know the reason. Gray's Letters.

ANTIMONARCHICAL.† adj. [from ἀντί, against, and μοναρχία, government by a single person, Fr. antimonarchique. Formerly written antimonarchial, as in Reresby's Memoirs, p. 148., "a peevish antimonarchial fellow;" in which also monarchial occurs, p. 121., "whether the government should be monarchial or republican. Milton uses monarchal, but in a different sense. Burke also writes monarchial, Works, ii. 291.] Against government by a single person.

When he spied the statue of King Charles in the middle of the crowd, and most of the kings ranged over their heads, he concluded that an antimonarchial assembly could never choose such a place. Addison.

ANTIMONARCHICALNESS. n. s. [from antimonarchial.]

The quality of being an enemy to regal power.

ANTIMONARCHICK.* adj. The same as antimonarchial.

Those who are of antimonarchick principles, have been desirous to maintain, that the beheading of K. Charles was as lawful as the opposition made to K. James.

Bp. Benson's 30th Jan. Sermon.

ANTIMO'NARCHIST.* n. s. An enemy to monarchy.

Monday, a terrible raging wind happened, which did much hurt. Dennis Bond, a great Oliverian and antimonarchist, died on that day; and then the devil took bond for Oliver's appearance. Life of A. Wood. p. 115.

ANTIMO'NIAL. adj. [from antimony.] Made of antimony; having the qualities of antimony; relating to antimony.

They were got out of the reach of antimonial fumes. Grew.

Though antimonial cups prepar'd with art,
Their force to wine through ages should impart;
This dissipation, this profuse expence,
Nor shrinks their size, nor wastes their stores immense.

Blackmore.

ANTIMONY.† n. s. [The stibium of the ancients, by the Greeks called σίμμι. The reason of its modern denomination is referred to Basil Valentine, a German monk; who, as the tradition relates, having thrown some of it to the hogs, observed, that, after it had purged them heartily, they immediately fattened; and therefore, he imagined, his fellow monks would be the better for a like dose.

The experiment, however, succeeded so ill, that they all died of it; and the medicine was thenceforward called antimoine; antimonk. This etymology, given by Dr. Johnson, is what Furetière relates; and is of a romantick rather than a serious cast. From being found in the mines of all metals, it is probable that its denomination may have arisen from ἀντί and μόνος, i. e. not confined to one thing, in opposition to one. See Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. et Gr. One of our old dictionaries cites Arab. atimad.]

Antimony is a mineral substance, of a metalline nature, having all the seeming characters of a real metal, except malleability; and may be called a semimetal, being a fossile glebe of some undetermined metal, combined with a sulphurous and stony substance. Mines of all metals afford it; that in gold mines is reckoned best. It has also its own mines in Hungary, Germany, and France. Its texture is full of little shining veins or threads, like needles; brittle as glass. Sometimes veins of a red or golden colour are intermixed, which is called maleantimony; that without them being denominated female antimony. It fuses in the fire, though with some difficulty; and dissolves more easily in water. It destroys and dissipates all metals fused with it, except gold; and is therefore useful in refining. It is a common ingredient in speculums, or burning concaves; serving to give them a finer polish. It makes a part in bell metal; and renders the sound more clear. It is mingled with tin to make it more hard, white, and sound; and with lead in the casting of printers' letters, to render them more smooth and firm. It is a general help in the melting of metals, and especially in casting of cannon balls. In pharmacy, it is used under various forms, and with various intentions, chiefly as an emetick. Chambers.

Antimony is of a greyish white colour, and moderately brilliant; when combined with sulphur in the earth, it forms an ore of antimony commonly called crude antimony. Parkinson.

ANTIMO'RALIST.* n. s. An enemy to morality.

There is a sect of antimoralists, who have our Hobbes and the French duke de la Rochefoucault for their leaders.

Warburton on Prodiges, p. 26.

ANTINEPHRITICK. adj. [from ἀντί and νεφρός.]

Medicines good against diseases of the reins and kidneys.

ANTINO'MIAN.* n. s. [Gr. ἀντί and νόμος, Fr. antinomien.] • One of the sect called antinomianism.

That doctrine that holds that the covenant of grace is not established upon conditions, and that nothing of performance is required on man's part to give him an interest in it, but only to believe that he is justified; this certainly subverts all the motives of a good life. But this is the doctrine of the Antinomians. South, Sermon. vii. 102.

ANTINO'MIAN.* adj. Relating to the sect of the Antinomians.

It is a mad conceit of our antinomian hereticks, that God sees no sin in his elect; whereas he notes and takes, more tenderly, their offences than any other. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 233.

ANTINO'MIANISM.* n. s. The tenets of those who are called Antinomians. See ANTINOMIAN.

Antinomianism began in one minister of this diocese, [Norwich,] and how much it is spread, I had rather lament than speak. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 189.

ANTI'NOMIST.* n. s. He who pays no regard to the law.

Great offenders this way are the libertines and antinomists, who quite cancel the whole law of God, under the pretence of Christian liberty.

Bp. Sanderson, Sermon, p. 310.

ANTIMONY.† n. s. [from ἀντι and νόμος; Fr. antinomie.] A contradiction between two laws, or two articles of the same law; a rule in opposition to other rules.

Antinomies are almost unavoidable in such variety of opinions and answers.

Baker.

If God once willed adultery should be sinful, and to be punished with death, all his omnipotence will not allow him to will the allowance that his holiest people might, as it were, by his own antinomy, or counterstatute, live unreprieved in the same fact as he himself esteemed it.

Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce, ii. 1.

Humility, poverty, meanness, and wretchedness, are direct antinomies to the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life.

Bp. Taylor, Gr. Exemp. p. 50.

ANTIPOPAL.* adj. [ἀντι, and papal.] Opposing popery.

He charges strictly his son after him to persevere in that antipapal schism.

Milton, Answer to Eik. Bas. xviii.

I could not well think of putting it under any other patronage, than that of the primate of the noblest and best established antipapal church in the world.

M. Geddes, Pap. Supr. Ded.

ANTIPAPISTICAL.* adj. [from ἀντι, and papa.] Opposing popery.

It is pleasant to see how the most antipapistical poet are inclined to canonize their friends.

Jortin on Milt. Lycidas.

ANTIPOPALLEL.* adj. [from ἀντι, and parallel.] Running in a contrary direction.

The only way for us, the successors of these ignorant Gentiles, to repair those ruins, to renew the image of God in ourselves, which their idolatrous ignorance defaced, must be to take the opposite course, and to provide our remedy antiparallel to their disease.

Hammond, Sermon, p. 646.

ANTIPARALYTIC.† adj. [from ἀντι and παραλυτικός; Fr. antiparalytique.] Efficacious against the palsy.

ANTIPATHETICAL. adj. [from antipathy.] Having a natural contrariety to any thing.

The soil is fat and luxurious, and antipathetical to all venomous creatures.

Howell, Vocal Forest.

ANTIPATHETICALNESS. n. s. [from antipathetical.] The quality or state of having a natural contrariety to any thing.

Dict.

ANTIPATHETICK.* adj. [from ἀντι and παθητικός.] Of an opposite disposition.

[Being] ty'd upon the sledge, a papist and a protestant in front, two and two together, being two very disparate and antipathetick companions, was a very ridiculous scene of cruelty.

Iron Intell. p. 110.

ANTIPATHETICALLY.* adv. In an antipathetical or adverse manner.

ANTI-PATHOUS.* adj. Adverse; having a natural contrariety.

Mi-tress, what point you at? —

Her lamps are out, yet still she extends her hand,

As if she saw something antipathous

Unto her virtuous life.

Beaum. and Fl. Qu. of Corinth. iii. 2.

This antipathous extreme.

Ibid. Four Plays in One.

ANTI-PATHY. n. s. [from ἀντι, against, and πάθος, feeling; antipathie, Fr.]

1. A natural contrariety to any thing, so as to shun it involuntarily; aversion; dislike. It is opposed to sympathy.

No contraries hold more antipathy,

Than I and such a knave.

Shakspeare.

To this perhaps might be justly attributed most of the sympathies and antipathies observable in men.

Locke.

2. It has sometimes the particle against before the object of antipathy.

I had a mortal antipathy against standing armies in times of peace; because I took armies to be hired by the master of the family, to keep his children in slavery.

Swift.

3. Sometimes to.

Ask you what provocation I have had?

The strong antipathy of good to bad.

When truth, or virtue, an affront endures,

Th' affront is mine, my friend, and should be yours.

Pope.

4. Formerly with; but improperly.

Tangible bodies have an antipathy with air; and any liquid body, that is more dense, they will draw, condense, and, in effect, incorporate.

Bacon.

ANTIPEPASTASIS. n. s. [from ἀντιπεριστάσις, formed of ἀντι and περιστάσις, to stand round.] The opposition of a contrary quality, by which the quality it opposes becomes heightened or intended; or the action, by which a body attacked by another, collects itself, and becomes stronger by such opposition; or an intention of the activity of one quality caused by the opposition of another. Thus quicklime is set on fire by the affusion of cold water; so water becomes warmer in winter than in summer; and thunder and lightning are excited in the middle region of the air, which is continually cold, and all by antiperistasis. This is an exploded principle in the Peripatetick philosophy.

Th' antiperistasis of age

More inflam'd his am'rous rage.

Conley.

The riotous prodigal detest his covetousness; yet let him find the springs grow dry, which feed his luxury, covetousness shall be called in; and so, by a strange antiperistasis, prodigality shall beget rapine.

Decay of Piety.

ANTIPESTILENTIAL. adj. [from ἀντι, against, and pestilential.] Efficacious against the infection of the plague.

Perfumes correct the air, before it is attracted by the lungs; or, rather, antipestidential unguents, to annoint the nostrils with.

Harvey, on the Plague.

ANTI-PHLOGISTICK.* adj. [Fr. antiphlogistique, Gr. ἀντι, and φλόγιστος.] Good against inflammation.

I soon discovered — under what circumstances recourse was to be had to the lancet, and the antiphlogistick regimen.

Sir W. Fordyce, on the Muriatic Acid, p. 3.

ANTI-PHLOGISTICK.* n. s. A medicine which checks inflammation.

It is both unctuous and penetrating, a powerful antiphlogistick, and preservative against corruption and infection.

Bp. Berkeley, Siris, 59.

ANTI-PHON.* n. s. [Gr. ἀντι and φων, Fr. antiphone.]

1. The chant or alternate singing in the choirs of cathedrals; distinguished, in the offices of the Roman Catholic worship, from the versicle and the response. Several instances occur in the poetry of Crashaw.

Vers. Lord, by thy sweet saving sign,

Resp. Defend us from our foes and Thine.

Hymn. The wakeful matins haste to sing, &c.

Antiphon. All hail, fair tree,

Whose fruit we be.

Crashaw, Poems, p. 163.

That simple young prince of Hungary said much less, without ring or intention, only reading of course the words of an antiphone, "Thou art fair and beautiful, &c."

Brevint, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 391.

A sort of office, or service to Saint Edmund, consisting of an antiphone, versicle, response, and collect.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. ii. 56.

2. An echo, or response.

The great synod of Protestant ambassadors that are to meet at Hamborough, which to me sounds like an antiphone to the other malign conjunction at Colen.

Wotton, Rem. p. 376.

A N T

ANTI'PHONAL.* adj. Relating to the antiphon; alternate.

Antiphonal singing was first brought into the church of Milan, in imitation of the custom of the eastern churches.

Christian Antiquities, ii. 111.

He [Calvin] thought that novelty was sure to succeed, that the practice of antiphonal chanting was superstitious, &c.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. iii. 164.

ANTI'PHONAL.* n. s. A book of anthems. See ANTI-PHONER.

We command and charge you that you do command the dean and prebendaries of your cathedral church; the parson, vicar, or curat, and churchwardens of every parish, to bring and deliver unto you all antiphonals, missals, grayles, processionals, &c.

Barnet, Ref. ii. Rec. i. 47.

ANTI'PHONER.* n. s. [Lat. antiphonarium, Fr. antiphonaire.] A book of anthems, or antiphons.

He Alma Redemptoris herde sing,
As children led their antiphonere. Chaucer, Prioresse's Tale.
Item ii fair antiphoners of parchment lymmed with gold.

Warton's Sir T. Pope, p. 337.

The antiphonar is that book which containeth the invitatories, responses, verses, collects, and whatever is said or sung in the quire, called the seven hours, or breviary.

Barn, Ecc. Law.

ANTI'PHONICAL.* adj. The same as ANTI'PHONAL.

Pliny has recorded, that it was the custom in his time to meet upon a fixed day before light, and to sing a hymn, in parts or by turns, to Christ as God: which expression can hardly have any other sense put upon it, than that they sang in an antiphonal way.

Wheatley on the Com. Prayer, p. 161.

ANTI'PHONY.* n. s. The same as ANTI'PHON.

These are the pretty responses, these are the dear antiphonies, that so bewitched of late our prelates and their chaplains, with the goodly echo they made.

Milton, Arcop.

Alternate psalmody, for its division into two parts, was commonly called antiphony.

Chest. Antiq. ii. 111.

ANTI'PHRASIS. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and φράσις, a form of speech.] The use of words in a sense opposite to their proper meaning.

You now find no cause to repent, that you never dipt your hands in the bloody high courts of justice, so called only by antiphrasis.

South.

ANTI'PHRASTICALLY.* adv. [from antiphrasis.] In the manner of an antiphrasis.

The unruliness of whose pen, and the virulency thereof, none hath more felt than myself, as well in his book of Mitigation, as in his (antiphrastically so called) Sober Reckoning.

Bp. Morton's Discharge, p. 206.

ANTI'PODAL. adj. [from antipodes.] Relating to the countries inhabited by the antipodes.

The Americans are antipodals unto the Indians.

Brown.

ANTI'PODES.† n. s. It has no singular, Dr. Johnson says; which is a mistake. [from ἀντί, against, and ποδες, feet.]

1. Those people who, living on the other side of the globe, have their feet directly opposite to ours.

We should hold day with the antipodes,
If you would walk in absence of the sun.
So shines the sun, though hence remov'd, as clear
When his beams warm th' antipodes, as here.

Shakspeare.

Waller.

2. Used by way of opposition.

My soul is an antipode, and treads opposite to the present world.

Stafford's Niobe, To the Reader.

Can there be a greater contrariety unto Christ's judgement, a more perfect antipodes to all that hath hitherto been gospel, than that which, by pulling out one pin in the scene, hath been thus shifted into its stead?

Hammond, Sermon.

ANTI'POISON.* n. s. An antidote.

In venomous natures something may be amiable: poisons afford antipoisens; nothing is totally or altogether uselessly bad.

Brown, Christ. Mor. xxviii. 1.

A N T

ANTI'POPE.† n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and pope, Fr. antipape.] He that usurps the popedom, in opposition to the right pope.

Pope Urban the sixth, coming to his episcopal chair, would be correcting the loose manners of the Cardinals: They, impatient of his reformation, set up another for an anti-pope, Clement the seventh.

Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 72.

This house is famous in history for the retreat of an anti-pope, who called himself Felix V.

Addison.

ANTI'PORT.* n. s. [Fr. antiporte, Lat. ante and portus.] An outward gate or door. It should be written anteport.

This, like the chapel at Mecca, they esteem so holy, that it is only lawful for a Mussulman to enter it. If a Christian or Jew should but lift up the antiport, and set one step into it, he profaned it.

Smith, Manners of the Turks, p. 75.

ANTI'PRELATIC.* adj. [from anti and prelate.] Adverse to prelacy.

What say our antiprelatical opposites?

Bp. Morton's Episcopacy Asserted i, p. 45.

ANTI'PRELATIC.* adj. The same as ANTI'PRELATIC.

The rooters, the antiprelatical party, declaim against me.

Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 161.

ANTI'PRIEST.* n. s. An enemy to priests.

While they are afraid of being guided by priests, they consent to be governed by antipriests.

Waterland, Ch. p. 28.

Burke, Speech on the Claims of the Church.

ANTI'PRINCIPLE.* n. s. An opposite principle.

When the devil had once planted this opinion of omens, it is likely it received great increase from that vulgar notion among the heathens, That besides one great cause and source of good, there was an anti-principle of evil, of as great force and activity in the world.

Spencer on Predigies, p. 168.

ANTI'PROPHET.* n. s. An opposite or an enemy to prophets.

Well therefore might St. John, when he saw so many anti-prophets spring up, say, "Hereby we know that this is the last time."

Made's Apostasy of the Later Times, p. 88.

ANTI'PTOSIS. n. s. [from ἀντί and πτωσις.] A figure in grammar, by which one case is put for another.

ANTI'PURITAN.* n. s. An opposer of puritans.

This book [the Rehearsal Trapposed] is an attack on Dr. Samuel Parker, famous for his tergiversation with the times, now an antipuritan in the extreme, and who died bishop of Oxford, and king James's popish president of Magdalen College, Oxford.

Warton's Notes to Milton's Smaller Poems, p. 51.

ANTIQUA'RIAN.* adj. [Lat. antiquarius.] Relating to antiquity; partial to antiquities.

Your account of Gorhambury is very graphical. The library, according to your account, has been an heir-loom ever since the time of Bacon. You say your antiquarian taste drew you thither.

Warburton's Letters, i. 213.

He [Sir Thomas Stradling] was remarkable for his critical skill in the British language, and his patronage of the Welch antiquarian literature.

Warton's Sir T. Pope, p. 219.

ANTIQUA'RIAN.* n. s. [This word is improper, and is now rarely if at all used.] An antiquary.

You talk of Jackson's Chronology, on which occasion you quote a hue of Mr. Pope, which he would have envied you the application of; and would certainly have drawn a new character of a "diving antiquarian," for the pleasure of applying this line to him.

Warburton's Letters, i. 47.

ANTIQUA'RIANISM.* n. s. [from antiquarian.] Love of antiquities.

I used to despise him [Bishop Lyttelton] for his antiquarianism; but of late, since I grew old and dull myself, I cultivated an acquaintance with him for the sake of what formerly kept us asunder.

Warburton's Letters, p. 428.

I digressed a little, (to let you see that I have the seeds of antiquarianism in me,) to take a view of Gorhambury.

Hurd to Warburton, Lett. p. 429.

The sun was hot, but the spirit of antiquarianism gave us strength and courage to climb up to the platform of Saint John de Alfarache.

Swinhurne, Trav. through Spain, Let. 31.

ANTIQUARY. n. s. [antiquarius, Lat.] A man studious of antiquity; a collector of ancient things.

All arts, rarities, and inventions, are but the relicts of an intellect defaced with sin. We admire it now, only as antiquaries do a piece of old coin, for the stamp it once bore.

South.

With sharpen'd sight pale antiquaries pore,
Th' inscription value, but the rust adore.

Pope.

The rude Latin of the Monks is still very intelligible; had their records been delivered in the vulgar tongue, they could not now be understood, unless by antiquaries.

Swift.

ANTIQUARY. adj. [This word is improper.] Old; antique.

Here's Nestor,

Instructed by the antiquary times;

He must, he is, he cannot but be wise.

Shakspeare.

TO ANTIQUATE. v. a. [antiquo, Lat.] To put out of use; to make obsolete.

The growth of christianity in this kingdom might reasonably introduce new laws, and antiquate or abrogate some old ones, that seemed less consistent with the christian doctrines.

Hale's Common Law of England.

Milton's Paradise Lost is admirable. But cannot I admire the height of his invention, and the strength of his expression, without defending his antiquated words, and the perpetual harshness of their sound?

Dryden.

Almighty Latium, with her cities crown'd,
Shall like an antiquated fable sound.

Addison.

ANTIQUATEDNESS. n. s. [from antiquated.] The state of being antiquated, worn out of use, or obsolete.

ANTIQUATENESS.* n. s. [from antiquate.] The state of being obsolete.

For this sin of sacrilege, as God began to punish it very early, even in Paradise itself; so hath he continually pursued and hounded this sin; as in Achan in the Old Testament, in Ananias and Sapphira in the New; that no one may pretend antiquateness of the Old Testament.

Appendix to Life of Mede, xli.

ANTIQUATION.* n. s. [from antiquate.] The state of being antiquated.

Reason is a law

High and divine, engrav'd in every breast,
Which must no change nor antiquation know.

Beaumont's Psyche, xv. 164.

ANTI'QUE. adj. [antique, Fr. antiquus, Lat.] It was formerly pronounced according to the English analogy, with the accent on the first syllable; but now after the French, with the accent on the last, at least in prose; the poets use it variously.]

1. Ancient; old; not modern.

Now, good Cesario, but that piece of song,

That old and antique song we heard last night.

Shakspeare.

Such truth in love as th' antique world did know,

In such a style as courts might boast of now.

Waller.

2. Of genuine antiquity.

The seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them.

Dryden.

My copper lamps at any rate,
For being true antique I bought;
Yet wisely melted down my plate,
On modern models to be wrought;

And trifles I alike pursue,
Because they're old, because they're new.

Prior.

3. Of old fashion.

Forth came that ancient lord and aged queen,
Array'd in antique robes down to the ground,
And sad habiliments right well beseen.

Spenser, F. Q.

Must be no more divert the tedious day?

Nor sparkling thoughts in antique words convey?

Smith to the Memory of Philips.

4. Odd; wild; antick.

Name not these living death-heads unto me;
For these not ancient but antique be.

Donne.

And sooner may a gulling weather-spy
By drawing forth heav'n's scheme, tell certainly
What fashion'd hats or ruffs, or suits next year,
Our giddy-headed antique youth will wear.

Donne.

ANTI'QUE. n. s. [from antique, adj.] An antiquity; a remain of ancient times; an ancient rarity.

I leave to Edward, now earl of Oxford, my seal of Julius Cæsar; as also another seal, supposed to be a young Hercules; both very choice antiques, and set in gold.

Swift.

ANTI'QUENESS. n. s. [from antique.] The quality of being antique; an appearance of antiquity.

We may discover something venerable in the antiqueness of the work; but we would see the design enlarged.

Addison.

ANTI'QUITY. n. s. [antiquitas, Lat.]

1. Old times; time past long ago.

I mention Aristotle, Polybius, and Cicero, the greatest philosopher, the most impartial historian, and the most consummate statesman of all antiquity.

Addison.

2. The people of old times; the ancients.

That such pillars were raised by Seth, all antiquity has avowed.

Raleigh.

3. The works or remains of old times.

As for the observation of Machiavel, traducing Gregory the Great, that he did what in him lay, to extinguish all heathen antiquities: I do not find that those zeals last long; as it appeared in the succession of Sabinian, who did revive the former antiquities.

Bacon.

4. Old age: a ludicrous sense.

Is not your voice broken? your wind short? your chin double? your wit single? and every part about you blasted with antiquity? and will you yet call yourself young?

Shakspeare.

5. Ancientness; as, this ring is valuable for its antiquity.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONARY.* adj. [anti and revolution.]

Adverse to revolutions in governments.

There these ministers and magistrates will hear him entertain the worthy aldermen with an instructing and pleasing narrative of the manner, in which he made the rich citizens of Bourdeaux squeak, and gently led them by the publick credit of the guillotine to disgorge their antirevolutionary pelf.

Burke, Regicide's Peace.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONIST.* n. s. He who opposes a change or revolution in government.

At Whittington, between Sheffield and Chesterfield, is an old thatched cottage, the upper story of which, lighted by a very small window, is shewn as the apartment called by the antirevolutionists, "the plotting parlour."

Guthrie, Eng.

ANTISABBATA'RIAN.* n. s. One of a sect so called.

The antisabbatarians hold the sabbath day, or that which we call the Lord's day, to be no more a sabbath: In which they go about to violate all religion; for take away the sabbath, and farewell religion.

Pagel's Heresiography, p. 119.

ANTISACERDO'TAL.* adj. [anti and sacerdos, a priest.]

Hostile to priests.

The charge of such sacerdotal craft hath often been unjustly laid by antisacerdotal pride or resentment.

Waterland, Ch. p. 58.

ANTISCI. n. s. It has no singular. [from anti and σκια.] In geography, the people who inhabit on different sides of the equator, who, consequently, at noon have their shadows projected opposite ways. Thus the people of the north are Antiscii to those of the south; the one projecting their shadows at noon toward the north pole, and the other toward the south pole.

Chambers.

ANTISCORBU'TICAL. adj. [from anti, against, and scorbutum, the scurvy.] Good against the scurvy.

A N T

The warm antiscorbutical plants, in quantities, will occasion stinking breath, and corrupt the blood. Arbutnot.

ANTISCORBU'TICKS. † n. s. [from ἀντί against, and scorbutum, the scurvy, Fr. adj. antiscorbutique.] Medicines against the scurvy.

The warm antiscorbuticks, animal diet, and animal salts, are proper. Arbutnot.

It is well known, that hot antiscorbuticks, where the juices of the body are alcallescent, increase the disease.

Bp. Berkeley's Serms. 97.

ANTISCRIP'TURISM.* n. s. [ἀντί and scripture.] Opposition to the holy scriptures.

Now that antiscripturism grows so rife, and spreads so fast, I hope it will not appear unseasonable to advise those that tender the safety and serenity of their faith, to be more than ordinarily shy of being too venturous on any books or company that may derogate from their veneration of the Scripture.

Boyle on the Style of the II. S. p. 146.

ANTISCRIP'TURIST.* n. s. One that denies revelation; that opposes the truth of the Holy Scriptures.

Not now to mention what is by atheists and antiscripturists alleged to overthrow the truth and authority of the Scripture.

Boyle on the Style of the II. S. p. 4.

It [the study of various lections] enables them to give an account of the hope that is in them; to confute the cavils of fanatical anti-scripturists; of some injudicious and fiery Romanists; and of all the shallow atheistical disputers of this world.

Blackwall, ii. 357.

ANTISE'PTICK.* adj. [ἀντί and πῶω, Fr. antiseptique.] Counteracting putrefaction.

A remedy, that is both diluting and antiseptick.

Battle on Madness.

ANTISE'PTICK.* n. s. A remedy against putrefaction; an antiseptick medicine.

This could be no other than the spirit of sea-salt; and I began to wonder how a preparation, the greatest antiseptick in nature, and extracted from a material that had been in use from the beginning of time for preserving as well as seasoning food, should have remained unemployed for the purpose of preserving from putrefaction the juices of the human body.

Sir W. Fordyce on the Muriatic Acid, p. 7.

ANTI'SPASMIS. n. s. [from ἀντί, against, and σπᾶω to draw.] The revulsion of any humour into another part.

ANTISPASMO'DICK.† adj. [from ἀντί, against, and σπᾶσμος, the cramp, Fr. antispasmodique.] That which has the power of relieving the cramp.

ANTISPASMO'DICKS.* n. s. Medicines that relieve spasms.

Under this head of antispasmodicks every one, I suppose, will readily place, valerian, castor, the gunms, and musk. Battle.

ANTISPA'STICK. adj. [from ἀντί and σπᾶστικός.] Medicines which cause a revulsion of the humours.

ANTISPLEN'ETICK. adj. [from ἀντί, and splenetick.] Efficacious in diseases of the spleen.

Antispleneticks open the obstructions of the spleen. Floyer.

ANTYSTES.* n. s. [Lat. antistes.] The chief priest or prelate.

He tells what the Christians had wont to do in their several congregations, to read and expound, to pray and administer, all which he says the antistes, or antistes, did.

Milton, of Prel. Episcopacy.

Unless they had as many antistes as presbyters. Ibid.

ANTYSTROPHIE.† n. s. [ἀντιστροφή, from ἀντί, the contrary way, and στροφή, turning.] In an ode supposed to be sung in parts, the second stanza of every three, or sometimes every second stanza; so called because the dance turns about.

The measure of verse used in the chorus is of all sort, called by the Greeks Monostrophick, or rather Apolehymenon, without regard had to strophe, antistrophe, or epode, which were a kind of stanzas framed only for the musick, then used with the chorus that sung. Milton, Pref. to Samson Agonistes.

ANTYSTROPHON.* n. s. [Lat. antistrophe.] A figure which repeats a word often.

That he may know what it is to be a child, and yet to meddle with edged tools, I turn his antistrophe upon his own head.

Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

ANTISTRUMA'TICK. adj. [from ἀντί and struma, a scrophulous swelling.] Good against the king's evil.

I prescribed him a distilled milk, with antistrumaticks, and purged him. Waxman.

ANTITHESIS. n. s. in the plural, antitheses. [ἀντί-σῆς, placing in opposition.] Opposition of words or sentiments; contrast; as in these lines:

Though gentle, yet not dull,
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full. Deham.

I see a chief, who leads my chosen sons,
All arm'd with points, antitheses, and puns. Pope.

ANTITHE'TON.* n. s. [Gr. ἀντίθεσις, pl. antitheta.] An opposite.

Those words which the voice chiefly to stay upon, and give an extraordinary emphasis to, are such in which there lies some figure; as all antithetas, and correspondents, and words relating to another. Instructions for Oratory, (1661.) p. 136.

ANTITHE'TICAL.* adj. [from antithesis.] Placed in contrast.

Parallel antithetical expressions are, in like manner, substituted for rhythm and cadence. Mason on Ch. Musick, p. 179.

ANTITRINITA'RIAN.* n. s. An opposer of the doctrine of the Trinity.

The antitrinitarians have renewed Arius's old heresy; and they are called Antitrinitarians because they blaspheme and violate the Holy Trinity. Lagü's Heresiography, p. 116.

Nothing can be more notorious than that Atheists, Deists, Socinians, Antitrinitarians, and other subdivisions of Free-thinkers, are persons of little zeal for the present establishment. Swift against abolishing Christianity.

When therefore they [the papists] urge us with the doctrine of the Trinity, putting that and transubstantiation upon the same foot, they do what they are upon all occasions much addicted to, that is, undermine Christianity, in order to support popery; as the Antitrinitarians, on the other hand, by the same sort of arguing, support popery, in order to undermine Christianity. Trapp's Popery truly Stated, part 2.

ANTITYPE. n. s. [ἀντίτυπος.] That which is resembled or shadowed out by the type; that of which the type is the representation. It is a term of theology. See TYPE.

When once upon the wing, he soars to an higher pitch, from the type to the antitype, to the days of the Messiah, the ascension of our Saviour, and, at length, to his kingdom and dominion over all the earth. Hurvell's Theoria.

He brought forth bread and wine, and was the priest of the most high God; imitating the antitype, or the substance, Christ himself. Taylor.

ANTITYPICAL. adj. [from antitype.] That which relates to an antitype; that which explains the type.

ANTIVENE'REAL. adj. [from ἀντί, and veneréal.] Good against the veneréal disease.

If the lues be joined with it, you will scarce cure your patient without exhibiting antiveneréal remedies. Waxman.

ANTLER. n. s. [andouillier, Fr.] Properly the first branches of a stag's horns; but, popularly and generally, any of his branches.

Grown old, they grow less branched, and first lose their brow antlers, or lowest furcations next to the head. Brown.

A well grown stag, whose antlers rise
High o'er his front, his beams invade the skies. Dryden.

Bright Diana
Brought hunted wild goats heads, and branching antlers
Of stags, the fruit and honour of her toil. Prior.

A N X

A'NTLERED.* adj. [from antler.] Furnished with antlers.

A fowl with spangled plumage, a brindled steer,
Sometimes a crested mare, or antler'd deer.

Ovid's Metamorph. b. 8. by Mr. Vernon.

ANTOECI. n. s. It has no singular. [Lat. from ἀντί and οἰκίζω, to inhabit.] In geography, those inhabitants of the earth, who live under the same meridian, and at the same distance from the equator; the one toward the north, and the other to the south. Hence they have the same longitude, and their latitude is also the same, but of a different denomination. They are in the same semicircle of the meridian, but opposite parallels. They have precisely the same hours of the day and night, but opposite seasons; and the night of the one is always equal to the day of the other. Chambers.

ANTONOMASIA. n. s. [from ἀντί and νόμας, a name.] A form of speech, in which, for a proper name, is put the name of some dignity, office, profession, science, or trade: or when a proper name is put in the room of an appellative. Thus a king is called his majesty; a nobleman, his lordship. We say the philosopher instead of Aristotle, and the orator for Cicero; thus a man is called by the name of his country, a German, an Italian; and a grave man is called a Cato, and a wise man a Solomon.

Smith's Rhetorick.

This way of speaking, which the grammarians call an anonomasia, and which is still extremely common, though now not at all necessary, demonstrates how much mankind are naturally disposed to give to one object the name of any other, which nearly resembles it, and thus to denominate a multitude, by what originally was intended to express an individual.

A. Smith on the Formation of Languages.

A'NTRE. [antre, Fr. antrum, Lat.] A cavern; a cave; a den: not in use.

My travel's history:

Wherein of antres vast, and deserts idle, —
It was my hint to speak.

Shakspeare.

A'NVIL.† n. s. [ænville, Sax. and also anvil, incus; and the word is written anvil by Chaucer.]

1. The iron block on which the smith lays his metal to be forged.

I saw a smith stand with his hammer, the,
The whilst his iron did on the anvil cool.

Shakspeare.

On their eternal anvil here he found

The brethren beating, and the blows go round.

Dryden.

2. Any thing on which blows are laid.

Here I clip

The anvil of my sword, and do contest

Hotly and nobly.

Shakspeare.

3. Figuratively; to be upon the anvil, is to be in a state of formation or preparation.

Several members of our house knowing what was upon the anvil, went to the clergy, and desired their judgment. Swift.

A'NVILED.* part. adj. [from anvil.] Fashioned on the anvil.

It must be told:

Yet, ere you hear it, with all care put on

The surest armour anvil'd in the shop

Of passive fortitude. Beaumont and Fl. Lover's Progress, iv. 1.

ANXI'ETY.† n. s. [anxietas, Lat. anxymney, Sax.]

1. Trouble of mind about some future event; suspense with uneasiness; perplexity; solicitude.

To be happy, is not only to be freed from the pains and diseases of the body, but from anxiety and vexation of spirit; not only to enjoy the pleasures of sense, but peace of conscience, and tranquillity of mind. Tillotson.

A O R

2. In the medical language, lowness of spirits, with uneasiness of the stomach.

In anxieties which attend fevers, when the cold fit is over, a warmer regimen may be allowed; and because anxieties often happen by spasms from wind, spices are useful. Arbuthnot.

A'NXIOUS. adj. [anxius, Lat.]

1. Disturbed about some uncertain event; solicitous; being in painful suspense; painfully uncertain.

His pensive cheek upon his hand reclin'd

And anxious thoughts revolving in his mind.

Dryden.

With beating hearts the dire event they wait, anxious, and trembling for the birth of fate.

Pope.

2. Careful; full of inquietude; unquiet.

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;

But ah! the mighty bliss is fugitive;

Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,

And age, and death's inexorable doom.

Dryden.

3. Careful, as of a thing of great importance.

No writing we need to be solicitous about the meaning of, but those that contain truths we are to believe, or laws we are to obey; we may be less anxious about the sense of other authors.

Locke.

4. It has generally for or about before the object, but sometimes of; less properly.

Anxious of neglect, suspecting change.

Granville.

A'NXIOUSLY. adv. [from anxious.] In an anxious manner; solicitously; unquietly; carefully; with painful uncertainty.

But where the loss is temporal, every probability of it needs not put us so anxiously to prevent it, since it might be repaired again.

South.

Thou what befits the new lord mayor,

And what the Gallick arms will do,

Art anxiously inquisitive to know.

Dryden.

A'NXIOUSNESS. n. s. [from anxious.] The quality of being anxious; susceptibility of anxiety.

A'NY.† adj. [ains, ainohun, Goth. aniz, emiz, Sax.]

1. Every; whoever he be; whatever it be. It is, in all its senses, applied indifferently to persons or things.

I know you are now, Sir, a gentleman born — Ay and have been so any time these four hours.

Shakspeare.

You contented yourself with being capable, as much as any who-soever, of defending your country with your sword.

Dryden.

How fit is this retreat for uninterrupted study? Any one that sees it will own, I could not have chosen a more likely place to converse with the dead in.

Pope.

2. Whosoever; whatsoever; as distinguished from some other.

What warmth is there in your affection towards any of these princely suitors that are already come?

Shakspeare.

An inverted motion being begun any where below, continues itself all the whole length.

Locke.

He never appears in any alacrity but when raised by wine.

Teller.

3. It is used in opposition to none.

I would and I had: neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand.

Deut. xxxii. 39.

ANY-WHITHER.* adv. Any where; wheresoever.

This [profit] is the bait, by which you may inveigle most men any-whither.

Barrow's Works, i. 9.

ANY-WISE.* adv. In any manner. [Corruptly written any ways. See NOWISE.]

How can he be any-wise rich, who doth want all the best things, the only valuable things in the world, which any man may have, which any good man doth possess?

Barrow's Works, i. 16.

A'ORIST.† n. s. [ἀόριστος, Fr. aoriste.] Indefinite; a term in the Greek grammar.

First and second aorists in the potential and subjunctive or conjunctive moods (which are futures too) are often in sacred and common writers equivalent to the future of the indicative.

Blackwall's Sarrad Class. ii. 284.

The word ποιήσωμεν, which is commonly rendered in the imperative, "let us do," I have translated in the subjunctive aorist, in its proper sense, together with the conjunction ἵνα, "because we have done." Knatchbull Tr. p. 156.

AORTA. f n.s. [Gr. ἀορτή.] The great artery which rises immediately out of the left ventricle of the heart. Quincy.

The left ventricle of the heart doth, in its diastole, receive that blood that is brought unto it by the arteria venosa of the lungs; and having retained it a little, it doth, in its systole, conveniently pass a due proportion thereof into the aorta.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 244.

APA'CE. adv. [from a and pace; that is, with a great pace.]

1. Quick; speedily: used of things in motion.

Or when the flying libbard she did chace,
She could them nimble move, and after fly apace. Spenser.

By, quoth my uncle Glo'ster,
Small herbs have grace, great weeds do grow apace.
And since methinks, I would I not grow so fast,
Because sweet flow'rs are slow, and weeds make haste.

Shakespeare.

He promis'd in his east a glorious race;
Now sunk from his meridian, sets apace. Dryden.

Is not he imprudent, who, seeing the tide making haste towards him apace, will sleep till the sea overwhelm him?

Tillotson.

2. With haste; applied to some action.

The baron now his diamonds pours apace;
Th' embroider'd king who shows but half his face,
And his refulgent queen. Pope, Rape of the Lock.

3. Hastily; with speed: spoken of any kind of progression from one state to another.

This second course of men,
With some regard to what is just and right,
Shall lead their lives, and multiply apace. Milton.

The life and power of religion decays apace here and at home, while we are spreading the honour of our arms far and wide through foreign nations. Atterbury.

If sensible pleasure, or real grandeur, be our end, we shall proceed apace to real misery. Watts.

APAGOGICAL. f adj. [from ἀπαγωγή; compounded of ἀπ, from, and ἀγω, to bring or draw.] An apagogical demonstration is such as does not prove the thing directly: but shews the impossibility, or absurdity, which arises from denying it: and is also called reductio ad impossibile, or ad absurdum.

Chambers.

I demand a reason why any other apagogical demonstration, or demonstration ad absurdum should be admitted in geometry rather than this. Bp. Berkeley's Analyst, § xxv.

What is common to these figures is an accumulation of particulars, which particulars form a whole.

Rhetor. Grammar.

APA'RT. adv. [apart, Fr.]

1. Separately from the rest in place.

Since I enter into that question, it behoveth me to give reason for my opinion, with circumspection: because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude. Raleigh.

The party discerned, that the earl of Essex would never serve their turn, they resolved to have another army apart, that should be at their devotion. Clarendon.

2. In a state of distinction; as, to set apart for any use.

He is so very figurative, that he requires a grammar apart, to construe him. Dryden.

The tyrant shall demand yon sacred load,
And gold and vessels set apart for God. Prior.

3. Distinctly.

Moses first nameth heaven and earth, putting waters but in the third place, as comprehending waters in the world earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart. Raleigh.

4. At a distance; retired from the other company.

So please you, markan,
To put apart these your attendants. Shakespeare.

APA'RTMENT. n. s. [apartment, Fr.] A part of the house allotted to the use of any particular person; a room; a set of rooms.

A private gallery 'twixt th' apartments led,
Not to the foe yet known. Sir J. Goddard.

He, pale as death, de spoil'd of his array,
Into the queen's apartment takes his way. Dryden.

The most considerable ruin is that on the eastern promontory, where are still some apartments left, very high and cridled at top. Adelphi.

APATHE'ICK. n. s. [Gr. ἀπάθεια and παῖς.] Without feeling.

I am not to be apathetic, like a statue.

Harris, Treatise of Happiness.

APATHIST. n. s. A man without feeling. See APATHY.

APATHISTICAL. n. s. [from apathist.] Indifferent; unfeeling.

Fontenelle was of a good-humoured and apathistical disposition. Scandal, Anecdotes, v. 252.

APATHY. n. s. [Gr. ἀπάθεια, not, and παῖς, feeling.] The quality of not feeling; exemption from passion; freedom from mental perturbation.

Of good and evil much they argued then,
Passion, and apathy, and glory, and shame. Milton.

To remain insensible of such provocations, is not constancy, but apathy. South.

In lazy apathy let stoicks boast.

Their virtue fix'd; 'tis fix'd as in frost,

Contracted all, retiring to the breast;

But strength of mind is exercise, not rest. Pope.

APPE. f n. s. [ape, Icelandic; apa, Sax. eppa, Welsh.]

1. A kind of monkey remarkable for imitating what he sees.

I will be more newfangled than an ape, more giddy in my desires than a monkey. Shakespeare.

Writers report, that the heart of an ape worn near the heart, comforteth the heart, and increaseth audacity. It is true, that the ape is a merry and bold beast. Bacon.

With glittering gold and sparkling gems they shine,
But apes and monkeys are the gods within. Granville.

Celestial Beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,

Admir'd such knowledge in a human shape,

And shew'd a Newton, as we show in an ape. Pope.

2. An imitator; used generally in the bad sense.

Julio Romano, who, had he himself eternity, and could put breath into his work, would beguile Nature of her custom: so perfectly he is her ape. Shakespeare.

3. Formerly the term for a fool. Fools used to carry apes on their shoulders; and "to put the ape upon a man," was a phrase equivalent to that of making a fool of him. This phrase is used by Chaucer, and adopted by Spenser. In later times strolling buffoons, or fools, are contemptuously called ape-bearers and ape-carriers.

Thus was the ape,
By their faire handling, put into Malbecco's cape.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. ix. 31.

I know this man well; he hath been since an ape-bearer; then a process-server, a bailiff, &c.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale.

Jugglers and gipsies, all the sorts of canters,
And colonies of beggars, tumblers, ape-carriers.

B. Jonson, New Inn, v. 5.

There is nothing in the earth so pitiful; no, not an ape-carrier. Overbury's Characters, O. 7.

A P E

[This] he could do with as much ease, as an ape-carrier with his eye makes the vaulting creature come aloft.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iii. 7.

TO APE. v. a. [from ape.] To imitate, as an ape imitates human actions.

Aping the foreigners in every dress,
Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less. Dryden.
Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!

Ambitiously sententious! Addison.

APE'AK, OR APE'EK. adv. [probably from à pique.] In a posture to pierce; formed with a point.

A'PENNINE.* n. s. [from alp and pen, Celt. top or summit. See also ALP.] A vast ridge of mountains running through Italy.

Loud fame calls ye,
Pitch'd on the topless Apennine, and blows
To all the under world. Braun, and Fl. Bonduca, iii. 2.

The rugged Apennines, that roll
Far through Italian bounds their wavy tops.

Thomson, Liberty, p. 4.

A'PEPSY. n. s. [ἀπεψία.] A loss of natural concoction.

Quincy.

A'TER. n. s. [from ape.] A ridiculous imitator or mimick.

APE'RIENT. adj. [aperio, Lat. to open.] That which has the quality of opening; chiefly used of medicines gently purgative.

There be bracelets fit to comfort the spirits; and they be of three intentions; refrigerant, corroborant, and aperient.

Bacon.

Of the stems of plants, some contain a fine aperient salt, and are diuretick and saponaceous.

Arbutnot.

APE'RITIVE.† adj. [Fr. aperitif, from aperio, Lat. to open.] That which has the quality of opening the excrementitious passages of the body.

They may make broth, with the addition of aperitive herbs.

Harecy.

APE'RT.† adj. [Lat. apertus, old Fr. apert, apiert.] 1. Open; without disguise; evident.

The phrase "privy and apert" is frequent in our old language. Neither do the poets, by these insinuations only, acknowledge that their faculty is given to them of God; but also by their direct and apert confessions.

Fotherby, Athcomastix, p. 358.

The proceedings may be apert, and ingenuous, and candid, and avowable; for that gives satisfaction and acquiescence.

Donne's Devotions, p. 209.

2. Simply, open.

is a guttural sound, and of all other vowels the most apert.

Dalgarnos, Didasc. p. 104.

APE'RTION. n. s. [from apertus, Lat.]

1. An opening; a passage through any thing; a gap.

The next now in order are the apertions; under which term I do comprehend doors, windows, staircases, chimneys, or other conduits: in short, all inlets or outlets.

Wotton.

2. The act of opening; or state of being opened.

The plenitude of vessels, otherways called the plethora, when it happens, causeth an extravasation of blood, either by ruption or apertion of them.

Wiseman.

APE'RTLY.† adv. [apertè, Lat.] Openly; without covert.

The malycouse and covetouse Romanes, with those unpure apostles which they from time to time have sent into this our nation, hath [have] most apertly shewed themselves to be those vile dogges and swyne, whome Christe admonyshed us to be ware of. Mathew vii. Bale, Eng. Vol. P. ii. fol. A. ii. b.

In all their discourses of him they never directly nor indirectly, covertly or apertly, insinuate this deformity.

Sir G. Buck, History of K. Rich. III. p. 79.

You shall discourage no man privily or apertly from the reading or hearing of the said Bible.

Injunct. by K. Hen. VIII. Burnet, vol. i. Records, p. 178.

APE'RTNESS. n. s. [from apert.] Openness.

A P H

The freedom, or apertness and vigour of pronouncing, — and the closeness, and muffling, and laziness of speaking, render the sound of their speech different.

Holder.

A'PERTURE. n. s. [from apertus, open.]

1. The act of opening.

Hence ariseth the facility of joining a consonant to a vowel, because from an appulse to an aperture is easier than from one appulse to another.

Holder.

2. An open place.

Memory be made by the easy motion of the spirits through the open passages, images, without doubt, pass through the same apertures.

Glanville.

3. The hole next the object glass of a telescope or microscope.

The concave metal bore an aperture of an inch; but the aperture was limited by an opaque circle, perforated in the middle.

Newton, Opticks.

4. Enlargement; explanation: a sense seldom found.

It is too much untwisted by the doctors, and, like philosophy, made intricate by explications, and difficult by the aperture and dissolution of distinctions.

Taylor.

APE'TALOUS. adj. [of a, priv. and πετάλον, a leaf.]

Without petala or flower leaves.

APE'TALOUSNESS. n. s. [from apetalous.] The state of being without leaves.

A'PEX.† n. s. apices, plur. [Lat.] The tip or point of any thing.

Upon his head a hat of delicate wool, whose top ended in a cone, and was thence called, according to that of Lucan, "attollensque apicem generoso vertice flamen." This apex was covered with a fine net of yarn.

B. Jonson, K. James's Entertainment.

Gaugamela might with a facile error be written for naugamela, there being no difference between gimel and nun but a small apex or excrescence, which oft-times escapes the printer's diligence, and more often might the transcriber's haste.

Gregory, Posthuma, p. 195.

The apex, or lesser end of it, is broken off.

Woodward.

APH'ÆRESIS. n. s. [ἀφαίρεσις.] A figure in grammar that takes away a letter or syllable from the beginning of a word.

APH'ELION. n. s. aphelia, plur. [from ἀπὸ, and ἥλιος, the sun.] That part of the orbit of a planet, in which it is at the point remotest from the sun.

The reason why the comets move not in the zodiack, is, that, in their aphelia, they may be at the greatest distances from one another; and consequently disturb one another's motions the least that may be.

Cheyne.

APH'ETA. n. s. [with astrologers.] The name of the planet, which is imagined to be the giver or disposer of life in a nativity.

Dict.

APH'E'TICAL. adj. [from apheta.] Relating to the apheta.

APHILA'NTHROPY. n. s. [Gr. ἀ, without, and φιλανθρωπία, love of mankind.] Want of love to mankind.

A'PHONY.† n. s. [old Fr. aphonie, from Gr. ἀ, without, and φωνή, speech.] A loss of speech.

Quincy.

A'PHORISM. n. s. [Gr. ἀφορισμός.] A maxim; a precept contracted in a short sentence; an unconnected position.

He will easily discern how little of truth there is in the multitude; and though sometimes they are flattered with that aphorism, will hardly believe the voice of the people to be the voice of God.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

I shall at present consider the aphorism, that a man of religion and virtue is a more useful, and consequently a more valuable member of a community.

Rogers.

A'PHORISMER.* n. s. [from aphorism.] A writer or relater of aphorisms.

A P I

We may infallibly assure ourselves, that it will as well agree with monarchy, though all the tribe of aphorismers and politicasters would persuade us there be secret and mysterious reasons against it. Milton, of Ref. in England, b. 2.

A'PHORIST.* n. s. [from aphorism.] A writer of aphorisms.

He took this occasion of farther clearing and justifying what he had written against the aphorist.

Nelson's Life of Bp. Bull, p. 246.

APHORI'STICAL.† adj. [Fr. aphoristique.] Having the form of an aphorism; in separate and unconnected sentences.

APHORI'STICALLY. adv. [from aphoristical.] In the form of an aphorism.

These being carried down, seldom miss a cure, as Hippocrates doth likewise aphoristically tell us. Harvey.

APHRODISI'ACAL.† } adj. [Fr. aphrodisiaque, from APHRODISI'ACK. } ἀφροδίτη, Venus.] Relating to the venereal disease.

A'PHRODITE.* n. s. [from ἀφροδίτη.] The French have the feminine noun, aphrodite. A follower of Venus.

A medal, where grim Mars, turn'd right,
Proves a smiling aphrodite. Cleveland's Poems, p. 89.

A'PIARY. n. s. [from apis, Lat. a bee.] The place where bees are kept.

Those who are skilled in bees, when they see a foreign swarm approaching to plunder their hives, have a trick to divert them into some neighbouring apiary, there to make what havoc they please. Swift.

APICES of a flower. [Lat. from apex, the top.] Little knobs that grow on the tops of the stamina, in the middle of a flower. They are commonly of a dark purplish colour. By the microscope they have been discovered to be a sort of capsule seminules, or seed vessels, containing in them small globular, and often oval particles, of various colours, and exquisitely formed. Quincy.

API'E.E. adv. [from a for each, and piece, or share.] To the part or share of each.

Men, in whose mouths at first sounded nothing but mortification, were come to think they might lawfully have six or seven wives apiece. Hooker.

I have to-night dispatched sixteen businesses, a month's length apiece, by an abstract of success. Shakspeare.

One copy of this paper may serve a dozen of you, which will be less than a farthing apiece. Swift.

API'E.CES.* adv. In pieces.

Yield up my sword? that's Hebrew;
I'll be first cut apieces.

Beaumont and Fl. Little Fr. Lawyer, ii. 1.
He will knap the spears apieces with his teeth.

More, Antid. against Atheism.

4 The air
Totters and reels, and rends apieces, Drusus,
With the huge vollied clamour.

Beaumont and Fl. Bonduca, iii. 5.

A'PISH. adj. [from ape.]

1. Having the qualities of an ape; imitative.

Report of fashions in proud Italy,
Whose manners still our tardy, apish nation
Limps after, in base awkward imitation. Shakspeare.

2. Foppish; affected.

Because I cannot flatter, and look fair,
Duck with French nods and apish courtesy,
I must be held a rancorous enemy. Shakspeare.

3. Silly; trifling; insignificant.

All this is but apish sophistry; and, to give it a name divine and excellent, is abusive and unjust. Glanville.

4. Wanton; playful.

Gloomy sits the queen;
Till happy chance reverts the cruel scene;

A P O

And apish folly, with her wild resort

Of wit and jest, disturbs the solemn court.

Prior.

A'PISHLY.† adv. [from apish.] In an apish manner; foppishly; conceitedly.

So apishly romanizing, that the word of command still was set down in Latin. Milton, Arcopagitica.

Sin is generally so apishly crafty, as to hide itself under the colours and masks of goodness and honesty.

Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 15.

Deride, and play upon his amorous humours,

Though he but apishly doth imitate

The gallant'st courtiers, kissing ladies pumps,

Holding the cloth for them, praising their wits.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

A'PISHNESS.† n. s. [from apish.] Munickry; fopperv; insignificance; playfulness. Sherwood, in his old dictionary, defines "Apishness, comme apish tricks."

My apishness has paid the ransom for my speech, and set it at liberty. Congreve.

It [deisin] was treated with that contempt, as suited, and was due, to the apishness of foreign manners. Warburton, Sermon.

API'TPAT. adv. [a word formed from the motion.]

With quick palpitation.

O there he comes—Welcome, my bully, my back; again, my heart is gone apitpat for you. Congreve.

APLUSTRE. n. s. [Latin.] The ancient ensign carried in sea vessels.

The one holds a sword in her hand, to represent the Iliad, as the other has an aplustre, to represent the Odyssey, or voyage of Ulysses. Addison.

APOCALYPSE.† n. s. [from ἀποκαλύπτω.] Revelation; discovery: a word used only of the sacred writings, Dr. Johnson says; he should have said, the last book in the sacred canon; and should have also omitted only.

O for that warning voice, which he who saw

Th' apocalypse heard cry, in heav'n aloud, Milton.

With this throne, of the glory of the Father, compare the throne of the Son of God, as seen in the apocalypse.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Nor do I think any of the learned will dispute that famous treatise to be a complete body of civil knowledge, and the revelation or rather the apocalypse of all state arcana.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, Introduct.

A company of giddy heads will take upon them to define how many shall be saved, and who damned, in a parish; where they shall sit in heaven; interpret apocalypses, and those hidden mysteries to private persons, times, and places, as their own spirit informs them! Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 677.

APO'CALYPTICAL.† adj. [from apocalypse.] Concerning revelation, or the book, particularly so called; containing revelation.

If we could understand that scene, at the opening of this apocalyptical theatre, we should find it a representation of the majesty of our Saviour. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

They are light and giddy-headed, much symbolizing in spirit with our apocalyptical zealots and fiery interpreters of Daniel and other prophets, whereby they often sooth or rather fool themselves into some illumination, which really proves but some egregious dotage. Howell's Letters, i. 6.

A man [Abp. Crammer] so averse to Rome, so instrumental in planting the gospel, so laborious, so holy, that a great apocalyptical man, and no friend to the hierarchy, [Brightman, who wrote a commentary on the Revelation of St. John] takes him to be that angel pointed at by the Spirit of God, Revel. 14, that had power over the fire. Jura Cleri, p. 43.

This sect looketh for a temporary kingdom of Christ, that must begin presently, and last 1000 years. Of this opinion are many of our apocalyptical men, that study more future events than their present duty, and more rules by prophecies than precepts. Pagit, Heresiography, p. 117.

They catch at some single expression or phrase, which seems to be more plausible and capable of serving their turn; and this is no where more done than in treating upon apocalyptical or prophetic matters. Worthington, Miscellanies, p. 9.

APOCALYPTICALLY. adv. [from apocalyphtical.] In such a manner as to reveal something secret.

APOCALYPTICK.* adj. [Fr. apocalyptique.] The same as apocalyphtical.

It was concluded by some, that Providence designed him the apocalyphtick angel which should pour out one of the vials upon the beast.

As if, forsooth, there could not be so much as a few houses fired, a few ships taken, or any other calamitous accident befall this little corner of the world, but that some apocalyphtick ignoramus or other must presently find and pick it out of some abused, martyred prophecy, of Ezekiel, Daniel, or the Revelation.

APOCALYPTICK.* n. s. [from the adjective.] Prophet: apocalyphtical writer.

The divine apocalyphtick, writing after Jerusalem was ruined, might teach them what the second Jerusalem must be; not on earth, but from heaven, Apoc. xxi. 2.

APOCOPE. n. s. [Gr. ἀποκοπή.] A figure in grammar, when the last letter or syllable of a word is taken away: as, ingeni, for ingenii: apoplex for apoplexy.

APOCRUSTICK. adj. [ἀποκρυστικός, from ἀποκρύβω, to drive.] Endured with a repelling and astringent power: applied to remedies which prevent the too great afflux of humours.

APOCRYPHA. [ἀποκρύφα, to put out of sight.] Books not publickly communicated: books whose authors are not known. It is used for the books appended to the sacred writings, which, being of doubtful authors, are less regarded.

We hold not the apocrypha for sacred, as we do the holy scripture, but for human compositions.

APOCRYPHAL.† adj. [from apocrypha, and Lat. apocryphus.]

1. Not canonical; of uncertain authority.

Jerom, who saith, that all writings not canonical are apocryphal, uses not the title apocryphal, as the rest of the fathers ordinarily have done, whose custom is so to name, for the most part, only such as might not publickly be read or divulged.

2. Contained in the apocrypha.

To speak of her in the words of the apocryphal writers, wisdom is glorious, and never faileth away.

3. It is sometimes used for an account of uncertain credit.

Many apocryphal pamphlets (let him who likes them, call them books,) have been of late years writ and licensed, which endeavour to confute the established and known doctrine of our church, and all reformed churches in Europe; and maintain positions, which are evidently Socinian, Popish, or Pelagian.

Arguing lights and calls
Arguing apocryphal and false.

4. It is also used for a person of uncertain credit.

Who shall take your word?
A whoreson, upstart, apocryphal captain?

APOCRYPHAL.* n. s. A writing not canonical.

Nicophorus and Anastasius — upon this only account, (as Usher thinks,) because they were interpolated and corrupted, did rank these epistles in the number of apocryphals.

APOCRYPHALLY. adv. [from apocryphal.] Uncertainly; not indisputably.

APOCRYPHALNESS. n. s. [from apocryphal.] Uncertainty; doubtfulness of credit.

APOCRYPHICAL.* adj. [from apocrypha.] Doubtful; not authentick.

The bishops in this synod, being destitute of scripture proof and authentic tradition for their image-worship, betook themselves to certain apocryphical and ridiculous stories, as Charles the great observed.

APODICTICAL. adj. [Gr. ἀποδεδίκεται, evident truth; demonstration.] Demonstrative; evident beyond contradiction.

Holding an apodictical knowledge, and an assured knowledge of it; verily, to persuade their apprehensions otherwise, were to make an Euclid believe, that there were more than one centre in a circle.

We can say all at the number three; therefore the world is perfect. Tobit went, and his dog followed him; therefore there is a world in the moon, were an argument as apodictical.

APODIXIS.† n. s. [Gr. ἀποδείξις.] Demonstration.

This might taste of a desperate will, if he had not afterwards given an apodixis in the battle, upon what platform he had projected and raised that hope.

APODICTICK.* adj. [from apodixis.] Demonstrable.

The argumentation is from a similitude, therefore not apodictick, or of evident demonstration.

APODOSIS.* n. s. [Gr. ἀποδοσις.] A figure in rhetoric; the application or latter part of a similitude.

The apostle puts lords, and that for the honour of Christ, of whom he was to infer ἀποδοσις; the name of Christ being not to be polluted with the appellation of an idol; for his apodosis must have been otherwise ἀποδοσις.

APODYTERIUM.* n. s. [Fr. apodyte, i. e. lieu où l'on se deshaille. Gr. ἀποδυτήριον. Roquefort Gloss.] The room before the entrance into the convocation-house at Oxford is so called, to this day. The vice-chancellor, proctors, &c. robe and unrobe in it. Anciently, the word means the dressing-room of baths.

Going out of the convocation-house into the apodyterium, Mr. W. Rogers, one of his [K. James II.] retinue, said, Sir, this convocation-house is the place wherein they confer degrees.

APOGEON.† n. s. [Gr. ἀπό, from, and γῆ, the earth.] A point in the heavens, which the sun, or a planet, is at the greatest distance possible from the earth in its whole revolution. The ancient astronomers, regarding the earth as the centre of the system, chiefly regarded the apogæon and perigæon, which the moderns, making the sun the centre, change for the aphelion and perihelion.

Thy sun is in his apogæon placed,
And when it moveth next, must needs descend.

It is yet not agreed in what time, precisely, the apogæon absolveth one degree.

The sun in his apogæe is distant from the centre of the earth 1550 semi-diameters of the earth, but in his perigæe 1446.

APOGIATURA.* n. s. [Ital.] A cadence, in musick, at the pleasure of the singer or performer.

The organist, who feels what he performs and recollects the place and occasion of performance, will not fail to throw in those apogiaturas and delicate notes of passage, which from accidental change it into fluent melody.

APOGRAPH.* n. s. [Fr. apographe, Gr. ἀπογραφή.] A copy: it is used in opposition to autograph.

APOLLINARIAN.* n. s. One of the sect of Apollinarianism, who maintained monstrous notions about the nature of Christ.

Apollinarians, by maiming and misinterpreting what belonged to Christ's human nature, withstood the truth.

He [Whiston] was partly Apollinarian, partly Arian; for he thought the word was all the soul that acted in our Saviour's body. Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time, an. 1711.

APOLOGE'TICAL.† } adj. [Fr. apologetique, from APOLOGE'TICK. } ἀπολογία, to defend; in our old lexicography, "apological, spoken in defence."
[Bullockar.] That which is said in defence of any thing or person.

The principal mark which I aim at, throughout the whole body of the discourse, being an apologetical defence of the power and providence of God, his wisdom, his truth, his justice, his goodness and mercy.

Hakewill, Apol. of the Power of God, Preface.

If, by looking on what is past, thou hast deserved that name, [of reader.] I am willing thou shouldst yet know more by that which follows, an apologetical dialogue.

B. Jonson's Poetaster.

To begin an apology for those animadversions, which I write against the remonstrant in defence of Smectymnus; since the preface, which was purposely set before them, is not thought apologetical enough; it will be best to acquaint ye, readers, before other things, what the meaning was to write them in that manner which I did.

Milton, Apol. for Smectymnus.

I design to publish an essay, the greater part of which is apologetical, for one sort of chymists. Boyle.

APOLOGE'TICALLY. adv. [from apologetical.] In the way of defence or excuse.

APOLOGIST.† n. s. [Fr. apologiste.] He that makes an apology; a pleader in favour of another.

This more plainly appears from the writings of the Christian apologists of those times against the Heathens objecting to them.

Bp. Bull, Corrupt. of the Ch. of Rome.

Which charge should it now be resumed and brought in by Turks or Indians against us Protestants, good God! what should we do for an apologist.

Hammond's Sermons.

Those scandalous imputations of pride and perverseness, which then rendered the Jews so odious to the world, as appears by divers passages in the ancient apologists for Christian religion.

Barrow, Works, i. 286.

The University of Oxford, whose moderation and forbearance of late was such as to put a zealous apologist to great difficulties in clearing her of the scandalous imputation, is now arrived at the contrary extreme.

Louth, Lett. to Warburton, p. 69.

To APOLOGIZE. v. n. [from apology.]

1. To plead in favour of any person or thing.

It will be much more reasonable to reform than apologize or retort; and therefore it imports those, who dwell secure, to look about them.

Decny of Piety.

2. It has the particle for before the subject of apology.

I ought to apologize for my indiscretion in the whole undertaking.

Wake, Preparation for Death.

The translator needs not apologize for his choice of this piece, which was made in his childhood.

Popr, Preface to Statius.

APOLOGIZER.* n. s. [from apologize.] Defender.

His apologizers labour to free him; laying the fault of the errors fathered upon him unto the charge of others.

Hammer, View of Antiquity, p. 239.

A'POLOGUE.† n. s. [Fr. apologue, from Gr. ἀπολογία.] Fable; story contrived to teach some moral truth.

An apologue of Æsop is beyond a syllogism, and proverbs more powerful than demonstration.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Some men are remarked for pleasantness in raillery; others for apologues and apposite diverting stories.

Locke.

A'POLOGUER.* n. s. [from apologue.] A fabler; a relator of stories. An unusual word.

A mouse, saith an apologuer, [apologuer,] was brought up in a chest, there fed with fragments of bread and cheese.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 569.

APOLOGY.† n. s. [apologia, Lat. ἀπολογία.]

1. Defence; excuse. Apology generally signifies rather excuse than vindication, and tends rather to extenuate the fault, than prove innocence. This is, however, sometimes unregarded by writers, Dr. Johnson says. Sandys uses it for vindication.

In her face excuse

Came prologue, and apology to prompt;
Which with bland words at will she thus address'd. Milton.

A little longer suffer me, while I,

Proceed in this divine apology. Sandys's Job, p. 32.

2. It has for before the object of excuse.

It is not my intention to make an apology for my poem: some will think it needs no excuse, and others will receive none.

Dryden.

I shall neither trouble the reader, nor myself, with any apology for publishing of these sermons; for if they be, in any measure, truly serviceable to the end for which they are designed, I do not see what apology is necessary; and if they be not so, I am sure none can be sufficient.

Tillotson.

APOMECOMETRY. n. s. [ἀπό, from, μέτρος, distance, and μετρέω, to measure.] The art of measuring things at a distance. Dict.

APONEURO'SIS. n. s. [from ἀπὸ, from, and ὑἰον, a nerve.] An expansion of a nerve into a membrane.

When a cyst rises near the orifice of the artery; it is formed by the aponeurosis that runs over the vessel, which becomes excessively expanded.

Sharp's Surgery.

APOPHASIS. n. s. [Lat. ἀπόφασις, a denying.] A figure in rhetoric, by which the orator, speaking ironically, seems to wave what he would plainly insinuate; as, Neither will I mention those things, which if I should, you notwithstanding could neither confute or speak against them. Smith, Rhetorick.

APOPHLEGMATICK. n. s. [ἀπο and φλέγμα.] That which has the quality of drawing away phlegm.

APOPHLEGMATISM. n. s. [ἀπο and φλέγμα.] A medicine of which the intention is to draw phlegm from the blood.

And so it is in apophlegmatism and gargarisms, that draw the rheum down by the palate.

Bacon.

APOPHLEGMA'TIZANT. n. s. [ἀπὸ and φλέγμα.] Any remedy which causes an evacuation of serous or mucous humour by the nostrils, as particular kinds of sternutatories.

Quincy.

A'POPHTHEGM. n. s. [ἀπίφθιγμα.] A remarkable saying; a valuable maxim uttered on some sudden occasion.

We may magnify the apophthegm, or reputed replies of wisdom, whereof many are to be seen in Laertius and Lycothenes.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

I had a mind to collect and digest such observations and apophthegms, as tend to the proof of that great assertion, All is vanity.

Prior.

APOPHYGE. n. s. [ἀποφυγή, flight, or escape.]

Is, in architecture, that part of a column, where it begins to spring out of its base; and was originally no more than the ring or ferrel, which anciently bound the extremities of wooden pillars, to keep them from splitting, and were afterward imitated in stone work. We sometimes call it the spring of the column.

Chambers.

APOPHYSIS. n. s. [ἀπόφυσις.] The prominent parts of some bones; the same as process. It differs from an epiphysis, as it is a continuance of the bone itself; whereas the latter is somewhat adhering to a bone, and of which it is not properly a part.

Quincy.

It is the apophysis, or head of the os tibiae, which makes the knee.

Wismann, Surgery.

APOPLECTICAL. adj. [from apoplectick.] Relating to an apoplexy.

We meet with the same complaints of gravity in living bodies, when the faculty locomotive seems abolished; as may be observed in supporting persons inebriated, apoplectical, or in lipthymies and swoonings. Brown, Vulg. Err.

In an apoplectical case, he found extravasated blood, making way from the ventricles of the brain. Derham.

APOPLECTICK. † adj. [Fr. apoplectique.] Relating to an apoplexy.

A lady was seized with an apoplectick fit, which afterward terminated in some kind of lethargy. Wiseman.

APOPLECTICK.  n. s.* [from the adjective.] A person seized with an apoplexy.

Rasis, the Arabick physician, hath left it written as I have it from Quistorpius, that it was ordained by a law, that no apoplecticks, who foamed about the mouth, should be buried till after 72 hours. Knatchbull, Tr. p. 77.

APOPLEXY. † n. s. [See APOPLEXY.] Apoplexy. The last syllable is cut away; but this is only in poetry, Dr. Johnson says; which is a great mistake, the word being found in a medical writer of eminence, no poet.

Present punishment pursues his maw,
When surfeited and swell'd, the peacock raw,
He bears into the bath; whence want of breath,
Repletions, apoplex, instate death. Dryden, Juv. Sat. 1.

Preternatural sleep, and preternatural watching, are altogether inconsistent; and therefore an apoplex and a frenzy are in no wise incident to the same person at the same time.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 131. 1666.

An apoplex falls under a double consideration; either as it is a disease, or as it is a symptom. Ibid. p. 223.

Out upon her! she's as cold of her favour as an apoplex. Beaumont and Fl. Philaster.

How does his apoplex?

Is that strong on him till? B. Jonson's For.
This apoplex will, certain, be his end.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. II. p. 2.

APOPLEXED. adj. [from apoplex.] Seized with an apoplexy.

Sense, sure, you have,
Else could you not have motion: but sure that sense
Is apoplex'd. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

APOPLEXY. n. s. [ἀπὸ πλῆξης.] A sudden deprivation of all internal and external sensation, and of all motion, unless of the heart and thorax. The cause is generally a repletion, and indicates evacuation, joined with stimuli. Quincy.

Apoplexy is a sudden abolition of all the senses, external and internal, and of all voluntary motion, by the stoppage of the flux and reflux of the animal spirits through the nerves destined for those motions. Arbuthnot on Diet.

Peace is a very apoplexy, lethargy, muddled, deaf, sleepy, insensible. Shakspeare, Coriol.

A fever may take away my reason, or memory, and an apoplexy leave neither sense nor understanding. Locke.

APORIA. n. s. [ἀπορία.] Is a figure in rhetoric, by which the speaker shews, that he doubts where to begin for the multitude of matter, or what to say in some strange and ambiguous thing; and doth, as it were, argue the case with himself. Thus Cicero says, Whether he took them from his fellows more impudently, gave them to a harlot more lasciviously, removed them from the Roman people more wickedly, or altered them more presumptuously, I cannot well declare. Smith, Rhetorick.

APORRHOEA. n. s. [ἀπορροή.] Effluvium; emanation; something emitted by another: not in use.

The reason of this he endeavours to make out by atonical aporrhæa, which passing from the cruentate weapon to the wound, and being incorporated with the particles of the salve, carry them to the affected part. Glanville, Sceptis.

APOSIOPEISIS. n. s. [ἀποσιώπησις, from ἀπὸ, after, and σιωπᾶν, to be silent.] A form of speech, by which the speaker, through some affection, as sorrow, bashfulness, fear, anger, or vehemency, breaks off his speech before it be all ended. A figure, when, speaking of a thing, we yet seem to conceal it, though indeed we aggravate it; or when the course of the sentence begun is so stayed, as thereby some part of the sentence not being uttered, may be understood. Smith, Rhetorick.

APOSTASY. n. s. [ἀποστασις.] Departure from what a man has professed: it is generally applied to religion; sometimes with the particle from.

The canon law defines apostasy to be a wilful departure from that state of faith, which any person has professed himself to hold in the Christian church. Ayliffe, Parergon.

The affable archangel had forewarn'd
Adam, by due example, to beware
Apostasy, by what befel in heav'n
To those apostates. Milton.

Vice in us were not only wickedness, but apostasy, degenerate wickedness. Sprut.

Whoever do give different worships, must bring in more gods; which is an apostasy from one God. Stillingfleet.

APOSTATE. † n. s. [apostata, Lat. ἀποστάτης.]

This word was formerly written, in our language, apostata; but was anglicised early in the seventeenth century. Dr. Johnson's example of this word, from Rogers's sermons, is a mistake; it being there an adjective.] One that has forsaken his profession; generally applied to one that has left his religion.

Apostates in point of faith, are, according to the civil law, subject unto all punishments ordained against hereticks. Ayliffe.
Robbing it, [the church,] as Julian the apostate did.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 135.

Say, goddess, what ensued when Raphael,
The affable archangel, had forewarn'd
Adam, by dire example, to beware
Apostasy, by what befel in heav'n
To those apostates. Milton, P. L. vii. 44.

APOSTATE.  adj.* False; traitorous; rebellious.

What more probable account of these ludicrous forms in the air can be given than the operation of apostate spirits, ready εὐαγγέλιος, (in the phrase of St. John.) to make a lie, as well as to tell one. Spencer on Prodiges, p. 218.

Easily the proud attempt
Of spirits apostate, and their counsels vain,
Thou hast repell'd. Milton, P. L. vii. 610.

To APOSTATE.  v. n.* [from the noun.] To apostatize; to desert one's profession.

Mahomet himself apostated.

Mountagu, Appeal to Cæsar, p. 150.

Perhaps some of these apostating stars have thought themselves true. Bp. Hall, Occ. Meditations, Med. 4.

They do apostate from the faith.

Wilcocke, English Protestant's Apology, p. 27.

APOSTATICAL. † adj. [from apostate.] After the manner of an apostate.

To wear turbans is an apostatical conformity. Sandys.

All mankind stood condemned in the apostatical root of Adam. Alp. Usher, of the Religion of the Anc. Irish, ch. 1.

An hereticall and apostaticall church. Bp. Hall, Reconciler.

The devil, when he brought in this apostatical doctrine [canonization] amongst Christians, swerved but little from his ancient method of seducing mankind.

Mede, Apostasy of the Later Times, p. 14.

To APOSTATIZE. † v. n. [from apostate, Fr. also, apostasier, to play the apostate, as Cotgrave renders it.] To forsake one's profession; it is commonly used of one who departs from his religion.

Leaving the Mahometans, let us take a short view of Rome Christian, though apostatized and degenerately Christian.

Worthington, Miscellanies, p. 29.

They now generally apostatize from their own cause, belye their own conscience. Dean Martin's Letters, p. 5.

None revolt from the faith, because they must not look upon a woman to lust after her, but because they are restrained from the perpetration of their lusts. If wanton glances, and libidinous thoughts, had been permitted by the gospel, they would have apostatized nevertheless. Bentley.

TO APOSTEMATE. † v. n. [Fr. apostemer, to swell.] To become an aposteme; to swell and corrupt into matter.

These are no mean surges of blasphemy, not only dipping Moses the divine lawgiver, but dashing with a high hand against the justice and purity of God himself; as these ensuing scriptures, plainly and freely handled, shall verify, to the launching of that old apostemated error. Milton, Tetrachordon.

There is care to be taken in abscesses of the breast and belly, in danger of breaking inwards; yet, by opening these too soon, they sometimes apostemate again, and become crude. Wiseman.

APOSTEMAT'ION. n. s. [from apostemate.] • The formation of an aposteme; the gathering of a hollow purulent tumour.

Nothing can be more admirable than the many ways nature hath provided for preventing, or curing of fevers; as, vomitings, apostematations, salivations, &c. Grew.

A'POSTEME. † n. s. [Fr. aposteme, from Gr. ἀποστήμα.] A hollow swelling, filled with purulent matter; an abscess.

With equal propriety we may affirm, that ulcers of the lungs, or apostemes of the brain, do happen only in the left side. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The opening of apostemes, before the suppuration be perfected, weakeneth the heat, and renders them crude. Wiseman.

APOSTLE. n. s. [apostolus, Lat. ἀπόστολος.] A person sent with mandates by another. It is particularly applied to them whom our Saviour deputed to preach the Gospel.

But all his mind is bent to holiness; His champions are the prophets and apostles. Shakspeare.

I am far from pretending infallibility; that would be to erect myself into an apostle: a presumption in any one that cannot confirm what he says by miracles. Locke.

We know but a small part of the notion of an apostle, by knowing barely that he is sent forth. Watts, Logick.

APO'STLESHIP. n. s. [from apostle.] The office or dignity of an apostle.

Where, because faith is in too low degree, I thought it some apostleship in me To speak things, which by faith alone I see. Donne.

God hath ordered it, that St. Paul hath writ epistles; which are all confined within the business of his apostleship; and so contain nothing but points of Christian instruction. Locke.

APO'STOLATE.* n. s. [Lat. apostolatus.] Apostleship; mission.

Himself [St. Paul] and his brethren in the apostolate. Killingbeck, Serm. p. 118.

When one considers the volumes that have been here filled with romances, both of the grave and the lighter kind, it might almost incline one to suspect something more than a mere Arabian whinsey in the hypothesis of the lunar apostolate. Cornwall, Philenon, Conv. iii.

APOSTO'LICAL. adj. [from apostolick.] Delivered or taught by the apostles; belonging to the apostles.

They acknowledge not, that the church keeps any thing as apostolical, which is not found in the apostles' writings, in what other records soever it be found. Hooker.

Declare yourself for that church, which is founded upon scripture, reason, apostolical practice, and antiquity. Hooker.

APOSTO'LICALLY. † adv. [from apostolical.] In the manner of the apostles.

Those that are sincerely and fervently good, it cannot but make them have an antipathy against what is evil, and discern them that bear themselves never so apostolically, and yet are not right at the bottom, to be but hypocrites and liars. More, Seven Churches, ch. 3.

He that is rightly and apostolically Sped with her [the church's] invisible arrow.

Milton, of Reform. in England, b. 2.

APOSTO'LICALNESS. † n. s. [from apostolical.] The quality of relating to the apostles; apostolical authority.

Thou shalt escape better than any party of men, by reason of thy conspicuous innocence, sincerity, and exemplarity of life, and unexceptionable apostolicalness of doctrine.

More, Seven Churches, ch. 8.

APOSTO'LICK. † adj. [from apostle, and Fr. apostolique.] The accent is placed by Dryden repeatedly on the antepenult. But the accent on the penultima is more in use.] Taught by the apostles; belonging to an apostle.

Their oppositions in maintenance of publick superstition against apostolick endeavours, were vain and frivolous. Hooker.

Or where did I at sure tradition strike, Provided still it were apostolick? Dryden, Hind and Panther.

In vain, alas, you seek

The ambitious title of apostolick. Hind and Panther.

APOSTO'LICKS.* n. s. ["A kind of anabaptists; because they would be like the apostles, they wandered up and down the countries without staves, shoes, money, or bags; preaching up and down their celestial vocation to the ministry of the word." Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 28.]

I might here run through a great number of the old heresies, in which the papists consent with the ancient hereticks.—The apostolicks in their vow of continence. Fulke, Retentive, p. 314.

APOSTROPHE. † n. s. [ἀποστροφή, from ἀπό, from, and στρέφω, to turn, written apostrophus by B. Jonson, in his grammar; and defined, "the rejecting of a vowel from the beginning or ending of a word."]

1. In rhetoric, a diversion of speech to another person, than the speech appointed did intend or require; or, it is a turning of the speech from one person to another, many times abruptly. A figure when we break off the course of our speech, and speak to some new person, present or absent, as to the people or witnesses, when it was before directed to the judges, or opponent. Smith, Rhetorick.

2. In grammar, the contraction of a word by the use of a comma: as, tho', for though; rep', for reputation.

Many laudable attempts have been made, by abbreviating words with apostrophes; and by lopping polysyllables, leaving one or two syllables at most. Swift.

APO'STROPHICK.* adj. [from apostrophe.] Denoting an apostrophe; belonging to it.

TO APO'STROPHIZE. v. a. [from apostrophe.] To address by an apostrophe.

There is a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apostrophizing Eumeus, and speaking of him in the second person; it is generally applied only to men of account. Pope.

A'POSTUME. n. s. See APOSTEME. [This word is properly aposteme.] A hollow tumour filled with purulent matter.

How an apostume in the mesentery breaking, causes a consumption in the parts, is apparent. Harvey.

TO A'POSTUME. † v. n. [old Fr. apostumer.] To apostemate.

APOTHE'CA.* n. s. [Lat. apotheca, a repository, Fr. apothecque, Sued. and Dan. apothek.] The Danes also use apotheker for apothecary. In our old lexicography we have apotheke, a store-house.] An apothecary's shop.

He [the master apothecary] shall ever now and then visit the apotheca, to cast out thereof all decayed drugs and compositions. Sir W. Petty, Advance. of Learning, p. 16.

A'POTHECARY.† n. s. [apotheca, Lat. a repository: formerly written poticary. See POTHECARY.] A man whose employment is to provide medicines for sale.

Give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

They have no other doctor but the sun and the fresh air, and that such an one, as never sends them to the apothecary. South.

Wand'ring in the dark,
Physicians, for the tree, have found the bark;
They, lab'ring for relief of human kind,
With sharpen'd sight some remedies may find;

Th' apothecary-train is wholly blind. Dryden.

A'POTHEGM. n. s. [properly apophthegm; which see.] A remarkable saying.

By frequent conversing with him, and scattering short apothegms, and little pleasant stories, and making useful applications of them, his son was, in his infancy, taught to abhor vanity and vice as monsters. Walton, Life of Sanderson.

APOTHEGMATICAL.* adj. [from apothegm.] In the manner of an apothegm.

At the end [of the satire] is the first use, I have seen, of a witty apothegmatical comparison, of a libidinous old man.

Walton, Hist. Eng. Poet. 4. 38. n.

APOTHEGMATIST.* n. s. [from apothegm.] A collector of apothegms.

A poet or orator should send to the apothegmatist for his senses. Arbutnot and Pope, Martin Scribler, ch. 13.

TO APOTHEGMATIZE.* v. n. [from apothegm.] To utter remarkable sayings.

APOTHEOSIS. n. s. [ἀποθεωσις.] Deification; the rite of adding any one to the number of gods.

As if it could be graven and painted omnipotent, or the nails and the hammer could give it an apotheosis. South.

Allots the prince of his celestial line,

An apotheosis, and rites divine. Garth.

APOTHEOSIS.* n. s. [Gr. ἀποθεωσις.] A place on the south side of the chancel in the primitive churches, furnished with shelves one above another, on which were books, vestments, and holy vessels. See Sir G. Wheler's Description of the Ancient Primitive Churches, p. 100.]

This [the chancel] being appropriated only to the sacred ministry, is very short from east to west, though it takes up the whole breadth of the church, together with the diaconicon or prothesis, and the apothosis, from north to south.

Sir G. Wheler, Descript. of Anc. Churches, p. 82.

APOTOME. n. s. [from ἀποτέμνω, to cut off.]

1. In mathematics, the remainder or difference of two incommensurable quantities.

2. In musick, it is the part remaining of an entire tone, after a greater semitone has been taken from it. The proportion in numbers of the apotome, is that of 2048 to 2187. The Greeks thought that the greater tone could not be divided into two equal parts; for which reason they called the first part αποτομή, and the other λημνα. Chambers.

A'POZEM.† n. s. [Fr. apozeme, ἀπόδ, from, and ζέω, to boil.] A decoction; an infusion made by boiling ingredients.

During this evacuation, he took opening broths and apozems.

Squirts read Garth 'till apozems grow cold. Gay.

APOZEMICAL.* adj. [from apozem.] Like a decoction.

Wine, that is dilute, may safely and profitably be adbibited in an apozemical form in fevers.

Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 33.

TO APPAIR.* v. a. [Sax. apapan or for-pæpan, to overthrow, to spoil, Fr. empirer.] To impair, or bring into decay; to lessen; to make worse.

Gentlewomen, which fear neither sunne nor winde for appairing their beaultie. Sir T. Elyot's Governour, fol. 61. b.

Riches greatly appaired. Barret, Alcecarie.

For who-so liveth in the school of skill,

And medleth not with any world's affairs,

Forsooketh poms and honours that do spill

The mind's recourse to grace's quiet stairs:

His state no fortune by no mean appairs:

For fortune is the only foe of those

Which to the world their wretched wills dispose.

Mirror for Mag. p. 346.

TO APPAIR.* v. n. To degenerate; to become worse.

I see the more that I them forbere,

The worse they be fro yere to yere;

All that lyveth appayreth fast.

Morality of Every Man, Hawkin's Old Pl. i. 38.

TO APPA'L.† v. a. [appallir, Fr. It might more properly have been written appale, Dr. Johnson says; which indeed he would have found so written, if he had examined our elder authors: "These golden swords and daggers almost appale a man," Stubbe's Anat. of Abuses, fol. 31. "Bashful blushing did him then appale," Parrot's Springes for Woodcocks, Ep. 72.] To fright; to strike with sudden fear; to depress; to discourage.

Whilst she spake, her great words did appal

My feeble courage, and my heart oppress,

That yet I quake and tremble over all.

Spenser, F. Q.

Give with thy trumpet a loud note to Troy,

Thou dreadful Ajax; that the appalled air

May pierce the head of thy great combatant.

Shakespeare.

The house of peers was somewhat appalled at this alarm;

but took time to consider of it till next day.

Clarendon.

Does neither rage inflame, nor fear appal,

Nor the black fear of death that saddens all?

Pope.

The monster curls

His flaming crest, all other thirst appall'd,

Or shivering flies, or choak'd at distance stands.

Thomson.

TO APPA'L.* v. n. [Lat. palleo, as well as the Fr. appallir, which has the neuter signification also. See Cotgrave in V. Mr. Boucher and Mr. Mason have cited the barbarous Latin appalus, signifying soft, (which they might have also referred to Gr. ἀπαλός;) in order to illustrate Spenser's usage of the word; but, surely, it is figuratively employed by the poet, adapting what befalls the person to the thing.] To grow faint; to be dismayed.

To make his power to appallen, and to fayle.

Idgals.

Therewith her wrathfull courage 'gan appall,

And haughthe spirits meekely to adaw. Spenser, F. Q. iv. vi. 16.

APPA'LEMENT.† n. s. [Fr. appalment.] Depression; discouragement; impression of fear.

As the furious slaughter of them was a great discouragement and appalment to the rest.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

APPANAGE. n. s. [appanagium, low Latin; probably from panis, bread.] Lands set apart by princes for the maintenance of their younger children.

He became suitor for the earldom of Chester, a kind of appanage to Wales, and using to go to the king's son.

Bacon.

Had he thought it fit,

That wealth should be the appanage of wit,

The God of light could ne'er have been so blind,

To deal it to the worst of human kind.

Swift.

APPARA'TUS.† n. s. [Latin; but formerly we had the English apparate, instead of apparatus.] Things provided as means to any certain end, as the tools of a trade; the furniture of a house; ammunition for war; equipage; show.

There is an apparatus of things previous, to be adjusted before I come to the calculation itself.

Woodward.

Ourselves are easily provided for; it is nothing but the circumstances, the apparatus or equipage of human life, that costs so much. Pope, Letters to Gay.

Where is then mention made of such apparate and order for publick sacrifices, as are becoming to such a one?

Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, (1616) p. 271.

APPA'REIL. n. s. It has no plural. [appareil, Fr.]

1. Dress; vesture.

I cannot cog and say, that thou art this and that, like many of those lipping hawthorn buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simpling time.

Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

2. External habiliments.

Our late burnt London, in apparel new,
Shook off her ashes to have treated you.

Waller.

At publick devotion, his resigned carriage made religion appear in the natural apparel of simplicity.

Tatler.

To APPA'REIL.† v. a. [old Fr. appareiller, from Lat. apparo.]

1. To dress to cloath.

With such robes were theeking's daughters that were virgins apparelled.

2 Sam. xiii. 18.

Both combatants were apparelled only in their doublets and hoses.

Hayward.

2. To adorn with dress.

She did apparel her apparel, and with the preciousness of her body made it most sumptuous.

Sidney.

3. To cover or deck, as with dress.

You may have trees apparelled with flowers, by boring holes in them, and putting into them earth, and setting seeds of violets.

Bacon.

Shelves, and rocks, and precipices, and gulfs, being apparelled with a verdure of plants, would resemble mountains and valleys.

Bentley, Sermons.

4. To fit out; to furnish: not in use.

It hath been agreed, that either of them should send ships to sea well manned and apparelled to fight.

Sir J. Hayward.

APPA'RENCE. n. s. [Fr.] Appearance.

To make illusion

By such an appearance or joglerie.

Chaucer, Frankl. Tale.

It pleased his highness, upon a notable appearance of honour, cleanness, and maidenly behaviour, to bend his affection towards Mistress Katherine Howard.

Id. Herbert, Hist. of Hen. VIII. p. 470.

Which made them resolve no longer to give credit unto outward appearances.

Trans. of Boccacini, (1626) p. 66.

APPA'RENCY. n. s. [Fr. apparence.] Appearance.

Feignyng of light thei werke
The dedes whiche are inwarde derke:

And thus this double hypocrisie,

With his devoute apparencie,

A vyser set upon his face;

Whereof, towarde the worldes grace,

He semeth to be right well thewed;

And yet his herte is all beshrewed.

Gower, Conf. Am. b. 1.

It will not be easy to comprehend how a law, that preserves the nobility from laying themselves out upon vain and gaudy apparencies, should tend to the limiting their estates.

Wren's Monarchy Asserted, p. 145.

It had now been a very justifiable presumption in the king, to believe as well as hope, that he could not be long in England without such an apparency of his own party that wished all that he himself desired, and such a manifestation of their authority, interest, and power, that would prevent or be sufficient to subdue any forward disposition that might grow up in the parliament.

Id. Clarendon's Life, ii. 21.

APPA'RENT. adj. [apparent, Fr. apparens, Lat.]

1. Plain; indubitable; not doubtful.

The main principles of reason are in themselves apparent. For to make nothing evident of itself unto man's understanding, were to take away all possibility of knowing any thing.

Hooker.

2. Seeming; in appearance; not real.

The perception intellective often corrects the report of phantasy, as in the apparent bigness of the sun, the apparent crookedness of the staff in air and water. Hale, Orig. of Man.

3. Visible; in opposition to secret.

What secret imaginations we entertained is known to God: this is apparent, that we have not behaved ourselves, as if we preserved a grateful remembrance of his mercies.

Atterbury.

The outward and apparent sanctity of actions should flow from purity of heart.

Rogers.

4. Open; evident; known; not merely suspected.

As well the fear of harm, as harm apparent,

In my opinion ought to be prevented.

Shakespeare, Richard III.

5. Certain; not presumptive.

He is the next of blood,

And heir apparent to the English crown.

Shakespeare, Henry VI.

APPA'RENT. n. s. Elliptically used for heir apparent.

Draw thy sword in right. —

— I'll draw it as apparent to the crown,

And in that quarrel use it.

Shakespeare, Henry VI.

APPA'RENTLY. adv. [from apparent.] Evidently; openly.

Arrest him, officer;

I would not spare my brother in this case,

If he should scorn me so apparently.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Err.

Vices apparently tend to the impairing of men's health.

Tillotson.

APPA'RENTNESS. n. s. [from apparent.] That which is apparent. An old English substantive.

Sherwood.

APPA'RITION.† n. s. [old Fr. apparicion, apparition, from Lat. appareo.]

1. Appearance; visibility.

When suddenly stood at my head a dream,

Whose inward apparition gently mov'd

My fancy.

Milton.

My retirement tempted me to divert those melancholy thoughts which the new apparitions of foreign invasion and domestic discontent gave us.

Denham.

2. The thing appearing; a form; a visible object.

I have mark'd

A thousand blushing apparitions

To start into her face; a thousand innocent shames

In angel whiteness bear away those blushes.

Shakespeare.

A glorious apparition! had not doubt,

And carnal fear, that day dimm'd Adam's eyes.

Milton.

Any thing besides may take from me the sense of what appeared; which apparition, it seems, was you.

Tatler.

3. A spectre; a walking spirit.

Horatio says 'tis but our phantasy,

Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us;

Therefore I have intreated him,

That if again this apparition come,

He may approve our eyes, and speak to it.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Tender minds should not receive early impressions of goblins, spectres, and apparitions, wherewith maids fright them into compliance.

Locke.

One of those apparitions had his right hand filled with darts, which he brandish'd in the face of all who came up that way.

Tatler.

4. Something only apparent, not real.

Still there's something

That checks my joys — — —

— Nor can I yet distinguish

Which is an apparition, this or that.

Denham, Sophy.

5. Astronomically, the visibility of some luminary, opposed to occultation.

A month of apparition is the space wherein the moon appeareth, deducting three days wherein it commonly disappeareth; and this containeth but twenty-six days and twelve hours.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

APPA'RITOR.† n. s. [from apparo, Lat. to be at hand. And accordingly the word is written, agreeably to the etymology, apparator, by Sir T. Over-bury, Minshew and Cotgrave. But the French write appariteur.]

1. Such person as is at hand to execute the proper orders of the magistrate or judge of any court of judicature. Ayliffe.

The prætor with his train of dictors and apparitors, the rods and the axes, and all the insolent parade of a conqueror's jurisdiction. Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. i. 3.

Skinner, the apparitor, made a fire of two faggots in the theatre-yard, and burnt the second volume of Athene Oxonienses. Life of A. Wood, p. 377.

2. The lowest officer of the ecclesiastical court; a summoner.

They swallowed all the Roman hierarchy, from the pope to the apparitor. Ayliffe, Parergon.

Many heretofore have been by apparitors both of inferior courts, and of the courts of the archbishop's prerogative, much distracted, and diversely called and summoned for probate of wills, &c. Const. and Canons Eccl. 92.

Was it to go about circled with a band of rooking officials, with cloakbags full of citations, and processes to be served by a corporality of griffonlike promoters and apparitors? Milton, of Reform. in England, b. 1.

To APPAY.† v. a. [appayer, old Fr., to satisfy.]

1. To satisfy; to content: whence well appayed, is pleased; ill appayed, is uneasy. It is now obsolete; though found in our best writers.

How well appayed she was her bird to find? Sidney.

I am well appayed that you had rather believe, than take the pain of a long pilgrimage. Camden.

So only can high justice rest appayed. Milton.

What a shame were it for us Christians not to be well appayed with a much larger, though but homely, provision. Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines.

Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill assay'd,
How can lagpipe or joints be well appayed? Sp.

To APPEACH.† v. a. [Fr. appecher, old Fr. apescher.]

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Baron, Hen. VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakespeare, Rich. II.

Disclose
The state of your affection; for your passions
Have to the full appeached. Shakespeare.

2. To censure; to reproach; to taint with accusation.

For when Cymochles saw the foul reproach,
Which them appeached; prick'd with guilty shame,
And inward grief; he fiercely gan approach,
Revolv'd to put away that lordly blame. Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 44.

Nor canst, nor durst thou, traitor, on the pain,
Approach my honour, or thine own maintain. Dryden.

Whether this approach not the judgement and approbation of the parliament, I leave to equal arbiters. Milton, Animadv. Rem. Defence, § 1.

APPEACHER.* n. s. [from appeach. This substantive occurs in the Prompt. Parv. and is rendered appellator; and in Sherwood's Eng. and Fr. Dict. where it is translated emputeur. Foxe, in his Acts, speaking of Wicliffe, mentions "certain theeves that were named appellatores, accusers or peachers of others that were guiltlesse." An accuser.

APPEACHMENT. n. s. [from appeach.] Charge exhibited against any man; accusation.

A busy-headed man gave first light to this appeachment; but the earl did avouch it. Hayward.

The duke's answers to his appeachments, in number thirteen, I find very diligently and civilly couched. Wotton.

To APPEAL. v. n. [appello, Lat.]

1. To transfer a cause from one to another; with the particles to and from.

From the ordinary therefore they appeal to themselves.

Hooker.

2. To refer to another as judge.

Force, or a declared sign of force, upon the person of another, where there is no common superior on earth to appeal for relief, is the state of war; and it is the want of such an appeal gives a man the right of war, even against an aggressor, though he be in society and a fellow-subject. Locke.

They knew no foe, but in the open field,
And to their cause and to the gods appeal'd. Stepney.

3. To call another as witness.

Whether this, that the soul always thinks, be a self-evident proposition, I appeal to mankind. Locke.

To APPEAL.* v. a. [The first example has been inaccurately given by Dr. Johnson as the proof of a verb neuter.]

1. To charge with a crime; to accuse: a term of law.

One but flatters us,
As well appeareth by the cause you come,
Namely, to appeal each other of high treason. Shakespeare.
Bring forth your child, or I appeal you of murder. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady, v. 10.

2. In the Latin sense of appello, to pronounce; or the old Fr. apeler, to utter simply, or in request and invocation. Not now in use.

They both uprose, and took their ready way
Unto the church, their prayers to appele,
With great devotion, and with little zeal. Spenser, F. Q. iii. ii. 48.

APPEAL. n. s. [from the verb To APPEAL.]

1. An appeal is a provocation from an inferior to a superiour judge, whereby the jurisdiction of the inferior judge is for a while suspended, in respect of the cause; the cognizance being devolved to the superiour judge. Ayliffe's Parergon.

This ring
Deliver them, and your appeal to us
There make before them. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Our reason prompts us to a future state,
The last appeal from fortune and from fate,
Where God's all-righteous ways will be declar'd. Dryden.

There are distributors of justice, from whom there lies an appeal to the prince. Addison.

2. In the common law.

An accusation; which is a lawful declaration of another man's crime before a competent judge, by one that sets his name to the declaration, and undertakes to prove it, upon the penalty that may ensue of the contrary; more commonly used for the private accusation of a murderer, by a party who had interest in the party murdered, and of any felon, by one of his accomplices in the fact. Cowel.

The duke's unjust,
Thus to retort your manifest appeal,
And put your trial in the villain's mouth,
Which here you come to accuse. Shakespeare.

Hast thou, according to thy oath and bond,
Brought hither Henry Hereford, thy bold son,
Here to make good the boist'rous late appeal.
Against the Duke of Norfolk? Shakespeare.

3. A summons to answer a charge.

Nor shall the sacred character of king
Be urg'd to shield me from thy bold appeal,
If I have injur'd thee, that makes us equal. Dryden.

4. A call upon any as witness.

The casting up of the eyes, and lifting up of the hands, is a kind of appeal to the Deity, the author of wonders. Bacon.

APPEALABLE.* adj. [from appeal.] Subject to an appeal.

To clip the power of the council of state, composed of the natives of the land, by making it appealable to the council of Spain. Howell, Letters, i. ii. 15.

A P P

APPEALANT. n. s. [from appeal, Fr.] He that appeals.

Lords appealants,
Your differences shall all rest under gage,
Till we assign you to your days of trial.

Shakspeare.

APPEALER. † n. s. [old Fr. apélor, appelour.] One that makes an appeal, Dr. Johnson says; which Sherwood confirms by calling the appealer an appealant. It means also, in our old language, an accuser, or appeacher, who is termed appellator. See APPEACHER.

If I consented to you thus, as yee have here before rehearsed to mee, I should become an appealer, or every bishop's espie.

Foxe's Acts, Life of Thorpe.

To APPEAR. v. n. [appareo, Lat.]

1. To be in sight; to be visible.

As the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh. Lev. xiii. 43.

And half her knee, and half her breast appear.
By art, like negligence, disclos'd and bare. Prior.

2. To become visible as a spirit.

For I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness. Acts, xxvi. 16.

3. To stand in the presence of another; generally used of standing before some superiour; to offer himself to the judgement of a tribunal.

When shall I come and appear before God? Psaln xlii. 2.

4. To be the object of observation.

Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. Psaln xc. 16.

5. To exhibit one's self before a court of justice.

Keep comfort to you, and this morning see
You do appear before them. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

6. To be made clear by evidence.

Egfrid did utterly waste and subdue it, as appears out of Beda's complaint against him; and Edgar brought it under his obedience, as appears by an ancient record. Spenser, Ireland.

7. To seem in opposition to reality.

His first and principal care being to appear unto his people, such as he would have them be, and to be such as he appeared.
Sidney.

My noble master will appear
Such as he is, full of regard and honour. Shakspeare.

8. To be plain beyond dispute.

From experiments, useful indications may be taken, as will appear by what follows. Arbutnot.

APPEAR.  n. s.* [from the verb.] Appearance.

Here will I wash it in this morning's dew,
Which she on every little grass doth strew,
In silver drop, against the sun's appear.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

APPEARANCE. † n. s. [Fr. appareance.]

1. The act of coming into sight; as, they were surprised by the sudden appearance of the enemy.

2. The thing seen; as, the remarkable appearances in the sky.

3. Phænomena; that quality of any thing which is visible.

The advancing day of experimental knowledge discloseth such appearances, as will not lie even in any model extant.
Glanville, Serpiss.

4. Semblance; not reality.

He increased in estimation, whether by destiny, or whether by his virtues, or at least by his appearances of virtues. Hayward.
Heroic virtue did his actions guide,
And he the substance not th' appearance chose. Dryden.

The hypocrite would not put on the appearance of virtue, if it was not the most proper means to gain love. Addison.

5. Outside; show.

Under a fair and beautiful appearance there should ever be the real substance of good. Rogers.

6. Entry into a place or company.

Do the same justice to one another, which will be done us hereafter by those, who shall make their appearance in the world, when this generation is no more. Addison.

A P P

7. Apparition; supernatural visibility.

I think a person terrified with the imagination of spectres, more reasonable than one who thinks the appearance of spirits fabulous. Addison.

8. Exhibition of the person to a court.

I will not tarry; no, nor ever more
Upon this business my appearance make
In any of their courts. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

9. Open circumstance of a case.

Or grant her passion be sincere,
How shall his innocence be clear?
Appearances were all so strong,
The world must think him in the wrong. Swift.

10. Presence; mien.

Health, wealth, victory, and honour, are introduced; wisdom enters the last, and so captivates with her appearance, that he gives himself up to her. Addison.

11. Probability; seeming; likelihood.

There is that which hath no appearance, that this priest being utterly unacquainted with the true person, according to whose pattern he should shape his counterfeit, should think it possible for him to instruct his player. Bacon.

APPEARER. † n. s. [from To appear.] The person that appears.

That owls and ravens are ominous appearers, and presignify unlucky events, was an augural conception. Brown.

CRR. If you have told Diana's altar true,

This is your wife.

PER. Reverend appearer, no. Shakspeare, Pericles, v. 3.

APPEARING.  n. s.* [from appear.] The act of appearing.

The history of their appearings, [the apparitions of spirits,] is so big with legend, and the account of the consequents of their signs so steeped in affection and superstition.

Spencer on Prodiges, p. 222.

APPEASABLE. adj. [from To appease.] That may be pacified; reconcileable.

APPEASABLENESS. n. s. [from To appease.] The quality of being easily appeased; reconcileableness.

To APPEASE. v. a. [appaier, Fr.]

1. To quiet: to put in a state of peace.

By his counsel he appeaseth the deep, and planteth islands therein. Eccles. xliii. 23.

England had no leisure to think of reformation, till the civil wars were appeased, and peace settled. Davies on Ireland.

2. To pacify; to reconcile; to still wrath.

So Simon was appeased towards them, and fought no more against them. 1 Mac. xiii. 47.

O God! if my deep prayers cannot appease thee,
Yet execute thy wrath on me along. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The rest shall hear me call, and oft be warr'd
Their sinful state, and to appease betimes

Th' incensed Deity. Miller.

3. To still; to quiet.

The rest
They cut in legs and fillets for the feast,
Which drawn and serv'd, their hunger they appease. Dryden.

APPEASEMENT. † n. s. [Fr. appaïsment.] A state of peace.

Being neither in numbers nor in courage great, partly by authority, partly by entreaty, they were reduced to some good appeasements. Hayward.

APPEASER. † n. s. [Fr. appaiseur.] He that pacifies others; he that quiets disturbances. Sherwood.

APPEASIVE.  adj.* [from appease.] That which mitigates or appeases. Sherwood.

APPELLANCY.  n. s.* [from appello.] Appeal; capability of appeal.

APPELLANT. n. s. [appello, Lat. to call.]

1. A challenger; one that summons another to answer either in the lists or in a court of justice.

In the devotion of a subject's love,
And free from other misbegotten hate,
Come I appellant to this princely presence. Shakspeare.

This is the day appointed for the combat,
And ready are the appellant and defendant,
The armourer and his man, to enter the lists. Shakspeare.

These shifts refuted, answer thy appellant,
Though by his blindness maim'd for high attempts,
Who now defies thee thrice to single fight. Milton.

2. One that appeals from a lower to a higher power.

An appeal transfers the cognizance of the cause to the superior judge; so that, pending the appeal, nothing can be attempted in prejudice of the appellant. Ayliffe, Parergon.

APPELLANT.* adj. Appealing; relating to an appeal, or to the appealer.

The party appellant [shall] first personally promise and avow, that he will faithfully keep and observe all the rites and ceremonies of the church of England, &c.

Const. and Canons Eccl. 98.

APPELLATE.† adj. [appellatus, Lat.]

1. The person appealed against.

An appellatory libel ought to contain the name of the party appellant; the name of him from whose sentence it is appealed; the name of him to whom it is appealed; from what sentence it is appealed; the day of the sentence pronounced, and appeal interposed; and the name of the party appellate, or person against whom the appeal is lodged. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. Created on appeal.

The king of France is not the fountain of justice; the judge, neither the original nor the appellate are of his nomination.

Burke, on the French Revolution.

APPELLATION.† n. s. [appellatio, Lat.]

1. Name; word by which any thing is called.

Nor are always the same plants delivered under the same name and appellations. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

Good and evil commonly operate upon the mind of man, by respective names or appellations, by which they are notified and conveyed to the mind. South.

2. Mr. Boucher has observed, that as far as he can recollect, this noun is used in England, only to express the common name by which any person or thing is known. But it is one of our oldest substantives for appeal, being so defined in Huloet's Dict. and is common in our old writers; though Mr. Mason has cited Spenser's poetry merely as a peculiarity, in this sense.

There is such a noise in the court, that they have frighted me home with more violence than I went! such speaking and counter-speaking, with their several voices of citations, appellations, allegations, certificates, &c. B. Jonson's Epicene.

Here is no lawful appellation spoken of, but the bishop of Rome's sentence pronounced void. Fulke's Retentive, p. 268.

And bade Dan Phœbus' scribe her appellation seal.

Spenser, F. Q. vii. vii. 35.

APPELLATIVE.† n. s. [appellativum, Lat.] A title, or distinction.

There also [in the rosary] the blessed Virgin Mary, after many glorious appellatives, is prayed to in these words: Join me to Christ, govern me always, &c.

Bp. Taylor, Dissuasive from Popery, p. 218.

An appellative of scorn, a scene of laughter.

His Sermons at Golden Grove, Sermon 16.

Words and names are either common or proper. Common names are such as stand for universal ideas, or a whole rank of beings, whether general or special. These are called appellatives. So fish, bird, man, city, river, are common names; and so are trout, eel, lobster; for they all agree to many individuals, and some to many species. Watts, Logick.

APPELLATIVE.* adj. [appellativus, Lat.] Common; usual; opposed to proper, peculiar.

Nor is it likely that he [St. Paul] would give the common appellative name of Books to the divinely inspired Writings, without any other note of distinction. Bp. Bull's Works, ii. 401.

APPELLATIVE.† adv. [from appellative.] According to the manner of nouns appellative; as this man is a Hercules. Hercules is used appellatively to signify a strong man.

APPELLATORY.† adj. [Fr. appellatoire.] That which contains an appeal. See APPELLATE.

APPELLEE. n. s. [from appel.] One who is appealed against, and accused. Dict.

To APPE'ND.† v. a. [appendo, Lat.] to hang to any thing.]

1. To hang any thing upon another; as, the inscription was appended to the column: the seal is appended to the record.

The parchment containing the record of admission is, with the seal appending, fastened to a ribband, and worn for one day by the new citizen in his hat.

Dr. Johnson, Journ. West. Isl.

2. To add to something, as an accessory, not a principal part.

Hales-Cwen, one of those insulated districts which, in the division of the kingdom, was appended, for some reason not now discoverable, to a distant county. Johnson, Life of Shenstone.

APPE'NDANCE.* n. s. [from append.] Something annexed to, or hanging on, another.

Under the royal laws of our Maker, — under one sin mentioned all the species and appendances are wont to be comprised. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

When we see and hear of high titles, rich coats, ancient houses, long pedigrees, glittering suits, large revenues, we honour these (and so we must do) as the just monuments, signs, and appendances of civil greatness. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 29.

APPE'NDAGE. n. s. [French.] Something added to another thing, without being necessary to its essence, as a portico to the house.

Modesty is the appendage of sobriety, and is to chastity, to temperance, and to humility, as the fringes are to a garment.

Taylor's Rule of Living Holy.

None of the laws of motion now established, will serve to account for the production, motion, or number of bodies, nor their appendages, though they may help us a little to conceive their appearances. Cheyne.

He was so far from over-valuing any of the appendages of life, that the thoughts of life did not affect him. Atterbury.

APPE'NDANT.† adj. [French.]

1. Hanging to something else.

The saying of the beads over, with a medal or other trinket of the pope's benediction appendant, getteth plenary indulgence. Sir E. Sandys's State of Religion.

A man in compliment uses to trick up the name of some esquire, gentleman, or lord paramount at common law, with the appendant form of a ceremonious presentment.

Milton, Apol. for Smeectymnuus.

The Normans, during the reigns of Will. I. Will. II. and Henry I., often set the witnesses names, corroborated with crosses after the Anglo-Saxon fashion; to which they added seals of wax appendant, according to the Norman manner.

Wotton's View of Hicker's Thesaurus, p. 49.

2. Belonging to; annexed; concomitant.

He that despises the world, and all its appendant vanities, is the most secure. Taylor.

He that looks for the blessings appendant to the sacrament, must expect them upon no terms, but of a worthy communion. Taylor.

Riches multiplied beyond the proportion of our character, and the wants appendant to it, naturally dispose men to forget God. Rogers.

3. In law. Appendant is any thing belonging to another, as accessorium principali, with the civilians, or adjunctum subjecto, with the logicians. An hospital may be appendant to a manor; a common of fishing appendant to a freehold. Corvel.

APPE'NDANT. n. s. That which belongs to another thing, as an accidental or adventitious part.

Pliny gives an account of the inventors of the forms and appendants of shipping. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

A word, a look, a tread, will strike, as they are appendants to external symmetry, or indications of the beauty of the mind. Gr. w.

APPENDENCY.* n. s. [from append.] That which is by right annexed to another thing. See APPENDANCE.

Abraham bought the whole field, and by right of appendency had the cave with it. Spelman.

To APPENDICATE. v. a. [appendo, Lat.] To add to another thing.

In a palace there is the case or fabrick of the structure, and there are certain additaments; as, various furniture, and various motions of divers things appendicated to it. Hale.

APPENDICATION. n. s. [from appendicate.] Adjunct; appendage; annexion.

There are considerable parts and integrals, and appendications unto the mundus aspectabilis, impossible to be eternal. Hale.

APPENDIX. n. s. appendices, plur. [Lat.]

1. Something appended, or added to another thing.

The cherubim were never intended as an object of worship, because they were only the appendices to another thing. But a thing is then proposed as an object of worship, when it is set up by itself, and not by way of addition or ornament to another thing. Stillingfleet.

Normandy became an appendix to England, the nobler dominion, and received a greater conformity of their laws to the English, than they gave to it. Hale, Civil Law of England.

2. An adjunct or concomitant.

All concurrent appendices of the action ought to be surveyed, in order to pronounce with truth concerning it. Watts.

To APPERCEIVE.* v. n. [Fr. aperceivre, apercevoir.] To comprehend; to understand. Obsolete; though its descendant apperception is now in use.

For now goth he ful fast imagining,
If by his wives chere he mighte see,
Or by hire wordes apperceive, that she Were changed. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale.

APPERCEIVING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Perception; the act of perceiving.

For dread of jealous mennes apperceivings.

Chaucer, Squ. Tale.

APPERCEPTION.* n. s. [from apperceive.] A philosophical expression.

The philosopher makes a distinction between perception, and what he calls apperception. By apperception he understands that degree of perception, which reflects, as it were, upon itself; by which we are conscious of our own existence, and conscious of our own perceptions. Reid's Inquiry.

APPERIL.* n. s. [from peril.] This is the reading of old copies of Shakspeare, which the modern editors have changed into own peril, asserting that no such word as apperil exists; which, however, one of the commentators has asserted to be an expression now in actual use in the metropolis.] Danger.

Let me stay at thine apperil. Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

To APPERTAIN. v. n. [appartenir, Fr.]

1. To belong to as of right; with to.

The honour of devising this doctrine, that religion ought to be enforced by the sword, would be found appertaining to Mahomed the false prophet. Ralegh.

The Father, & whom in heav'n supreme Kingdom, and power, and glory appertains,
Hath honour'd me, according to his will. Milton, P. L.

2. To belong to by nature or appointment.

If the soul of man did serve only to give him being in this life, then things appertaining to this life would content him, as we see they do other creatures. Hooker.

And they roasted the passover with fire, as appertaineth: as for the sacrifices, they sod them in brass pots. Esdras.

VOL. I.

Both of them seem not to generate any other effect, but such as appertaineth to their proper objects and senses. Bacon.

It is expected, I should know no secrets

That appertain to you? Shakspeare, Jul. Cas.

APPERTAINMENT. n. s. [from appertain.] That which belongs to any rank or dignity.

He sent us messengers, and we lay by

Our appertainments, visiting of him. Shakspeare.

APPERTENANCE. n. s. [appartenance, Fr.] That which belongs or relates to another thing.

Can they which behold the controversy of divinity condemn our enquiries in the doubtful appertenances of arts, and receptaries of philosophy? Brown, Vulg. Err.

To APPERTENANCE.* v. a. To have as right belonging.

The buildings are antient, large, strong, and fair, and appertenanced with the necessities of wood, water, fishing, parks, and mills. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

APPERTINENT.† adj. [old Fr. apertinent.] Belonging; relating.

All the other gifts appertinent to man, as the malice of this age shapes them, are not worth a gooseberry.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

APPERTINENT.* n. s. [from the adjective.] Any thing pertaining.

You know how apt our love was to accord.

To furnish him with all appertinents

Belonging to his honour. Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

A'PPETENCE.† } [old Fr. appetence, Lat. app-
A'PPETENCY. } tentia.]

1. Carnal desire; sensual desire.

Bred only and completed to the taste

Of lustful appetence; to sing, to dance,

To dress, to trouble the tongue, and roll the eye. Milton.

2. Simply, desire.

Nor can your arguments, taken from human nature's prime appetency of truth, serve to conclude an infallibility in whatsoever shall be embraced for truth by a vast multitude of men of variety of natures, dispositions, and interests.

Sir K. Digby, Lett. p. 96.

A'PPETENT.* adj. [Lat. appetens.] Very desirous.

Knowing the earl to be thirsty and appetent after glory and renown.

Sir G. Buck, Hist. of K. Rich. III. p. 60.

A'PPETIBLE. adj. [appetibilis, Lat.] Desirable; that which may be the object of appetite.

Power both to slight the most appetible objects, and to controul the most unruly passions. Bramhall against Hobbes.

APPETIBILITY. n. s. [from appetible.] The quality of being desirable.

That elicitation which the schools intend, is a deducing of the power of the will into act, merely from the appetibility of the object, as a man draws a child after him with the sight of a green bough. Bramhall against Hobbes.

A'PPETITE. n. s. [appetitus, Lat.]

1. The natural desire of good; the instinct by which we are led to seek pleasure.

The will properly and strictly taken, as it is of things which are referred unto the end that man desireth, differeth greatly from that inferior natural desire, which we call apptite. The object of appetite is whatsoever sensible good may be wished for; the object of will is that good which reason does lead us to seek. Hooker.

2. The desire of sensual pleasure.

Why, she should hang on him,

As if increase of appetite had grown

By what it fed on.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Urge his hateful luxury,

And bestial appetite in change of lust. Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

Each tree

Loaden with fairest fruit, that hung to th' eye

Tempting, stirr'd in me sudden appetite

To pluck and eat.

Milton, P. L.

3. Violent longing; eagerness after any thing.

No man could enjoy his life, his wife, or goods, if a mightier man had an appetite to take the same from him. Davies.

Hopton had an extraordinary appetite to engage Waller in a battle. Clarendon.

4. The thing eagerly desired.

Power being the natural appetite of princes, a limited monarch cannot gratify it. Swift.

Blackstone.

For their price: By law, they ought to take as they can agree with the subject: By abuse, they take at an imposed and enforced price: By law, they ought to make but one apprisement, by neighbours, in the country: By abuse, they make a second apprisement at the court-gate.

Bacon, Speech to K. James.

APPRECA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. apprecor, or adprecor.] Earnest prayer or well-wishing.

We all look, not without desire and apprecation, in what shape you will come forth.

Bp. Hall, Epist. Dec. 1. ch. 8.

God Almighty prosper and perfect your undertakings, and provide for you in heaven those rewards which such publick works of piety used to be crowned withal: It is the apprecation of your devoted servitor.

Howell's Letters, i. 2.

You will pardon my holy importunity, which shall ever be seconded with my hearty prayers to the God of truth, that he will establish your heart in that eternal truth of his Gospel which you have received, and both work and crown your happy perseverance; such shall be the fervent apprecations of your much devoted friend

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 404.

A'PPRECATORY.* adj. [Lat. apprecor.] Praying or wishing any good.

If either the blessing or curse of a father go deeper with us than of any other whatsoever, although but proceeding from his own private affection without any warrant from above; how forcible shall we esteem the (not so much apprecatory as declaratory) benedictions of our spiritual fathers, sent to us, out of heaven

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iii. 9.

To APPRE'CIATE.* v. a. [Fr. apprécier; To estimate; to value.

The sectaries of a persecuted religion are seldom in a proper temper of mind, calmly to investigate, or candidly to appreciate the motives of their enemies.

Gibbon.

Fortitude is, in reality, no more than prudence, good judgement, and presence of mind, in properly appreciating pain, labour, and danger.

A. Smith.

APPRE'CIATION.* n. s. [Fr. appreciation.] One of our old substantives also. "A rating, valuing, prising, estimating," as Bullokar defines it.] Valuation.

Lord Clarendon's Life, iii. 688.

APPREHENDER. v. n. s. [from apprehend.]

1. Conceive; thinker.

Gross apprehenders may not think it any more strange, than that a bullet should be moved by the rarified fire. Glanville.

2. The person who apprehends or seizes another.

St. Hierom is bold to aver, that his [Christ's] countenance carried, hidden in it, a star-like brightness; which, revealing itself, made both his disciples to follow him at the first sight, and his apprehenders to fall backwards to the ground.

Walsall, Life and Death of Christ, (1615) sign. B. ii. b.

APPREHENSIBLE. adj. [from apprehend.] That which may be apprehended, or conceived.

The north and southern poles are incommunicable and fixed points, whereof the one is not apprehensible in the other.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

APPREHENSION. n. s. [apprehensio, Lat.]

1. The mere contemplation of things, without affirming or denying any thing concerning them. So we think of a horse, high, swift, animal, time, matter, mind, death, &c.

Simple apprehension denotes no more than the soul's naked intellection of an object, without either composition or deduction. Glanville.

2. Opinion; sentiments; concession.

If we aim at right understanding its true nature, we must examine what apprehension mankind make of it. Digby.

To be false, and to be thought false, is all one in respect of men who act not according to truth, but apprehension. South.

The expressions of Scripture are commonly suited in those matters to the vulgar apprehensions and conceptions of the place and people where they were delivered. Locke.

3. The faculty by which we conceive new ideas, or power of conceiving them.

I nam'd them as they pass'd, and understood Their nature, with such knowledge God indu'd My sudden apprehension. Milton.

4. Fear.

It behoveth that the world should be held in awe, not by a vain surmise, but a true apprehension of somewhat which no man may think himself able to withstand. Hooker.

And he the future evil shall no less In apprehension than in substance feel. Milton.

The apprehension of what was to come from an unknown, at least unacknowledged successor to the crown, clouded much of that prosperity. Clarendon.

As they have no apprehension of these things, so they need no comfort against them. Tillotson.

After the death of his nephew Caligula, Claudius was in no small apprehension for his own life. Addison.

5. Suspicion of something to happen, or to be done.

I'll note you in my book of memory, And scourge you for this apprehension. Shakespeare.

That he might take away the apprehension, that he meant suddenly to depart, he sent out orders, which he was sure would come into the enemies' hands, to two or three villages, that they should send proportions of corn into Basinghouse. Clarendon.

6. Seizure.

See that he be convey'd unto the Tower: And go we brothers to the man that took him, To question of his apprehension. Shakespeare.

7. The power of seizing, catching or holding.

A lobster hath the chely or great claw of one side longer than the other, but this is not their leg, but a part of apprehension whereby they seize upon their prey.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

APPREHENSIVE. v. adj. [Fr. apprehensif.]

1. Quick to understand.

My father would oft speak Your worth and virtue; and as I did grow More and more apprehensive, I did thirst To see the man so rais'd.

Beaumont and Fletcher's Philaster.
And gives encouragement to those who teach such apprehensive scholars. Holder.

His conscience be naturally apprehensive and sagacious, certainly we should trust and rely upon the reports of it. South.

They are not at all apprehensive of evils at a distance, nor tormented with the fearful prospect of what may befall them hereafter. Tillotson.

3. Perceptive; feeling.

Thoughts, my tormentors, arm'd with deadly stings, Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts. Milton.

By the apprehensive power we perceive the species of sensible things, present or absent, and retain them as wax doth the print of a seal. Burton, Anat. of Mel.

If the imagination be very apprehensive, intent, and violent, it sends great store of spirits to or from the heart. Ibid. p. 90.

Among them here who suffered gloriously, Aron, and Julius of Caerleon upon Usk, but chiefly Alban of Verulam, were most renowned; the story of whose martyrdom soiled, and worse martyred, with the fabulous zeal of some idle fancies, more fond of miracles than apprehensive of truth, deserves not longer digression. Milton, Hist. of England, B. ii.

APPREHENSIVELY. adv. [from apprehensive.] In an apprehensive manner.APPREHENSIVENESS. v. n. s. [from apprehensive.] The quality of being apprehensive.

We shall often mark in it [the eye] a dulness, or apprehensiveness, even before the understanding.

Whereas the vowels are much more difficult to be taught, you will find, by falling upon them last, great help by the apprehensiveness already gained in learning the consonants. Holder.

Mr. B., in the delicacy of his apprehensiveness for me, led me into the next parlour; and placing himself by me on the settee, said, Take care, my best beloved, that the joy, which overflows your dear heart for having done a beneficent action to a deserving gentleman, does not affect you too much. Richardson, Pamela.

APPRENTICE. n. s. [apprenti, Fr.] One that is bound by covenant, to serve another man of trade, for a certain term of years, upon condition, that the artificer, or tradesman, shall, in the mean time, endeavour to instruct him in his art or mystery. Cowel.

Love enjoined such diligence, that no apprentice,—no, no bond slave could ever be more ready than that young princess was. Sidney.

He found him such an apprentice, as knew well enough how to set up for himself. Wotton.

This rule sets the painter at liberty; it teaches him, that he ought not to be subject himself servilely, and be bound like an apprentice to the rules of his art. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

To APPRENTICE. v. a. [from the noun.] To put out to a master as an apprentice.

Him, portion'd maids, apprentic'd orphans' blest, The young who labour, and the old who rest. Pope.

APPRENTICEHOOD. n. s. [from apprentice.] The years of an apprentice's servitude.

Must I not serve a long apprenticehood

To foreign passages, and in the end, Having my freedom, boast of nothing else But that I was a journeyman to grief?

Shakespeare.

APPRENTICESHIP. n. s. [from apprentice.] The years which an apprentice is to pass under a master.

In every art, the simplest that is, there is an apprenticeship necessary, before it can be expected one should work. Digby.

Many rushed into the ministry, as being the only calling that they could profess, without serving any apprenticeship. South.

APPRENTISAGE.* n. s. [Fr. apprentissage.] Apprenticeship; figuratively, trial; experience.

It is a better condition of inward peace, to be accompanied with some exercise of no dangerous war in foreign parts, than to be utterly without apprentisage of war; whereby people grow effeminate, and unpractised, when occasion shall be.

Bacon, Observ. upon a Label, 1592.

To APPRI'ZE. v. a. [apprendre; part. appris, Fr.] To inform; to give the knowledge of any thing.

He considers the tendency of such a virtue or vice; he is well apprized, that the representation of some of these things may convince the understanding, and some may terrify the conscience. Watts.

It is fit he be apprized of a few things, that may prevent his mistaking. Cheyne.

But if appriz'd of the severe attack,
The country he shut up, lur'd by the scent,
On church-yard drear (inhuman to relate)
The disappointed prowlers fall. Thomson.

APPRI'ZE.* n. s. Information. Obsolete.

Then I praised him for to saie
His will, and I it would obseie,
After the forme of his apprize. Gower, Conf. Am. b. 1.

To APPROACH. † v. n. [approcher, Fr.]

1. To draw near locally.

'Tis time to look about: the powers of the kingdom approach apace. Shakspeare.

Wherefore approach ye so nigh the city. 2 Sam. xi. 20.

Thou gav'st thine ears, like tapsters, that bid welcome
To knaves and all approachers. Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

Whose rheum quencheth, and wrinkles bury, all desire in suits or approachers. Whitlock's Mann. of the Eng. p. 386.

Had you but plants enough of this blest tree, Sir,
Set round about your court, to beautify it,
Deaths twice so many, to dismay the approachers,

The ground would scarce yield graves to noble lovers.
Baum, and Fl. Wife for a Month, A. 1.

APPRO'ACHMENT. † n. s. [old Fr. apruichement.] The act of coming near.

As for ice, it will not concreate, but in the approachment of the air, as we have made trial in glasses of water, which will not easily freeze. Brown, Vulg. Err.

APPROBATE.* part. adj. [Lat. approbo. Cocke-ram's old vocabulary notices the verb "approve, to allow, to like." Approved. Obsolete.

All things contained in Scripture is approve by the whole consent of all the clergie of Christendome.

APPROPINQUATION.* n. s. [Lat. appropinquatio.]
The act or power of approaching.
There are many ways of our appropinquation to God.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 90.
This third appropinquation of God is never other than cordial and beneficial. It is a sweet word, "I will dwell amongst the children of Israel, and will be their God." Exod.
xxix. 45. Ibid. p. 96.

To APPROPINQUE. v. n. [appropinquo, Lat.] To approach; to draw near to. A ludicrous word.

The clotted blood within my hose,
That from my wounded body flows,
With mortal crisis doth portend
My days to appropinque an end. Hudibras.

APPROPRIABLE. adj. [from appropriate.] That which may be appropriated; that which may be restrained to something particular.

This conceit applied unto the original of man, and the beginning of the world, is more justly appropriable unto its end.
Brown, Vulg. Eri.

To APPROPRIATE. v. a. [appropriar, Fr. appro-prio, low Lat.]

1. To consign to some particular use or person.
Things sanctified were thereby in such sort appropriated unto God, as that they might never afterwards again be made common. Hooker.

As for this spot of ground, this person, this thing, I have selected and appropriated, I have inclosed it to myself and my own use; and I will endure no sharer, no rival or companion in it. South.

Some they appropriated to the gods,
And some to publick, some to private ends. Roscommon.

Marks of honour are appropriated to the magistrate, that he might be invited to reverence himself. Atterbury.

2. To claim or exercise; to take to himself by an exclusive right.

To themselves appropriating
The spirit of God, promis'd alike, and giv'n
To all believers. Milton.

Why should people engross and appropriate the common benefits of fire, air, and water, to themselves? L'Estrange.

Every body else has an equal title to it; and therefore he cannot appropriate, he cannot inclose, without the consent of all his fellow-commoners, all mankind. Locke.

3. To make peculiar to something; to annex by combination.

He need but be furnished with verses of sacred Scripture; and his system, that has appropriated them to the orthodoxy of his church, makes them immediately irrefragable arguments.
Locke.

We, by degrees, get ideas and names, and learn their appropriated connection one with another. Ibid.

4. In law, to alienate a benefice. See APPROPRI-ATION.

Before Richard II. it was lawful to appropriate the whole fruits of a benefice to any abbey, the house finding one to serve the cure; that king redressed that horrid evil. Ayliffe.

APPROPRIATE. adj. [from the verb.] Peculiar; consigned to some particular use or person; belonging peculiarly.

He did institute a band of fifty archers, by the name of yeomen of his guard; and that it might be thought to be rather a matter of dignity, than any matter of diffidence appropriate to his own case, he made an ordinance not temporary, but to hold in succession for ever. Bacon.

The heathens themselves had an apprehension of the necessity of some appropriate acts of divine worship. Stillingfleet.
Many prebends in cathedral churches are founded in some living appropriate, which is their corps, and the principal part of their revenue. Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 167.

APPROPRIATE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Peculiarity.
The Bible's appropriate being (as itself tells us) to enlighten the eyes and make wise the simple.

Boyle on the Style of the H. Scrip. p. 44.
APPROPRIATELY.* adv. [from appropriate.] Distinguishingly; fitly; in an appropriate manner.

ness or fitness of application.

APPROPRIATION.† n. s. [from appropriate.]

1. The application of something to a particular purpose.

The mind should have distinct ideas of the things, and retain the particular name, with its peculiar appropriation to that idea.
Locke.

2. The claim of any thing as peculiar.

He doth nothing but talk of his horse, and he makes it a great appropriation to his good parts, that he can shoe him himself. Shakspeare.

3. The fixing a particular signification to a word.

The name of faculty may, by an appropriation that disguises its true sense, palliate the absurdity. Locke.

4. In law, a severing of a benefice ecclesiastical to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house, or dean, and chapter, bishoprick, or college; because, as persons ordinarily have no right of fee-simple, these, by reason of their perpetuity, accounted owners of the fee-simple; and therefore are called propriators. To an appropriation, after the licence obtained of the king in chancery, the consent of the diocesan, patron, and incumbent, are necessary, if the church be full: but if the church be void, the diocesan and the patron, upon the king's licence, may conclude. Cowel.

Othobon, the pope's legate in England, by the command of Urban the Fifth, made a constitution for the endowment of vicars and appropriations; but it prevailed not.

Bp. Bramhall, Schism guarded, p. 128.
APPROPRIATOR. n. s. [appropriate.] He that is possessed of an appropriated benefice.

These appropriators, by reason of their perpetuities, are accounted owners of the fee-simple; and therefore are called propriators. Ayliffe, Parergon.

APPROPRIETARY.* n. s. [from ad, Lat. and proprietary.] A lay possessor of the profits of a benefice.

Let me say one thing more to the appropriaries of bene-fices. Spelman.

APPROVABLE. adj. [from approve.] That which merits approbation.

The solid reason, or confirmed experience, of any man, is very approvable in what profession soever. Brown, Vulg. Err.

APPROVAL. n. s. [from approve.] Approbation: a word rarely found.

There is a censor of justice and manners, without whose approval no capital sentences are to be executed. Temple.

APPROVANCE. n. s. [from approve.] Approbation: a word not much used.

A man of his learning should not so lightly have been carried away with old wives' tales from approvance of his own reason. Spenser.

Should she seem
Soft'ning the least approvance to bestow,
Their colours burnish, and, by hope inspir'd,

They brisk advance. Thomson.

To APPROVE.† v. a. [approver, Fr. approbo, Lat.]

1. To like; to be pleased with.
There can be nothing possibly evil which God approveth, and that he approveth much more than he doth command. Hooker.
What power was that, whereby Medea saw,
And well approv'd, and prais'd the better course
When her rebellious sense did so withdraw
Her feeble powers, that she pursu'd the worse? Davies.
2. To express liking.
It is looked upon as insolence for a man to set up his own opinion against that of some learned doctor, or otherwise approved writer. Locke.
3. To prove; to show; to justify.
His meaning was not, that Archimedes could simply in nothing be deceived; but that he had in such sort approved his skill, that he seemed worthy of credit for ever after, in matters appertaining to the science he was skilful in. Hooker.
In religion,
What damned errour, but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text. Shakspeare.
I'm sorry
That he approves the common liar, Fame,
Who speaks him thus at Rome. Shakspeare.
Would'st thou approve thy constancy? Approve
First thy obedience. Milton.
Refer all the actions of this short life to that state which will never end; and this will approve itself to be wisdom at the last, whatever the world judge of it now. Tillotson.
4. To experience: not in use.
Oh, 'tis the curse in love, and still approv'd,
When women cannot love, where they're below'd. Shakspeare.
5. To make, or show to be worthy of approbation.
The first care and concern must be to approve himself to God by righteousness, holiness, and purity. Rogers.
6. It has of before the object, when it signifies to be pleased, but may be used without a preposition; as, I approve your letter, or, of your letter.
I shewed you a piece of black and white stuff, just sent from the dyer; which you were pleased to approve of, and be my customer for. Swift.
7. [In law.] To improve.
This inclosure, when justifiable, is called in law approving, an antient expression signifying the same as improving. Blackstone.

APPRO'VEMENT.† n. s. [from approve.]

1. Approbation; liking.
It is certain that at the first you were all of my opinion, and that I did nothing without your approvement. Hayward.
As in the choice of our acquaintance, so in our approvement of books. The Princely Pelican, ch. 7.
2. [In law.] Approvement is, when a person indicted of treason or felony, and arraigned for the same, doth confess the fact before plea pleaded, and appeals or accuses others his accomplices in order to obtain his pardon. Blackstone.
3. [In law also.] The lord may approve, that is, enclose and convert to the uses of husbandry (which they call melioration or approvement) any waste grounds, woods, or pastures, in which the tenants have common appendant to their estates, provided he leaves sufficient common to his tenants. Blackstone.

APPRO'VER.† n. s. [from approve.]

1. He that approves.
[They] told him all the secree that they knewe —
They weren his approvers prively. Chaucer, Frere's Tale.
Clysters are in good request — Hercules de Saxoniâ is a great approver of them. Burton, Anat. of Melancholy, p. 405.
Those, who are alleged for the approvers of our liturgy. Milton, Apol. for Smectymnus.
He that commends a villain, is not an approver only, but a party in his villainy. South, Sermons, viii. 190.

2. He that makes trial.
Their discipline,
Now mingled with their courages, will make known
To their approvers, they are people, such
That mend upon the world. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.
3. In our common law, one that confessing felony of himself, appealeth or accuseth another, one or more, to be guilty of the same: and he is called so, because he must prove what he hath alleged in his Cowel.

APPROXIMANT.* adj. [from approximate.] Approaching.

That were, indeed, a well-tempered and a blessed reformation, whereby our times might be approximant and conformant to the apostolical and pure primitive church.

Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 74.

APPROXIMATE. adj. [from ad, to, and proximus, near, Lat.] Near to.

These receive a quick conversion, containing approximate dispositions unto animation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To APPROXIMATE.* v. a. [from the adj.] To bring that which is remote or distant; near.

The favour of God, embracing all, hath approximated and combined all together; so that now every man is our brother, not only by nature, as derived from the same stock, but by grace, as partakers of the common redemption.

Barrow's Works, i. 247.

Time past is gone like a shadow; make time to come present: approximate thy latter times by present apprehensions of them: be like a neighbour unto the grave, and think there is but little to come. Broune, Christ. Mor. ii. 30.

To APPROXIMATE.* v. n. To come near.

Among such five men there will be one possessing all the qualifications of a good workman, one bad, and the other three middling, and approximating to the first and the last.

Burke, Thoughts on Scarcity.

APPROXIMATION.† n. s. [from approximate.]

1. Approach to any thing.

Unto the latitude of Capricorn, or the winter solstice, it had been a spring; for, unto that position, it had been in a middle point, and that of ascent or approximation.

Brown, Vulgar Errors.

The fiery region gains upon the inferior elements; a necessary consequent of the sun's gradual approximation towards the earth. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Quadrupeds are better placed according to the degrees of their approximation to the human shape. Grew's, Musaeum.

This is the best and truest approximation to God: "Walk before me," saith God to Abraham, "and be upright."

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 91.

2. In science, a continual approach nearer still, and nearer to the quantity sought, though perhaps without a possibility of ever arriving at it exactly.

Whether if the end of geometry be practice, and this practice be measuring, and we measure only assignable extensions, it will not follow that unlimited approximations completely answer the intention of geometry?

Bp. Berkeley's Analyst, qu. 53.

APPU'LS.† n. s. [from appulsus, Lat.]

1. The act of striking against any thing.

An hectic fever is the innate heat kindled into a destructive fire, through the appulse of saline steams. Harvey.

In vowels, the passage of the mouth is open and free, without any appulse of an organ of speech to another: but, in all consonants, there is an appulse of the organs. Holder.

2. Arrival; landing; resting.

I have, in a former treatise, shown that the history of Deucalion, and of the appulse of the Ark, was adopted by different nations, and referred to their own country.

Bryant's Analyst, ii. 412.

3* [In astronomy.] The approaching to a conjunction with the sun, of any fixed star.

A P R

The observation of the moon's appulses to any fixed star is reckoned one of the best methods for resolving this problem.

Adams.

Give cherries at time of year, or apricots.

B. Jonson, Epicure.

A'PRIL. n. s. [Aprilis, Lat. Avril, Fr.] The fourth month of the year, January counted first.

April is represented by a young man in green, with a garland of myrtle and hawthorn buds; in one hand primroses and violets, in the other the sign Taurus. Peacham on Drame

Men are April when they woo, December when they wed; Maids are May when they are maids, but the sky changes when they are wives.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

A'PRIL-FOOL.* n. s. He who is imposed upon by others, on the first of April; who is made a fool by being then sent on some absurd errand; which the Swedes call April-arcnde, a sleeveless errand, and the person so sent April-narr, an April-fool.

He will be the choicest of Cupid's April-fools; and I will not say an egregious ass, but camel, to bear his burthens.

Han's Essay on Deformity

The French too have their all-fool-day, and call the person imposed upon "an April-fish, poisson d'Avril," whom we term an April-fool.

Brand's Popular Antiquities.

A'PRIL-FOOL-DAY.* n. s. The first of April; All-fools-day; which see.

I do not doubt but it will be found, that the balance of folly lies greatly on the side of the old first of April; nay, I much question whether infatuation will have any force on what I call the false April-fool-day.

The World, No. 10.

A'PRON.† n. s. [A word of uncertain etymology, but supposed by some to be contracted from afore one, Dr. Johnson says; which is as curious as upper-on, proposed in a copy of Johnson which belonged to Mr. Henshall. It may be from the Fr. naperon, a large cloth; the old Eng. orthography being napron; and in our northern speech nappern is sometimes the pronunciation. Laconbe, however, gives the old Fr. apronnaire, and appronier, for aprons. And we may go to the Celt, ap-pirn.] A cloth hung before, to keep the other dress clean.

A P R

Give us gold, good Timon: hast thou more? -

Hold up, you sluts,

Your aprons mountant.

Shakespeare.

The nobility think scorn to go in leather aprons. Shakespeare. How might we see Falstaff, and not ourselves be seen? —

Put on two leather jerkins and aprons, and wait upon him at his table as drawers.

Shakespeare.

In these figures the vest is gathered up before them, like an apron, which you must suppose filled with fruits. Addison.

A'PRON [in gunnery.] A piece of lead which covers the touch-hole of a great gun.

A'PRON of a good The fat skin which covers the belly.

A'PRON-MAN. n. s. [from apron and man.] A man that wears an apron; a workman; a manual artificer.

You have made good work,

You and your apron-men, that stood so much

Upon the voice of occupation, and

The breath of garlick eaters.

Shakespeare.

A'PRONED.† adj. [from apron.] Wearing an apron.

The cobbler apron'd, and the parson gown'd.

Pope.

Their authors would be counted somebody; the small regency of an apron'd auditory, or handful of illiterate disciples, how hath it drove men to singularity in opinions and doctrines.

Whitlock, Manners of the English, p. 361.

APROPOS.* adv. [Fr. à propos.] Opportunely; to the purpose.

Mr. Brown is now busy upon his work. Apropos, I heard very lately that my friend was the author of that fine little pamphlet that has so irretrievably spoiled the credit and the sale of that vain simple book of Weston's.

Warburton to Hurd, Lett. xvii.

A'PSIS. n. s. apsides, plural. [αψις.]

Is applied, in astronomy, to two points in the orbits of planets, in which they are at the greatest, and the least distance from the sun or earth. The higher apsis is more particularly denominated aphelion, or apogee; the lower, perihelion, or perigee.

Chambers.

If bodies revolve in orbits that are pretty near circles, and the apsides of these orbits be fixed, then the centripetal forces of those bodies will be reciprocally as the squares of the distances.

Cheyne.

APT. adj. [aptus, Lat.]

1. Fit.

This so eminent industry in making proselytes, more of that sex than of the other, growth; for that they are deemed apter to serve as instruments in the cause. After they are through the eagerness of their affection; after through a natural inclination unto piety; after through sundry opportunities, &c. Finally, after through a singular delight which they take in giving very large and particular intelligence how all near about them stand affected as concerning the same cause.

Hooker.

2. Having a tendency to; liable to.

Things natural, as long as they keep those forms which give them their being, cannot possibly be apt or inclinable to do otherwise than they do.

Hooker.

My vines and peaches on my best south walls were apt to have a soot or smuttiness upon their leaves and fruits.

Temple.

3. Inclined to; led to; disposed to.

You may make her you love, believe it; which, I warrant, she is apter to do, than confess she does.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

Men are apt to think well of themselves, and of their nation, of their courage and strength.

Temple.

One, who has not these lights, is a stranger to what he reads, and apt to put a wrong interpretation upon it.

Addison.

Even those who are near the court, are apt to deduct wrong consequences, by reasoning upon the motives of actions.

Swift.

What we have always seen to be done in one manner, we are apt to imagine there was but that one way.

Bentley.

unto they were only apt. Shakespeare.
All that were strong and apt for war, even them the king of Babylon brought captive to Babylon. 2 Kings.

To APT. v. a. [apto, Lat.]

1. To suit; to adapt.
We need a man that knows the several graces
Of history, and how to apt their places;
Where brevity, where splendour, and where height,
Where sweetness is required, and where weight. B. Jonson.
In some ponds, apted for it by nature, they become pikes. Walton.

2. To fit; to qualify; to dispose; to prepare.
They are things ignorant,
And therefore apted to that superstition
Of doting fondness. Beaumont and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage, 2. 3.
The king is melancholy,
Apted for any ill impressions. Denham's Sophy.

*AP'PTABLE. adj. [from apto.] Accommodable; suitable. Obsolete. Shewwood.

To AP'PTATE. v. a. [aplatus, Lat.] To make fit.
To apptate a planet, is to strengthen the planet in position of house and dignities to the greatest advantage, in order to bring about the desired end. Bailey.

AP'TITUDE. n. s. [French.]

1. Fitness.

In an abortion, the mother, besides the frustration of her hopes, acquires an aptitude to miscarry for the future. Decay of Piety.

3. Disposition.
He that is about children, should study their nature and aptitudes, what turns they easily take, and what becomes them:
what their native stock is, and what it is fit for. Locke.

AP'TLY. adv. [from apt.]

1. Properly; with just connection, or correspondence; fitly.

That part
Was aptly fitted, and naturally perform'd. Shakespeare.
But what the mass nutritious does divide?
What makes them aptly to the limbs adhere,
In youth encrease them, and in age repair? Blackmore.

2. Justly; pertinently.
Ireneus very aptly remarks, that those nations, who were not possessors of the gospels, had the same accounts of our Saviour, which are in the Evangelists. Addison.

3. Readily; acutely; as, he learned his business very aptly.

AP'PTNESS. n. s. [from apt.]

1. Fitness; suitableness.
The nature of every law must be judged of by the aptness of things therein prescribed, unto the same end. Hooker.
There are antecedent and independent aptnesses in things; with respect to which, they are fit to be commanded or for-bidden. Norris, Miscellanies.

2. Disposition to any thing; of persons.
The nobles receive so to heart the banishment of that worthy Coriolanus, that they are in a ripe aptness to take all power from the people. Shakespeare.

3. Quickness of apprehension; readiness to learn.
What should be the aptness of birds, in comparison of beasts, to imitate speech, may be enquired. Bacon.

4. Tendency; of things.

AR'TORE. n. s. [of a and tor.] A noun which is not declined with cases.

AQUA. n. s. [Latin.] A word signifying water, very much used in chymical writings.

AQUA FORTIS. [Latin.] A corrosive liquor made by distilling purified nitre with calcined vitriol, or rectified oil of vitriol in a strong heat: the liquor, which rises in fumes red as blood, being collected, is the spirit of nitre or aqua fortis; which serves as a menstruum for dissolving of silver, and all other metals, except gold. But if sea salt, or sal ammo-niack, be added to aqua fortis, it commences aqua regia, and will then dissolve no metal but gold. Chambers.

The dissolving of silver in aqua fortis, and gold in aqua regia, and not vice versa, would not be difficult to know. Locke.

AQUA MARINA, of the Italian lapidaries, is of a sea or bluish green. This stone seems to me to be the beryllus of Pliny. Woodward.

AQUA MIRABILIS. [Latin.] The wonderful water, is prepared of cloves, galangals, cubbs, mace, cardomums, nutmegs, ginger, and spirit of wine, digested twenty-four hours, then distilled.

AQUA REGIA, or AQUA REGALIS. [Latin.] An acid water, so called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. Its essential ingredient, is common sea salt, the only salt which will operate on gold.
It is prepared by mixing common sea salt, or sal ammoniac, or the spirit of them, with spirit of nitre, or common aqua fortis. Chambers.

He adds to his complex idea of gold, that of fixedness or solubility in aqua regia. Locke.

*AQUA-TINTA. n. s. [Lat. and Ital.] A species of engraving now much practised, imitating, upon copper, drawings made with Indian ink or bistre.

AQUA-VITÆ. [Latin.] It is commonly understood of what is otherwise called brandy, or spirit of wine, either simple or prepared with aromatics. But some appropriate the term brandy to what is procured from wine, or the grape; aqua-vitæ, to that drawn after the same manner from malt. Chambers.

I will rather trust a Fleming with my butter, an Irishman with my aqua-vitæ bottle, or a thief to walk with me, mulling golding, than my wife with herself. Shakespeare.

*AQUARIUS. n. s. [Lat.] The eleventh sign in the zodiack.

A constellation in the watery sign,

Temple.

To A'RBITER.* v. a. [Fr. arbitrer, Lat. arbitror.] To judge. Huot.

A'RBITRABLE.† adj. [from arbitror, Lat. or Fr. arbitrable, which our old dictionaries give; one of the oldest of which (Huot's) defines the word, "that which is to be judged by an arbiter," determinable; not noticed by Dr. Johnson.]

1. Arbitrary; depending upon the will.

The ordinary revenue of a parsonage is in layd, called the globe; in tythe, a set part of our goods rendered to God; in other offerings bestowed upon God by the people, either in such arbitrable proportion as their own devotion moveth them, or as the laws or customs of particular places do require them.

Spelman.

2. Determinable.

The value of moneys or other commodities is arbitrable according to the sovereign authority and use of several kingdoms and countries.

Bp. Hall's Cases of Conscience, Dec. 1. Case 1.

ARBI'TRAMENT.† n. s. [from arbitror, Lat.] Will; determination; choice. This should be written arbitrement, Dr. Johnson says. It is so written by Milton, and Dr. Johnson and others have charged the great poet with blundering in orthography, only because they have followed a bad edition of his poetry, and have not taken the pains to examine the passage as it was printed in his life-time. I therefore correct arbitrament in the example given by Dr. Johnson.]

A R B

Stand fast! to stand or fall,
Free in thine own arbitrement it lies.
Perfect within, no outward aid require;
And all temptation to transgress repel. Milton, P. L. viii. 640.

A'RBITARILY.† adv. [from arbitrary.] With no other rule than the will; despotically; absolutely.

He governed arbitrarily, he was expelled; and came to the deserved end of all tyrants. Dryden.

Tickell has ignorantly and arbitrarily altered "comperto" to "compensans." Warton, Notes on Milton's Smaller Poems.

A'RBITRARI'NESS.† n. s. [from arbitrary.]

1. Despoticalness; tyranny.

He that by harshness of nature, and arbitrariness of commands, uses his children like servants, is what they mean by a tyrant. Temple.

2. Choice.

All things in the world are very different one from another, and have all manner of variety, and all the marks of will and arbitrariness and changeableness, (and none of necessity,) in them. Clarke on the Attributes, p. 47.

ARBITRA'RIOUS.† adj. [from arbitrarius, Lat.]

1. Arbitrary; depending on the will.

These are standing and irrepeatable truths, such as have no precarious existence, or arbitrarius dependance upon any will or understanding whatsoever. Norris.

2. Despotick.

The most specious devices of arbitrarius superstition.

More, Conj. Cabb. p. 249.

Hallywell, Nav. of Souls, p. 25.

ARBITRA'RIOUSLY. adv. [from arbitrarius.] Arbitrarily; according to mere will and pleasure.

Where words are imposed arbitrarily, distorted from their common use, the mind must be led into misprision. Glanville.

A'RBITRARY.† adj. [arbitrarius, Lat.]

1. Despotick: absolute; bound by no law; following the will without restraint. It is applied both to persons and things.

In vain the Tyran queen resigns her life

For the chaste glory of a virtuous wife,

If lying hard may false amours rehearse,

And blast her name with arbitrarius verse.

Walsh.

Their regal tyrants shall with blushes hide

Their little lusts of arbitrarius pride,

Nor bear to see their vassals ty'd.

Prior.

2. Depending on no rule; capricious.

It may be perceived, with what insecurity we ascribe effects depending on the natural period of time, unto arbitrarius calculations, and such as vary at pleasure. Bowen, Vulg. Err.

3. Holden at will or pleasure.

Those inappropriated livings, which have now no settled endowment, and are therefore called not vicarages, but perpetual or sometimes arbitrarius curacies.

H. Wharton, Specimen of Baret's Err. p. 67.

4. Voluntary, or left to our choice.

Indifferent things are left arbitrarius to us.

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 277.

To A'RBITRATE.† v. a. [arbitror, Lat.]

1. To decide; to determine.

This might have been prevented, and made whole,

With very easy arguments of love,

Which now the manage of two kingdoms must

With fearful bloody issue arbitrate.

Shakespeare.

He doth use much to arbitrate quarrels.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Things must be compared to, and arbitrated by, her [wisdom's] standard, or else they will contain something of monstrous enormity. Barrow's Works, i. 6.

2. To judge of.

Yet where an equal poise of hope and fear

Does arbitrate th' event, my nature is

That I incline to hope, rather than fear.

Milton.

Covent.

Be a good soldier, or upright trustee,

An arbitrator from corruption free.

Dryden.

2. A governour; a president.

Though heaven be shut,

And heaven's high arbitrator sit secure

In his own strength, this place may be expos'd.

Milton.

3. He that has the power of prescribing to others without limit or controul.

Another Blenheim or Ramillies will make the confederates masters of their own terms, and arbitrators of a peace.

Addison on the State of the War.

4. The determiner; he that puts an end to any affair.

But now the arbitrator of despair,

Just death, kind umpire of man's miseries,

With sweet enlargement doth dismiss me hence.

Shakespeare.

The end crowns all;

And that old common arbitrator, time,

Will one day end it.

Shakespeare.

ARBITRATRIX.  n. s.* [Lat.] A female judge; an arbitress. This substantive has not escaped Dr. Ash's notice; but it is also found in the old lexicography of Sherwood.

ARBITREMENT. n. s. [from arbitror, Lat.]

1. Decision; determination.

I know the knight is incensed against you, even to a mortal arbitrement; but nothing of the circumstance more.

Shakspeare.

A R C

There is sprung up

An heretick, an arch one, Crammer.

Shakspeare.

2. Waggish; mirthful; triflingly mischievous. This signification it seems to have gained, by being frequently applied to the boy most remarkable for his pranks; as, the arch rogue; unless it be derived from Archy, the name of the jester to Charles I.

Eugenio set out from the university; he had the reputation of an arch lad at school.

Swift.

ARCH, † in composition, signifies chief, or of the first class. [from ἀρχή or ἐξουσία] as, archangel, archbishop. It is pronounced variously with regard to the ch, which before a consonant sounds as in cheese, as archdeacon; before a vowel like k, as archangel, Dr. Johnson says; but this is not a general rule; for arch-architect, and arch-enemy, require the first sound of ch.

ARCH'ANGEL. n. s. [archangelus, Lat.] One of the highest order of angels.

His form had yet not lost

All her original brightness, nor appear'd
Less than archangel ruin'd, and the excess
Of glory obscur'd.

Milton.

'Tis sure th' archangel's trump I hear,

Nature's great passing bell, the only call

Of God's that will be heard by all.

Norris.

ARCHED. part. adj. [from To arch.] Bent in the form of an arch.

I see how thine eye would emulate the diamond: thou hast the right arched bent of the brow.

Let the arched knife

Shakspeare.

Well sharpen'd, now assail the spreading shades

Of vegetables.

Philips.

ARCHER. n. s. [archer, Fr. from arcus, Lat. a bow.]

He that shoots with a bow; he that carries a bow in battle.

Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head. Shakspeare.

This Cupid is no longer an archer, his glory shall be ours, for we are the only love-gods. Shakspeare.

Thou frequent bring'st the smitten deer;

For seldom, archers say, thy arrows err.

Prior.

ARCHIERESS. n. s. [from archer.] She that shoots with a bow.

The swiftest and the keenest shaft that is,

In all my quiver —

I do select; to thee I recommend it,

O archieress eternal!

Parashar, Past. Ed. p. 143.

ARCHERY. n. s. [from archer.]

1. The use of the bow.

Among the English artillery, archery challengeth the pre-eminence, as peculiar to our nation. C Camden.

2. The act of shooting with the bow.

Flower of this purple dye,

Hit with Cupid's archery,

Sink in apple of his eye! Shakspeare, Mid. N. Night's Dr.

3. The art of an archer.

Blest seraphims shall leave their quire,

And turn love's soldiers upon thee,

To exercise their archery.

Crashaw, Steps to Temple.

Say from what golden quivers of the sky

Do all thy winged arrows fly?

Swiftness and power by birth are thine.

'Tis I believe this archery to show,

That so much cost in colours thou,

And skill in painting, dost bestow

Upon thy ancient arms the gaudy heavenly bow. Cowley.

ARCHES-COURT. n. s. [from arches and court.] The chief and most ancient consistory that belongs to the archbishop of Canterbury, for the debating of spiritual causes, so called from Bow-church in London, where it is kept, whose top is raised of stone pillars, built archwise. The judge of this court is termed the dean of the arches, or official of the arches-court: dean of the arches, because with this office is commonly joined a peculiar jurisdiction of thirteen parishes in London, termed a deanery, being exempted from the authority of the bishop of London, and belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury; of which the parish of Bow is one. Some others say, that he was first called dean of the arches, because the official to the archbishop, the dean of the arches, was his substitute in his court; and by that means the names became confounded. The jurisdiction of this judge is ordinary, and extends through the whole province of Canterbury: so that, upon any appeal, he forthwith, and without any further examination of the cause, sends out his citation to the party appealed, and his inhibition to the judge from whom the appeal is made.

Covent.

ARCHETYPE. n. s. [Fr. archetype, Lat. archetypum.] The original of which any resemblance is made.

Our souls, though they might have perceived images themselves by simple sense; yet it seems inconceivable, how they should apprehend their archetype.

Glanville, Scopsus.

As a man, a tree, are the outward objects of our perception, and the outward archetypes or patterns of our ideas; so our sensations of hunger, cold, are also inward archetypes or patterns of our ideas. But the notions or pictures of these things, as they are in the mind, are the ideas.

Watts, Logic.

ARCHETYPAL. adj. [archetypus, Lat.] Original; being a pattern from which copies are made.

Through contemplations opticks I have seen

Him who is fairer than the sons of men:

The source of good, the light archetypal.

Norris

Nothing in the world can be more beautiful and lovely than that which hath the most exact symmetry and conformity with that archetypal copy of divine loveliness and beauty.

Hallywell, Execl. of Mor. Vir. p. 112.

ARCHEUS. n. s. [probably from ἀρχεῖν.] A word by which Paracelsus seems to have meant a power that presides over the animal economy, distinct from the rational soul.

ARCHIATER.* n. s. [Fr. archiatre, from Gr. ἀρχι, the chief, and ἰατρος, a physician.] A chief physician.

I wanted not the advice and help of the archiater, the king's doctor; who, albeit he was doubtless a very skilful physician, yet did me little good, so malignant was my distemper.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 233.

ARCHICAL.* adj. [Gr. ἀρχικός.] Chief; primary.

When the brutish life leads us astray from the government of reason, and we cast away that ἀρχικὴν ἀρχήν, that principality and archical rule, wherewith God hath invested us, over all our corporeal passions and affections; then the order of the creation is inverted, and the beast governs the man.

Hallywell, Execl. of Mor. Vir. p. 48.

ARCHIDIA'CONAL.* adj. [from archidiaconus, Lat. an archdeacon.] Belonging to an archdeacon; as, this offence is liable to be censured in an archidiaconal visitation.

I can now hold my place canonically, which I held before but dispensatively, and withal, I can exercise an archidiaconal authority annexed thereto.

Wotton, Rem. p. 328.

ARCHIEPI'SCOPAL.* adj. [from archiepiscopus, Lat. an archbishop; formerly written arch-episcopal.] "The prior of Canterbury, in whom the arch-episcopal jurisdiction, during a vacancy, was invested." H. Wharton, Specimen of Burnet's Errors, p. 35.] Belonging to an archbishop; as, Canterbury is an archiepiscopal see; the suffragans are subject to archiepiscopal jurisdiction.

Matthew Parker, thus irrefragably settled in the archiepiscopal see, with three other bishops, in the same month of December, solemnly consecrated Edmund Grindall and Edwin Sands.

Ep. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Cler. i. 17.

ARCHIEPI'SCOPACY.* s. [Lat. archiepiscopatus.] The state and dignity of an archbishop.

I did not dream, at that time, of extirpation and abolition of any more than his [Laud's] archiepiscopacy.

Sir E. Dering's Speeches, p. 5.

ARCHITECT. n. s. [architectus, Lat.]

1. A professor of the art of building.

The architect's glory consists in the designment and idea of the work; his ambition should be to make the form triumph over the matter.

Wotton.

2. A contriver of a building; a builder.

The hasty multitude

Admiring entered, and the work some praise,
And some the architect, his hand was known
In heaven, by many a tow'rd structure high,
Where scepter'd angels held their residence,
And sat as princes.

Milton.

3. The contriver or former of any compound body.

This inconvenience the divine architect of the body obviated.

Ray on the Creation.

4. The contriver of any thing.

An irreligious Moor,

Chief architect and plotter of these woes.

Shakspeare.

ARCHITECTIVE. adj. [from architect.] That performs the work of architecture.

How could the bodies of many of them, particularly, the last mentioned, be furnished with architective materials?

Dr. Ham, Physico-Theology.

ARCHITECTO'NICAL.* n. s. [from ἀρχι, chief, and τεκνω, building or the builder.] That which forms or builds any thing.

Those inferior and ministerial arts, which are subjected unto others, as to their architectonicals.

Fotherby, Athecomastix, p. 186.

ARCHITECTO'NICAL.* adj. Having skill in architecture.

Geometrical and architectonical artists look narrowly upon the description of the ark, the fabrick of the temple, and the holy city in the Apocalypse.

Sir T. Brown's Misc. Tracts, p. 6.

ARCHITECTO'NICK. adj. [from ἀρχι, and τεκνω.]

That which has the power or skill of an architect; that which can build or form any thing.

To say that some more fine part of either, or all the hypothetical principle, is the architect of this elaborate structure, is to give occasion to demand, what proportion of the tria prima afforded this architectonick spirit, and what agent made so skilful and happy a mixture.

Boyle.

ARCHITECTOR.* n. s. [Low Lat. architector.] A builder. Obsolete.

Having first, like a skilful architector, made the frame, he now raises and sets it up.

Austin's Hec Homo, p. 55.

They think to overcome us with numbers too, laying claim to all merchants, pilots, seamen, architectours, masons, &c.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quix. iv. 11.

ARCHITECTRESS.* n. s. [from architect.] She who builds.

If Nature herself, the first architectress, had (to use an expression of Vitruvius) windowed your breast.

Wotton, Remains, p. 129.

ARCHITECTURE. n. s. [architectura, Lat.]

1. The art or science of building. Architecture is divided into civil architecture, called by way of eminence architecture; military architecture, or fortification; and naval architecture, which, besides building of ships and vessels, includes also ports, moles, docks, &c.

Chambers.

Our fathers next in architecture skill'd,

Cities for use, and forts for safety build:

Then palaces and lofty domes arose,

These for devotion, and for pleasure those.

Blackmore.

2. The effect or performance of the science of building.

The formation of the first earth being a piece of divine architecture, ascribed to a particular providence. Burnet, Theory.

A R C

ARCHITECTURAL.* adj. [from architecture.] Relating to architecture.

Plot's, though a neat engraving, and in the most finished manner of that excellent architectural sculptor Michael Burghers, is by no means a faithful and exact representation.

Warton's Hist. of Kiddington, p. 16.

ARCHITRAVE. n. s. [from ἀρχή, chief, and trabs, Lat. a beam; because it is supposed to represent the principal beam in timber buildings.] That part of a column, or order of a column, which lies immediately upon the capital, and is the lowest member of the entablature. This member is different in the different orders; and, in building architrave doors and windows, the workman frequently follows his own fancy. The architrave is sometimes called the reason piece, or master beam, in timber buildings, as porticos, cloisters, &c. In chimnies it is called the mantle piece; and over jambs of doors, and lintels of windows, hyperthyron.

Builder's Dict.

The materials laid over this pillar were of wood; through the lightness whereof the architrave could not suffer, nor the column itself, being so substantial. Wotton, Architecture.

Westward a pompous front-piece appear'd,
On Dorick pillars of white marble rear'd,
Crow'd with an architrave of antique mold,
And sculpture rising on the roughen'd gold. Pope.

ARCHIVES.† n. s. Without a singular, Dr. Johnson says, which is a great mistake; as my examples will shew; [archiva, Lat.] The place where records or ancient writings are kept. It is perhaps sometimes used for the writings themselves.

Though we think our words vanish with the breath that utters them, yet they become records in God's court, and are laid up in his archives, as witnesses either for or against us.

Goverment of the Tongue.

I shall now only look a little into the Mosaick archives, to observe what they furnish us with upon this subject. Woodward.

This I transcribed out of the Greek manuscript, which we have extant in the archive of our publick library.

Gregory's Posthumus, (1650) p. 249.

It may be found in the same archive, where the famous original compact between magistrate and people, so much insisted on, in the vindications of the rights of mankind, is repositied. Warburton's Alliance Ch. and St. (1st ed.) p. 90.

Boccaccio himself calls his master Leontius an inexhaustible archive of Grecian tales and fables.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 70.

ARCHLIKE.* adj. Built like an arch.

An archlike strong foundation. Young, Night Th. 7.

ARCHLY.* adv. [from the adj. arch.] Jocosely.

This he archly supposes. Thyer's Notes to Butler's Remains.

ARCHNESS.* n. s. [from the adj. arch.] Shrewdness; sly humour, without malice.

He [Fontaine] generally took his subjects from Boccaccio, Poggius, and Ariosto; but adorned them with so many natural strokes, with such quaintness in his reflections, and such a dryness and archness of humour, as cannot fail to excite laughter. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, ii. 68.

ARCHON.* n. s. [from ἀρχων.] The chief of the magistrates among the Athenians.

Plutarch relates, that himself was honoured with the freedom of Athens, made a member of the tribe Leontis, and afterwards bore the office of archon. Potter, Antiq. of Greece, i. 12.

We might establish a doge, a lord Archon, a Regent.

Bolinfroke on Parties, Lett. 8.

ARCHWISE. adv. [from arch and wise.] In the form of an arch.

The court of arches, so called ab arcuata ecclesia, or from Bow church, by reason of the steeple or clochier thereof, raised at the top with stone pillars in fashion of a bow bent archwise. Ayliffe, Parergon.

A R D

ARCI'TENENT. adj. [arcitenens, Lat.] Bow-bearing. Dict.

ARCTA'TION. n. s. [from arcto, to streighten.] Streightening; confinement to a narrower compass.

ARCTICK. n. s. [from Ἀρκτικός, the northern constellation.] Northern; lying under the Arctos, or bear. See ARTICK.

Ever during snows, perpetual shades
Of darkness, would congeal their livid blood,
Did not the arctick tract spontaneous yield
A cheering purple berry big with wine. Philips.

ARCTICK Circle. The circle at which the northern frigid zone begins.

ARCUATE. adj. [arcuatus, Lat.] Bent in the form of an arch.

The cause of the confusion in sounds, and the inconfusion of species visible, is, for that the sight worketh in right lines; but sounds that move in oblique and arcuate lines, must needs encounter and disturb the one the other. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

In the gullet, where it perforateth the midriff, the carneous fibres are inflected and arcuate. Ray on Creation.

ARCUATILE. adj. [from arcuate.] Bent; inflected. Dict.

ARCUA'TION. n. s. [from arcuate.]

1. The act of bending any thing; incurvation.
2. The state of being bent; curvity, or crookedness.
3. [In gardening.] The method of raising by layers such trees as cannot be raised from seed, or that bear no seed, as the elm, lime, alder, willow; and is so called from bending down to the ground the branches which spring from the offsets or stools after they are planted. Chambers.

ARCUATURE. n. s. [arcuatura, low Latin.] The bending or curvature of an arch. Dict.

ARCUBALIST.* n. s. [Lat. arcubalista.] A crossbow; an engine to shoot stones.

It is an historical fact, that Richard was killed by the French from the shot of an arcubalist, a machine which he often worked skilfully with his own hands.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. i. 158.

ARCUBALISTER.† n. s. [from arcubalista; not from arbalist, as Dr. Ash asserts.] A crossbow man.

King John was espied by a very good arcubalister, who said, that he would soon dispatch the cruel tyrant. God forbid, varlet, quoth the earl, that we should procure the death of the holy one of God. Camden, Remains.

ARD. [Saxon.] Signifies natural disposition; as, Goddard is a divine temper; Reliance, a sincere temper; Giffard, a bountiful and liberal disposition; Bernard, filial affection. Gibson's Camden.

ARDENCY.† n. s. [from ardent.]

1. Ardour; eagerness; warmth of affection.

Accepted our prayers shall be, if qualified with humility, and ardency, and perseverance, so far as concerns the end immediate to them. Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

The ineffable happiness of our dear Redeemer must needs bring an increase to ours, commensurate to the ardency of our love for him. Boyle.

2. Heat.

By how much heat any one receives externally from the ardency of the sun, his internal heat is proportionably abated.

Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 27.

ARDENT.† adj. [ardens, Lat. burning, old Fr. ardent.]

1. Hot; burning; fiery.

Chymists observe, that vegetables, as lavender, rue, marjoram, &c. distilled before fermentation, yield oils without any burning spirits; but, after fermentation, yield ardent spirits without oils; which shews, that their oil is, by fermentation, converted into spirit. Newton, Opticks.

A R E

2. Fierce; vehement; having the appearance or quality of fire.

A knight of swarthy face,
High on a coal-black steed pursued the chase;
With flashing flames his ardent eyes were filled. Dryden.

3. Passionate; affectionate: used generally of desire.

Another nymph with fatal power may rise,
To damp the sinking beams of Cælia's eyes;
With haughty pride may hear her charms confest,
And scorn the ardent vows that I have blest. Prior.

- A'RDENTLY. adv. [from ardent.] Eagerly; affectionately.

With true zeal may our hearts be most ardently inflamed to our religion. Spirit, Sermons.

- A'RDENTNESS. n. s. [from ardent; an old substantive in our language.] Ardency. Shrewsb.

- A'RDOUR.† n. s. [ardor, Lat. heat.]

1. Heat.

Joy, like a ray of the sun, reflects with a greater ardour and quickness, when it rebounds upon a man from the breast of his friend. South.

That grand universal fire, which shall happen at the day of judgement, may, by its violent ardour, vitrify and turn to one lump of crystal the whole body of the earth; Nor am I the first that fell upon this conceit. Howell's Letters, i. 1.

2. Heat of affection; as love, desire, courage.

The soldiers shout around with gen'rous rage;
He prais'd their ardour, duly pleas'd to see
His host. Dryden.

Unmov'd the mind of Ithacus remain'd,
And the vain ardours of our love restrain'd. Pope.

3. The person ardent or bright. This is used only by Milton, who adopts it from the Ital. ardore, in Dante's Paradise, c. xxii. 54.

Nor delay'd the winged saint,
After his charge receiv'd; but from among Thousand celestial ardours, where he stood
Veil'd with his gorgeous wings, up-springing light, Flew through the midst of heaven. Milton, P. L.

- ARDU'ITY. n. s. [from arduous.] Height; difficulty. Dict.

- A'RDUOUS. adj. [arduus, Lat.]

1. Lofly; hard to climb.

High on Parnassus' top her sons she show'd,
And pointed out those arduous paths they trod. Pope.

2. Difficult.

It was a means to bring him up in the school of arts and policy, and so to fit him for that great and arduous employment that God designed him to. South.

- A'RDUOUSNESS. n. s. [from arduous.] Height; difficulty.

- ARE. The third person plural of the present tense of the verb to be; as, young men are rash, old are cautious.

- A-RE, or Alamire. The lowest note but one in Guido's scale of musick.

Gamut I am, the ground of all accord,
A re to plead Hortensio's passion;
B mi Bianca take him for thy lord,
C faut, that loves with all affection. Shakspeare.

- AREA. n. s. [Latin.]

1. The surface contained between any lines or boundaries.

The area of a triangle is found by knowing the height and the base. Watts, Logick.

2. Any open surface, as the floor of a room; the open part of a church; the vacant part or stage of an amphitheatre. An inclosed place, as lists, or a bowling-green, or grass-plot.

Let us conceive a floor or area of goodly length, with the breadth somewhat more than half the longitude. Watts.

A R E

The Alban lake is of an oval figure, and, by reason of the high mountains that encompass it, looks like the area of some vast amphitheatre. Addison.

In areas vary'd with Mosaick art,
Some whirl the disk, and some the jav'lin dart. Pope.

- To ARE'AD, or ARE'ED.† v. a. [ajeban, Sax. to counsel, from the Teut. radad, counsel, raden, to advise.] To advise: to direct; to declare; to shew.

Knights and ladies gentle deeds,
Whose praises having slept in silence long,
Me, all too meane, the sacred muse areeds
To blazon broad. Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 1.

But what adventure, or what high intent,
Hath brought you hither into Fairy land,
Aread, Prince Arthur, crowne of martiall band.
Spenser, F. Q. i. ix. 6.

But mark what I aread thee now: avant,
Fly thither whence thou fled'st! If from this hour
Within these hallow'd limits thou appear,
Back to the infernal pit I drag thee chain'd. Milton, P. L.

Areed: good gentle swaine,
If in the dale below, or on yond plaine;
Or is the village situate in a grove? Bourne's Brit. Past. i. 2.

In the following passage, it seems employed for read.

I will o'erlook
Her hardly open'd book,
Which to aread is easie, to understand divine.
John Hall, Poems, p. 61.

- ARE'EK. adv. [A low expression, from a and reck.] In a recking condition.

A messenger comes all areek
Mordanto at Madrid to seek. Swift.

- AREFA'CTION. n. s. [arefacio, Lat. to dry.] The state of growing dry; the act of drying.

From them, and their motions, principally proceed arefaction, and most of the effects of nature. Bacon.

- To A'REFY. v. a. [arefacio, Lat. to dry.] To dry; to exhaust of moisture.

Heat drieth bodies that do easily expire, as parchment, leaves, roots, clay, &c., and so doth time or age arefy, as in the same bodies, &c. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

- AREN'AL. n. s. [Lat. The amphitheatre at Rome has been so called, because strewed with arena, sand, to drink up the blood of prize-fighters slain in it, and to render it steadfast footing for the next combatants.] The space for combatants; or other exhibitions, in a theatre.

Within [the remains of a theatre] is a very large arena, but the just measure of it could not be taken, by reason of the houses with which the Turks have almost filled it up.

Maunderell, Journey, p. 16.

- ARENA'CEOUS.† adj. [Lat. arenaceus.] Sandy; having the qualities of sand.

Fishes whose egg or spawn is arenaceous. Brown, Vulg. Err. iv. 10.

A piece of the stone of the same mines, of a yellowish brown colour, an arenaceous friable substance, and with some white spar mixed with it. Woodward on Fossils.

- ARENA'TION. n. s. [from arena, Lat. sand.] Is used by some physicians for a sort of dry bath, when the patient sits with his feet upon hot sand. Dict.

- ARENO'SE.† adj. [Fr. arenose, from arena, Lat.] Sandy; full of sand. Dict.

- ARE'NULOUS. adj. [from arenula, Lat. sand.] Full of small sand; gravelly.

- AREO'METER. n. s. [Fr. aréomètre, from Gr. ἀραιός and μέτρον.] An instrument to measure the density or gravity of any liquid.

- ARE'OPAGITE. n. s. [Gr. Ἀρειοπαγίτης. See AREOPAGUS.] A senator or judge in the court of Areopagus at Athens.

Howbeit certain men clave unto him, and believed; among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite. Acts, xvii. 34.

Some say that there was no appeal from the Areopagites to the people; but others are of a contrary opinion.

Potter's Antiq. of Greece, i. 19.

An Areopagite signified proverbially an excellent person.

Hammond on the Acts, xvii. 19.

AREOPAGUS. * n. s. [Gr. Ἀρειοπαγος or Ἀρειος πᾶγος, i. e. Mars' hill.] The highest court at Athens.

They took him [Paul] and brought him unto Areopagus, [written Mars' hill in the 12d verse,] saying, May we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest is? Acts, xvii. 19.

The senators of Areopagus were never rewarded with crowns for their services. Potter, Antiq. of Greece, i. 19.

AREOTICK. adj. [Gr. ἀρειοτικός.] Efficacious in opening the pores; attenuants; applied to medicines that dissolve viscidities, so that the morbidick matter may be carried off by sweat, or insensible perspiration. Dict.

ARETOLOGY. n. s. [from ἀρετή, virtue, and λόγος, to discourse.] That part of moral philosophy which treats of virtue, its nature, and the means of arriving at it. Dict.

ARGAL. † n. s. [old Fr. argalh. “argout, puits perdu,” Roquefort. Written also argaile and argol.] Hard lees sticking to the sides of wine vessels, more commonly called tartar. Dict.

I know you have arghick,

Vitriol, sal-tartre, argule, alkaly.

B. Jonson, Alchemist.

The brightest colours, dyed with this material, are made by over-dying the same; and then by discharging part of it by back-hoyling it in argol.

Sir W. Petty, in Sprat's Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 298.

ARGENT. adj. [from argentum, Lat. silver.]

1. The white colour used in the coats of gentlemen, knights, and baronets, supposed to be the representation of that metal.

Rinaldo flings

As swift as fiery lightning kindled new,

His argent eagle with her silver wings

In field of azure, fair Erminia knew.

Fairfax.

In an argent field, the god of war

Was drawn triumphant on his iron car.

Dryden.

2. Silver; bright like silver.

Those argent fields more likely habitants,

Translated suns, or middle spirits hold,

Between th' angelical and human kind.

Milton.

Or ask of yonder argent fields above,

Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove.

Pope.

ARGENT-HORNED. * adj. [from argent and horned.]

Silver-horned.

Bright as the argent-horned rooone. Locke, Luc, p. 151.

ARGENTATION. n. s. [from argentum, Lat. silver.]

An overlaying with silver.

Dict.

ARGENTINE. † adj. [argentum, Fr.] Sounding like silver; appearing like silver; as the moon is often said by the poets to appear.

Celestial Dian, goddess argentine, I will obey thee.

Shakspeare's Pericles, v. 2.

ARGENTRY. * n. s. [from argent.] Materials of silver; plate. Not now in use.

Having preserved Count Mansfeld's troops from disbanding, by pawning his own argentry and jewels, he passed this way.

Howell's Letters, i. 2.

No medals, or rich stuff of Tyrian dye,

No costly howls of frosted argentry.

Howell's Poem to K. Charles I.

ARGILL. † n. s. [Fr. argile, Lat. argilla, Gr. ἀργιλλός.] Potter's clay; a fat soft kind of earth of which vessels are made.

Potter's clay is not pure argill. Kirwan's Manures, p. 61.

Argill is that part of clay, to which this owes its property of feeling soft and unctuous, and of hardening in fire; it is difficultly soluble in acids, and scarce ever effervesces with them. When combined with the vitriolick acid, it forms alum.

Kirwan's Manures, p. 6.

ARGILLA'CEOUS. † adj. [from argil.] Clayey; partaking of the nature of argil; consisting of argil, or potter's clay.

Clayey loam denotes a compound soil, moderately cohesive, in which the argillaceous ingredient predominates.

Kirwan's Manures, p. 9.

ARGILL'OUS. adj. [from argil.] Consisting of clay; clayish; containing clay.

Albuquerque derive this redness from the sand and argillous earth at the bottom. Brady, Vulg. Err.

ARGOSY. † n. s. [derived by Pope from Argo, the name of Jason's ship; supposed by others to be a vessel of Ragusa or Ragosa, a Ragazine, corrupted. It must not be omitted, that the Fr. argosin, and the Ital. argosino, mean the lieutenant of a galley.] A large vessel for merchandise; a carrack.

Your mind is tossing on the ocean;

There where your argosies with portly sail,

Like signiors and rich burghers on the flood,

Do overpeer the petty traffickers.

Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice.

They might perhaps find stuff enough, I will not say to lade an argosy, but to overlede any man's wit in the world to reply unto.

Sir E. Scawley, State of Religion

Mine argosies from Alexandria,

Loaden with spice and silks, now under sail,

Are smoothly gliding down by Candy shore

To Malta, through our Mediterranean sea.

Marlowe's Jew of Malta.

TO ARGUE. † v. n. [arguo, Lat., arguer, Fr.]

1. To reason; to offer reasons.

I know your majesty has always lov'd her

So dear in heart, not to deny her what

A woman of less place might ask by law;

Scholars allow'd freely to argue for her.

Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

Publick arguing oft serves not only to exasperate the minds, but to whet the wits of heretics.

Decay of Piety.

An idea of motion, not passing on, would perplex any one, who should argue from such an idea.

Locke.

2. To dispute; with the parties with or against before the opponent, and against before the thing opposed.

Why do christians, of several persuasions, so fiercely argue against the salvability of each other?

Decay of Piety.

He that by often arguing against his own sense, imposes falsehoods on others, is not far from believing himself.

Locke.

I do not see how they can argue with any one, without setting down strict boundaries.

Locke.

TO ARGUE. † v. a.

1. To prove any thing by argument.

If the world's age and death be argued well,

By the sun's fall, which now towards earth doth bend,

Then we might fear that virtue, since she fell

So low as woman, should be near her end.

Donne.

2. To persuade by argument. This definition and example Johnson has erroneously given to the verb neuter.

It is a sort of poetical logick which I would make use of, to argue you into a protection of this play.

Congreve, Ded. to Old Bachelor.

3. To debate any question; as, to argue a cause.

4. To prove, as an argument.

So many laws argue so many sins

Among them; how can God with such reside?

Milton.

It argues distemper of the mind as well as of the body, when a man is continually tossing from one side to the other.

South.

This argues a virtue and disposition in those sides of the rays, which answers to that virtue and disposition of the crystal.
Newton, Opticks.

5. To charge with, as a crime; with of.

I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine, which can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them.
Dryden, Fables.

The accidents are not the same, which would have argued him of a servile copying, and total barrenness of invention; yet the seas were the same.
Dryden, Fables.

6. To prove by appearance.

What's he that thus boldly enters in?
His habit argues him a christian.

Tr. of Solomon and Perseda.

ARGUER.† n. s. [Fr. arguer.] A reasoner; a disputant; a controvertist.

Men are ashamed to be proteclites to a weak arguer, as thinking they must part with their reputation as well as their sin.

Decay of Piety.

Neither good christians nor good arguers.

Atterbury.

ARGUING.* n. s. [from argue.] Argument; reasoning.

Those heart-risings and internal arguings against the reception of those joyful tidings.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 22.

He had, to his sufficient memory and incomparable invention, a clear discerning judgement; and that, not only in scholastical affairs and points of learning which the arguings, and besides them the designment of his writings, manifest beyond dispute, but in the concerns of publick nature both of church and state.

Fell, Life of Hammond, sect. i.

ARGUMENT. n. s. [argumentum, Lat.]

1. A reason alleged for or against any thing.

We sometimes see, on our theatres, vice rewarded, at least unpunished; yet it ought not to be an argument against the art.

Dryden.

When any thing is proved by as good arguments as that thing is capable of, supposing it were; we ought not in reason to make any doubt of the existence of that thing.

Tillotson.

Our author's two great and only arguments to prove, that heirs are lords over their brethren.

Locke.

2. The subject of any discourse or writing.

That she who ev'n but now was your best object,

Your praise's argument, balm of your age,

Dearest and best.

Shakspeare, King Lear.

To the height of this great argument

I may assert eternal providence,

And justify the ways of God to man.

Milton.

Sad task! yet argument

Not less, but more heroick than the wrath

Of stoic Achilles.

Milton.

A much longer discourse my argument requires; your merciful dispositions a much shorter.

Sprat, Sermons.

3. The contents of any work summed up by way of abstract.

The argument of the work, that is, its principal action, the æconomy and disposition of it, are the things which distinguish copies from originals.

Dryden.

4. A controversy.

This day, in argument upon a case,

Some words there grew 'twixt Somerset and me.

Shakspeare.

An argument that fell out last night, where each of us fell in praise of our country mistresses.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

If the idea be not agreed on betwixt the speaker and hearer, the argument is not about things, but names.

Locke.

5. It has sometimes the particle to before the thing to be proved, but generally for.

The best moral argument to patience, in my opinion, is the advantage of patience itself.

Tillotson.

This, before that revelation had enlightened the world, was the very best argument for a future state.

Atterbury.

6. [In astronomy.] An arch by which we seek another unknown arch, proportional to the first.

Chambers.

To ARGUMENT. v. n. [from the noun.] An old English verb used for to reason; to discourse. Obsolete.

But yet they argumenion faste

Upon the pope and his estate.

Gower, Conf. Am. Prolog.

ARGUMENTAL. adj. [from argument.] Belonging to argument; reasoning.

Afflicted sense thou kindly dost set free;

Oppress'd with argumental tyranny,

And routed reason finds a safe retreat in thee.

Pope.

ARGUMENTATION. n. s. [from argument.] Reasoning; the act of reasoning.

Argumentation is that operation of the mind, whereby we infer one proposition from two or more propositions premised. Or it is the drawing a conclusion, which before was unknown, or doubtful, from some propositions more known and evident; so when we have judged that matter cannot think, and that the mind of man doth think, we conclude, that therefore the mind of man is not matter.

Watts, Logick.

I suppose it is no ill topick of argumentation, to shew the prevalence of contempt, by the contrary influences of respect.

South.

His thoughts must be masculine, full of argumentation, and that sufficiently warm.

Dryden.

The whole course of his argumentation comes to nothing.

Addison.

ARGUMENTATIVE. adj. [from argument.]

1. Consisting of argument; containing argument.

This omission, considering the bounds within which the argumentative part of my discourse was confined, I could not avoid.

Atterbury, Pref. to his Sermons.

2. Sometimes with of, but rarely.

Another thing argumentative of providence is that pappous plumage growing upon the tops of some seeds, whereby they are wafted with the wind and disseminated far and wide.

Ray.

3. Applied to persons, disputatious; disposed to controversy.

ARGUMENTATIVELY.* adv. In an argumentative manner.

Nor do they oppose things of this nature argumentatively, so much as oratoriously.

Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 115.

Chamier has in reality exhausted the question, both historically and argumentatively, in his disputes against the Romanists.

Waterland, Ch. p. 69.

To ARGUMENTIZE. v. n. [from argument.] To debate; to reason.

Must it needs follow that all the unmixed and argumentizing philosophy, all arts and sciences, must be brought from Canaan?

Mannyngham, Discourses, p. 34.

ARGUTÉ.† adj. [arguto, Ital. argutus, Lat. argut, old Fr. "un sçavant, un habile homme," Lacombe.]

1. Subtle; witty; sharp.

2. Shrill.

ARGUTENESS.* n. s. [from argute.] Wittiness; acuteness.

The arguments of the Grecian, [Plutarch,] drawn from reason, work themselves into your understanding, and make a deep and lasting impression in your mind; those of the Roman, [Seneca,] drawn from wit, flash immediately on your imagination, but leave no durable effect: so this tickles you by starts with his arguteness, that pleases you for continuance with his propriety.

Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

ARIA. n. s. [Ital. in musick.] An air, song, or tune.

ARIAN.* n. s. One of the sect of Arius, who denies "that Christ is the Eternal God."

The Arians, and the Eunomians, admitting that Christ took on him a real human body, yet denied that he took on him an human soul.

South, Sermon. viii. 279.

A R I

A'RIAN.* adj. Belonging to Arianism.

Will they say it [the Church] was not reformed, when the Arian heresy was suppressed?

Trapp, Popery truly stated, part. i.

A'RIANISM.* n. s. The heresy or sect of Arius.

The alcoran is but a system of the old arianism, ill digested and worse put together, with a mixture of some Heathenism and Judaism. For Mahomet's father was an heathen, his mother a Jewess, and his tutor was Sergius the monk, a Nestorian; which sect was a branch of arianism. These, crudely mixed, made up the farrago of the alcoran. But the prevailing part was arianism. Leslie, Truth of Christianity, p. 129.

What will the Romanists say of the whole Church in a manner, both eastern and western, when it was overspread with arianism? Trapp, Popery truly stated, part. i.

To A'RIANIZE.* v. n. [from Arian.] To admit or follow the tenets of Arianism.

These some were the Christians, that lived after the downfall of the arianizing Vandals and the expiring of their power.

Worthington, Miscellanies, p. 89.

A'RID.† adj. [aridus, Lat. dry, Fr. aride.]

1. Dry; parched up.

My complexion is become adust, and my body arid, by visiting lands. Arbutnot and Pope.

His harden'd fingers deck the gaudy spring,
Without him Summer were an arid waste. Thomson.

2. Metaphorically, dry: cold; pedantick.

ARI'DITY. n. s. [from arid.]

1. Dryness; siccidity.

Salt taken in great quantities will reduce an animal body to the great extremity of aridity, or dryness.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. In the theological sense, a kind of insensibility in devotion, contrary to unction or tenderness.

Strike my soul with lively apprehensions of thy excellencies, to bear up my spirit under the greatest aridities and dejections, with the delightful prospect of thy glories. Norris.

ARIES. n. s. [Lat.] The Ram; one of the twelve signs of the zodiac: the first vernal sign.

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright Bull receives him. Thomson.

To ARI'ETATE. v. n. [arieto, Lat.]

1. To butt like a ram.

2. To strike in imitation of the blows which rams give with their heads.

ARIETA'TION. n. s. [from arietate.]

1. The act of butting like a ram.

2. The act of battering with an engine called a ram.
The strength of the percussion, wherein ordnance do exceed all arietations and ancient inventions. Bacon.

3. The act of striking, or conflicting in general.

Now those heterogeneous atoms, by themselves, hit so exactly into their proper residence, in the midst of such tumultuary motions, and arietations of other particles. Glennville.

ARIE'TTA. n. s. [Ital. in musick.] A short air, song, or tune.

ARI'GHT.† adv. [Sax. apelit, apelit, upright.]

1. Rightly; without mental error.

How him I lov'd, and love with all my might;
So thought I eke of him, and think I thought aright. Spenser,
These were thy thoughts, and thou could'st judge aright. Dryden.
Till interest made a jaundice in thy sight.

The motions of the tongue are so easy, and so subtle, that you can hardly conceive or distinguish them aright. Holder.

2. Rightly; without crime.

A generation that set not their hearts aright. Psalm.

3. Rightly; without failing of the end designed.

The doing of courtesies aright, is the mixing of the respects for his own sake and for mine. D. Jenson, Discourses.
Guardian of groves, and goddess of the night,
Fair queen, he said, direct my dart aright. Dryden.

ARIOLA'TION, or HARIOLA'TION. n. s. [hariolus, Lat. a soothsayer.] Soothsaying; vaticination.

A R I

The priests of elder time deluded their apprehensions with ariolation, soothsaying, and such oblique idolatries. Brown.

ARIO'SO. n. s. [Ital. in musick.] The movement of a common air, song, or tune. Dict.

To ARI'SE.† v. n. pret. arose, particip. arisen. [Sax. apujan, apaj.]

1. To mount upward as the sun.

He rose, and, looking up, beheld the skies
With purple blushing, and the day arise. Dryden.

2. To get up as from sleep, or from rest.

So Esdras arose up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed the law.

How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard; when wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? Pron. vi. 9.

3. To come into view, as from obscurity.

There shall arise false Christs and false prophets. Matt. xxiv.

4. To revive from death.

Thy dead men shall live, together with my body shall they arise: awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust. Isaiah, xxvi. 19.

5. To proceed, or have its original.

They which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice.

I know not what mischief may arise hereafter from the example of such an innovation. Acts, xi. 19.

6. To enter upon a new station, to succeed to power or office.

Another Mary then arose,
As I did rigorous laws impose. Cowley.

7. To commence hostility.

And when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him. 1 Sam. xvii. 35.

For the various senses of this word see Rise.

ARISTARCHY.* n. s. [from ἀριστος, greatest, and ἀρχη, government.] A body of good men in power.

The ground on which I would build his chief praise, to some of the aristarchy and sour censures of these days, requires first an apology. Harington, Brief View of the Ch. of Eng. p. 153.

ARISTOCRACY. n. s. [ἀριστος, greatest, and αρχη, to govern.] That form of government which places the supreme power in the nobles, without a king, and exclusively of the people.

The aristocracy of Venice hath admitted so many abuses through the degeneracy of the nobles, that the period of its duration seems to approach. Swift.

ARISTOCRAT.* n. s. [Fr. from the Greek, as in ARISTOCRACY.] A word of modern use, imported into this country in the early part of the French democratical revolution.]

What his friends call aristocrats and despots. Bml.

ARISTOCRATICAL. adj. [from aristocracy.] Relating to aristocracy; including a form of government by the nobles.

Ockham distinguishes, that the papacy, or ecclesiastical monarchy, may be changed in an extraordinary manner, for some time, into an aristocratical form of government. Asylife.

ARISTOCRATICALLY.* adv. [This is an old English adverb, in the dictionary of Sherwood.] In an aristocratical manner.

ARISTOCRATICALNESS. n. s. [from aristocratical.] An aristocratical state. Dict.

ARISTOCRA'TICK.* adj. [Fr. aristocratique.] Aristocratical.

Though with the temper'd monarchy here mix'd
Aristocrack sway, the people still,
Flatter'd by this or that, as interest lean'd,
No full perfection knew. Thomson, Liberty, P. IV.

Subdivisions in government are only admissible in favour of the dignity of inferior princes and high nobility; or for the support of an aristocrack confederacy under some head; or for the conversion of the franchises of the people in some privileged province.

Burke's Works, iii. 264.

ARISTOCRACY. * n. s. [The same as ARISTOCRACY, Fr. aristocratie. This seems the more precise orthography.]

Their pure forms of commonwealths, monarchies, aristocracies, democratic are most famous in contemplation: but in practice they are temperate, and usually mixt.

Burton, Anal. of Mel. p. 37.

This art — has sometimes made use of a monarchy, sometimes of an aristocracy, sometimes of a democracy.

Wren, Monarchy Asserted, p. 179.

ARISTOTELIAN. * adj. [from the philosopher Aristotle.] Founded on the opinion of Aristotle.

The historian has here the very same advantages over the moral philosopher, that the experimental naturalist has over the Aristotelian in physicks. Warburton on Prodiges, part. 2.

This is just the Aristotelian hypothesis of sensible species, which modern philosophers have been at great pains to refute.

Reid's Inquiry.

ARISTOTELIAN. * n. s. A follower of the philosophy of Aristotle.

The Aristotelians were of opinion, that superfluity of riches might cause a tumult in a commonwealth.

See Miles Suidas, Essays, p. 210.

Some of Plato's followers, in particular, when they talk of the world of ideas, entertain us with substances and beings no less extravagant and chimerical. Many Aristotelians have likewise spoken as unintelligibly of their substantial forms.

Addison, Spect. No. 56.

ARISTOTELIAN. * adj. Relating to the philosophy of Aristotle.

The Aristotelian or Arabian philosophy continued to be communicated from Spain and Africa to the rest of Europe chiefly by means of the Jews.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. i. 443.

ARITHMANCY. n. s. [from ἀριθμός, number, and μαντεία, divination.] A foretelling future events by numbers.

Diet.

ARITHMETICAL. adj. [from arithmetick.] According to the rules or method of arithmetick.

The principles of bodies may be infinitely small, not only beyond all naked or assisted sense, but beyond all arithmetical operation or conception.

Grew.

The squares of the diameters of the rings, made by any prismatic colour, were in arithmetical progression, as in the fifth observation.

Newton.

ARITHMETICALLY. adv. [from arithmetical.] In an arithmetical manner; according to the principles of arithmetick.

Though the fifth part of a sexages being a simple fraction, and arithmetically regular, it is yet no proper part of that measure.

Arithmetical in Coins.

ARITHMETICIAN. n. s. [from arithmetick.] A master of the art of numbers.

A man had need be a good arithmetician, to understand this author's works. His description runs on like a multiplication table.

Addison.

ARITHMETICK. n. s. [ἀριθμός, number, and μετρώω, to measure.] The science of numbers; the art of computation.

On fair ground I could beat forty of them;

But now 'tis odds beyond arithmetick. Shakespeare, Coriolanus.

The christian religion, according to the Apostle's arithmetick, hath but these three parts of it; sobriety, justice, religion.

Bp. Taylor.

ARK. † n. s. [Lat. arca, Goth. arka, Sax. arc, Basq. arca, Welsh and Bas. Bret. arch, old Fr. arche.]

1. A vessel to swim upon the water, usually applied to that in which Noah was preserved from the universal deluge; but not wholly.

Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shall pitch it within and without with pitch.

Genesis, vi. 14.

A R M

The one just man alive, by his command,
Shall build a wondrous ark, as thou beheld'st,
To save himself and household, from amidst
A world devote to universal wreck.

Milton.

And when she could not longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein.

Ezod. ii. 3.

2. The repository of the covenant of God with the Jews.

This coffer was of shittim wood, covered with plates of leaves of gold, being two cubits and a half in length, a cubit and a half wide, and a cubit and a half high. It had two rings of gold on each side, through which the staves were put for carrying it. Upon the top of it was a kind of gold crown all around it, and two cherubims were fastened to the cover. It contained the two tables of stone, written by the hand of God.

Calmet.

3. A chest, coffer, or binn; so used in most of the languages cited in the etymology; and still common, in this sense, in our northern counties.

The oak, the margarite or pearl; the other, the cabinet or ark to keep this jewel.

Bp. King, Fine Palatine, p. 6.

Bearing that precious relike in an ark
Of gold.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. v. 17.

ARM. † n. s. [Goth. arms, Celt. arm, Sax. apum, capum, Germ. arm, Lat. armus.]

1. The limb which reaches from the hand to the shoulder.

If I have lift up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate, then let mine arm fall from my shoulderblade, and mine arm be broken from the bone.

Job.

Like helpless friends, who view from shore
The labouring ship, and hear the tempest roar,
So stood they with their arms across.

Dryden.

2. The bow of a tree.

The trees spread out their arms to shade her face,
But she on elbow lean'd.

Sidney.

Where the tall oak his spreading arms entwines,
And with the beech a mutual shade combines.

Guy.

3. An inlet of water from the sea.

Full in the centre of the sacred wood,
An arm ariseth of the Stygian flood.

Dryden, Ru.

We have yet seen but an arm of this sea of beauty.

Norris.

4. Power; might. In this sense is used the secular arm, &c.

Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. Jer. xvii. 5.

O God, thy arm was here!

And not to us, but to thy arm alone,

Ascribe we all.

Shakespeare, Hen. F.

ARM'S END. n. s. A phrase taken from boxing, in which the weaker man may overcome the stronger, if he can keep him from closing.

Such a one as can keep him at arm's end, need never wish for a better companion.

Sully's Arcadia.

For my sake be comfortable, hold death awhile at the arm's end.

Shakespeare.

In the same sense is used man's length.

ARM'S REACH. * n. s. [Sax. capum-gepece, Cardmon.] Within the stretch or reach of the arm.

To ARM. v. a. [armo, Lat.]

1. To furnish with armour of defence, or weapons of offence.

And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan.

Genesis.

True conscious honour is to feel no sin;

He's arm'd without, that's innocent within.

Pope.

2. To plate with anything that may add strength.

• Their wounded steeds

Yerk out their armed heels at their dead masters. Shakespeare.

3. To furnish; to fit up: as, to arm a loadstone, is to case it with iron.

A R M

You must arm your hook with the line in the inside of it.

Walton's Angler.

Having wasted the callus, I left off those tents, and dressed it with others armed with digestives.

Wiseman's Surgery.

4. To provide against.

His servant, arm'd against such coverture,

Reported unto all, that he was sure

A noble gentleman of high regard.

Spenser.

To Arm. v. n. To take arms; to be fitted with arms.

Think we king Harry strong;

And, princes, look you strongly arm to meet him.

Shakspeare.

ARMADA. n. s. [Span. a fleet of war, from the Lat. armata, supplying classis, the fleet.] An armament for sea; a fleet of war. It is often erroneously spelt armado. B. Jonson writes it correctly.

In all the mid-earth seas was left no road

Wherein the pagan his bold head untwines,

Spread was the huge armado wide and broad,

From Venice, Genes, and towns which them confines.

Fairfax.

So by a roaring tempest on the flood,

A whole armado of convicted sail

Is scatter'd and disjoin'd from fellowship.

Shakspeare.

I could report more actions yet of weight

Out of this orb, as here of eighty-eight,

Against the proud Armada, still'd by Spain

The Invincible, that cover'd all the main.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

At length resolv'd to assert the watery ball,

He in himself did whole armados bring:

Him aged seamen might their master call,

And chose for general, were he not their king.

Dryden.

ARMADILLO. n. s. [Spanish.] A four-footed animal of Brasil, as big as a cat, with a snout like a hog, a tail like a lizard, and feet like a hedge-hog. He is armed all over with hard scales like armour, whence he takes his name, and retires under them like the tortoise. He lives in holes, or in the water, being of the amphibious kind. His scales are of a bony or cartilaginous substance; but they are easily pierced. This animal hides himself a third part of the year under ground. He feeds upon roots, sugar-canes, fruits, and poultry. When he is caught, he draws up his feet and head to his belly, and rolls himself up in a ball, which the strongest hand cannot open; and he must be brought near the fire before he will shew his nose. His flesh is white, fat, tender, and more delicate than that of a sucking pig.

Trevoux.

ARMAMENT. n. s. [armamentum, Lat.] A force equipped for war, military or naval.

So small were her armaments, and her councils thus divided.

Bryant's Troy.

He possessed neither such courage, nor such vigour and activity of mind, as to undertake in person the conduct of the armament.

Robertson.

Dict.

ARMAN. n. s. A confection for restoring appetite in horses.

Dict.

ARMATURE. n. s. [armatura, Lat.]

1. Armour; something to defend the body from hurt.

Others should be armed with hard shells; others with prickles; the rest that have no such armature, should be endued with great swiftness and perniciousity.

Ray on the Creation.

A R M

2. Offensive weapons; less properly.

The double armature is a more destructive engine than the tumultuary weapon.

Decay of Pity.

ARMED. adj. [In heraldry.] Is used in respect of beasts and birds of prey, when their teeth, horns, feet, beak, talons, or tusks, are of a different colour from the rest; as, he bears a cock or a falcon armed, or.

Chambers.

ARMED Chair. n. s. [from armed and chair, Dr. Johnson says; but it is usually called, I believe, an arm-chair. So we say, an elbow-chair.] An elbow-chair, or a chair with rests for the arms.

ARMENIAN Bolt. n. s. A fatty medicinal kind of earth, of a pale reddish colour, which takes its name from the country of Armenia.

ARMENIAN Stone. n. s. A mineral stone or earth of a blue colour, spotted with green, black, and yellow; anciently brought only from Armenia, but now found in Germany, and the Tyrol. It bears a near resemblance to lapis lazuli, from which it seems only to differ in degree of maturity; it being softer, and speckled with green instead of gold.

Chambers.

ARMENTAL. adj. [armentalis, or armentinus, Lat.]

ARMENTINE. adj. Belonging to a drove or herd of cattle.

Dict.

ARMENTOSE. adj. [armentosus, Lat.] Abounding with cattle.

Dict.

ARMFUL.* n. s. [from arm and full.] The Danes have also arm-fuld. This is an old English substantive, which neither Dr. Johnson, nor subsequent lexicographers, have thought worthy of notice.] What the arm can hold.

'Tis not the wealth of Plutus, nor the gold

Lockt in the heart of earth, can buy away

This armful from me; this had been a ransom

To have redeem'd the great Augustus Cesar,

Had he been taken.

Beaumont and Fl. Philaster, iv. i.

He comes so lazily on in a simile, with his "armful of weeds," and demeans himself in the dull expression so like a dough-kneaded thing.

Milton, Apol. for Smeectynnuus.

Let that happy soul hold fast

Her heavenly armful.

Crashaw's Poems, p. 59.

ARMGAUNT. adj. [from arm and gaunt.] Slender as the arm.

So he nodded,

And soberly did mount an armgaunt steed.

Shakspeare.

ARMHOLE. n. s. [from arm and hole.] The cavity under the shoulder.

Tickling is most in the soles of the feet, and under the arm-holes, and on the sides. The cause is the thinness of the skin in those parts, joined with the rareness of being touched there.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

ARMIGEROUS. adj. [from armiger, Lat. an armory-bearer.] Bearing arms.

ARMILLARY. adj. [from armilla, Lat. a bracelet. Resembling a bracelet.

When the circles of the mundane sphere are supposed to be described on the convex surface of a sphere, which is hollow within, and, after this, you imagine all parts of the sphere's surface to be cut away, except those parts on which such circles are described; then that sphere is called an armillary sphere, because it appears in the form of several circular rings, or bracelets, put together in a due position.

Harris's Description of the Globes.

ARMILLATED. adj. [armillatus, Lat.] Having bracelets.

Dict.

A R M

A'RMINGS. n. s. [in a ship.] The same with waste clothes, being clothes hung about the outside of the ship's upper works fore and aft, and before the cubbrige heads. Some are also hung round the tops, called top armings. Chambers.

ARMINIAN.* n. s. He who supports the tenets of Arminius.

The Arminian may be tempted to trust too much to himself, and too little to God. Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.

I am not, nor would be, accounted willingly Arminian, Calvinist, or Lutheran, (names of division,) but a Christian. For my faith was never taught by the doctrine of men.

Mountagu's Appeal to Cæsar, p. 10.

ARMINIAN* adj. Relating to the sect or doctrine of Arminius.

He that has looked into controversy, and especially those two, which are now the most considerable, the Arminian, and the Soemian. South, Sermons, ix. 315.

ARMINIANISM.* n. s. The tenets of Arminius.

For Arminianism, I must and do protest before God and his angels, the time is yet to come that I ever read [a] word in Arminius. Mountagu's Appeal to Cæsar, p. 11.

Laud, Neil, Montagu, and other bishops were all supposed to be tainted with Arminianism. Hume, Hist. of England.

He [Bishop Hall] soon became eminent in the theology of those times, preached against predestination before prince Henry with unrivalled applause, and discussed the doctrines of Arminianism in voluminous dissertations.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. iv. 2.

ARMIPOTENCE. n. s. [from arma, arms, and potentia, power, Latin.] Power in war.

ARMIPOTENT. adj. [armipotens, Lat.] Powerful in arms; mighty in war.

The manifold linguist, and the armipotent soldier.

Shakspeare.

For if our God the Lord armipotent,
Those armed angels in our aid down send,
That were at Dathan to his prophet sent,
Thou wilt come down with them.

Fairfax.

Beneath the low'ring brow, and on a bent,
The temple stood of Mars armipotent.

Dryden.

ARMISONOUS. adj. [armisonus, Lat.] Rustling with armour.

ARMISTICE.† n. s. [armistitium, Lat.] A short truce; a cessation of arms for a short time.

Many reasons of prudence might incline the king of England to think this armistice more desirable than a continuance of the war.

Lyttelton.

ARMLESS.* adj. [from arm and less.]

1. Without ap-arm.

On a wall this king his eye cast,
And saw an hand armless, that wrote full fast.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale.

2. Without weapons or arms.

Truth laughs at death,
And terrifies the killer more than kill'd:
Integrity thus armless seeks her foes,
And never needs the target, nor the sword,
Bow, nor envenom'd shafts.

Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth, iv. 3.

Next, we leave thy sword,
And give thee armless to thy enemies.

Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta, v. 2.

They of the religion, are now townless and armless.

Howell, Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 116.

A'RMORER.† n. s. [armurier, Fr.] It is usually written armourer.

1. He that makes armour, or weapons.

Now thrive the armourers, and honour's thought
Reigns solely in the breast of every man.

Shakspeare.

The armourers make their steel more tough and pliant, by aspersion of water and juice of herbs.

Bacon.

The whole division that to Mars pertains,
All trades of death that deal in steel for gains
Were there: The butcher, armorer, and smith,
Who forges sharpen'd fauchions, or the scythe.

Dryden.

When arm'ers temper in the ford
The keen-edg'd pole-ax, or the shining sword,
The red-hot metal hisses in the lake.

Pope.

2. He that dresses another in armour.

The armourers accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation.

Shakspeare.

The morning he was to join battle with Harold, his armorer put on his backpiece before, and his breastplate behind.

Camden.

ARMO'RIAL.† adj. [armorial, Fr.]

1. Belonging to the arms or escutcheon of a family, as ensigns armorial.

These five cinquefs, or these 25 round spots, which in arms do signify numbers, as some writers have observed, have not been only imprinted upon their altars, but being (as it is probable) from thence derived, have been accounted a symbolical device and made armorial.

Potter on the Numb. 666. p. 176.

It is not even from domesday-book, pedigrees in the heralds' offices armorial bearings, &c. that this controversy is to be finally and effectually adjusted.

Warton, Eng. Rom. p. 124.

2. Simply, belonging to armour.

Cotgrave.

ARMO'RICAN.* adj. Relating to Armorica or Basse Bretagne, now Britany.

Mr. Lhwyd says he has thoughts to pass from Cornwall into Bretagne in France, in order to pick up the remains of the Armorican dialect.

Letters, (Bp. Nicolson to Charlett,) i. 115.

An ingenious French antiquary supposes, that the communications of the Armoricans with the Cornish had chiefly contributed to give a roughness or rather hardness to the romance or French language in some of the provinces, towards the eleventh century, which was not before discernible.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. i. Diss. 1.

ARMO'RIK.* adj. Armorican,

What resounds

In fable or romance of Uther's son,
Begirt with British and Armorick knights. Milton, P. L. i. 581.
The Armorick language now spoken in Britany, is a dialect of the Welsh; and so strong a resemblance still subsists between the two languages, that, in our late conquest of Belleisle, such of our soldiers as were natives of Wales were understood by the peasantry. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. i. Diss. 1.

A'RMORIST. n. s. [from armour.] A person skilled in heraldry.

Dict.

A'RMORY.† n. s. [old Fr. armoirie, Span. armeria, L. Lat. armarium.] Usually written armoury.

1. The place in which arms are repositied for use.

The sword

Of Michael, from the armoury of God,
Was giv'n him temper'd so, that neither keep,
Nor solid, might resist that edge.

Milton, P. L.

With plain heroic magnitude of mind,
And celestial vigour arm'd,

Their armouries and magazines contents.

Milton, S. A.

Let a man consider these virtues, with the contrary sins, and then, as out of a full armory, or magazine, let him furnish his conscience with texts of scripture.

South.

2. Armour; arms of defence.

Nigh at hand
Celestial armour, shields, helms, and spears,
Hung high, with diamond flaming, and with gold. Milton, P. L.

3. Ensigns armorial.

Well worthy be you of that armory,
Wherein you have great glory won this day. Spenser, F. Q.
Your great grandfather, Henry the Seventh, (whether more valiant, or fortunate, I know not,) being almost at once an exile and a conqueror, united, by the marriage of Elizabeth of York, the white rose and the red, the armorics of two very powerful families. Sir H. Wotton, Panegy. to K. Ch. I.

A'RMOUR. † n. s. [armure, Fr. armatura, Lat.] Defensive arms; a word not frequent in the plural number.

Your friends are up, and buckle on their armour. Shakspeare.
That they might not go naked among their enemies, the only armour that Christ allows them, is prudence and innocence. South.

We'll want no mistresses,
Good swords, and good strong armours!
Beaumont and Fl. Knight of Malta, ii. 5.

A'RMOUR-BEARER. n. s. [from armour and bear.] He that carries the armour of another.

His armour-bearer first, and next he kill'd
His charioteer. Dryden.

A'RMPI. n. s. [from arm and pit.] The hollow place under the shoulder.

The handles to these gouges are made so long, that the handle may reach under the armpit of the workman. Moxon.
Others hold their plate under the left armpit, the best situation for keeping it warm. Swift.

ARMS. n. s. Without the singular number. [arma, Lat.]

1. Weapons of offence, or armour of defence.

Those arms which Mars before
Had giv'n the vanquish'd, now the victor bore. Pope.

2. A state of hostility.

Sir Edward Courtney, and the haughty prelate,
With many more confederates, are in arms. Shakspeare.

3. War in general.

Arms and the man I sing.
Him Paris follow'd to the dire alarms,
Both breathing slaughter, both resolv'd in arms. Pope.

4. Action; the act of taking arms.

Up rose the victor angels, and to arms
The matin trumpet sung.
And seas and rocks and skies rebound,
To arms, to arms, to arms! Pope.

5. The ensigns armorial of a family.

A'RMV. n. s. [armée, Fr.]

1. A collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man.

Number itself importeth not much in armies, where the people are of weak courage. Bacon.

The meanest soldier, that has fought often in an army, has a truer knowledge of war, than he that has writ whole volumes, but never was in any battle. South.

The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing,
Which follow'd great Aeneas to the war;
Their arms, their numbers, and their names declare. Dryden.

2. A great number.

The fool hath planted in his memory an army of good words.
Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice.

ARNA'TTO.* † n. s. A vegetable production of the ARNO'TTO. † West Indies.

Arnatto dyeth of itself an orange-colour, is used with pot-ashes upon silk, linen, and cottons, but not upon cloth, as being not apt to penetrate into a thick substance.

Sir W. Petty, in Sprat's Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 299.
Arnatto is mixed up by the Spanish Americans with their chocolate, to which it gives, in their opinion, an elegant tincture and great medicinal virtue. They suppose that it strengthens the stomach, stops fluxes, and abates febrile symptoms; but its principal consumption is among painters and dyers. It is sometimes used by the Dutch farmers to give a richness of colour to their butter: and very small quantities of it are said to be applied in the same manner in the English dairies. Guthrie's Geography.

ARO'INT. See AROYNT.

AROMA.* n. s. [Gr. ἀρωμα, Fr. arôme.] Used by some writers for myrrh; and in chymistry, signifies the odorant principle, the volatile spirit, of plants.

AROMA'TICAL. adj. [from aromatick.] Spicy; fragrant; high scented.

All things that are hot and aromatical do preserve liquors or powders. Bacon.

Volatile oils refresh the animal spirits, but likewise are en-dued with all the bad qualities of such substances, producing all the effects of an oily and aromatical acrimony. Arbuthnot.

AROMA'TICK. † adj. [Fr. aromatique.]

1. Spicy.

Amidst whole heaps of spices lights a hall,
And now their odours arm'd against them fly:
Some preciously by shatter'd porcelain fall,
And some by aromatick splinters die. Dryden.

2. Fragrant; strong scented.

Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,
Die of a rose in aromatick pain. Pope.

AROMA'TICKS. n. s. Spices.

They were furnished for exchange of their aromaticks, and other proper commodities. Ralegh.

AROMATIZA'TION. n. s. [from aromatize.] The mingling of a due proportion of aromatick spices or drugs with any medicine.

To ARO'MATIZE. † v. a. [Fr. aromatizer.]

1. To scent with spices; to impregnate with spices.

Drink the first cup at supper hot, and half an hour before supper something hot and aromatized. Bacon.

2. To scent; to perfume.

Unto converted Jews no man imputeth this unsavoury odour, as though aromatized by their conversion. Brown.

ARO'MATIZER.* n. s. [from the verb.] That which gives spicy quality.

Of other strewings, and aromatizers, to enrich our sallets, we have already spoken. Evelyn.

ARO'SE. The preterite of the verb arise. See ARISE.

ARO'UND. adv. [from a and round.]

1. In a circle.

He shall extend his propagated sway,
Where Atlas turns the rowling heav'ns around,
And his broad shoulders with their lights are crown'd. Dryden.

2. On every side.

And all above was sky, and ocean all around. Dryden.

ARO'UND. prep. About; encircling, so as to encompass.

From young Iulus head
A lambent flame arose, which gently spread Around his brows, and on his temples fed. Dryden.

To ARO'USE. v. a. [from a and rouse.]

1. To wake from sleep.

How loud howling wolves arouse the jades,
That drag the tragic melancholy night. Shakspeare.

2. To raise up; to excite.

But absent, what fantastick woes arou'd
Rage in each thought, by restless musing fed,
Chill the warm cheek, and blast the bloom of life. Thomson.

ARO'W. † adv. [Formerly written on row.] Spenser writes arew, Fr. rue, Goth. rud, line or order. See ROW.

1. In a row; with the breasts all bearing against the same line.

Then some green gowns are by the lasses worn
In chastest plays, till home they walk arow. Sidney.

But with a pace more sober and more slow,
And twenty, rank in rank, they rode arow.

Dryden.

2. Successively; in order; one after another.

My master and his man are both broke loose,
Beaten the maids arow, and bound the doctor.

Shakspeare, Comedy of Errors.

Three days arow, to pass the open street.

M^r. for Magistrates, p. 321.

AR'ONT.† adv. [This word, Dr. Johnson says, is of uncertain etymology; and he offers none. Perhaps it may be referred to the old Fr. voigner, (from the Lat. avertimus, or avertico), to pare, to clip; and figuratively, to keep under, to hinder from rising, to disarm. See Cotgrave in VV. voigner, and voignier: a very proper meaning to be used (as the word is used) in exorcising a witch; that is, be thou disarmed, be thou kept under, stand off.] Be gone: away: a word of expulsion, or avoiding.

Satur Withold footed thrice the wold,
He met the night-mare, and her nine fold,
Bid her alight, and her troth plight,

And arout thee, witch, arout thee!

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

ARPEGGIO.* n. s. [Ital.] In musick, the distinct sound of the notes of an instrumental chord, plainly heard in succession, accompanying the voice.

The funeral song—was sung in recitative over his grave by a racaraide, or rhapsodist, who occasionally sustained his voice with arpeggios swept over the strings of the harp.

Walker's Hist. M^{em}. of the Irish Bards, p. 17.

ARQUEBUSA'DE.* n. s. [Fr. Existing in old Fr. under a very different meaning, that of the shot of an arquebuse; but perhaps formed, in consequence of being applied to wounds made by that weapon.] A distilled water, applied to a bruise or wound.

You will find a letter from my sister to thank you for the arquebusade water, which you sent her.

Chesterfield.

ARQUEBUSE.† n. s. [Fr. spelt falsely harquebuss.

When guns were first used, a bow was joined to the same stock which served for the musquet, and thence it was called by Menage arcubugio.] A hand gun. It seems to have anciently meant much the same as our carbine, or fusée.

A harquebuse, or ordnance, will be farther heard from the mouth of the piece, than backwards or on the sides. Bacon.

ARQUEBUSIER. n. s. [from arquebuse.] A soldier armed with an arquebuse.

He compassed them in with fifteen thousand arquebusiers, whom he had brought with him well appointed. Kneller.

A'RR.* n. s. [Dan. a; Sued. arr, Sax. appa.] A mark or seam, made by a flesh-wound; a cicatrice. Used in Cumberland, and other northern counties.

The healen plaister eas'd the painful sair,
The arr indeed remains, but naething naire.

Relph's Poems, p. 2.

A'RRÄ.* n. s. [Lat. arra or arra.] A pledge. Not now in use.

By his spirit he hath God grafted us into his Christ, as the branches are into the true vine, by whose sap, even his sayd spirit, we have not onely our arra and earnest penny of his assured covenant, but also are set so sure into eternall lyfe, that it is impossible for sinne, satan, flesh, or whatsoever, to condemne us.

Anderson on the Hymn Benedictus, (1573) p. 4. b.

A'RRACH, O'KRACH, or O'RRAGE. n. s. One of the quickest plants both in coming up and running to seed. Its leaves are very good in pottage.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

ARRA'CK, or ARA'CK.† n. s. The word arack is an Indian name for strong waters of all kinds; for they call our spirits and brandy English arack. But what we understand by the name arack, is no other than a spirit procured by distillation from a vegetable juice called toddy, which flows by incision out of the cocoa-nut tree.

Chambers.

I send this to be better known for choice of china, tea, arrack, and other Indian goods.

Spectator.

Many persons drink a spirituous liquor, arraki, which the Tartar mountaineers distil from plums, sloes, dog-berries, elder-berries, and wild-grapes.

Pallas, Travels in the Crimea.

ARRA'CK-PUNCH.* n. s. The liquor called punch, composed, in a great degree, of arrack. See PUNCH.

He gets drunk with arrack-punch, staggers home at three in the morning, quarrels with the watch, and breaks lamps.

Dr. Warton's Works, p. 186.

They treated me with port-wine and arrack-punch; and now and then, when they had drank so much as hardly to distinguish wine from water, they would conclude with a bottle or two of claret.

Graves's Recollection of Shenstone, p. 16.

To ARR'AIGN.† v. a. [Dr. Johnson derives this word, inaccurately, from the Fr. arranger, to set in order. It is from the old Fr. arraigner, impétrér, appeler en justice, solliciter un jugement, assigner. V. Lacombe and Roquefort. And arrainier, from the low Lat. arrainare, citer devant un tribunal.]

1. To set a thing in order, or in its place. One is said to arraign a writ in a county, that fits it for trial before the justices of the circuit. A prisoner is said to be arraigned, where he is indicted and brought forth to his trial.

Coxe's.

Summon a session, that we may arraign
Our most disloyal lady; for as she hath
Been publicly accused, so shall she have
A just and open trial.

Shakspeare.

2. To accuse; to charge with faults in general, as in controversy, in a satire.

Reverse of nature! shall such copies then
Arraign the originals of Maro's pen?

Roscommon.

He that thinks a man to the ground, will quickly endeavour to lay him there: for while he despises him, he arraigns and condemns him in his heart.

South.

3. It has for before the fault.

My own enemies I shall never answer; and if your lordship has any, they will not arraign you for want of knowledge.

Dryden, Dedication to the Æneid.

ARRA'IGNMENT.† n. s. [old Fr. araisment.] The act of arraigning; an accusation; a charge.

In the sixth satire, which seems only an arraignment of the whole sex, there is a latent admonition to avoid ill women.

Dryden.

The night thou [O blessed Saviour] hadst spent in watching, in prayer, in agony, in thy conveyance from the garden to Jerusalem; from Annas to Caiphas, from Caiphas to Pilate; in thy restless answers, in buffetings, and stripes; the day, in arraignments, in haling from place to place, in scourgings, in stripping, in robing and disrobing, in bleeding, in tugging under thy cross, in woundings and distension, in pain and passion.

Bp. Hall, Contemplations. The Cranford.

ARRA'IMENT.* n. s. [from array. This should be the proper word for raiment, according to Dr. Johnson; who, however, seems not to have known the existence of arraiment. See RAIMENT.] Clothing; dress.

For their taste they must have weekly fish, herbs, and fruits, brought well-nigh from all places in Italy; for their clothing, the softest arraiments [that] can be had.

Sheldon's Miracles of Antichrist, p. 176.

Is my condition worse than sheep ordained for slaughter, that crop the springing grass, clothed warm in soft arraiment, purchased without their providence or pains?

Quarles, Judg. and Mer. The Slothful Man.

A R R

A'RRAND.* n. s. [Sax. arēnd, Dan. arend.] The old word for errand; message; so written by Chaucer, and not disused in the time of Milton. Such may be said to go out upon such an arrand.
Howell, Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 187.

To ARRANGE. v. a. [arranger, Fr.] To put in the proper order for any purpose.

I chanc'd this day
To see two knights in travel on my way,
(A sorry sight!) arrang'd in battle new. Spenser, F. Q.
How effectually are its muscular fibres arranged, and with what judgment are its columns and furrows disposed! Cheyne.

To ARRANGE*. v. n.
We cannot arrange with our enemy in the present conjuncture, without abandoning the interest of mankind.
Burke's Two Letters, p. 14.

ARRANGEMENT. † n. s. [Fr. arrangement.] The act of putting in proper order; the state of being put in order.

There is a proper arrangement of the parts in elastic bodies, which may be facilitated by use. Cheyne.
Nor think thou seest a wild disorder there;
Through this illustrious chaos to the sight,
Arrangement neat and chastest order reign.

Young, Night Th. 9.
In my new arrangement, I ought to have placed this piece under the Translations.

Warton's Notes on Milton's Smaller Poems.
He views the piles of fall'n Persepolis
In deep arrangement hide the darksome plain.

Warton's Pleasures of Melancholy
ARRANGER.* n. s. [from arrange.] He who plans or contrives.

None of the list-makers, the assemblers of the mob, the directors and arrangers, have been convicted.
Burke, Reflections on the Executions in 1780.

A'RRANT. † adj. [A word of uncertain etymology, but probably from errant, which being at first applied in its proper signification to vagabonds, as an errant or arrant rogue, that is, a rambling rogue, lost, in time, its original signification, and being by its use understood to imply something bad, was applied at large to any thing that was mentioned with hatred or contempt. Butler says, as Mr. Malone observes, that it comes from arrenter, Fr. (pronounced arranter;) "to let out for rent or hire;" and so an arrant knave or whose is such a one as is hired to be naught. Eng. Gram. 4to. 1633, p. 2. of Index. To this etymology I do not accede, but think with Dr. Johnson that it is a corruption of errant or errand; and the examples which I add, of errand, in this sense, are on our side.]

1. Bad in a high degree.
Country folks, who hallooed and hooted after me, as at the arrantest coward that ever shewed his shoulders to the enemy.
Sidney.

A vain fool grows forty times an arranter sot than before.
L'Estrange.

And let him every deity adore,
If his new bride prove not an arrant whore. Dryden.
He [the devil] makes all his subjects errand vassals, yea chained slaves. Bp. Hall's Remains, p. 25.

That they were a company of errand hypocrites we have little cause to doubt, because our blessed Saviour, who knew their very thoughts, calls them [the Scribes and Pharisees] so even to their faces.

Asheton, Sermon at Guildhall Chapel, 1673, p. 11.

2. Applied to things.
Your justification is but a miserable shifting off those testimonies of the ancientest fathers alleged against you, and the authority of some synodal canons, which are now arrant to us.
Milton, Animad. on Rem. Defence.

A R R

A'RRANTLY. adv. [from arrant.] Corruptly; shamefully.

Funeral tears are us arrantly hired out as mourning clokes.
L'Estrange.

A'RRAS. † n. s. [from Arras, a town in Artois, where hangings are woven.] Tapestry; hangings woven with images. Not often found in the plural number.

Thence to the hall, which was on every side
With rich array and costly arras light. Spenser, F. Q.
He's going to his mother's closet;

Behind the arras I'll convey myself,
To hear the process. Shakespeare.

As he shall pass the galleries, I'll place
A guard behind the arras. Deviant's Sophy.
I have of yore made many a scrambling meal
In corners, behind arrasses, off stairs.

Beaumont and Fl. Woman Hater, iii. 4.

ARRAUGHT. v. a. [a word used by Spenser, in the preter tense, of which I have not found the present, but suppose he derived arreach from arracher, Fr.] Seized by violence.

His ambitious sons unto them twain
Arraught the rule, and from their father drew. Spenser, F. Q.

ARRA'Y. † n. s. [arroy, Fr. arreo, Sp. arredo, Ital. from reje, Teut. order. It was adopted into the middle Latin, mille hominum arraiatorum, Knighton.]

1. Order, chiefly of war. [So the Sax. eorabe means a cohort or legion.]

The earl espying them scattered near the army, sent one to command them to their array. Hayward.

What might require the array of war, thy skill
Of conduct would be such, that all the world
Could not sustain thy prowess. Milton, P. R.

A general sets his army in array
In vain, unless he fight and win the day. Denham.

2. Dress.

A rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sat most brave embellished
With royal robes, and gorgeous array,
A maiden queen. Spenser, F. Q.

That women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety; not with brodered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array. 1 Tim. ii. 9.

In this remembrance, Emily ere day
Arose, and dress'd herself in rich array. Dryden.

3. In law. Array, of the Fr. array, i. e. ordo, the ranking or setting forth of a jury or inquest of men impannelled upon a cause. Thence is the verb to array a pannel, that is, to set forth one by another the men impannelled. Cowell.

To ARRAY. † v. a. [arrayer, old Fr.]

1. To put in order. Not much in use.
His barge was for him araied. Gower, Conf. Am. b. 8.

2. To deck; to dress; to adorn the person: with the particle with, or in.

Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency, and array thyself with glory and beauty. Job, xl. 10.

Now went forth the morn,
Such as in highest heaven, array'd in gold
Empyrean. Milton, P. L.

One vest array'd the corps, and one they spread
O'er his clos'd eyes, and wrapp'd around his head. Dryden.

3. In law. See ARRAY in law.

ARRA'YERS. † n. s. [old Fr. arraiers, sergent de compagnie, maréchal de camp.] Officers who anciently had the care of seeing the soldiers duly appointed in their armour. Cowell.

ARREAR. † adv. [arriere, Fr. behind.] Behind. This is the primitive signification of the word, which, though not now in use, seems to be retained by Spenser. See REAR.

A R R

To leave with speed Atlanta swift arrear,
Through forests wild and unfrequented land,
To chase the lion, boar, or rugged bear. Spenser, F. Q.

To be "arrear," to be behind with account or reckoning. Huloet.

ARREAR. † n. s.

1. That which remains behind unpaid, though due. See ARREARAGE.

His boon is giv'n; his knight has gain'd the day,
But lost the prize; th' arrears are yet to pay. Dryden.

If a tenant run away in arrear of some rent, the land remains; that cannot be carried away, or lost. Locke.

It will comfort our grand-children, when they see a few rags hung up in Westminster-hall, which cost an hundred millions, whereof they are paying the arrears, and boasting as beggars do, that their grandfathers were rich. Swift.

2. The rear. See ARRIERE.

The first comes sometimes in the arrear.

Howell, Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 74.

ARREARAGE. † n. s. a word now little used. [Low Lat. arrearagium.]

Arrearage is the remainder of an account, or a sum of money remaining in the hands of an accountant; or, more generally, any money unpaid at the due time, as arrearage of rent. Cowel.

Paget set forth the King of England's title to his debts and pension from the French king; with all arrearages. Hayward.

He'll grant the tribute, send the arrearages. Shakspeare.

The old arrearages under which that crown had long groan'd, being defray'd, he hath brought Lurana to uphold and maintain herself. Howell, Vocal Forest.

ARREARANCE. n. s. The same with arrear. See ARREAR. Dict.

To ARRECT.* v. a. [Lat. arriigo, part. arrectus.]

To raise or lift up. Obsolete.

Arrectyng my sight towarde the zodiacke,
The signes xij for to beholde asarre. Skelton, Poems, p. 9.

ARRECT.* adj. [Lat. arrectus.] Erected; figuratively, attentive.

God speaks not to the idle and unconcerned hearer, but to the vigilant and arrect. Bp. Smalridge, Sermon, p. 9.

Having large ears, perpetually exposed and arrect.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, § 11.

Eager for the event,

Around the beldame all arrect they hang,
Each trembling heart with grateful terrors quell'd. Akenside, Pl. of Imag. b. i.

ARRENTATION.* n. s. [from arrendar, Span. to farm, or old Fr. arrenter, low Lat. arrendare.] Is, in the forest law, the licensing an owner of lands in the forest, to inclose them with a low hedge and small ditch, in consideration of a yearly rent. Dict.

ARREPTIOUS. † adj. [arreptus, Lat.]

1. Snatched away.

2. [from ad and repto.] Crept in privily.

3. Mad. [Lat. arreptivus.]

Mock oracles, and odd arreptitious frantick extravagancies. Howell, Letters, iv. 43.

ARREST. n. s. [from arrestor, Fr. to stop.]

1. In law.

A stop or stay; as, a man apprehended for debt, is said to be arrested. To plead in arrest of judgment, is to shew cause why judgment should be stayed, though the verdict of the twelve be passed. To plead in arrest of taking the inquest upon the former issue, is to shew cause why an inquest should not be taken. An arrest is a certain restraint of a person, depriving him of his own will, and binding it to become obedient to the will of the law, and may be called the beginning of imprisonment.

Cowel.

If I could speak so wisely under an arrest, I would send for my creditors; yet I had as lief have the foppery of freedom, as the morality of imprisonment. Shakspeare.

2. Any caption, seizure of the person.

To the rich man, who had promised himself ease for many years, it was a sad arrest, that his soul was surprised the first night. Taylor.

3. A stop.

The stop and arrest of the air sheweth, that the air hath little appetite of ascending. Bacon.

ARREST. n. s. [In horsemanship.] A mangey humour between the ham and pastern of the hinder legs of a horse. Dict.

To ARREST. v. a. [arrestor, Fr. to stop.]

1. To seize by a mandate from a court or officer of justice.* See ARREST.

Good tidings, my Lord Hastings, for the which I do arrest thee, traitor, of high treason. Shakspeare.

There's one yonder arrested, and carried to prison, was worth five thousand of you all. Shakspeare.

2. To seize any thing by law.

He hath enjoyed nothing of Ford's but twenty pounds of money, which must be paid to Master Brook; his horses are arrested for it. Shakspeare.

3. To seize; to lay hands on; to detain by power.

But when as Morpheus had with leaden mæœs Arrested all that goodly company. Spenser, F. Q. i. iv. 44.

Age itself, which, of all things in the world, will not be baffled or defied, shall begin to arrest, seize, and remind us of our mortality. South.

4. To withhold; to hinder.

This defect of the English justice was the main impediment that did arrest and stop the course of the conquest. Davies.

As often as my dogs with better speed Arrest her flight, is she to death decreed. Dryden.

Nor could her virtues, nor repented vows
Of thousand lovers, the relentless hand
Of death arrest. Philips.

5. To stop motion.

To manifest the coagulative power, we have arrested the fluidity of new milk, and turned it into a curdled substance. Boyle.

6. To obstruct; to stop.

Ascribing the causes of things to secret proprieties, hath arrested and laid asleep all true enquiry. Bacon.

To ARRET.* v. a. [old Fr. arrestor, arcter; low Lat. arretare.] Obsolete; but frequent in Spenser.

To assign; to allot; to decree.

The charge, which God doth unto me arret,
Of his deare safety, I to thee commend. Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 8.

But, after that, the judges did arret her
Unto the second best that lov'd her better. Ib. F. Q. iv. v. 21.

ARRET.* n. s. [from the verb.] A decree.

ARRETTED. † adj. [arretatus, low Lat.] He that is convened before a judge, and charged with a crime. It is used sometimes for imputed or laid unto; as, no folly may be arretted to one under age. Cowel. See To ARRET.

To ARRIDE. † v. a. [arrideo, Lat.]

1. To laugh at.

2. To smile; to look pleasantly upon one.

3. To please well; to content with delight; which Dr. Johnson has not noticed. This is the definition in our old dictionaries, and it agrees with the usage of it by Ben Jonson; who, however, ridicules the word with much humour.

A pretty air; in general, I like it well: but in particular, your long-die-note did arride me most.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

F. 'Fore heavens, his humour arrides me exceedingly.

C. Arrides you?

F. Ay, pleases me, (a pox on't,) I am so haunted at the court, and at my lodging with your refined choice spirits, that it makes me clean of another garb, another sheaf, I know not how! I cannot frame me to your harsh vulgar phrase, 'tis against my genius! B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

ARRIÈRE, n. s. [French.] The last body of an army, for which we now use rear.

The horsemen might issue forth without disturbance of the foot, and the avant-guard without shuffling with the battail or arriere.

Hayward.

ARRIÈRE BAN. † n. s. [Casseneuve derives this word from arriere and ban: Ban denotes the convening of the noblesse, or vassals, who hold fees immediately of the crown, and arriere, those who only hold of the king mediately. It is also written band.] A general proclamation, by which the King of France summons to the war all that hold of him, both his own vassals or the noblesse, and the vassals of his vassals.

This sea being of too limited a surface to yield competent supply to so vast a region labouring universally under this calamity, nature seems distressed and reduced to her last shifts; and, when her common methods fail, summons (as it were) her arriere band to prevent, for ought we know, some sort of dissolution. Sir J. P. Sheere, Disc. of the Medit. Sea, p. 26.

Thus vice the standard rear'd; her arriere ban

Corruption call'd, and loud she gave the word.

Thomson, Castle of Indolence, ii. 30.

ARRIÈRE FEE, or FIEF. Is a fee dependant on a superiour one. These fees commenced, when dukes and counts, rendering their governments hereditary, distributed to their officers parts of the domains, and permitted those officers to gratify the soldiers under them, in the same manner.

ARRIÈRE VASSAL. The vassal of a vassal. Trevoux.

ARRISIO. n. s. [arrisio, Lat.] A smiling upon.

Dict.

ARRIVAL. n. s. [from arrive.] The act of coming to any place; and, figuratively, the attainment of any purpose.

How are we changed, since we first saw the queen?

She, like the sun, does still the same appear,

Bright as she was at her arrival here.

Waller.

The unravelling is the arrival of Ulysses upon his own island.

Broome, View of Epick Poetry.

ARRIVANCE. n. s. [from arrive.] Company coming: not in use.

Every minute is expectancy

Of more arrivance.

Shakspeare.

To ARRIVE. † v. n. [arriver, Fr. to come on shore.]

1. To come to any place by water.

At length arriving on the banks of Nile,

Wearied with length of ways, and worn with toil,

She laid her down.

Dryden.

2. To reach any place by travelling.

When we were arrived upon the verge of his estate, we stopped at a little inn, to rest ourselves and our horses.

Sidney.

3. To reach any point.

The bounds of all body we have no difficulty to arrive at; but when the mind is there, it finds nothing to hinder its progress.

Locke.

4. To gain any thing, by progressive approach.

It is the highest wisdom by despising the world to arrive at heaven; they are blessed who converse with God.

Taylor.

The virtuous may know in speculation, what they could never arrive at by practice, and avoid the snares of the crafty.

Addison.

5. The thing at which we arrive is always supposed to be good.

6. To happen; with to before the person or thing. This sense seems not proper, Dr. Johnson says: but our best authors use it.

Happy! to whom this glorious death arrives,
More to be valued than a thousand lives.

Waller.

In the age of that poet, [Æschylus,] the Greek language was arrived to its full perfection. Dryden, Pref. to Troil. and Cressida.

Whether he that has these notions of repentance, is ever like to arrive to the truth of repentance, He alone knows, who knows whether He will give such an one another heart or no.

South, Sermon, vii. 126.

To ARRIVE. * v. a. To reach.

Ere we could arrive the point propos'd.

Shakspeare, Jul. Cæsar.

Ere he arrive

The happy isle.

Milton, P. L. ii. 408.

Lest a worse woe arrive him. Milton, Treat. of Civil Power.

To ARRO'DE. v. a. [arrodo, Lat.] To gnaw or nibble.

Dict.

ARROGANCE. } n. s. [arrogantia, Lat.] The act or ARROGANCY. } quality of taking much upon one's self; that species of pride which consists in exorbitant claims.

Stanley, notwithstanding she's your wife,

And loves not me; be you, good lord, assur'd.

I hate not you for her proud arrogance.

Shakspeare.

Pride hath no other glass

To shew itself but pride; for supple knees

Feed arrogance, and are the proud man's fees.

Shakspeare.

Pride and arrogance, and the evil way, and the froward mouth do I hate.

Prov. viii. 13.

Discoursing of matters dubious, and on any controvertible truths, we cannot, without arrogancy, entreat a credulity.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Humility it expresses by the stooping and bending of the head; arrogance, when it is lifted, or, as we say, tossed up.

Dryden, Dufrenoy.

ARROGANT. adj. [arrogans, Lat.] Given to make exorbitant claims; haughty: proud.

Feagh's right unto that country which he claims, or the signiory therein, must be vain and arrogant.

An arrogant way of treating with other princes and states, is natural to popular governments.

Temple.

ARROGANTLY. † adv. [from arrogant.] In an arrogant manner.

Not enterprising to run afore, and so, by their rashness, become the greatest hinderers of such things, as they more arrogantly than godly would seem, (by their own private authority) most hotly to set forward.

Our poet may

Himself admire the fortune of his play;

And arrogantly, as his fellows do,

Think he writes well, because he pleases you.

Dryden.

Another, warm'd

With high ambition, and conceit of prowess

Inherent, arrogantly thus presum'd;

What if this sword, full often drench'd in blood,

Should now cleave sheer the execrable head

Of Churchill.

Philips.

ARROGANTNESS. n. s. [from arrogant.] The same with arrogance; which see.

Dict.

To ARROGATE. v. a. [arrogo, Lat.] To claim vainly; to exhibit unjust claims only prompted by pride.

I intend to describe this battle fully, not to derogate any thing from one nation, or to arrogate to the other.

Hayward.

The popes arrogated unto themselves, that the empire was held of them in homage.

Sir Walter Raleigh

Who, not content

With fair equality, fraternal state,

Will arrogate dominion undeserv'd,

Over his brethren.

Milton.

A R S

Rome never arrogated to herself any infallibility, but what she pretended to be founded upon Christ's promise. Tillotson.

ARROGATION. n. s. [from arrogare.] A claiming in a proud unjust manner. Dict.

Where selfishness is extinguished, all manner of arrogation must of necessity be extinct.

More's Song of the Soul, Notes, p. 372.

ARROGATIVE.  adj.* [from arrogare.] Claiming in an unjust manner.

Mortification, not of the body, (for that is sufficiently insisted upon,) but of the more spiritual arrogative life of the soul, that subtil ascribing that to ourselves that is God's, for all is God's.

More's Song of the Soul, Notes, p. 371.

ARROSION. n. s. [from arrosus, Lat.] A gnawing. Dict.

ARROW. n. s. [apepe, Sax.] The pointed weapon which is shot from a bow. Darts are thrown by the hand, but in poetry they are confounded.

I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow,
By his best arrow with the golden head.

Shakspeare.

Here were boys so desperately resolved, as to pull arrows out of their flesh, and deliver them to be shot again by the archers on their side.

Hayward.

ARROWHEAD. n. s. [from arrow and head.] A water plant, so called from the resemblance of its leaves to the head of an arrow. Dict.

ARROWY.  adj.* [from arrow.]

1. Consisting of arrows.

He saw them in their forms of battle rang'd,
How quick they wheel'd, and flying, behind them shot
Sharp sleet of arrowy show'r against the face
Of their pursuers, and o'ercame by flight.

Milton.

2. Formed like an arrow.

The lambent homage of his arrowy tongue.

Couper, Task, b. 6.

ARSE. n. s. [eappe, Sax.] The buttocks, or hind part of an animal.

To hang an ARSE. A vulgar phrase, signifying to be tardy, sluggish, or dilatory.

For Hudibras wore but one spur,
As wisely knowing, could he stir
To active trot one side of 's horse,
The other would not hang an arse.

Hudibras.

ARSE-FOOT. n. s. A kind of water fowl, called also a didapper. Dict.

ARSENAL. n. s. [arsenale, Ital.] A repository of things requisite to war; a magazine of military stores.

I would have a room for the old Roman instruments of war, where you might see all the ancient military furniture, as it might have been in an arsenal of old Rome.

Addison.

ARSENICAL. adj. [from arsenick.] Containing arsenick; consisting of arsenick.

An hereditary consumption, or one engendered by arsenical fumes under ground, is incapable of cure.

Harvey.

There are arsenical, or other like noxious minerals lodged underneath.

Woodward.

ARSENICK. n. s. [ἀρσένιον.] A ponderous mineral substance, volatile and uninflamable, which gives a whiteness to metals in fusion, and proves a violent corrosive poison; of which there are three sorts. Native or yellow arsenick, called also auripigmentum or orpiment, is chiefly found in copper mines. White or crystalline arsenick is extracted from the native kind, by subliming it with a proportion of sea salt, the smallest quantity of crystalline arsenick, being mixed with any metal, absolutely destroys its malleability; and a single grain will turn a pound of copper into a beautiful seeming silver, but without ductility. Red arsenick is a preparation of the white, made by adding to it a mineral sulphur.

Chambers.

A R T

Arsenick is a very death poison; held to the fire, it emits fumes, but liquates very little. Woodward on Poisons.

ARSMART. n. s. [Persian, Lat.] An herb.

It is said that if a handful of arsmart be put under the saddle, upon a tired horse's back, it will make him travail fresh and lustily! Coles, Art of Simpling, p. 68.

ARSON.  n. s.* [old Fr. arson, a burning, from arser.] The law expression for the crime of house-burning.

ART. n. s. [arte, Fr. ars, Lat.]

1. The power of doing something not taught by nature and instinct; as, to walk is natural, to dance is an art.

Art is properly an habitual knowledge of certain rules and maxims, by which a man is governed and directed in his actions.

South.

Blest with each grace of nature and of art,
E'en copious Dryden wanted, or forgot,
The last and greatest art, the art to blot.

Pope.

2. A science; as, the liberal arts.

Arts that respect the mind were ever reputed nobler than those that serve the body.

Ben Jonson.

When did his pen on learning fix a brand,
Or fail at arts he did not understand?

Dryden.

3. A trade.

This observation is afforded us by the art of making sugar.

Boyle.

4. Artfulness; skill; dexterity.

The art of our necessities is strange,
That can make vile things precious.

Shakspeare.

5. Cunning.

More matter with less art.

Shakspeare.

6. Speculation.

I have as much of this in art as you;
But yet my nature could not bare it so.

Shakspeare.

ARTERIAL.  adj.* [from artery, and Fr. arterial.]

That which relates to the artery; that which is contained in the artery.

Had not the Maker wrought the springy frame,
The blood, defrauded of its nitrous food,
Had cool'd and languish'd in the arterial road.

Blackmore.

As this mixture of blood and chyle passeth through the arterial tube, it is pressed by two contrary forces; that of the heart driving it forward against the sides of the tube, and the elastic force of the air, pressing it on the opposite sides of those air-bladders; along the surface of which this arterial tube creeps.

Arbuthnot.

ARTERIO-TOMY. n. s. [Gr. ἀρτηρία, and τέμνω, to cut.]

The operation of letting blood from the artery: a practice much in use among the French.

ARTERY. n. s. [arteria, Lat. from the Gr.] An artery is a conical canal, conveying the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. Each artery is composed of three coats; of which the first seems to be a thread of fine blood vessels and nerves, for nourishing the coats of the artery; the second is made up of circular, or rather spiral fibres, of which there are more or fewer strata, according to the bigness of the artery. These fibres have a strong elasticity, by which they contract themselves with some force, when the power by which they have been stretched out ceases. The third and innermost coat is a fine transparent membrane, which keeps the blood within its canal, that otherwise, upon the dilatation of an artery, would easily separate the spiral fibres from one another. As the arteries grow smaller, these coats grow thinner, and the coats of the veins seem only to be continuation of the capillary arteries.

Quincy.

"The arteries are elastic, and endowed with a contractile force, by which they drive the blood on, and being hindered from going backward by the valves, they do not flow back."

ARTFUL. adj.

1. Performed with art.

The last of these was the most easy, but, for the same reason, the least artful. Dryden.

2. Artificial; not natural.

3. Cunning; skilful; dexterous.

O still the same, Ulysses, she rejoin'd,
In useful craft successfully refin'd,
Artful in speech, in action, and in mind. Pope.

ARTFULLY. adv. [from artful.] With art; skilfully; dexterously.

The rest in rank: Honoria chief in place,
Was artfully contriv'd to set her face,
To front the ticket, and behold the chase. Dryden.

Vice is the natural growth of our corruption. How irresistibly must it prevail, when the seeds of it are artfully sown, and industriously cultivated? Rogers.

ARTFULNESS. n. s. [from artful.]

1. Skill.

Consider with how much artfulness his bulk and situation is contrived, to have just matter to draw round him these massy files. Cheyne.

2. Cunning.

ARTHRITICK. † adj. [from arthritis, and † arthritic.] † tique.

1. Gouty; relating to the gout.

I have forgotten whether I told you in my last a pretty late experiment in arthritic pains. Sir H. Wotton's Rem. p. 455.
Frequent changes produce all the arthritic diseases. Arbuthnot.

2. Relating to joints.

Serpents, worms, and leaches, though some want bones, and all extended articulations, yet have they arthritic analogies; and by the motion of fibrous and muscular parts, are able to make progression. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ARTHRITIS. n. s. [ἀρθριτις; from ἀρθρον, a joint.]

Any distemper that affects the joints, but the gout particularly. Quincy.

ARTICHOKE. † n. s. [artichault, Fr. artiskok, Dan. In Lombardy an artichoke is also articoeco; and ciocco is a hair, which the choke certainly resembles.]

This plant is very like the thistle, but hath large scaly heads shaped like the cone of the pine tree; the bottom of each scale, as also at the bottom of the florets, is a thick fleshy eatable substance. Miller.

No herbs have curled leaves, but cabbage and cabbage lettuce; none have double-leaves, one belonging to the stalk, another to the root or seed, but the artichoke. Bacon.

Artichokes contain a rich, nutritious, stimulating juice. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ARTICI of Jerusalem. † A species of sun flower, yielding bulbous, esculent roots, of a flavour not unlike to sweet potatoes.

ARTICK. [It should be written artick, from arctic.] Northern; under the bear. See ARCTIC.

But it would have winters like those beyond the artick circles for sun would be 80 degrees from them. Brown.

following example, it is, contrary to custom, the French manner, and accented on the h degree,

To you, one,
At nap in one,
And do not much for one,
By bringing thither fifty.

2. Methinks all climes should be alike,
From tropick e'en to pole artique.

Dryden, Epist. 7

ARTICLE. n. s. [articulus, Lat.]

1. A part of speech, as, the, an; the man, an ox.

2. A single clause of an account; a particular part of any complex thing.

Laws touching matters of order, are changeable by the power of the church; articles concerning doctrine not so. Hooker.

Have the summary of all our griefs,
When times shall serve to shew in articles. Shakspeare.

Many believe the article of remission of sins, but believe it without the condition of repentance. We believe the article otherwise than God intended it. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

All the precepts, promises, and threatenings of the gospel will rise up in judgment against us; and the articles of our faith will be so many articles of accusation; and the great weight of our charge will be this, That we did not obey the gospel which we professed to believe; that we made confession of the Christian faith, but lived like heathens. Tillotson.

You have small reason to repine upon that article of life. Swift.

3. Terms; stipulations.

I embrace these conditions; let us have articles between us. Shakspeare.

It would have gall'd his surly nature,
Which easily endures not article,
Tying him to aught. Shakspeare.

4. Point of time; exact time.

If Causfield had not, in that article of time, given them that brisk charge, by which other troops were ready, the king himself had been in danger. Clarendon.

TO ARTICLE. v. n. [from the noun article.] To stipulate; to make terms.

Such in love's warfare is my case,
I may not article for grace,
Having put love at last to shew this face. Dodder.

He had not infringed the least tittle of what was articled, that they aimed at one mark, and their ends were concentrick. Howell, Vacc. For.

If it be said, God chose the successor, that is manifestly not so in the story of Jephtha, where he articled with the people, and they made him judge over them. Locke.

TO ARTICLE. v. a. To draw up in particular articles.

He, whose life seems fair, yet if all his errors and follies were articled against him, the man would seem vicious and miserable. Bp. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

ARTICULAR. adj. [articularis, Lat.] Belonging to the joints. In medicine, an epithet applied to a disease, which more immediately infests the joints. Thus the gout is called morbus articularis.

ARTICULARLY.  adv.* [from articular.] Sounding every syllable, and staying at every point, i. e. stop. Hulot.

ARTICULATE. † adj. [from articulus, Lat.]

1. Distinct; divided, as the parts of a limb are divided by joints; not continued in one tone, as articulate sounds; that is, sounds varied and changed at proper pauses, in opposition to the voice of animals, which admit no such variety. An articulate pronunciation, a manner of speaking clear and distinct, in which one sound is not confounded with another.

In speaking under water, when the voice is reduced to extreme exility, yet the articulate sounds, though they are not confounded.

The first, at least, of these I thought deny'd
To beasts; whom God, on their creation day, Created mute to all articulate sound. Milton.

Antiquity expressed numbers by the fingers on their hand, the left they accounted their digits, and the right hand to an hundred, on the right hand, hundreds and thousands. Vol. Err.

2. Branched out into articles. This is a meaning little in use.

Henry's instructions were extreme curious and articulate; and, in them, more articles touching inquisition than negotiation: requiring an answer in distinct articles to his questions.

Bacon.

3. Belonging to the joints.

The causes internal of these articulate pains move upon one hinge of Hippocrates, which he calleth humors.

Whitaker, Blood of the Grape, p. 75.

To ARTICULATE. v. a. [from article.]

1. To form words; to utter distinct syllables; to speak as a man.

The dogmatist knows not by what art he directs his tongue, in articulating sounds into voices.

Glanville.

Parisian academists, in their anatomy of apes, tell us, that the muscles of the tongue, which do most serve to articulate a word, were wholly like those of man.

Ray on the Creation.

They would advance in knowledge, and not deceive themselves with a little articulated air.

Locke.

2. To draw up in articles.

These things, indeed, you have articulated, Proclaim'd at market crosses, read in churches, To face the garment of rebellion With some fine colour.

Shakespeare.

3. To make terms; to treat. These two latter significations are unusual.

Send us to Rome

The best, with whom we may articulate, For their own good and ours.

Shakespeare.

4. To joint.

If we consider, on the part of the bones, first, the scapula, and take notice that it is seated on the strong part of the back; — that it is articulated to the humerus per arthrodium.

Smith, Port. of Old Age, p. 59.

To ARTICULATE. v. n. To speak distinctly.

ARTICULATELY. adv. [from articulate.] In an articulate voice.

The secret purpose of our heart, no less articulately spoken to God, who needs not our words to discern our meaning.

Dev. of Piety.

ARTICULATENESS. n. s. [from articulate.] The quality of being articulate.

ARTICULATION. n. s. [from articulate.]

1. The juncture or joint of bones.

With relation to the motion of the bones in their articulations, there is a twofold liquor prepared for the inunction and lubrication of their heads, an oily one, and a mucilaginous, supplied by certain glandules seated in the articulations.

Ray.

2. The act of forming words.

I conceive that an extreme small, or an extreme great sound, cannot be articulate, but that the articulation requireth a mediocrity of sound.

Bacon.

By articulation I mean a peculiar motion and figure of some parts belonging to the mouth, between the throat and lips.

Holder.

3. [In botany.] The joints or knots in some plants, as the cane.

ARTIFICE. n. s. [artificium, Lat.]

1. Trick; fraud; stratagem.

It needs no legends, no service in an unknown tongue; none of all these laborious artifices of ignorance; none of all these cloaks and coverings.

South.

2. Art; trade; skill obtained by science or practice.

ARTIFICE. n. s. [artifex, Lat.]

1. An artist; a manufacturer; one by whom any thing is made.

The lights, doors, and stairs, rather directed to the use of the guest, than to the eye of the artificer.

Sidney.

The great artificer would be more than ordinarily exact in drawing his own picture.

South.

In the practices of artificers, and the manufactures of several kinds, the end being proposed, we find out ways.

Locke.

2. A forger; a contriver.

He soon awoke.

Each perturbation smooth'd with outward calm, Artificer of fraud! and was the first That practis'd falsehood under saintly show.

Milton.

Th' artificer of lies

Renews th' assault, and his last batt'ry tries.

Dryden.

3. A dexterous or artful fellow: not in use.

Let you alone, cunning artificer.

B. Jonson.

ARTIFICIAL. † adj. [artificiel, Fr.]

1. Made by art; not natural.

Basilius used the artificial day of torches to lighten the sports their inventions could contrive.

Sidney.

The curtains closely drawn the light to screen,

As if he had contriv'd to lie unseen;

Thus covered with an artificial night,

Sleep did his office.

Dryden.

There is no natural motion perpetual; yet it doth not hinder but that it is possible to contrive such an artificial revolution.

Wilkins.

2. Fictitious; not genuine.

Why, I can smile, and murder while I smile, And cry, Content, to that which grieves my heart, And wet my cheeks with artificial tears.

Shakespeare.

The resolution which we cannot reconcile to public good, has been supported by an obsequious party, and then with usual methods confirmed by an artificial majority.

Swift.

3. Artful; contrived with skill.

These seem to be the more artificial, as those of a single person the more natural governments.

Temple.

4. Skilled in stratagem; cunning. This definition is found in our old dictionaries and is supported by good authority.

The great trust his majesty reposed in him, infinitely above and contrary to his desire, was in itself liable to envy; and how insupportable that envy must be, upon this new relation, he could not but foresee; together with the jealousies, which artificial men would be able to insinuate into his majesty.

Continuation of Clarendon's Life, ii. 72.

ARTIFICIAL Arguments. [In rhetorick.] Are proofs on considerations which arise from the genius, industry, or invention of the orator; which are thus called, to distinguish them from laws, authorities, citations, and the like, which are said to be inartificial arguments.

ARTIFICIAL Lines, on a sector or scale, are lines so contrived as to represent the logarithmick sines and tangents; which, by the help of the line of numbers, solve, with tolerable exactness, questions in trigonometry, navigation, &c.

Chambers.

ARTIFICIAL Numbers, are the same with logarithms.

ARTIFICIAL.  n. s.* The production of art.

There ought to be added to this work many and various indices, besides the alphabetical ones; as namely, one of all the artificials mentioned in the whole work.

Sir W. Petty, Advice to S. Harlib, p. 19.

ARTIFICIALITY.  n. s.* [from artificial.] Appearance of art.

Trees in hedges partake of their artificiality.

ARTIFICIALLY. † adv. [from artificial.]

1. Artfully; with skill; with good contrivance.

How cunningly he made his faultiness less, he set out the torments of his own conscience.

ce. artificially

Sidney.

Should any one be cast upon a desolate island, and find there a palace artificially contrived, and curiously adorned.

Ray.

2. By art; not naturally.

It is covered on all sides with earth, crumbled into powder, as if it had been artificially sifted.

Addison.

3. Craftily; with stratagem.

A R T

So artificially did this young Italian behave herself, that she deceived even the eldest and most jealous persons both in the court and country. Barnet, Hist. of his own Times, B. 3.

ARTIFICIALNESS. n. s. [from artificial.] Artfulness. Dict.

ARTIFICIOUS. adj. [from artifice.] The same with artificial.

To ARTILISE. v. a. [A word coined for the occasion.] To give the appearance of art to.

If I was a philosopher, says Montaigne, I would naturalise art, instead of artilising nature. The expression is odd; but the sense is good. Bolingbroke to Pope.

ARTILLERY. n. s. It has no plural. [artillerie, Fr. from the old verb, artiller, to fortify. Low. Lat. also artillaria, Basque, artilleria.]

1. Weapons of war; always used of missive weapons. And Jonathan gave his artillery unto his lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them unto the city. 1 Samuel.

2. Cannon; great ordnance.

Have I not heard great ordnance in the field? Shakespeare.

And Heaven's artillery thunder in the skies

I'll to the tower with all the haste I can,

To view th' artillery and ammunition. Shakespeare.

Upon one wing the artillery was drawn, being sixteen pieces, every piece having pioneers to plain the ways. Hayward.

He that views a fort to take it,

Plants his artillery 'gainst the weakest place. Denham.

ARTISAN. n. s. [French.] Dr. Johnson has placed the accent on the last syllable, which formerly prevailed; but it is now on the first.

1. Artist; professor of an art.

What are the most judicious artisans, but the mimicks of nature? Wotton, Architecture.

Best and happiest artisan,

Best of painters, if you can,

With your many colour'd art,

Draw the mistress of my heart. Guardian.

2. Manufacturer; low tradesman.

I who had none but generals to oppose me, must have an artisan for my antagonist. Addison.

ARTIST. n. s. [artiste, Fr.]

1. The professor of an art, generally of an art manual.

How to build ships, and dreadful ordnance cast,

Instruct the artists, and reward their haste. Waller.

Rich with the spoils of many a conquer'd land,

All arts and artists Theseus could command,

Who sold for hire, or wrought for better fame:

The master painters and the carvers came. Dryden.

When I made this, an artist undertook to imitate it; but using another way, fell much short. Newton, Opticks.

2. A skilful man; not a novice.

If any one thinks himself an artist at this, let him number up the parts of his child's body. Locke.

ARTLESS. adj. [from art and less.]

1. Unskilful; wanting art; sometimes with the particle of.

The high-shoed plowman, should he quit the land,
Artless of stars, and of the moving sand. Dryden.

She maintains a train of prating pettifoggers, prowling summers, smooth-tongued bawds, artless empericks, hungry parasites. Brewer, Lingua, iii. 5.

Had it been a practice of the Saxons to set up these assemblages of artless and massy pillars, more specimens would have remained. Warton, Hist. of Kiddington.

2. Void of fraud; as an artless maid.

3. Contrived without skill; as, an artless tale.

ARTLESSLY. adv. [from artless.]

1. In an artless manner; without skill.

2. Naturally; sincerely; without craft.

Nature and truth, though never so low or vulgar, are yet pleasing when openly and artlessly represented. Pope.

A S

ARTLESSNESS. n. s. [from artless.] Want of art; absence of fraud.

ARTSMAN. n. s. [from art and man.] A man skilled in arts.

The pith of all sciences, which maketh the artsman differ from the inexpert, is in the middle propositions.

Bacon on Learning, B. ii.

ARUNDINACEOUS. adj. [arundinaceus, Lat.] Of or like reeds. Dict.

ARUNDINEOUS. adj. [arundineus, Lat.] Abounding with reeds.

ARUSPEX. n. s. [Lat.] A soothsayer.

Adorn'd with bridal pomp, she sits in state;

The public notaries and aruspex wait. Dryden, Jew. Sat. 10.

ARUSPICE. n. s. [Dr. Ash gives this substantive as denoting divination by inspecting the entrails of beasts, from the Lat. aruspicium. Others have applied it to the diviner, or person inspecting, from aruspex; and with greater propriety; aruspicy being the proper word for the action.]

The second sort of ministers mentioned by Cicero, were not priests, but augurs and aruspices, designed to be the interpreters of the mind of the gods.

Bp. Story on the Priesthood, ch. 5.

They [the Romans] had colleges for augurs and aruspices, who used to make their predictions sometimes by fire, sometimes by flying of fowls, &c. Howell's Letters, iii. 23.

ARUSPICY. n. s. [Lat. aruspicium or haruspicium. The act of prognosticating by inspecting the entrails of the sacrifice.]

A flum more senseless than the rogery
Of old aruspicy and augury. Butler, Hud. ii. 5.

AS. n. s. [Lat.] The Roman pound, consisting of twelve equal parts or ounces.

Where twelve divide the as, and every one
Hath part withouten defalcation.

Verses prefixed to Kynaston's Chauce.

The as, or Roman pound, was commonly used to express any integral sum. Blackstone.

AS. conjunct. [als, Teut. aye, Sax. Perhaps abbreviated from alþ ypa, all so.]

1. In the same manner with something else.

When thou dost hear I am as I have been,

Approach me, and thou shalt be as thou wast. Shakespeare.

In singing, as in piping, you excell;

And scarce your master could perform so well. Dryden.

I live as I did, I think as I did, I love you as I did; but all these are to no purpose: the world will not live, think, or love as I do. Swift.

2. In the manner that.

Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate

With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state. Dryden, An.

The landlord, in his shirt as he was, taking a candle in one hand, and a drawn sword in the other, ventured out of the room. Arbutnot and Pope.

3. That; in a consequential sense.

The cunningest mariners were so conquered by the storm, as they thought it best with stricken sails to yield to be governed by it. Sidney.

He had such a dexterous proclivity, as his teachers were fain to restrain his forwardness. Wotton.

The relations are so uncertain, as they require a great deal of examination. Bacon.

God shall by grace prevent sin so soon, as to keep the soul in the virginity of its first innocence. South.

4. In the state of another.

Madam, were I as you, I'd take her counsel;

I'd speak my own distress. A. Philips, Distress Mother.

5. Under a particular consideration; with a particular respect.

Besides that law which concerneth men as men, and that which belongs unto men as they are men, linked with others in some society; there is a third which touches all several bodies politick, so far forth as one of them hath publick concerns with another.

Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Dar'st thou be as good as thy word now? —

Why, Hal, thou knowest, as thou art but a man, I dare; but as thou art a prince, I fear thee, as I fear the frowning of the lion's whelp.

Shakspeare, Henry IV.

The objections that are raised against it as a tragedy, are as follow.

Gay, Pref. to What d'ye call it

6. Like; of the same kind with.

A simple idea is one uniform idea, as sweet, bitter. Watts.

7. In the same degree with.

Where you, unless you are as matter blind, Conduct and beautiful disposition find. Blackmore.

Well hast thou spoke, the blue-eyed maid replies,

Thou good old man, benevolent as wise. Pope, Odyssey.

8. As if; according to the manner that would be if.

The squire began higher to approach, And wind his horn under the castle-wall, That with the noise it shook as it would fall. Spenser, F. Q.

They all contended to creep into his humour, and to do that, as of themselves, which they conceived he desired they should do. Hayward.

Contented in a nest of snow He lies, as he his bliss did know, And to the wood no more would go. Waller.

So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose, As all the Dardan and Argolick race Had been contracted in that narrow space. Dryden.

Can misery no place of safety know, The noise pursues me wheresoe'er I go, As fate sought only me. Dryden, Aurengzebe.

9. According to what.

Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man. 1 Cor.

Their figure being printed, As just before, I think, I hinted, Alma inform'd can try the case. Prior.

The republick is shut up in the great duke's dominions, who at present is very much incensed against it. The occasion is as follows. Addison on Italy.

10. As it were; in some sort.

As for the daughters of king Edward IV. they thought king Richard had said enough for them; and took them to be but as of the king's party, because they were in his power, and at his disposal. Bacon, Henry VII.

11. While; at the same time that.

At either end, it whistled as it flew, And as the brands were green, so dropp'd the dew; Infected as it fell with sweat of sanguine hue. Dryden.

These haughty words Alecto's rage provoke, And frighted Turnus trembled as she spoke. Dryden.

So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stains Of rushing torrents, and descending rains, Works itself clear, and as it runs refines. Addison, Cato.

12. Because.

He that commanded the injury to be done, is first bound; then he that did it; and they also are obliged who did so assist, as without them the thing could not have been done. Taylor.

13. Because it is; because they are.

The kernels draw out of the earth juice fit to nourish the tree, as those that would be trees themselves. Bacon.

14. Equally.

Before the place A hundred doors a hundred entries grace; As many voices issue, and the sound Of Sibyl's word as many times rebound. Dryden.

15. How; in what manner.

Men are generally permitted to publish books, and contradict others, and even themselves, as they please, with as little danger of being confuted, as of being understood. Boyle.

16. With; answering to like or same.

Sister, well met; whither away so fast? — Upon the like devotion as yourselves, To gratulate the gentle princes there. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

17. In a reciprocal sense, answering to as.

Every offence committed in the state of nature, may, in the state of nature, be also punished, and as far forth as it may in a commonwealth. Locke.

As sure as it is good, that human nature should exist; so certain it is, that the circular revolutions of the earth and planets, rather than other motions which might as possibly have been, do declare God. Bentley.

18. Going before as, in a comparative sense; the first as being sometimes understood.

Sempronius is as brave a man as Cato. Addison.

Bright as the sun, and like the morning fair. Granville.

19. Answering to such.

Is it not every man's interest, that there should be such a governour of the world as designs our happiness, as would govern us for our advantage? Tillotson.

20. Having so to answer it; in a conditional sense.

As far as they carry light and conviction to any other man's understanding, so far, I hope, my labour may be of use to him. Locke.

21. So is sometimes understood.

As in my speculations I have endeavoured to extinguish passion and prejudice, I am still desirous of doing some good in this particular. Spettator.

22. Answering to so conditionally.

So may th' auspicious queen of love, To thee, O sacred ship, be kind; As thou to whom the muse commends, The best of poets and of friends, Dost thy committed pledge restore. Dryden.

23. Before how it is sometimes redundant; but this is in low language.

As how, dear Syphax? Addison, Cato.

24. It seems to be redundant before yet; to this time.

Though that war continued nine years, and this hath as yet lasted but six, yet there hath been much more action in the presep war. Addison.

25. In a sense of comparison, followed by so.

As when a dab-chick waddles through the copse On feet and wings, and flies, and wades, and hops; So lab'ring on, with shoulders, hands, and head, Wide as a windmill all his figure spread. Pope.

26. As FOR; with respect to.

As for the rest of those who have written against me, they deserve not the least notice. Dryden's Fables, Preface.

27. As IF; in the same manner that it would be if. Answering their questions, as if it were a matter that needed it. Locke.

28. As TO; with respect to.

I pray thee, speak to me as to thy thinkings, As thou dost ruminate; and give thy worst of thoughts The worst of words. Shakspeare, Othello.

They pretend, in general, to great refinements, as to what regards christianity. Addison on Italy.

I was mistaken as to the day, placing that accident about thirty-six hours sooner than it happened. Swift.

29. AS WELL AS; equally with.

Each man's mind has some peculiarity, as well as his face, that distinguishes him from all others. Locke.

It is adorned with admirable pieces of sculpture, as well modern as ancient. Addison on Italy.

30. AS THOUGH; as if.

These should be at first gently treated, as though we expected an imposthumation. Sharp's Surgery.

ASADULCIS. See BENZOIN.

ASAFOTIDA. } n. s. A gum or resin brought from the East Indies, of a sharp taste, and a strong offensive smell; which is said to distil, during the heat of summer, from a little shrub. Chambers.

Nigh Who-moot are Duzgun, Laztan-de, and other towns, where is got the best ansafadita through all the orient: The tree exceeds not our briar in height; but the leaves resemble rose-leaves, the root the radish: though the savour be so offensive to most, the sapor is so good, that no meat, no sauce, no vessel pleases some of the Guzurgs' palates save what relishes of it. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 118.

ASARABACCA. n. s. [asarum, Lat.] The name of a plant.

ASBESTINE. † adj. [from asbestos.] Something incombustible, or that partakes of the nature and qualities of the lapis asbestos.

A good man like an asbestine garment, as well as a tobacco-pipe when foul, is cleansed by burning.

Feltham's Resolves, ii. 57.

ASBESTOS. n. s. [ἀσβεστός.] A sort of native fossile stone, which may be split into threads and filaments, from one inch to ten inches in length, very fine, brittle, yet somewhat tractable, silky, and of a greyish colour. It is almost insipid to the taste, indissoluble in water, and endued with the wonderful property of remaining unconsumed in the fire. But in two trials before the Royal Society, a piece of cloth made of this stone was found to lose a dram of its weight each time. This stone is found in Anglesey in Wales, and in Aberdeenshire in Scotland. Chambers.

ASCARIDES. n. s. [ἄσκαρις; from ἀναρῖζω, to leap.] Little worms in the rectum, so called from their continual troublesome motion, causing an intolerable itching. Quincy.

To ASCEND. v. n. [ascendo, Lat.]

1. To move upwards; to mount; to rise.

Then to the heav'n of heav'ns shall he ascend
With victory, triumphing through the air
Over his foes and thine. Milton.

2. To proceed from one degree of good to another.

By these steps we shall ascend to more just ideas of the glory of Jesus Christ, who is intimately united to God, and is one with him. Watts Improvement of the Mind.

3. To stand higher in genealogy.

The only incest was in the ascending, not collateral branch; as when parents and children married, this was accounted incest. Broome's Notes on the Odyssey.

To ASCEND. † v. a. To climb up any thing.

Vespasian triumphantly did ascend the imperial throne.

Barrow's Works, i. 343.

They ascend the mountains, they descend the vallies.

Delany's Revelation examined.

ASCEN'DABLE. adj. [from ascend.] That may be ascended. Dict.

ASCENDANT. † n. s. [from ascend.]

1. The part of the ecliptick at any particular time above the horizon, which is supposed by astrologers to have great influence.

2. Height; elevation.

He was initiated, in order to gain instruction in sciences that were there in their highest ascendant. Temple.

3. Superiority; influence.

By the ascendant he had in his understanding, and the dexterity of his nature, he could persuade him very much. Clarendon.

Some star I find,
Has giv'n thee an ascendant o'er my mind. Dryden, Juv. Sat. x.
When they have got an ascendant over them, they should use it with moderation, and not make themselves scarecrows. Locke.

4. The person having influence or superiority.

There is not a single particular in the Francis-street declamations, which has not, to your and to my certain knowledge, been taught by the jealous ascendants, sometimes by doctrine, sometimes by example, always by provocation. Burke's 2d Letter to Sir H. Langrishe.

5. One of the degrees of kindred reckoned upwards.

The most nefarious kind of bastards, are incestuous bastards, which are begotten between ascendants and descendants in infinitum; and between collaterals, as far as the divine prohibition. Ayliffe, Parergon.

ASCENDANT. † adj. Written formerly ascendent, which should seem to be right from Dr. Johnson's remark on DESCENDENT.

1. Superiour; predominant; overpowering.

Christ outdoes Moses, before he displaces him; and shews an ascendant spirit above him. South.

Thus I pass from the descendent to the ascendent duty.

Sir M. Sandys's Essays, p. 150.

2. In an astrological sense, above the horizon.

Let him study the constellation of Pegasus, which is about that time ascendant. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ASCENDENCY. † n. s. [from ascend.] Influence; power.

Custom has some ascendency over understanding, and what at one time seemed decent, appears disagreeable afterwards. Watts.

Instead of prating about Protestant ascendencies, Protestant parliaments ought, in my opinion, to think at last of becoming patriot parliaments. Burke, Letter to R. Burke Esq.

ASCENSION. n. s. [ascensio, Lat.]

1. The act of ascending or rising; frequently applied to the visible elevation of our Saviour to heaven.

Then rising from his grave,
Spoil'd principalities, and pow'rs, triumph'd
In open shew; and, with ascension bright,
Captivity led captive through the air. Milton, P. L.

2. The thing rising, or mounting.

Men err in the theory of inebriation, conceiving the brain doth only suffer from vaporous ascensions from the stomach. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ASCENSION, in astronomy, is either right or oblique. Right ascension of the sun, or a star, is that degree of the equinoctial, counted from the beginning of Aries, which rises with the sun or star in a right sphere. Oblique ascension is an arch of the equator intercepted between the first point of Aries, and that point of the equator which rises together with a star in an oblique sphere.

ASCENSION DAY. The day on which the Ascension of our Saviour is commemorated, commonly called Holy Thursday; the Thursday but one before Whitsuntide.

ASCENSIONAL Difference, is the difference between the right and oblique ascension of the same point to the surface of the sphere. Chambers.

ASCENSIVE. adj. [from ascend.] In a state of ascent: not in use.

The cold augments when the days begin to encrease, though the sun be then ascensive, and returning from the winter tropick. Brown, Vulg. Err.

ASCENT. n. s. [ascensus, Lat.]

1. Rise; the act of rising; the act of mounting.

To him with swift ascent he up return'd,
Into his blissful bosom reassum'd
In glory, as of old. Milton.

2. The way by which one ascends.

The temple, and the several degrees of ascent, whereby men did climb up to the same, as if it had been a scala celi, be all poetical and fabulous. Bacon.

It was a rock

Conspicuous far; winding with one ascent
Accessible from earth, one entrance high. Milton.

3. An eminence, or high place.

No land like Italy erects the sight,
By such a vast ascent, or swells to such a height. Addison.

A wide flat cannot be pleasant in the Elysian fields, unless it be diversified with depressed valleys and swelling ascents.

Bentley.

To ASCERTA'IN.† v. a. [ascertener, Fr.] Accented by Spenser on the first syllable, in which he follows Chaucer.

1. To make certain; to fix; to establish.

The divine law both ascertaineth the truth, and supplieth unto us the want of other laws.

Hooker.

Of a small time, which none ascertaine may.

Spenser, Daphnida, v. 504.

Money differs from uncoined silver in this, that the quantity of silver in each piece is ascertained by the stamp.

Locke.

2. To make confident; to take away doubt: often with of.

Right judgment of myself, may give me the other certainty, that is, ascertain me that I am in the number of God's children.

Hammond, Practical Catechism.

This makes us act with a repose of mind and wonderful tranquillity, because it *ascertain*s us of the goodness of our work.

Dryden, Desires.

ASCERTA'INABLE.* adj. [from ascertain.] That which may be ascertained.

ASCERTA'INER. n. s. [from ascertain.] The person that proves or establishes.

ASCERTA'INMENT. n. s. [from ascertain.] A settled rule; an established standard.

For want of ascertainment, how far a writer may express his good wishes for his country, innocent intentions may be charged with crimes.

Swift to Lord Muddleton.

ASCET'ICISM.* n. s. [from ascetick.] The state of an ascetick.

Such societies we have seen, whose religious doctrines are so little serviceable to civil society, that they can prosper only on the ruin and destruction of it. Such are those which preach up the sanctity of celibacy; asceticism; the sinfulness of defensive war, capital punishments, and even civil magistracy itself.

Warburton, Alliance Ch. and St. (1st ed.) p. 57.

ASCET'ICK. adj. [ασκητικος.] Employed wholly in exercises of devotion and mortification.

None lived such healthful and long lives as monks and hermits, who had sequestered themselves from the pleasures and plenty of the world to a constant ascetick course of the severest abstinence and devotion.

South, Sermon ii. 31.

ASCET'ICK. n. s. He that retires to devotion and mortification; a hermit.

I am far from commending those asceticks, that, out of a pretence of keeping themselves unspotted from the world, take up their quarters in deserts.

Noëris.

He that preaches to man, should understand what is in man; and that skill can scarce be attained by an ascetick in his solitudes.

Atterbury.

ASCI. n. s. It has no singular. [from α, without, and σκια, a shadow.] Those people who, at certain times of the year, have no shadow at noon; such are the inhabitants of the torrid zone, because they have the sun twice a-year vertical to them.

Dict.

ASCI'TES. n. s. [from ασκη, a bladder.] A particular species of dropsy; a swelling of the lower belly and depending parts, from an extravasation and collection of water broke out of its proper vessels. This case, when certain and inveterate, is universally allowed to admit of no cure but by means of the manual operation of tapping.

Quincy.

There are two kinds of dropsy, the anasarca, called also leucophlegmacy, when the extravasated matter swims in the cells of the membrana adiposa; and the ascites, when the water possesses the cavity of the abdomen.

Sharp, Surgery.

ASCI'TICAL. } adj. [from ascites.] Belonging to an ASCI'TICK. } ascites; dropsical; hydropical.

When it is p. if another tumour, it is hydropical, either anasarcous or Wiseman, Surgery.

ASCITI'TIOUS. adj. [ascititius, Lat.] Supplemental; additional; not inherent; not original.

Homer has been reckoned an ascititious name, from some accident of his life.

Pope.

ASCRIB'ABLE. adj. [from ascribe.] That which may be ascribed.

The greater part have been forward to reject it, upon a mistaken persuasion, that those phenomena are the effects of nature's abhorrence of a vacuum, which seem to be more fitly ascribable to the weight and spring of the air.

Boyle.

To ASCRIBE. v. a. [ascribo, Lat.]

1. To attribute to as a cause.

The cause of his banishment is unknown, because he was unwilling to provoke the emperor, by ascribing it to any other reason than what was pretended.

Dryden.

To this we may justly ascribe those jealousies, and encroachments, which render mankind uneasy to one another.

Rogers.

2. To attribute as a quality to persons, or accident to substance.

These perfections must be somewhere, and therefore may much better be ascribed to God, in whom we suppose all other perfections to meet, than to any thing else.

Tillotson.

ASCRIP'TION.† n. s. [ascriptio, Lat.] The act of ascribing.

By this description his [Anaxagoras's] mens must needs be God. Yea, and so is it likewise by his ascription too. For he ascribeth unto this mens the very making of the world.

Petherby, Athomastir, p. 231.

Though the heathen templed and adored this drunken god, [Bacchus] yet one would take their ascriptions to him to be matter of dishonour and mocks; as, his troop of mad women; his chariot drawn with the lynx and tiger.

Fellham, Resolves, 84.

Although a woman, praised for her complexion, be bound in modesty to gainsay those praises; yet if the fire have given her a good colour, it is not thought pride to refrain contradicting, because the effect being natural to the fire, and requiring no excellent predispositions in the object, to refer those ascriptions to their cause, is held to justify the not rejecting them.

Boyle against Custom, Swearing, p. 78.

ASCRIP'TIOUS.† adj. [ascriptitius, Lat.] That which is ascribed.

Dict.

An ascriptitious and supernumerary god.

Fariodon, Sermon.

ASH.† n. s. [fraxinus, Lat. æpe, Saxon.]

1. A tree.

This tree hath pennated leaves, which end in an odd lobe. The male flowers, which grow at a remote distance from the fruit, have no petals, but consist of many stamina. The ovary becomes a seed vessel, containing one seed at the bottom, shaped like a bird's tongue.

Miller.

The mountain-ash, so called, is a nursery tree or shrub, with pennated leaves, yielding clustered red berries.

With which of old he charm'd the savage train,
And call'd the mountain ashes to the plain.

Dryden.

2. The wood of the ash.

Let me twine

Mine arms about that body, where against
My grained ash an hundred times hath broke,
And scar'd the moon with splinters.

Shakspeare, Coriolanus

To ASHA'ME.* v. a. [See To SHAME.] To make ashamed, which Mr. Boucher considers as a Scottish verb, though he admits that "to shame a man" is not thought bad English. Indeed it is used by one of our best writers, and is found in one of our oldest dictionaries, (though Dr. Johnson has noticed neither circumstance,) meaning "to defame one to his utter reproach," i. e. to make him ashamed.

Huot.

A S H

It should humble, ashame, and grieve us.

Barrow's Works, iii. 417.

ASHA'MEN. adj. [from shame.] Touched with shame; generally with of before the cause of shame if a noun, and to if a verb.

Profess publicly the doctrine of Jesus Christ, not being ashamed of the word of God, or of any practices enjoined by it.

Taylor, Holy Living.

One wou'd have thought she would have stirr'd; but strove
With modesty, and was asham'd to move. Dryden.

This I have shudowed, that you may not be ashamed of that hero, whose protection you undertake. Dryden.

ASHA'MEDLY.* adv. [from ashamed.] Bashfully.

Huloet.

ASH-COLOURED. adj. [from ash and colour.] Coloured between brown and grey, like the bark of an ashen branch.

Clay, ash-coloured, was part of a stratum which lay above the strata of stone. Woodward on Fossils.

ASHE'LY.* adv. [On a shelf; or rock. See SHELF.]

A naval expression; though unnoticed by any person, as far as my observation has extended; yet a word not to be dismissed from the language of a naval people.

Why have you done that which I dare not speak,
And in the action chang'd the humble shape
Of my obedience to rebellious rage
And insolent pride; and with shut eyes constrain'd me
To run my bark of honour on a shelf,
I must not see, nor, if I saw it, shun it?

Massinger, Unnatural Combat.

I will declare and make plaine unto you by a familiar similitude, that we jut not any more and run ashelf on such idolatry and very manifest sorcery.

Harnar, Transl. of Beza's Serms, p. 231.

A'SHEN. adj. [from ash.] Made of ash wood.

At once he said, and threw

His ashen spear; which quiver'd as it flew. Dryden.

AS'HFIRE.* n. s. [from ash and fire.] The subdued or low fire used in chymical operations.

AS'HFLY.* n. s. [from ash and fly.] The ash-fly is called by some, the oak-fly. The head is of an ash-colour: it is seen on the body of ash-trees, oaks, willows, and thorns, growing near the water, in March, April, May, and June, with its head downwards.

Complete Angler.

A'SHES.† n. s. [Goth. atzo, azgo, dust, Sax. ascan, Dutch asche.] Dr. Johnson says, the word wants the singular. But it is common, in the singular, in the North of England; and we say, in colloquial language, "burnt to an ash." So likewise in the compound ash-tub, and in others (like it) forgotten or little used, as ash-hole.

1. The remains of any thing burnt.

Some relics would be left of it, as when ashes remain of burnt bodies. Digby on Bodies.

This late dissension, grown between the peers,

Burns under feigned ashes of forg'd love,
And will at last break out into a flame. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

Ashes contain a very fertile salt, and are the best manure for cold lands, if kept dry, that the rain doth not wash away their salt. Mortimer, Husband.

2. The remains of the body; often used in poetry for the carcase, from the ancient practice of burning the dead.

Poor key-cold figure of a holy king!

Pale ashes of the house of Lancaster!

Thou bloodless remnant of that royal blood! Shakespeare.

To great Lærtæ's I bequeath

A task of grief, his ornaments of death;

A S I

Lest, when the fates his royal ashes claim,
The Grecian matrons taint my spotless name. Pope.

A'SHILAR. n. s. [with masons.] Free stones as they come out of the quarry, of different lengths, breadths, and thicknesses.

A'SHLERING. n. s. [with builders.] Quartering in garrets, about two foot and a half or three foot high, perpendicular to the floor, and reaching to the underside of the rafters. Builder's Dict.

A'SHWEED. n. s. [from ash and weed.] An herb.

A'SHY.† adj. [from ash.]

1. Ash-coloured; pale; inclining to a whitish grey.

Oft have I seen a timely parted ghost

Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless. Shakespeare.

2. Turned into ashes.

That self-begotten bird

In the Arabian woods embost,

That no second knows nor third,

And lay ere while a holocaust,

From out her ashy womb now teem'd,

Revives, reflowerishes, then vigorous most,

When most unactive deem'd. Milton, S. A. v. 1703.

A'SHY-PALE.* adj. Pale as ashes.

Still is he sullen, still he low'rs and frets,

'Twixt crimson shame and anger, ashy-pale!

Shakespeare, Ven. and Adonis.

A'SIAN.* adj. Relating to Asia.

Their lordships may object

Our not denying the same late request

Unto the Asian cities. B. Jonson, Sejanus.

Ignatius, taking his last leave of the Asian churches, as he went to martyrdom, exhorted them to adhere close to the written doctrine of the apostles. Milton of Reform. in Eng. v.

ASIA'TICK.* adj. Respecting Asia.

Queen Berenice, and her train of women, among whom, no doubt, all the Roman and Asiatick fashion of improved beauty did appear. Bp. Taylor, Art of Handsoneness, p. 82.

When peace, ease, and plenty took away these whetstones of courage and emulation, they insensibly slid into the Asiatick softness, and were intent upon nothing but their cooks, and their ragouts, their fine attendants, and unusual habits.

South, Sermon, iv. 73.

ASIA'TICK.* n. s. A native or inhabitant of Asia.

Such are the fanatick dogmata of the Alcoran, credited by most Asiaticks. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 330.

ASIA'TICISM.* n. s. Imitation of the Asiatick manner or custom.

Nor is this fantastick imagery the only mark of asiaticism, which appears in the Runick odes.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. i. Diss. 1.

AS'IDE. adv. [from a and side.]

1. To one side; out of the perpendicular direction.

A S K

The storm rush'd in, and Arcite stood aghast;
The flames were blown aside, yet shone they bright,
Fann'd by the wind, and gave a ruffled light. Dryden.

1. To another part; out of the true direction.

He had no brother; which though it be a comfortable thing for kings to have, yet it draweth the subjects eyes a little aside.
Bacon.

3. From the company; as, to speak aside.

He took him aside from the multitude. Mark, vii. 33.

A'SINARY. adj. [asinarius, Lat.] Belonging to an ass.
Dict.

A'SININE.† adj. [Fr. asinin, from asinus, Lat.] Belonging to an ass.

You shall have more ado to drive our dullest and laziest youth, our stocks and stubs, from the infinite desire of such a happy nurture, than we have now to hale and drag our choicest and hopefulest wits to that asinine feast of sow-thistles and brambles. Milton on Education.

This one act
Of his, to let his wife out to be courted,
And at a price, proclaims his asinine nature
So loud, as I am weary of my title to him.

B. Jonson, Devil's an Ass. i. 6.
They petitioned his majesty, in most lowly manner, to commiserate their asinine miseries, if not to conclude and end them.
Trans. of Boccacini, (1626,) p. 212.

To ASK. v. a. [ajcian, Saxon.]

1. To petition; to beg: sometimes with an accusative only; sometimes with for.

When thou dost ask me blessing, I'll kneel down,
And ask of thee forgiveness. Shakspeare.

We have nothing else to ask, but that
Which you deny already: yet will ask,
That, if we fail in our request, the blame
May hang upon your hardness. Shakspeare.
In long journeys, ask your master leave to give ale to the horses. Swift.

2. To demand; to claim: as, to ask a price for goods.

Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife. Genesis, xxxiv. 12.

He saw his friends, who, whelm'd beneath the waves,
Their funeral honours claim'd, and ask'd their quiet graves.
Dryden, Aeneid.

3. To question.

O inhabitant of Aroer, stand by the way and espy, ask him that flieth, and her that escapeth, and say, what is done?
Jeremiah, xlviii. 19.

4. To enquire; with after before the thing.

He said, wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name?
And he blessed him there. Genesis, xxxii. 29.

5. To require, as physically necessary.

As it is a great point of art, when our matter requires it, to enlarge and veer out all sail; so to take it in and contract it, is no less praise when the argument doth ask it. B. Jonson.

A lump of ore in the bottom of a mine will be stirred by two men's strength; which, if you bring it to the top of the earth, will ask six men to stir it. Bacon.

The administration passes into different hands at the end of two months, which contributes to dispatch: but any exigence of state asks a much longer time to conduct any design to its maturity. Addison.

To ASK. v. n.

1. To petition; to beg: with for before the thing.

My son, hast thou sinned? do so no more, but ask pardon for thy former sins. Ecclus. xxi. 1.

If he ask for bread, will he give him a stone? Matt. vii. 9.

2. To make enquiry; with for or of before the thing.
To enquire.

Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls. Jerem. vi. 16.

For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there bath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it. Deut. iv. 32.

A S K

ASK, ASH, As, do all come from the Saxon ærc, an ash tree. Gibson's Camden.

ASK.* n. s. See ASKER, a water newt.

ASK'ANCE.† } adv. [Dutch, schuin. See SQUINT.

ASK'ANCE. } Mr. Tooke considers it a participle, aschained, aschuins; citing the Dutch verb schuizen, to cut awry, as well as the obvious derivation of squint. Our old dictionaries define askance to be asquint; and the best illustration of this word, which can be adduced, is Milton's usage of it,
where he describes Satan turning aside from a view which he could not steadily behold.] Sideways; obliquely.

Zelmang, keeping a countenance askance, as she understood him not, told him, it became her evil. Sidney.

His wannish eyes upon them bent askance,
And when he saw their labours well succeed,
He wept for rage, and threaten'd dire mischance. Fairfax.

Some say, he bid his angels turn askance
The poles of earth, twice ten degrees, and more,
From the sun's axle; they with labour push'd
Oblique the centrick globe. Milton.

Aside the devil turn'd
For envy, yet with jealous leer malign
Ey'd them askance, and to himself thus plain'd.

Milton, P. L. iv. 502.
ASKA'UNT. adv. Obliquely; on one side.

At this Achilles roll'd his furious eyes,
Fix'd on the king askaunt; and thus replies,
O, impudent. Dryden, Iliad, b. 1.

Since the space, that lies on either side
The solar orb, is without limits wide,
Grant that the sun had happen'd to prefer
A seat askaunt, but one diameter:
Lost to the light by that unhappy place,
This globe had laid a frozen lonesome mass. Blackmore.

A'SKER. n. s. [from ask.]

1. Petitioner.

* Have you
Ere now denied the asker? and, now again
On him that did not ask, but mock, bestow. Shakspeare, Corio.
The greatness of the asker, and the smallness of the thing asked, had been sufficient to enforce his request. South.

2. Enquirer.

Every asker being satisfied, we may conclude, that all their conceptions of being in a place are the same. Digby of Bodies.

A'SKER.† n. s. [Written and pronounced also ask, as well as asker, in our northern countries. Mr.
Boucher considers the word of Celtic origin;
Dr. Jamieson refers it to the Sax. asex, Germ.
aidex.] A water newt.

ASK'EW.† adv. [from a and skew, Dr. Johnson says; yet, in his dictionary, we seek in vain for skew; but he means skue. Goth. skū, partic. disjunct. sket, oblique. V. Serenius, Swed. Dict.
Mr. Tooke refers to the Danish skiev, crooked.
Barret, in his old dictionary, defines the word,
"to cast a wanton eye upon one; to look askew."]]

1. Aside; with contempt, or envy.

For when ye mildly look with lovely hue,
Then is my soul with life and love inspir'd:
But when ye lowre, or look on me askew,
Then do I die. Spenser, Sonn. 7.

He looked askew upon him, as one he envied or hated.
Bp. Patrick on 1 Sam. xviii. 9.

Then take it, Sir, as it was writ,
Nor look askew at what it saith;
• There's no petition in it. Prior.

2. Obliquely; out of the regular way.

All things are now discovered to proceed askew, the round world and all. Gayton, Notes on D. Quixote, p. 39.

To ASLA'KE.† v. a. [Sax. aslacian.] To remit; to mitigate; to slacken. Obsolete.

But this continual, cruel, civil war,
No skill can stint, nor reason can aslake. Spenser.
Whilst seeking to aslake thy raging fire,
Thou in me kindest much more great desire. Spenser.

Liberty of speaking — is but a slender revenge for so great a wrong as ill government; yet such as, by giving vent to the boiling fumes of hatred, doth evaporate and aslake that heat, which otherwise would flame out into fire and mischief.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

ASLA'NT. adv. [from a and slant.] Obliquely; on one side; not perpendicularly.

There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shews his hoar leaves in the glassy stream. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

He fell; the shaft
Drove through his neck aslant; he spurns the ground,
And the soul issues through the weazon's wound. Dryden.

ASLE'EP.† adv. [On sleep. Sax. aslaben.]

1. Sleeping; at rest.
How many thousands of my poorest subjects
Are at this hour asleep? O gentle sleep,
Nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee! Shakspeare.
The diligence of trade, and noise of gain,
And luxury more late asleep were laid;
All was the night's, and, in her silent reign,
No sound the rest of nature did invade. Dryden.

There is no difference between a person asleep, and in an apoplexy, but that the one can be awaked, and the other cannot. Arbuthnot on Duct.

2. To sleep.
If a man watch too long, it is odds but he will fall asleep. Bacon, Ess.

Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By whispering winds soon lull'd asleep. Milton.

3. It is used figuratively for the dead.
The earth shall restore those that are asleep in her. 2 Esdras, vii. 32.

I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. 1 Thess. iv. 13.

ASLO'PE.† adv. [from a and slope, Dr. Johnson says; but of slope, he tells us, no satisfactory original is found; though he thinks the original may be latent in loopen, Dutch, to run; slope being easy to the runner. It is rather to be referred, with the adverb before us, to the Sax. aslupan, to slide, to slip away.] With declivity; obliquely; not perpendicularly.

Set them not upright, but aslope, a reasonable depth under the ground. Bacon.

The curse aslope
Glanc'd on the ground; with labour I must earn
My bread: what harm? Idleness had been worse:
My labour will sustain me. Milton.

The knight did stoop
And sate on further side aslope. Hudibras.

ASLU'G.* adv. [from a and slug.] In a heavy, sluggish manner. An unusual word.

[He] drags on muddy shore his boat,
That comes aslug against the stream. Fotherby's Atheomastix, p. 338.

ASO'MATOUS. adj. [from a priv. and σῶμα, a body.] Incorporeal, or without a body.

ASP. } n. s. [aspis, Lat.] A kind of serpent,
A'SPICK. } whose poison kills without a possibility of applying any remedy. It is said to be very small, and peculiar to Egypt and Lybia. Those that are bitten by it, die within three hours; and the manner of their dying being by sleep without any pain, Cleopatra chose it. Calmet.

High-minded Cleopatra, that with stroke
Of aspes sting herself did kill. Spenser, F. Q. i. v. 50.
Scorpion, and asp, and amphibæna dire,
And dipsas. Milton, P. L. x. 524.

ASP. n. s. A tree. See ASPEN.

ASPA'LATHUS. n. s. [Latin.]

1. A plant called the rose of Jerusalem, or our lady's rose.

2. The wood of a prickly tree, heavy, oleaginous, somewhat sharp and bitter to the taste. Aspalathus affords an oil of admirable scent, reputed one of the best perfumes. Chambers.

I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and aspalathus, and I yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh. Ecclus. xxiv.

ASPA'RAGUS.† n. s. [Gr. ἀσπράγος, Lat. asparagus, Fr. asparage. Formerly called sparage, and now corruptly sparagrass.] The name of a plant. It has a rosaceous flower of six leaves, placed orbicularly, out of whose centre rises the pointal, which turns to a soft globular berry, full of hard seeds. Miller.

Asparagus affects the urine with a fetid smell, especially if cut when they are white; and therefore have been suspected by some physicians, as not friendly to the kidneys; when they are older, and begin to ramify, they lose this quality; but when they are not so agreeable. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

A'SPECT. n. s. [aspectus, Lat. It appears anciently to have been pronounced with the accent on the last syllable, which is now placed on the first.]

1. Look; air; appearance.
I have presented the tongue under a double aspect, such as may justify the definition, that it is the best and worst part. Governant of the Tongue.

They are in my judgement, the image or picture of a great ruin, and have the true aspect of a world lying in its rubbish. Burnet's Theory.

2. Countenance; look.
Those eyes of thine from mine have drawn salt tears,
Sham'd their aspects with store of childish drops. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

I am fearful: wherefore frowns he thus? Shakspeare.
'Tis his aspect of terror. All's not well.

Yet had his aspect nothing of severe,
But such a face as promis'd him sincere. Dryden.

Then shall thy Craggs (and let me call him mine)
On the east ore another Pollio shine;
With aspect open shall erect his head. Pope.

3. Glance; view; act of beholding.
Fairer than fairest, in his faining eye,
Whose sole aspect he counts felicity. Spenser.
When an envious or an amorous aspect doth infect the spirits of another, there is joined both affection and imagination. Baron, Nat. Hist.

4. Direction towards any point; view; position.

The setting sun
Slowly descended; and with right aspect
Against the eastern gate of paradise,
Levell'd his evening rays. Milton, P. I.

I have built a strong wall, faced to the south aspect with brick. Swift.

5. Disposition of any thing to something else; relation.

The light got from the opposite arguing of men of parts, shewing the different sides of things, and their various aspects and probabilities, would be quite lost, if every one were obliged to say after the speaker. Locke.

6. Disposition of a planet to other planets.

There's some ill planet reigns,
I must be patient till the heavens look
With an aspect more favourable. Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

Not unlike that which astrologers call a conjunction of planets, of no very benign aspect the one to the other. Wolton.

A S P

To the blank moon

Her office they prescrib'd : to th' other five
Their planetary motions, and aspects,

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite. Milton, P. L.
Why does not every single star shed a separate influence, and have aspects with other stars of their own constellation?

Bentley, Serm.

To ASPE'CT. v. a. [aspicio, Lat.] To behold: not used.

Happy in their mistake, those people whom
The northern pole aspects; whom fear of death
(The greatest of all human fears) ne'er moves. Temple.
